1615.—"The inhabitants do nightly house their goats and sheepe for fear of Iaccals (in my opinion no other than Foxes), whereof an infinite number do lurke in the obscure vauls."—Sundys, Relation, &c., 205.

1616.—"... those Jackalls seem to be wild Doggs, who in great companies run up and down in the silent night, much disquieting the peace thereof, by their most hideous noise."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 371.

1653.—"Le schekal est un espece de chien sauvage, lequel demeure tout le jour en terre, et sort la nuit cent trois fois sur quatre a certaines heures."—De la Boulangere, Gotz, ed. 1657, p. 254.

1672.—"There is yet another kind of beast which they call Jackals; they are horribly greedy of man's flesh, so the inhabitants beset the graves of their dead with heavy stones."—Baldens (Germ. ed.), 422.

1673.—"An Hellish concert of Jackals (a kind of Fox)."—Feger, 53.

1681.—"For here are many Jackalls, which catch their Hens, some Tygers that destroy their Cattle; but the greatest of all is the King; whose endeavour is to keep them poor and in want."—Know, Ceylon, 87. On p. 20 he writes Jacobs.

1711.—"Jackals are remarkable for Howling in the Night; one alone making as much noise as three or four Curr Dogs, and in different Notes, as if there were half a dozen of them got together."—Lockyer, 382.

1810.—Colebrooke (Essays, ii. 109, [Life, 185]) spells shakal. But Jackal was already English.

c. 1816.—
"The jackal's troop, in gather'd ery, Bayed from afar, complainingly.
Siège de Corinth, xxxiiii.

1850.—"The mention of Jackal-hunting in one of the letters (of Lord Minto) may remind some Anglo-Indians still living, of the days when the Calcutta hounds used to throw off at gun-fire."—Sat. Rev. Feb. 14.

JACK-SNIPE of English sportmen is Gallinago gallinula, Linn., smaller than the common snipe, G. scolopacinus, Bonap.

JACKASS COPAL. This is a trade name, and is a capital specimen of Hobson-Johnson. It is, according to Sir R. Burton, [Zanzibar, i. 357], a corruption of chaldzi. There are three qualities of copal in the Zanzibar market. 1. Sendarazi witi, or 'Tree Copal,' gathered directly from the tree which exudes it (Trachyclobinium Mossambicense). 2. Chaldzi or chaldzi, dug from the soil, but seeming of recent origin, and priced on a par with No. 1. 3. The genuine Sendarazi, or true Copal (the Animé of the English market), which is also fossil, but of ancient production, and bears more than twice the price of 1 and 2 (see Sir J. Kirk in J. Linn. Soc. [Botany] for 1871). Of the meaning of chaldzi we have no authentic information. But considering that a pitch made of copal and oil is used in Kutch, and that the cheaper copal would naturally be used for such a purpose, we may suggest as probable that the word is a corr. of jahdzi, and = 'ship-copal.'

JACQUETE, Town and Cape, n.p. The name, properly Jakad, formerly attached to a place at the extreme west horn of the Kathëwâr Peninsula, where stands the temple of Dwarka (q.v.). Also applied by the Portuguese to the Gulf of Cutch. (See quotation from Camoes under DIUL-SIND.) The last important map which gives this name, so far as we are aware, is Aaron Arrowsmith's great Map of India, 1816, in which Dwarka appears under the name of Juggut.

1525.—(Meloquyaz) "holds the revenue of Crystina, which is in a town called Zaguite where there is a place of Pilgrimage of gentoon which is called Crystna. . . ."— Le paysanns des Comans du India, 35.

1553.—"From the Diul estuary to the Point of Jaquete 39 leagues; and from the same Jaquete, which is the site of one of the principal temples of that heathenism, with a noble town, to our city Din of the Kingdom of Guzarat, 58 leagues."—Barros, i. ix. 1.

1555.—"Whilst the tide was at its greatest height we arrived at the gulf of Chakad, where we satisfied of signs of fine weather, such as sea-horses, great snakes, turtles, and sea-weeds."—Sidé, i. iv, p. 77.

1563.—"Passed the point of Jacquette, where is that famous temple of the Resibutos (see RAPOOT)."—Barros, iv. iv. 4.

1726.—In Valentyn's map we find Jaquite marked as a town (at the west point of Kathëwâr) and Epecado de Jaquete for the Gulf of Cutch.

1727.—"The next sea-port town to Bact, is Jigat. It stands on a Point of low Land, called Cape Jigat. The City makes a good Figure from the Sea, showing 4 or 5 high Steeples."—A. Hamilton, i. 153; [ed. 1711].

1813.—"Jigat Point . . . on it is a pagoda; the place where it stands was formerly called Jigat More, but now by the Hindoos Doreut (i.e. Dwarka, q.v.). At a distance the pagoda has very much the appearance of a ship under sail. . . . Great numbers of pilgrims from the interior visit Jigat pagoda. . . ."—Milburn, i. 150.

1811.—"Jigat Point called also Dwarka, from the large temple of Dwarka standing near the coast."—Horsburgh, Directory, 5th ed., i. 480.

JADE, s. The well-known mineral, so much prized in China, and so wonderfully wrought in that and other Asiatic countries; the yasham of the Persians; nephrite of mineralogists.

The derivation of the word has been the subject of a good deal of controversy. We were at one time inclined to connect it with the yada-tash, the yada stone used by the nomads of Central Asia in conjuring for rain. The stone so used was however, according to P. Hyakinth, quoted in a note with which we were favoured by the lamented Prof. Anton Schieffer, a bezoar (q.v.).

Major Raverty, in his translation of the Tubabat-i-Nāṣir, in a passage referring to the regions of Tukharistān and Bāmīān, has the following: "That tract of country has also been famed and celebrated, to the uttermost parts of the countries of the world, for its mines of gold, silver, rubies, and crystal, bejada [jade], and other [precious] things" (p. 421). On bejada his note runs: "The name of a gem, by some said to be a species of ruby, and by others a species of sapphire; but jade is no doubt meant." This interpretation seems however chiefly, if not altogether, suggested by the name; whilst the epithets compounded of bejada, as given in dictionaries, suggest a red mineral, which jade rarely is. And Prof. Max Müller, in an interesting letter to the Times, dated Jan. 10, 1880, states that the name jade was not known in Europe till after the discovery of America, and that the jade brought from America was called by the Spaniards piedra de ijada, because it was supposed to cure pain in the groin (Sp. ijada); for like reasons to which it was called lapis nephriticus, whence nephrite (see Bailey, below). Skeat, s.v. says: "It is of unknown origin; but probably Oriental. Prof. Cowell finds yalā a material out of which ornaments are made, in the Divyāvadāna; but it does not seem to be Sanskrit." Prof. Müller's etymology seems incontrovertible; but the present work has afforded various examples of curious etymological coincidences of this kind. [Prof. Max Müller's etymology is now accepted by the N.E.D. and by Prof. Skeat in the new edition of his Concise Dict. The latter adds that ijada is connected with the Latin ilia.]

[1595.—"A kind of greene stones, which the Spaniards call Piedras bijadas, and we use for samlene stone."—Raleigh, Discov. Guiana, 24 (quoted in N.E.D.).]

1799.—"Jade, a greenish Stone, bordering on the colour of Olive, esteemed for its Hardness and Virtues by the Turks and Poles, who adorn their fine Sabres with it: and said to be a preservative against the nephritick Colick."—Bailey's Eng. Dict., s.v.

[1826.—"Pray, sir," said the barber, "is that Sanskrit, or what language?" "May be it is jadoo." I replied, in a solemn and deep voice."—Pandurang Har, ed. 1873, i. 127.]

JADOOGUR, s. Properly Hind. jādāghar, "conjuring-house" (see the last). The term commonly applied by natives to a Freemasons' Lodge, when there is one, at an English station. On the Bombay side it is also called Shaitān khāna (see Burton's Sind Revisited), a name consonant to the ideas of an Italian priest who intimated to one of the present writers that he had heard the raising of the devil was practised at Masonic meetings, and asked his friend's opinion as to the fact. In S. India the Lodge is called Tubai-ṛtta-Koril, "Cut-head Temple," because part of the rite of initiation is supposed to consist in the candidate's head being cut off and put on again.

JAFNA. JAFNAPATĀM. n.p. The very ancient Tamil settlement, and capital of the Tamil kings on the singular peninsula which forms the northernmost part of Ceylon. The real name is, according to Emerson Tenenent, Yalpannam, and it is on the whole probable that this name is identical with the Galbe (Prom.) of Prolency. [The Mitras Gloss gives the Tamil name as Yikcapam from yikha-pam, a lute-player": "called after a blind minstrel of that name from the Chola country, who by permission of the Singhalese king obtained possession of Jaffna, then uninhabited, and introduced there a colony of the Tamil people."] 1553.—"... the Kingdom Triquinamal, which at the upper end of its coast adjoins another called Jafnapatam, which stands at the northern part of the Island."—Barros, III, ii, cap. i.

c. 1556.—In Côr do Federec it is written Gianifapanat.—Ramusio, iii, 390.
JAGHEER. Cocoa-Nut.Cb

JAGHER, JAGHIRE. 446

[JAFFRY. s. A screen or lattice-work, made generally of bamboo, used for various purposes, such as a fence, a support for climbing plants, &c. The ordinary Pers. jafer is derived from a person of the name of Jafer; but Mr. Platts suggests that in the sense under consideration it may be a corr. of Ar. џafid, џafir, 'a braided lock.'

[1832.—"Of vines, the branches must also be equally spread over the jaffry, so that light and heat may have access to the whole."—Trans. Agr. Hort. Soc. Ind. ii. 202.]

JAGGERY, s. Coarse brown (or almost black) sugar, made from the sap of various palms. The wild date tree (Phoenix sylvestris, Roxb.), Hind. kharuf, that is, which chiefly supplies palm-sugar in Guzerat and Coromandel, and almost alone in Bengal. But the palmyra, the caryota, and the coco-palm all give it; the first as the staple of Tinnevelly and northern Ceylon; the second chiefly in southern Ceylon, where it is known to Europeans as the Jaggery Palm (kitäl of natives); the third is much drawn for toddy (q.v.) in the coast districts of Western India, and this is occasionally boiled for sugar. Jaggery is usually made in the form of small round cakes. Great quantities are produced in Tinnevelly, where the cakes used to pass as a kind of currency (as cakes of salt used to pass in parts of Africa, and in Western China), and do even yet to some small extent. In Bombay all rough unrefined sugar-stuff is known by this name; and it is the title under which all kinds of half-prepared sugar is classified in the tariff of the Railways there. The word jaggery is only another form of sugar (q.v.), being like it a corr. of the Skt. śarkara, Konkani sakbard, [Malayal. chakkard, whence it passed into Port. jagara, jagra].

1516.—"Sugar of palms, which they call xagara."—Barbosa, 39.

1553.—Exports from the Maldives "also of fish-oil, coco-nuts, and jagara, which is made from these after the manner of sugar."—Barros, Dec. Ill. li. iii. cap. 7.

1561.—"Jagre, which is sugar of palm-trees."—Correa, Lendas, i. 2, 592.

1563.—"And after they have drawn this pot of gura, if the tree gives much they draw another, of which they make sugar, prepared either by sun or fire, and this they call jagra."—García, f. 67.

c. 1567.—"There come every yeere from Cochin and from Cananor tenne or fifteene great Shipspe (to Chaul) laden with great nuts ... and with sugar made of the selfe same nuts called Giagra."—Caesar Frederico, in Halli. ii. 344.

1598.—"Of the aforesaid sura they likewise make sugar, which is called jagra; they seeth the water, and set it in the sun, whereas it becometh sugar, but it is little esteemed, because it is of a browne colour."—Linschoten, 102; [Hak. Soc. ii. 49].

1616.—"Some small quantity of wine, but not common, is made among them; they call it Ruak (see ARRACK), distilled from Sugar, and a spiey rinde of a tree called Jagra."—Terry, ed. 1695, p. 365.

1727.—"The Produce of the Samorin's Country is . . . Coco-Nut, and that tree produceeth Jaggery, a kind of sugar, and Copern (see COPRAH), or the kernels of the Nut dried."—A. Hamilton, i. 506; [ed. 1744, i. 308].

1750-60.—"Arrack, a coarse sort of sugar called Jagree, and vinegar are also extracted from it" (coco-palm).—Grose, i. 43.

1807.—"The Turi or fermented juice, and the Jaggery or inspissated juice of the Palmyra tree . . . are in this country more esteemed than those of the wild date, which is contrary to the opinion of the Bengalese."—F. Buchanan, Myzore, &c., i. 5.

1860.—"In this state it is sold as jaggery in the bazaars, at about three farthings per pound."—Tennent's Ceylon, iii. 524.

JAGHEER, JAGHIRE, s. Pers. jâfîr, lit. 'place-holding.' A hereditary assignment of land and of its rent as annuity.

[1617.—"Hee quites dierers small Jaggers to the King."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 449.]

c. 1666.—". . . Not to speak of what they finger out of the Pay of every Horsemman, and of the number of the Horses; which certainly amounts to very considerable Pensions, especially if they can obtain good Jaghirs, that is, good Lands for their Pensions."—Berner, E.T. 66; [ed. Constable, 213].

1673.—"It (Surat) has for its Maintenance the Income of six Villages; over which the Governor sometimes presides, sometimes not, being in the Jaggea, or diocese of another."—Fryer, 120.

"Jageeb, an Annuity."—Ibid. Index, vi.

1768.—"I say, Madam, I know nothing of books; and yet I believe upon a land-carriage fishery, a stamp act, or a jaghire, I can talk my two hours without feeling the want of them."—Mr. Lofty, in The Good-Natured Man, Act ii.
1778.—"Should it be more agreeable to the parties, Sir Matthew will settle upon Sir John and his Lady, for their joint lives, a jaghire.

"Sir John.—A Jaghire?"

"Thomas.—The term is Indian, and means an annual Income."—Fort. The Nabob, i. 1.

We believe the traditional stage pronunciation in these passages is Jag Hire (assonant in both syllables to jolly-boat). This is also the pronunciation given in some dictionaries.

1778.—"... Jaghires, which were always rents arising from lands."—Obre, ed. 1803, ii. 52.

1809.—"He was nominally in possession of a larger jaghire."—Ind. Palat. Hist., i. 401.

A territory adjoining Fort St. George was long known as the Jaghire, or the Company's Jaghire, and is often so mentioned in histories of the 18th century. This territory, granted to the Company by the Nabob of Arcot in 1750 and 1763, nearly answers to the former Collectorate of Chen- gulpur and present Collectorate of Madras.

[1900.—"No doubt upon the occasion of Lord Curzon's introduction to the Waziris and the Mohmuns, he will inform their Jagirs that he has long since written a book about them."—Contemporary Rec., Aug. p. 292.]

JAGHEERDAR. s. P.—H. jagir-dar, the holder of a jagheer.

[1813.—"... in the Maratha empire the principal Jaghireddars, or nobles, appear in the field. ..."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 328.]

1826.—"The Resident, many officers, men of rank ... jagheerddars. Brahmins, and Pandits, were present, assembled round my father."—Pandurang Hari, 359: ed. 1873, ii. 259.

1833.—"The Sikhs administered the country by means of jagheerddars, and paid them by their jagheers: the English administered it by highly paid British officers, at the same time that they endeavoured to lower the land-tax, and to introduce grand material reforms."—Bosworth Smith, L. of Ed. Lawrence, i. 378.

JAIL-KHANA. s. A hybrid word for 'a gaol,' commonly used in the Bengal Presidency.

JAIN, s. and adj. The non-Brahmanical sect so called; believed to represent the earliest heretics of Buddhism, at present chiefly to be found in the Bombay Presidency. There are a few in Mysore, Canara, and in some parts of the Madras Presidency, but in the Middle Ages they appear to have been numerous on the coast of the Peninsula generally. They are also found in various parts of Central and Northern India and Behar. The Jains are generally merchants, and some have been men of enormous wealth. (see Colebrooke's Essays, i. 375 seqq.; [Lassen, in Ind. Antiq. ii, 193 seqq., 258 seqq.].) The name is Skt. jaina, meaning a follower of jina. The latter word is a title applied to certain saints worshipped by the sect in the place of gods; it is also a name of the Buddhists. An older name for the followers of the sect appears to have been Nirgrantha, 'without bond;' properly the title of Jain ascetics only (otherwise Yatte, [and in particular of the Digambera or 'sky-clad,' naked branch].) (Burnell, S. Indian Palaeography, p. 47, note.)

[c. 1590.—"Jaina. The founder of this wonderful system was Jina, also called Arhat, or Arhat."—Jin, ed. Jarret, iii. 188.]

JALEEBOTE. s. Jallebeet. A marine corruption of jolly-boat (Rosebud). (See GALLEVAT.)

a. A title borne by certain chiefs in Kutch, in Kathiawar, and on the lower Indus. The derivation is very obscure (see Elliot, i. 495). The title is probably Bilach originally. There are several Jams in Lower Sind and its borders, and notably the Jam of Las Bela State, a well-known dependency of Kelat, bordering the sea. [Mr. Longworth Dames writes: 'I do not think the word is of Balochi origin, although it is certainly made use of in the Balochi language. It is rather Sindhi, in the broad sense of the word, using Sindhi as the natives do, referring to the tribes of the Indus valley without regard to the modern boundaries of the province of Sindh. As far as I know, it is used as a title, not by Baloches, but by indigenous tribes of Rajo or Jat origin, now, of course, all Musalmans. The Jam of Las Bela belongs to a tribe of this nature known as the Jammat. In the Dera Ghazi Khan District it is used by certain local notables of this class, none of them Baloches. The principal tribe there using it is the Udhana. It is also an honorific title among the Mochis of Dera Ghazi Khan town.']
b. A nautical measure. Ar. ẓām, pl. ẓāwām. It occurs in the form ge'm in a quotation of 1614 under JASK. It is repeatedly used in the Mokhī of Sīdī 'Ali, published in the J. As. Soc. Bengal. It would appear from J. Prinsep's remarks there that the word is used in various ways. Thus Baron J. Hammer writes to Prinsep: Concerning the measure of ẓāwām the first section of the II'd. chapter explains as follows: The ẓām is either the practical one (ṣāfī) or the rhetorical (ṣīštāḥ—this however, the acute Prinsep suggests should be ṣāštāḥ, pertaining to the divisions of the astrolabe). The practical one is one of the 8 parts into which day and night are divided; the rhetorical (but read the astrolabe) is the 8th part of an inch (ṣāštā) in the ascension and declension of the stars; an explanation which helps me not a bit to understand the true measure of a ẓām, in the reckoning of a ship's course. Prinsep then elucidates this: The ẓām in practical parlance is said to be the 8th part of day and night; it is in fact a nautical watch or Hindu pahar (see PUHUR). Again, it is the 8th part of the ordinary inch, like the jau or barleycorn of the Hindus (the 8th part of an angul or digit), of which jau, ẓām is possibly a corruption. Again, the ṣibāh or inch, and the ẓām or 2 of an inch, had been transferred to the rude angle-instruments of the Arab navigators; and Prinsep deduces from statements in Sīdī 'Ali's book that the ṣibāḥ was very nearly equal to 96' and the ẓām to 18'. Prinsep had also found on enquiry among Arab mariners, that the term ẓām was still well known to nautical people as 1/ of a geographical degree, or 12 nautical miles, quite confirmatory of the former calculation; it was also stated to be still applied to terrestrial measurements (see J.A.S.B. v. 642-3).

1013.—"J'ai déjà parlé de Sērina (read Sarbasa) qui est située à l'extrémité de l'île de Lāmūri, à cent-vingt ẓāmā de Kala."—Ajā'īb al-Hind, ed. Van der Līth et Marcel Decrè. 176.

"Un marin m'a rapporté qu'il avait fait la traversée de Sērina (Sarbasa) à la Chine dans un Šinbob (see SAMBOOK). "Nous avions parcouru," dit-il, "un espace de cinquante zāmā, lorsqu'une tempête fondit sur notre embarcation. ... Ayant fait de l'eau, nous remîmes à la voile vers le Šenf, suivant ses instructions, et nous y abordâmes sans en sauver, après un voyage de quinze zāmā."—Ibid. pp. 190-91.

1554.—"26th Voyage from Calicut to Kardafān" (see GUARDAFUI). . . . you run from Calicut to Kolfānī (i.e. Ka鳌enī, one of the Laccadive Isds.) two zāms in the direction of W. by S., the 8 or 9 zāms to W.S.W. (this course is in the 9 degree channel through the Laccadives), then you may rejoice as you have got clear of the islands of Fāl, from thence W. by N. and W.N.W. till the pole is 4 inches and a quarter, and then true west to Kardafān."

The meaning of this last point is: Steer S.S.E. till you are in S. N. Lat. (lat. of Cæs Camorin); make then a little more easterly, but keep 72 miles between you and the coast of Ceylon till you find the β and γ of Ursa Minor have an altitude of only 12° 24' (i.e. till you are in N. Lat. 6° or 5'), and then steer due easterly. When you have gone 216 miles you will be quite clear of Ceylon."

1625.—"We cast anchor under the island of Kharg, which is distant from Cais, which we left behind us, 24 giam. Giam is a measure used by the Arab and Persian pilots in the Persian Gulf; and every giam is 24 lengths; insomuch as from Cais to Kharg we had made 72 lengths."—P. della Valle, ii. 516.

JAMBOO, JUMBOO, s. The Rose-apple, Eugenia jambos, L. Jambosa vulgaris, Decand.; Skt. jambā, Hind. jam, jambā, jumrāl, &c. This is the use in Bengal, but there is great confusion in application, both colloquially and in books. The name jambā is applied in some parts of India to the exotic guava (q. v.), as well as to other species of Eugenia; including the jīmūn (see JAMOON), with which the rose-apple is often confounded in books. They are very different fruits, though they have both been classed by Linnaeus under the genus Eugenia (see further remarks under JAMOON). [Mr. Skoat notes that the word is applied by the Malays both to the rose-apple and the guava, and Wilkinson (Dict. s.v.) notes a large number of fruits to which the name jambh is applied."

Garcia de Orta mentions the rose-apple under the name Iambos, and says (1563) that it had been recently introduced into Goa from Malacca. This may have been the Eugenia Malaccensis, L., which is stated in Forbes Watson's Catalogue of nomenclature to be called in Bengal Malaka Jamrā, and in Tamil Malakā maram i.e. Malacca tree. The Skt. name jambh is, in the Malay language, applied with distinguishing adjectives to all the species.

1672. — P. Vincezno Maria describes the Giambo d'India with great precision, and also the Giambo di China—no doubt J. malaccensis—but at too great length for extract, pp. 351-352.

1727.—"Their Jambo Malaca (at Goa) is very beautiful and pleasant."—A. Hamilton, i. 255; [ed. 1744, i. 255.]

JAMES AND MARY, n.p. The name of a famous sand-bank in the Hooghly R. below Calcutta, which has been fatal to many a ship. It is mentioned under 1748, in the record of a survey of the river quoted in Long, p. 10. It is a common allegation that the name is a corruption of the Hind. words jal mari, with the supposed meaning of 'dead water.' But the real origin of the name dates, as Sir G. Birdwood has shown, out of India Office records, from the wreck of a vessel called the "Royal James and Mary," in September 1694, on that sand-bank (Letter to the Court, from Chuttnatter, Dec. 19, 1694). [Report on Old Records, 90.] This shoal appears by name in a chart belonging to the English Pilot, 1711.

JAMMA, s. P.—H. jama, a piece of native clothing. Thus, in composition, see PYJAMMAS. Also stuff for clothing, &c., e.g. mom-jama, wax-cloth. "The jama may have been brought by the Aryans from Central Asia, but as it is still now seen it is thoroughly Indian and of ancient date" (Rajendralala Mitra, Indo-Aryans, i. 187 seq.).

[1513.—"The better sort (of Hindus) wear . . . a jama, or long gown of white calico, which is tied round the middle with a fringed or embroidered sash."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 52].

JAMMOO. s. Hind. jaman, jaman, jaml, &c. The name of a poor fruit common in many parts of India, and apparently in E. Africa, the Eugenia jambolana, Lamk. (Calyptranthes jambolana of Willdenoy, Syzygium jambolanum of Decand.) This seems to be confounded with the Eugenia jambos, or Rose-apple (see JAMBOO, above), by the author of a note on Leyden's Baber which Mr. Erksine justly corrects (Baber's own account is very accurate), by the translators of Ibn Batuta, and apparently, as regards the botanical name, by Sir R. Burton. The latter gives jaml as the Indian, and zam as the Arabic name. The name jambh appears to be applied to this fruit at Bombay, which of course promotes the confusion spoken of. In native practice the stones of this fruit have been alleged to be a cure for diabetes, but European trials do not seem to have confirmed this.

C. 13.—"The inhabitants (of Mombasa) gather also a fruit which they call jaman, and which resembles an olive; it has a stone like the olive, but has a very sweet taste."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 191. Elsewhere the translators write el enham, (iii. 128, iv. 114, 220), a spelling indicated in the original, but surely by some error.

C. 1590.—"Another is the jaman. . . . It is on the whole a fine looking tree. Its fruit resembles the black grape, but has a more acid taste, and is not very good."—Baker, 325. The note on this runs: "This, Dr. Hunter says, is the Eugenia Jambolana, the rose-apple (Eugenia jambolana, but not the rose-apple, which is now called Eugenia jambura.—D.W.). The jaman has no resemblance to the rose-apple; it is more like an oblong sloe than anything else, but grows on a tall tree."

1593.—"I will eat of those olives, — at least they look like such; but they are very astrigent (jamchous) as if biting — and yet they do look like ripe Cordova olives."

"O. They are called jambolones, and grow wild in a wood that looks like a myrtle grove; in its leaves the tree resembles the arbatus; but like the jack, the people of the country don't hold this fruit for very wholesome."—Garcia, i. 119.
1859.—“The Indian jamli. . . It is a noble tree, which adorns some of the coast villages and plantations, and it produces a damson-like fruit, with a pleasant sub-acid flavour.”—Burton, in J.R.G.S. ix. 36.

JANCADA, s. This name was given to certain responsible guides in the Nair country who escorted travellers from one inhabited place to another, guaranteeing their security with their own lives, like the Bhâts of Guzerat. The word is Malâyâl. chanâdâm (i.e. changâdâm, [the Madras Gloss. writes chanâdûm, and derives it from Skt. sanghâta, ‘union’]), with the same spelling as that of the word given as the origin of jangar or jangada, ‘a raft.’ These jancadas or jangadas seem also to have been placed in other confidential and dangerous charges. Thus:

1543.—“This man who so resolutely died was one of the jangadas of the Pagode. They are called jangades because the kings and lords of those lands, according to a custom of theirs, send as guardians of the houses of the Pagodes in their territories, two men as captains, who are men of honour and good cavaliers. Such guardians are called jangadas, and have soldiers of guard under them, and are as it were the Counsellors and Ministers of the affairs of the pagode, and they receive their maintenance from the establishment and its revenues. And sometimes the king changes them and appoints others.”—Correa, iv. 328.

c. 1610.—“I travelled with another Captain . . . who had with him these Jangai, who are the Nair guides, and who are found at the gates of towns to act as escort to those who require them. . . . Every one takes them, the weak for safety and protection, those who are stronger, and travel in great companies and well armed, take them only as witnesses that they are not aggressors in case of any dispute with the Nairs.”—Pyrrard de Laval, ch. xxv.; [Hak. Soc. i. 339, and see Mr. Gray’s note in loco].

1672.—“The safest of all journeyings in India are those through the Kingdom of the Nairs and the Samorin, if you travel with Giancasadas, the most perilous if you go alone. These Giancasadas are certain heathen men, who venture their own life and the lives of their kinsfolk for small remuneration, to guarantee the safety of travellers.”—P. Vincenzo Maria, 127.

JANGAR, s. A raft. Port. jangada. ["A double platform canoe made by placing a floor of boards across two boats, with a bamboo ralling.” (Madras Gloss.)] This word, chiefly colloquial, is the Tamil-Malâyâl. shangâdâm, chanâdâm (for the derivation of which see JANCADA). It is a word of particular interest as being one of the few Dravidian words, [but perhaps ultimately of Skt. origin], preserved in the remains of classical antiquity, occurring in the Periplus as our quotation shows. Bluteau does not call the word an Indian term.

c. 80-90.—“The vessels belonging to those places (Camara, Pedow, and Sapotama on the east coast) which hug the shore to Limyriez (Dimyrice), and others also called Zâγγaρa, which consist of the largest canoes of single timbers lash'd together; and again those biggest of all which sail to Chryse and Ganges, and are called Kolardiofôwra.”—Periplus, in Muller’s Geog. Gr. Min., i. The first part of this name for boats or ships is most probably the Tam. lânda:—Pinto, Translations of the Jângadâm—boat.”—Barnett, S.I. Palaeography, 612.

c. 1504.—“He held in readiness many jangadas of timber.”—Correa, Lendas, i. 476.

c. 1540.—“. . . to that purpose had already commanded two great Rafts (jangadas), covered with dry wood, barrels of pitch and other combustible stuff, to be placed at the entering into the Port.”—Pisto (orig. cap. xlvii.), in Cogan, p. 56.

1553.—“. . . the fleet . . . which might consist of more than 200 rowing vessels of all kinds, a great part of them combined into jangadas in order to carry a greater mass of men, and among them two of these contrivances on which were 150 men.”—Barros, ii. ii. 5.

1598.—“Such as stayed in the ship, some toke bords, deals, and other pceces of wood, and bound them together (which ye Portugals call jangadas) every man what they could catch, all hoping to save their lives, but of all those there came but two men safe to shore.”—Linckschen, p. 147; [Hak. Soc. ii. 181; and see Mr. Gray on Pyrard de Loual, Hak. Soc. i. 53 seq.].

1602.—“For his object was to see if he could rescue them in jangadas, which he ordered him immediately to put together of bankls, planks, and oars.”—Conto, Dec. iv. iv. cap. 10.

1756.—“. . . having set fire to a jungudo of Boats, these driving down towards the Fleet, compelled them to weigh.”—Capt. Jackson, in Dalrymple’s Or. Rep. i. 199.

c. 1790.—“Sangarie.” See quotation under HACKERY.

c. 1783.—“Nous nous remimes en chemin à six heures du matin, et passâmes la rivière dans un sangarie ou canot fait d’un palmier croussé.”—Hausser, ii. 77.

JAPAN, n.p. Mr. Giles says: "Our word is from Jeh-pun, the Dutch orthography of the Japanese Ni-pon." What the Dutch have to do with the matter is hard to see. ["Our word 'Japan' and the Japanese Nihon or Nippon, are alike corruptions of Ji-hen, the Chinese pronunciation of the characters (meaning) literally 'sun-origin.'" (Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 221.)] A form closely resembling Japan, as we pronounce it, must have prevailed, among foreigners at least, in China as early as the 13th century; for Marco Polo calls it Chipang-u or Jipan-ku, a name representing the Chinese Zhi-p'yan-Kue (Sun-origin-Kingdom), the Kingdom of the Sunrise or Extreme Orient, of which the word Nipon or Niphon, used in Japan, is said to be a dialectic variation. But as there was a distinct gap in Western tradition between the 14th century and the 16th, no doubt we, or rather the Portuguese, acquired the name from the traders at Malacca, in the Malay forms, which Crawford gives as Jipung and Japang.

1506.—"... and not far off they took a ship belonging to the King of Calichut: out of which they have brought me certain jewels of good value; including Mecece, pearls worth 8,900 ducats: also three astrological instruments of silver, such as are not used by our astrologers, large and well-wrought, which I hold in the highest estimation. They say that the King of Calichut had sent the said ship to an island called Saponin to obtain the said instruments."

1521.—"In going by this course we passed near two very rich islands: one is in twenty degrees latitude in the antarctic pole, and is called Cipanghu."—Pigafetta, Magellan’s Voyage, Hak. Soc., 67. Here the name appears to be taken from the chart or Mappe-Monde which was carried on the voyage. Cipanghu appears by that name on the globe of Martin Behaim (1492), but 20 degrees north, not south, of the equator.

mai or Kiang-mai, &c., is so called in narratives of the 17th century. Serious efforts to establish trade with this place were made by the E.I. Company in the early part of the 17th century, of which notice will be found in Purchas, Pilgrimage, and Sainsbury, e.g. in vol. i. (1614), pp. 311, 325: (1615) p. 425; (1617) ii. p. 90. The place has again become the scene of commercial and political interest; an English Vice-Consulate has been established; and a railway survey undertaken. [See Hallett, A Thousand Miles on an Elephant, 74 seq.]

c. 1544.—"Out of this Lake of Singu-pamor... do four very large and deep rivers proceed, whereof the first... runneth Eastward through all the Kingdoms of Sornau and Siam... the second, Jangumaa... disim boring into the Sea by the Bar of Martaban in the Kingdom of Pegu. ..."—Pinto (in Cogn. 165).

1553.—(Barros illustrates the position of the different kingdoms of India by the figure of a (left) hand, laid with the palm downwards) "And as regards the western part, following always the sinew of the forefinger, it will correspond with the ranges of mountains running from north to south along which lie the kingdom of Avá, and Bremá, and Jangomá."—III. ii. 5.

c. 1557.—"I went from Pegu to Jamayheyn, which is in the Country of the Langvimanes, whom we call Jangomes; it is five and twenty days journey to Northeast from Pegu... Hither to Jamayheyn come many Merchants out of China, and bring great store of Muske, Gold, Silver, and many things of China works."—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii.

c. 1606.—"But the people, or most part of them, fled to the territories of the King of Jangoma, where they were met by the Padre Friar Francisco, of the Annunciation, who was there negotiating..."—Bocarro, 186.

JARGON, JARCOON, ZIRCON. 452 JARGON, JARCOON, ZIRCON.
The name of a precious stone often mentioned by writers of the 16th century, but respecting the identity of which there seems to be a little obscurity. The English Encyclopædia, and the Times Reviewer of Emanuel's book On Precious Stones (1866), identify it with the hyacinth or jacinth; but Lord Stanley of Alderley, in his translation of Barbos (who mentions the stone several times under the form giaonza and jagonza), on the authority of a practical jeweller identifies it with corundum. This is probably an error. Jagonza looks like a corruption of jacinthus. And Hauty's Mineralogy identifies jargon and hyacinth under the common name of zircon. Dana's Mineralogy states that the term hyaicinth is applied to these stones, consisting of a silicate of zirconia, "which present bright colours, considerable transparency, and smooth shining surfaces. . . . The variety from Ceylon, which is colourless, and has a smoky tinge, and is therefore sold for inferior diamonds, is sometimes called jargon" (Syst. of Mineral., 3d ed., xxiv. 789 seq.]).
The word probably comes into European languages through the Span. azarcon, a word of which there is a curious history in Dozy and Engelmann. Two Spanish words and their distinct Arabic originals have been confounded in the Span. Dict. of Cobarruvias (1611) and others following him. Sp. zarcon is 'a woman with blue eyes,' and this comes from Ar. zarka, fem. of azrak, 'blue.' This has led the lexicographers above retained to astray, and azarcon has been by them defined as a 'blue earth, made of burnt lead.' But azarcon really applies to 'red-lead,' or vermilion, as does the Port. zarelo, azrelo, and its proper sense is as the Dict. of the Sp. Academy says (after repeating the inconsistent explanation and etymology of Cobarruvias), "an intense orange-colour, Lat. color auras." This is from the Ar. zarkān, which in Ibn Batigh is explained as synonymous with solīkān, and asraŋ,
"which the Greeks call sandis," i.e. cinnabar or vermillion (see Sonthei-mer's Ehm Beithar, i. 44, 530). And the word, as Dozy shows, occurs in Pliny under the form sycirim (see quotations below). The eventual etyology is almost certainly Persian, either zarγān, 'gold colour,' as Marcel Devic suggests, or azargān (perhaps more properly azargān, from azār, 'fire'), 'flame-colour,' as Dozy thinks.

JAROOL. s. The _Lagerstroemia reginae_, Roxb. H.-Beng. _jarūl, jīrāl_. A tree very extensively diffused in the forests of Eastern and Western India and Pegu. It furnishes excellent boat-timber, and is a splendid flowering tree. "An exceeding glorious tree of the Concan jungles, in the month of May robed as in imperial purple, with its terminal panicles of large showy purple flowers. JASQUE, JASQUES, CAPE, n.p. Ar. Rūs dūshak, a point on the eastern side of the Gulf of Oman, near the entrance to the Persian Gulf, and 6 miles south of a port of the same name. The latter was frequented by the vessels of the English Company whilst the Portuguese held Ormus. After the Portuguese were driven out of Ormus (1629) the English trade was moved to Gombroon (q.v.). The peninsula of which Cape Jask is the point, is now the terminus of the submarine cable from Bushire; and a company of native infantry is quartered there. _dūshak_ appears in Yākūt as "a large island between the land of Oman and the Island of Kish." No island corresponds to this description, and probably the reference is an incorrect one to _Jask_ (see _Dict. de la Perse_, p. 149). By a curious misapprehension, Cape Jasques seems to have been Englished as Cape James (see Dunn's _Or. Navigator_. 1750, p. 94).

of which the origin is unknown to the same meaning. The initial ya in Bengali is usually pronounced ja.

The root is ya, ‘to go.’ It is, or was, applied to a small palankin carriage, such as is commonly used by business men in going to their offices, &c.

JAVA, n.p. This is a geographical name of great antiquity, and occurs, as our first quotation shows, in Ptolomy’s Tables. His 1aJašisov represents with singular correctness what was probably the Prakrit or popular form of Yava-dVipa (see under DIU and MALDIVES), and his interpretation of the Sanskrit is perfectly correct. It will still remain a question whether Yava was not applied to some cereal more congenial to the latitude than barley,* or was (as is possible) an attempt to give an Indian meaning to some aboriginal name of similar sound. But the sixth of our quotations, the transcript and translation of a Sanskrit inscription in the Museum at Batavia by MR. HOLLE, which we owe to the kindness of Prof. KERN, indicates that a signification of wealth in cereals was attached to the name in the early days of its Indian civilization. This inscription is most interesting, as it is the oldest dated inscription yet discovered upon Javanese soil. Till a recent time it was not known that there was any mention of Java in Sanskrit literature, and this was so when Lassen published the 2nd vol. of his Indian Antiquities (1849). But in fact Java was mentioned in the Rāmajyana, though a perverted reading disguised the fact until the publication of the Bombay edition in 1863. The passage is given in our second quotation; and we also give passages from two later astronomical works whose date is approximately known. The Yava-Koti, or JAVA Point of these writers is understood by Prof. Kern to be the eastern extremity of the island.

* The Teutonic word Gars affords a handy instance of the varying application of the name of a cereal to that which is, or has been, the staple grain of each country. Gars in England familiarly means ‘wheat’; in Scotland ‘oats’; in Germany ‘rye’; in America ‘maize.’

We have already (see BENJAMIN) alluded to the fact that the terms Jāva, Jāwai were applied by the Arabs to the Archipelago generally, and often with specific reference to Sumatra. Prof. Kern, in a paper to which we are largely indebted, has indicated that this larger application of the term was originally Indian. He has discussed it in connection with the terms “Golden and Silver Islands” (Suvarṇa āśīra and Kṛṣṇa āśīra), which occur in the quotation from the Rāmajyana, and elsewhere in Sanskrit literature, and which evidently were the basis of the Chryse and Argyre, which take various forms in the writings of the Greek and Roman geographers. We cannot give the details of his discussion, but his condensed conclusions are as follows:—

1. Suvarṇa āśīra and Yava-āśīra were according to the prevalent representations the same; 2. Two names of islands originally distinct were confounded with one another; 3. Suvarṇa-āśīra in its proper meaning is Sumatra, Yava-āśīra in its proper meaning is Java; 4. Sumatra, or a part of it, and Java were regarded as one whole, doubtless because they were politically united; 5. By Yava-koti was indicated the east point of Java.

This Indian (and also insular) identification, in whole or in part, of Sumatra with Java explains a variety of puzzles, e.g. not merely the Arab application of Java, but also the ascription, in so many passages, of great wealth of gold to Java, though the island, to which that name properly belongs, produces no gold. This tradition of gold-produce we find in the passages quoted from Ptolomy, from the Rāmajyana, from the Holle inscription, and from Marco Polo. It becomes quite intelligible when we are taught that Java and Sumatra were at one time both embraced under the former name, for Sumatra has always been famous for its gold-production.

1503.—The Syrian Bishops Thomas, Jaballaha, Jacob, and Denha, sent on a mission to India in 1503 by the (Nestorian) Patriarch Elias, were ordained to go "to the land of the Indians and the islands of the seas which are between Dabag and Sin and Masin (see MACHEEN)."—Assemant, III. Pt. i. 592. This Dabag is probably a relic of the Zabai, or the Relation, of Mas'āf, and of Al-biruni.

1516.—"Further on ... there are many islands, small and great, amongst which is one very large which they call Java the Great. ... They say that this island is the most abundant country in the world. ... There grow pepper, cinnamon, ginger, bamboo, cubes, and gold."—Barbosa, 107.

Referring to Sumatra, or the Archipelago in general.

Saka, 575, i.e. A.D. 656.—"The Prince Adityadharmā is the Deva of the First Java Land (prathama Yavadvā). May he be great! Written in the year of Saka, 575. May it be great!"—From a Sunakrit Inscription from Pegu-Ruyong, in Menang Karbau (Sumatra), publ. by Friedrich, in the Batavian Transactions, vol. xxiii.

1224.—"Ma'bar (q.v.) is the last part of India; then comes the country of China (Sin), the first part of which is Jawa, reached by a difficult and fatal sea."—Yaḥat, l. 516.

"This is some account of remotest Sin, which I record without vouching for its truth ... for in sooth it is a far off land. I have seen no one who had gone to it and penetrated far into it; only the merchants seek its outlying parts, to wit the country known as Jawa on the sea-coast, like to India; for it are brought Aloe-wood (ud), camphor, and nard (samul), and clove, and mace (basbasa), and China drugs, and vessels of china-ware."—Ibid. iii. 445.
Kazvin speaks in almost the same words of Jawa. He often copies Yākīt, but perhaps he really means his own time (for he uses different words) when he says: "Up to this time the merchants came no further into China than to this country (Jawa) on account of the distance and difference of religion"—ii. 18.

1298.—"When you leave this Island of Pentan and sail about 100 miles, you reach the Island of Java the Less. For all its name 'tis none so small but that it has a compass of 2000 miles or more. "" &c.—Marco Polo, bk. iii. ch. 9.

e. 1300.—" . . . In the mountains of Java scented woods grow. . . . The mountains of Jawa are very high. It is the custom of the people to puncture their hands and entire body with needles, and then rub in some black substance."—Rashid-uddin, in Elliot, i. 71.

1328.—"There is also another exceeding great island, which is called Jawa, which is in circuit more than seven [thousand?] miles as I have heard, and where are many world's wonders. Among which, besides the finest aromatic spices, this is one, to wit, that there be found yagy men. . . . There are also trees producing cloves, which when they are in flower emit an odour so pungent that they kill every man who cometh among them, unless he shut his mouth and nostrils. . . . In a certain part of that island they delight to eat white and fat men when they can get them. . . ."—Frier Jordanus, 30-31.

e. 1330.—"Parmi les isles de la Mer de l'Inde il faut citer celle de Djawah, grande isle celebre par l'abondance de ses drognes . . . au sud del'isle de Djawah on remarque la ville de Fansour, d'où le camphre Fansouiri tire son nom."—Geogr. d'Aboulfeda, II. pt. ii. 127. [See CAMPHOR].

e. 1346.—"After a passage of 25 days we arrived at the Island of Jawa, which gives its name to the luhak jāriy (see BENJAMIN). . . . We thus made our entrance into the capital, that is to say the city of Sumatra; a fine large town with a wall of wood and towers also of wood."—Ihn Batuta, iv. 228-229.

1553.—"And so these, as well as those of the interior of the Island (Sumatra), are all dark, with lank hair, of good nature and countenance, and not resembling the Javanese, although such near neighbours, indeed it is very notable that at so small a distance from each other their nature should vary so much, all the more because all the people of this Island call themselves by the common name of Jaws (Jāis), because they hold it for certain that the Javanese (or Jāos) were formerly lords of this great Island."—Barros, III. v. 1.

1555.—"Beyond the Island of Java they sailed along by another called Bali; and then came also unto other called Ajuan, Cambaj, Solor . . . . The course by these islands is about 500 leagues. The ancient cosmographers call all these Islands by the name Iaous; but late experience hath found the names to be very driers as you see."—Antonio Galvano, old E.T. in Hakl. iv. 423.

1856.—"It is a saying in Goozcrat,— 'Who goes to Java Never returns. If by chance he return, Then for two generations to live upon, Money enough he brings back.'"—Rās Māla, ii. 82; [ed. 1878, p. 418].

JAVA-RADISH. s. A singular variety (Raphanus caudatus, L.) of the common radish (R. sativus, L.), of which the pods, which attain a foot in length, are eaten and not the root. It is much cultivated in Western India, under the name of mugra [see Baddi-Powell, Punjab Products, i. 260]. It is curious that the Hind, name of the common radish is mālā, from māl, 'root,' exactly analogous to radish from radīx.

JAVA-WIND. s. In the Straits Settlements an unhealthy south wind blowing from the direction of Java is so called. (Compare SUMATRA, b.)

JAWAUB, s. Hind. from Ar. jawāb, 'an answer.' In India it has, besides this ordinary meaning, that of 'dismissal.' And in Anglo-Indian colloquial it is especially used for a lady's refusal of an offer; whence the verb passive 'to be jawaub.' [The Jawaub Club consisted of men who had been at least half a dozen times jawaub'd.]

1830.—"The Juwawb'd Club," asked Elsmere, with surprise, 'what is that?' "'Tis a fanciful association of those melancholy candidates for wedlock who have fallen in their pursuit, and are smarting under the sting of rejection."—Orient. Sport. Mag., reprint 1873, i. 424.

Jawāb among the natives is often applied to anything erected or planted for a symmetrical double, where "Grove nodes at grove, each alley has a brother, And half the platform just reflects the other."

"In the houses of many chiefs every picture on the walls has its jawāb (or duplicate). The portrait of Scindiah now in my dining-room was the jawāb (copy in fact) of Mr. C. Landseer's picture, and hung opposite to the original in the Darbar room" (M.-Gen. Koating). ["The masjid with three domes of white marble occupies the left wing and has a counterpart (jawab) in a precisely similar building on the right hand side of the Taj. This last is sometimes called the false masjid; but it is in no sense dedicated to religious purposes."—Führer. Monumental Antiquities, N. W. P., p. 64.]

JAY. s. The name usually given by Europeans to the Coracias India. Linna., the Nilkanth, or 'blue-throat' of the Hindus, found all over India.

[1875.—"They are the commonality of birddom, who furnish forth the mobs which bewilders the drunk-en-lighted jay when he jerks, shrieking in a series of blue hyphens-flashes through the air. . ."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden. 3.]

JEEL. s. Hind. jhil. A stagnant sheet of inundation: a mere or lagoon. Especially applied to the great sheets of remnant inundation in Bengal. In Eastern Bengal they are also called bheel (q.v.).

[1757.—"Towards five the guard waked me with notice that the Nawab would presently pass by to his palace of Mootee jeel. Holbein's Letter of Feb. 26. in Wheeler, Early Records, 250.]

The Jhil of Silhet are vividly and most accurately described (though the word is not used) in the following passage:—

c. 1778.—"I shall not therefore be disbelieved when I say that in pointing my boat towards Syhet I had recourse to my compass, the same as at sea, and steered a straight course through a lake not less than 100 miles in extent, occasionally passing through villages built on artificial mounds: but so scanty was the ground that each house had a cane attached to it,"—Hon. Robert Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsay's, iii. 106.

1824.—"At length we . . . entered what might be called a sea of reeds. It was, in fact, a vast jeel or marsh, whose tall rushes rise above the surface of the water, having depth enough for a very large vessel. We sailed briskly on, rustling like a greyhound in a field of corn."—Hober, i. 101.

1850.—"To the geologist the Jheels and Sunderbunds are a most instructive region, as whatever may be the mean elevation of their waters, a permanent depression of 10 to 15 feet would submerge an immense tract."—Hector's Hindustan Journal, ed. 1855, ii. 265.

1858.—"You attribute to me an act, the credit of which was due to Lieut. George Hutchinson, of the late Bengal Engineers.* That able officer, in company with the late Colonel Berkeley, H.M. 32nd Regt., laid out the defences of the Alum Bagh camp, remarkable for its bold plan, which was so well devised that, with an apparently dangerous extent, it was defensible at every point by the small but ever ready force under Sir James Outram. A long interval . . . was defended by a post of support called 'Moir's Picket' . . . covered by a wide expanse of jheel, or lake, resulting from the rainy season. Foreseeing the probable drying up of the water, Lieut. Hutchinson, by a clever inspiration, marched all the transport elephants through and through the lake, and when the water disappeared, the dried clay-bed, pierced into a honey-combed surface of circular holes a foot in diameter and two or more feet deep, became a better protection against either cavalry or infantry than the water had been. . . .—Letter to Lt.-Col. P. R. Innes from F. M. Lord Napier of Magdala, dd. April 15.

Jheel and bheel are both applied to the artificial lakes in Central India and Bundelkhand.

JEETUL. s. Hind. jital. A very old Indian denomination of copper coin, now entirely obsolete. It long survived on the western coast, and the name was used by the Portuguese for one of their small copper coins in the forms cülä and cöitä. It is doubtful, however, if cülä is the same word. At least there is a medieval Portuguese coin called cüilit and cüitil (see Fernandes, in Memorias da Academia Real das Sciencias de Lisboa, 2da Classe, 1856); this may have got confounded with the Indian Jital. The jital of the Delhi coinage of Ala-ud-din (c. 1300) was, according to Mr. E. Thomas's calculations, 1/24 of the silver tanga, the coin called in later days the rupee. It was therefore just the equivalent of our modern piece. But of course, like most modern denominations of coin, it has varied greatly.

c. 1193.—"According to Kuth-ud-Din's command, Nizam-ud-Din Mohammad, on his return, brought them (the two slaves) along with him to the capital. Dillih; and Malik Kuth-ud-Din purchased both the Turks for the sum of 100,000 jital."—Racoon. Tabakat-i-Nisiri, p. 603.

c. 1260.—"In the same year . . . there was dearth in Dehli. and grain rose to a jital per sir (see SEER)."—Zia-ud-din Barni, in Elisir, iii. 146.

JEHAUD. 458  JEMADAR, JEMAUTDAR.

c. 1340.—"The dirhem saltdni is worth ¼ of the dirhem ashtalatesti, ... and is worth 3 fals, whilst the jital is worth 4 fals; and the dirhem hashtkanil, which is exactly the silver dirhem of Egypt and Syria, is worth 32 fals."—Shahâbadin, in Notices et Extraits, xii. 212.

1554.—In Sunda. "The cash (caixas) here go 120 to the tanga of silver; the which caixas are a copper money larger than ceitila, and pierced in the middle, which they say have come from China for many years, and the whole place is full of them."—A. Nunez, 42.

c. 1590.—"For the purpose of calculation the dam is divided into 25 parts, each of which is called a jital. This imaginary division is only used by accountants."—Ain, ed. Blochmann, i. 31.

c. 1750-60.—"At Carwar 6 pieces make the juttal, and 48 juttals a Pagoda."—Grose, i. 282.

JEHAUD, s. Ar. jidâd, [an effort, a striving]; then a sacred war of Musulmans against the infidel; which Sir Herbert Edwardes called, not very neatly, 'a crescentade.'

[c. 630 a.D.—"Make war upon such of those to whom the Scriptures have given who believe not in God, or in the last day, and who forbid not that which God and his Prophet have forbidden, and who profess not the profession of the truth, until they pay tribute (jizyâd) out of hand, and they be humbled."—Korân, Surah ix. 29.]

1880.—"When the Athenians invaded Ephesus, towards the end of the Peloponnesian War, Tissaphernes offered a mighty sacrifice at Artemis, and raised the people in a sort of Jehad, or holy war, for her defence."—Set. Recueil, July 17, 84b.

[1901.—'The matter has now assumed the aspect of a 'Schad,' or holy war against Christianity.'—Times, April 4.]

JELAUBEE, s. Hind. jûlebî, [which is apparently a corruption of the Ar. zalâbiya, P. zalabîya]. A rich sweetmeat made of sugar and ghee, with a little flour, melted and trickled into a pan so as to form a kind of interlaced work, when baked.

[1870.—'The poison is said to have been given once in sweetmeats, Jelabees.'—Cheers, Med. Jurisp. 178.]

JELLY, s. In South India this is applied to vitrified brick refuse used as metal for roads. [The Madras Gloss, gives it as a synonym of kunkur.] It would appear from a remark of C. P. Brown (MS. notes) to be Tehugu zalli, Tam. shalli, which means properly 'shivers, bits, pieces.'

JELUM, n.p. The most westerly of the "Five Rivers" that give their name to the Punjab (q.v.), (among which the Indus itself is not usually included). Properly Jilum or Jilam, now apparently written Jillam, and taking this name from a town on the right bank. The Jillam is the Tâdâwyr of Alexander's historians, a name corrupted from the Skt. Vîstulâ, which is more nearly represented by Ptolemy's Bâdâwyr. A still further (Prakritic) corruption of the same is Behut (see BEHUT).

1037.—"Here he (Mahmûd) fell ill, and remained sick for fourteen days, and got no better. So in a fit of repentance he forswore wine, and ordered his servants to throw all his supply ... into the Jillam."—Baghâdâ, in Elliot, ii. 139.

e. 1204.—"... in the height of the conflict, Shams-ud-din, in all his panoply, rode right into the water of the river Jillam ... and his warlike feats while in that water reached such a pitch that he was despatching those infidels from the height of the waters to the lowest depths of Hell ..."—Tabakât, by Râvâyât, 601-5.

1586.—"Hydaspes! often have thy waves run tuned To battle music, since the soldier King, The Macedonian, dipped his golden casque And swam thy swollen flood, until the time When Night the peace-maker, with pious hand, Unclasping her dark mantle, smoothed it soft O'er the pale faces of the brave who slept Cold in their clay, on Chillian's bloody field," The Banyan Tree.

JEMADAR, JEMAUTDAR, &c. Hind. from Ar.—P. jamâ'dar, jamâ' meaning 'an aggregate,' the word indicates generally, a leader of a body of individuals. [Some of the forms are as if from Ar.—P. jamâ'at, 'an assemblage.'] Technically, in the Indian army, it is the title of the second rank of native officer in a company of sepoys, the Sbâdár (see SOUBADAR) being the first. In this sense the word dates from the reorganisation of the army in 1768. It is also applied to certain officers of police (under the dârâgha), of the customs, and of other civil departments. And in larger domestic establishments there is often a jemutdars, who is over the servants generally, or over the stables, camp service and orderlies. It is also an honorific title often used by the other household servants in addressing the bhikshi (see BHEESTY).

1792.—"The English battalion no sooner quitted Trichinopoly than the regent set about accomplishments his scheme of surprising the City, and ... endeavoured to gain 500 of the Nabob's best peons with firelocks. The jemutdars. or captains of these troops, received his bribes and promised to join." —Orme, ed. 1803, i. 257.

1817.—"... Calliaud had commenced an intrigue with some of the jemutdars, or captains of the enemy's troops, when he received intelligence that the French had arrived at Trichinopoly."—Mill, iii. 175.

1824.—"'Abdullah" was a Muslim convert of Mr. Corrie's, who had travelled in Persia with Sir Gore Ouseley, and accompanied him to England, from whence he was sent to Europe, and ... when the Bishop took him into his service as a 'jemutdar,' or head officer of the peons."—Editor's note to Heber, ed. 1841, i. 65.

JENNYE. n.p. Hind. Janai. The name of a great river in Bengal, which is in fact a portion of the course of the Brahmaputra (see BURRAMPOOTER), and the conditions of which are explained in the following passage written by one of the authors of this Glossary many years ago: "In Reannell's time, the Burrampooter, after issuing westward from the Assam valley, swept south-eastward, and forming with the Ganges a fluvial peninsula, entered the sea abreast of that river below Dacca. And so almost all English maps persist in representing it, though this eastern channel is now, unless in the rainy season, shallow and insignificant; the vast body of the Burrampooter cutting across the neck of the peninsula under the name of Jenai, and uniting with the Ganges near Pubna (about 150 miles N. E. of Calcutta), from which point the two rivers under the name of Pudda (Padda) flow on in mighty union to the sea." (Blackwood's Mag., March 1852, p. 338.)

The river is indicated as an offshoot of the Burrampooter in Reennell's Bengal Atlas (Map No. 6) under the name of Jenni, but it is not mentioned in his M. moir of the Map of Hindostan. The great change of the river's course was palpably imminent at the beginning of the last century; for Buchanan (c. 1809) says: "The river threatens to carry away all the vicinity of Dewangunj, and perhaps to force its way into the heart of Nator." (Eastern India, iii. 394; see also 377.) Nator or Nattore was the territory now called Rajshahi District. The real direction of the change has been further south. The Janai is also called the Jumnaud (see under JUMNA). Hooker calls it Jummal (?) noticing that the maps still led him to suppose the Burrampooter flowed 70 miles further east (see Him. Journals, ed. 1855, ii. 250).

JENNYRICKSHAW. s. Read Capt. Gill's description below. Giles states the word to be taken from the Japanese pronunciation of three characters, reading jin-ri-ki-sha, signifying 'Man—Strength—Cart.' The term is therefore, observes our friend E. C. Baker, an exact equivalent of "Pull-man-Car". The article has been introduced into India, and is now in use at Simla and other hill-stations. [The invention of the vehicle is attributed to various people—to an Englishman known as "Public-spirited Smith" (8 ser. Notes and Queries, viii. 325); to native Japanese about 1868-70, or to an American named Goble, "half-cobbler and half-missionary." See Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 236 seq.]

1576.—"A machine called a jinnyrickshaw is the usual public conveyance of Shanghai. This is an importation from Japan, and is admirably adapted for the flat country, where the roads are good, and coolie hire cheap. In shape they are like a buggy, but very much smaller, with room inside for one person only. One coolie goes into the shafts and runs along at the rate of 6 miles an hour; if the distance is long, he is usually accompanied by a companion who runs behind, and they take it in turn to draw the vehicle." —W. Gill, River of Golden Sand, i. 10. See also p. 153.

1850.—"The Kuruma or jin-ri-ki-sha consists of a light perambulator body, an adjustable hood of oiled paper, a velvet or cloth lining and cushion, a well for parcels under the seat, two high slim wheels, and a pair of shafts connected by a bar at the ends." —Miso Bird, Japan, i. 18.

[1855. — "We ... got into rickshaws to make an otherwise impossible descent to JEZYA. s. Ar. āṣṣ̣a. The poll-tax which the Musulman law imposes on subjects who are not Moslems.

c. 1350. — "The Kāzī replied . . . 'No doctor but the great doctor (Hanīf) to whose school we belong, has assented to the imposition of Āṣṣ̣ā on Hindus. Doctors of other schools allow of no alternative but "Death or Islam."'" — Zia-ud-din Barni, in Elliot, iii. 184.

1683. — "Understand what custome ye English paid formerly, and compare ye difference between that and our last order for taking custome and Judaea. If they pay no more than they did formerly, they complain without occasion. If more, write what it is, and there shall be an abatement." — Vizier's Letter to Nābāb, in Judges, Diary, July 18; [Hak. Soc. i. 100].

1686. — "Books of accounts received from Dacca, with advice that it was reported at the Court there that the Poll-money or Judges' lately ordered by the Mogul would be exacted of the English and Dutch. . . . Among the orders issued to Pottama Cossimbazar, and Dacca, instructions are given to the latter place not to pay the Judges' or Poll-tax, if demanded." — Pt. St. Geo. Consuls. (on Tour) Sept. 29 and Oct. 10; Notes and Extracts, No. i. p. 49.

1765. — "When the Hindoo Rajahs . . . submitted to Tamarlane; it was on these capital stipulations: That . . . the emperors should never impose the Jesserah (or poll-tax) upon the Hindoos." — Helywell, Hist. Events, i. 37.

JHAUMP. s. A hurdle of matting and bamboo, used as a shutter or door. Hind. ḍhāṃp, Mahr. ḍhāṇpā; in connection with which there are verbs, Hind. ḍhāṃṇā, ḍhāṇā, ḍhāṃṇā, 'to cover.' See ḍhōprā, s.v. ak; [but there seems to be no etymological connection].

JHOMM, s. ħāṃ. This is a word used on the eastern frontiers of Bengal for that kind of cultivation which is practised in the hill forests of India and Indo-China, under which a tract is cleared by fire, cultivated for a year or two, and then abandoned for another tract, where a like process is pursued. This is the Kamari (see COOMRY) of S.W. India, the Chena of Ceylon (see Emerson Tennent, ii. 463), the tōng-gyan of Burma [Gazetteer, ii. 72, 757, the dañya of North India (Skt. dāk, 'to burn'), pōnām (Tam. pūn, 'inferior'), or pōnacaud (Mal. pūnac-kātu, pūn, 'inferior,' kātu, 'forest') of Malabar]. In the Philippine Islands it is known as gainges; it is practised in the Ardennes, under the name of sartage, and in Sweden under the name of svedjande (see Marsh, Earth as Modified by Human Action, 346).

[1800. — "In this hilly tract are a number of people . . . who use a kind of cultivation called the Colwodle, which a good deal resembles that which in the Eastern parts of Bengal is called Jumea." — Buchanan, MSS., ii. 177.]

1883. — "It is now many years since Government, seeing the waste of forest caused by jumbing, endeavoured to put a stop to the practice . . . . The people jumed as before, regardless of orders." — Indian Agriculturist, Sept. (Calcutta).

1885. — "Juming disputes often arose, one village against another, both desiring to jum the same tract of jungle, and those cases were very troublesome to deal with. The juming season commences about the middle of May, and the air is then darkened by the smoke from the numerous clearings. . . ." (Here follows an account of the process).—Lt.-Col. Levin, A Fly on the Wheel, 348 seq.

JILLMILL, s. Venetian shutters, or as they are called in Italy, persiane. The origin of the word is not clear. The Hind. word 'jhillmālā' seems to mean 'sparkling,' and to have been applied to some kind of gauze. Possibly this may have been used for blinds, and thence transferred to shutters. [So Platts in his H. Dict.]. Or it may have been an onomatopoeia, from the rattle of such shutters; or it may have been corrupted from a Port. word such as jānella, 'a window.' All this is conjecture.

[1832. — "Besides the parades, the openings between the pillars have blinds neatly made of bamboo strips, woven together with coloured cords: these are called jhillmuns or checkes." (See CHICK, a).—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 306.]

1874. — "The front (of a Bengal house) is generally long, exhibiting a pillared verandah, or a row of French casements, and jilling windows." — Cale. Rev. No. exxi. 207.

JOcole. s. We know not what this word is; perhaps 'toys'? [Mr.
W. Foster writes: "On looking up the I.O. copy of the P. St. George Consultations for Nov. 22, 1703, from which Wheeler took the passage, I found that the word is plainly not jocoles, but joculet, which is a not unusual form of chocolate." The N.E. D. s.v. Chocolate, gives as other forms jocollate, jocolatte, jocollat.] 1703. — "... sent from the Patriarch to the Governor with a small present of jocoles, oil, and wines." — In Wheeler, ii. 32.

JOGEE, s. Hind. jogi. A Hindu ascetic; and sometimes a 'conjuror.' From Skt. yogin, one who practises the yoga, a system of meditation combined with austerities, which is supposed to induce miraculous power over elementary matter. In fact the stuff which has of late been propagated in India by certain persons, under the names of theosophy and esoteric Buddhism, is essentially the doctrine of the Jogis.

1413. — "We cast anchor by a little island near the main, Anchidaiva (q.v.), where there was a temple, a grove, and a tank of water. ... We found a jogi leaning against the wall of a budhâna or temple of idols (respecting whom he tells remarkable stories)." — Ibn Batuta, iv. 62-63, and see p. 275.

c. 1412. — "The Inidels are divided into a great number of classes, such as the Bramins, the Joghis and others." — Adi-ramra-zaz, in India in the 17th Cent., 17.

1510. — "The King of the Joghe is a man of great dignity, and has about 30,000 people, and he is a pagan, he and all his subjects; and by the pagan Kings he and his people are considered to be saints, on account of their lives, which you shall hear ..." — Varthema, p. 111. Perhaps the chief of the Gerakhadha Gosains, who were once very numerous on the West Coast, and have still a settlement at Kadri, near Mangalore. See P. della Valle's notice below.

1516. — "And many of them noble and respectable people, not to be subject to the Moors, go out of the Kingdom, and take the habit of poverty, wandering the world ... they carry very heavy chains round their necks and waists, and legs; and they smear all their bodies and faces with ashes, ... These people are commonly called jogaes. In their own speech they are called Zeem (see SWAMY) which means Servant of God. ... These jogues eat all meats, and do not observe any idolatry." — Barbosa, 99-100.

1553. — Much of the general fear that affected the inhabitants of that city (Goa before its capture) proceeded from a Gentoo, of Bengal by nation, who went about in the habit of a Jogue, which is the strictest sect of their Religion ... saying that the City would speedily have a new Lord, and would be inhabited by a strange people, contrary to the will of the natives." — De Barras, Dec. ii. iv. v. cap. 3.

"For this reason the place (Adam's Peak) is so famous among all the Gentile- dom of the East yonder, that they resort thither as pilgrims from more than 1000 leagues off, and chiefly those whom they call Jogues, who, are of a speech who have abandoned the world and dedicated themselves to God, and make great pilgrimages to visit the Temples consecrated to him." — Ibid. Dec. iii. liv. ii. cap. 1.

1563. — "... to make them fight, like the cabras de capello which the jogues carry about asking alms of the people, and these jogues are certain heathen (Gentios) who go begging all about the country, powdered all over with ashes, and venerated by all the poor heathen, and by some of the Moors also, ..." — Garcia, f. 156a, 157.

1567. — "Jogues." See under CASIS. [c. 1610. — "The Gentiles have also their Abedalles (Abd Allah), which are like to our hermits, and are called Jogues." — Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 313.]

1624. — "Finally I went to see the King of the Jogis (Jogghi) where he dwelt at that time, under the shade of a cottage, and I found him roughy occupied in his affairs as a man of the field and husbandman ... they told me his name was Batmato, and that the hermitage and the place generally was called Cadira (Kadri)." — P. della Valle, ii. 724: [Hak. Soc. ii. 350, and see i. 37, 75.]

1625. — "I allude particularly to the people called Jauguis, a name which signifies 'united to God.'" — Brunier, ed. Constable, 316.

1673. — "Near the Gate in a Cholnry sate more than Forty naked Jogies, or men united to God, covered with Ashes and pleitied Turbats of their own Hair." — Fryer, 140.

1727. — "There is another sort called Jougies, who ... go naked except a bit of Cloth about their Loys, and some deny themselves even that, delighting in Nastleness, and an holy Obscenity, with a great

JOMPON.

Show of Sanctity."—A. Hamilton, i. 152;

"Fate work'd its own the while. A band Of Yogues, as they sounded the land Seeking a spouse for Jaga-Naut their God, Stray'd to this solitary glade.

Curse of Kehama, xiii. 16.

c. 1812.—"Scarcely ... were we seated when behold, there poured into the space before us, not only all the Yogues, Fakers, and rogues of that description ... but the King of the Baggars himself, wearing his peculiar badge."—Mrs. Sherwood, (describing a visit to Henry Martyn at Cawnpore), Autobiog., 415.

"Aprē ānā kā jogi ān ānā kā śīlā." Hind. proverb: "The man who is a jogi in his own village is a deity in another."—Quoted by Elliot, ii. 207.

JOHN COMPANY, n.p. An old personification of the East India Company, by the natives often taken seriously, and so used, in former days. The term Company is still applied in Sumatra by natives to the existing (Dutch) Government (see H. O. Forbes, Naturalist's Wanderings, 1885, p. 204). [Dohāi Company Bahūdār kā is still a common form of native appeal for justice, and Company Bāgh is the usual phrase for the public garden of a station. It has been suggested, but apparently without real reason, that the phrase is a corruption of Company Jahan, "which has a fine sounding smack about it, recalling Shah Jehan and Jehangir, and the golden age of the Moguls." (G. A. Sala, quoted in Notes and Queries, 8 ser. ii. 37). And Sir G. Birdwood writes: "The earliest coins minted by the English in India were of copper, stamped with a figure of an irradiated lingom, the phallic 'Roi Soleil.' The mintage of this coin is unknown (I Madras), but without doubt it must have served to ingratiate us with the natives of the country, and may have given origin to their personification of the Company under the potent title of Kumpāni Jehān, which, in English mouths, became 'John Company'." (Report on Old Records, 222, note).]

[1784.—"Further, I knew that as simple Hottentots and Indians could form no idea of the Dutch Company and its government and constitution, the Dutch in India had given out that this was one mighty ruling prince who was called Jan or John, with the surname Company, which also procured for them more reverence than if they could have actually made the people understand that they were, in fact, ruled by a company of merchants."—Andreas Sparrmann, Travels to the Cape of Good Hope, the South-Polar Lands, and round the World, p. 347; see 9 ser. Notes and Queries, vii. 34.]

1803.—(The Nawab) "much amused me by the account he gave of the manner in which my arrival was announced to him. ... "Lord Sahab Ka bhānja, Company ki navatā ābārī līā;" literally translated, 'The Lord's sister's son, and the grandson of the Company, has arrived.'—Lord Valentia, i. 157.

1808.—"However the business is pleasant now, consisting principally of orders to countermand military operations, and preparations to save Johnny Company's cash."—Lord Minto in India, 184.

1818-19.—"In England the ruling power is possessed by two parties, one the King, who is Lord of the State, and the other the House of Lords or Company. The former governs his own country; and the latter, though only subjects, exceed the King in power, and are the directors of mercantile affairs."—Sudāsēth, in Elliot, viii. 411.

1826.—"He said that according to some accounts, he had heard the Company was an old Englishwoman ... then again he told me that some of the Topce wallas say 'John Company,' and he knew that John was a man's name, for his master was called John Brice, but he could not say to a certainty whether 'Company' was a man's or a woman's name."—Pandarung Hari, 60; [ed. 1875, i. 83, in a note to which the phrase is said to be a corruption of Joint Company.]

1836.—"The jargon that the English speak to the natives is most absurd. I call it 'John Company's English,' which rather affronts Mrs. Stauton."—Letters from Madras, 42.

1852.—"John Company, whatever may be his faults, is infinitely better than Downing Street. If India were made over to the Colonial Office, I should not think it worth three years' purchase."—Mem. Col. Mountain, 283.

1888.—"It fared with them as with the sceptics once mentioned by a South-Indian villager to a Government official. Some men had been now and then known, he said, to express doubt if there were any such person as John Company; but of such it was observed that something had soon happened to them."—Sat. Revie, Feb. 14, p. 220.

JOMPON, s. Hind. jānpāṇi, jāpāṇi, [which are not to be found in Platt's Diet.]. A kind of sedan, or portable chair used chiefly by the ladies at the Hill Sanitarium of Upper India. It is carried by two pairs of men (who are called Jompunies, i.e. jānpāṇi or jāpāṇi), each pair bearing on their shoulders a short bar from which the shafts of the chair are slung. There is some perplexity as to the origin of the word. For we find in Crawfurd's Malay Dict. "Jampana (Jav. Jampona), a kind of litter." Also the Javanese Dict. of P. Jansz (1876) gives: "Djem-pana—dragstool (i.e. portable chair), or sedan of a person of rank." [Klinkert has jempana, djempana, sempana as a State sedan chair, and he connects sempana with Skt. sam-panna, 'that which has turned out well, fortunate.' Wilkinson has: "jempana, Skt. a kind of State carriage or sedan for ladies of the court." The word cannot, however, have been introduced into India by the officers who served in Java (1811-15), for its use is much older in the Himalaya, as may be seen from the quotation from P. Desideri.

It seems just possible that the name may indicate the thing to have been borrowed from Japan. But the fact that dpyn means 'hang' in Tibetan may indicate another origin.

Wilson, however, has the following: "Jhampán, Bengal. A stage on which snake-catchers and other juggling vagabonds exhibit; a kind of sedan used by travellers in the Himalaya, written Jāmpaun (?)." [Both Platts and Fallon give the word jhappin as Hind.; the former does not attempt a derivation; the latter gives Hind. jhānp, 'a cover,' and this on the whole seems to be the most probable etymology. It may have been originally in India, as it is now in the Straits, a closed litter for ladies of rank, and the word may have become appropriated to the open conveyance in which European ladies are carried.]

1716.—"The roads are nowhere practicable for a horseman, or for a Jampan, a sort of palankin."—Letter of P. Isidore Desideri, dated April 10, in Lettres Édificantes, t. 184.

1758.—'(After a description) ... by these central poles the litter, or as it is here called, the Sampan, is supported on the shoulders of four men.'—Forster's Journey, ed. 1808, i. 3.

1822.—"The Chumpaun, or as it is more frequently called, the Chumpala, is the usual vehicle in which persons of distinction, especially females, are carried. ..."—Lloyd, Gerard, Narr. i. 105.

1842.—"... a conveyance called a Jaumpaan, which is like a short palankeen, with an arched top, slung on three poles (like what is called a Tonjon in India)."—Elphinstone, Caubul, ed. 1842, i. 137.

1849.—"A Jhappan is a kind of arm chair with a canopy and curtains; the canopy, &c., can be taken off."—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, ii. 103.

1859.—"The gondola of Simla is the jampan or jampot, as it is sometimes called, on the same linguistic principle as that which converts asparagus into sparrow-grass. Every lady on the hills keeps her jampan and jampanees ... just as in the plains she keeps her carriage and footmen."—Letter in Times, Aug. 17.

JOOL. s. Hind. jhūl, supposed by Shakespear (no doubt correctly) to be a corrupt form of the Ar. joll, having much the same meaning; [but Platts takes it from jhūlā, "to dangle"]. Housings, body clothing of a horse, elephant, or other domesticated animal; often a quilt, used as such. In colloquial use all over India. The modern Arabs use the plur. jhūlā as a singular. This Dozy defines as "couverture en laine pliss ou moins ornée de dessins, très large, très chaude et enveloppant le poitrail et la croupe du cheval" (exactly the Indian jhūl)—also "ornement de soie qu'on étend sur la croupe des chevaux aux jours de fête."

1880.—"Horse Jhools. &c., at shortest notice."—Advit. in Madras Mail, Feb. 13.

JOOLA. s. Hind. jhūlā. The ordinary meaning of the word is 'a swing'; but in the Himalaya it is specifically applied to the rude suspension bridges used there.

1812.—"There are several kinds of bridges constructed for the passage of strong currents and rivers, but the most common are the Sāngha and Jhula" [a description of both follows].—Ann. Res. xi. 475.

1850.—"Our chief object in descending to the Satlej was to swing on a Joolah bridge. The bridge consists of 7 grass ropes, about twice the thickness of your thumb, tied to a single post on either bank. A piece of the hollowed trunk of a tree, half a yard long, slips upon these ropes, and from this 4 loops from the same grass rope depend. The passenger hangs in the loops, placing a couple of ropes under each thigh, and holds on by pegs in the block over his head; the signal is given, and he is drawn over by an eighth rope."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 114.

JOSS. s. An idol. This is a corruption of the Portuguese Deus, 'God,' first taken up in the 'Piggin' language. of the Chinese ports from the Portuguese, and then adopted from that jargon by Europeans as if they had got hold of a Chinese word. [See Chin-Chin.]

1659.—"But the Devil (whom the Chinese commonly called the Joosje) is a mighty and powerful Prince of the World."—Walter Schatz, 17.

"In a four-cornered cabinet in their dwelling-rooms, they have, as it were, an altar, and thereon an image ... this they call Josin."—Sear, ed. 1672, p. 27.

1677.—"All the Sinese keep a limning of the Devil in their houses, ... They paint him with two horns on his head, and commonly call him Josie (Joosje)."—Gerret Verwollen, Oost Indische Voyagie, 33.

1711.—"I know but little of their Religion, more than that every Man has a small Joss or God in his own House."—Lockyer, 181.

c. 1730.—"Down with dukes, earls, and lords, those pagan Josses, False gods! Away with stars and strings and crosses."

Peter Pindar, Ode to Kien Long.

1798.—"The images which the Chinese worship are called joostje by the Dutch, and joss by the English seamen. The latter is evidently a corruption of the former, which being a Dutch nickname for the devil, was probably given to these idols by the Dutch who first saw them."—Staunton, E.T. i. 173.

This is of course quite wrong.

Joss-house, s. An idol temple in China or Japan. From joss, as explained in the last article.

1750–52.—"The sailors, and even some books of voyages ... call the pagodas Yoss-houses, for on enquiring of a Chinese for the name of the idol, he answers Grande Yoss, instead of Gran Dios."—Ogil. Toren, 292.

1789–1810.—"On the 8th, 15th, and 28th day of the Moon those foreign barbarians may visit the Flower Gardens, and the Honan Joss-house, but not in dresses of over ten at a time."—8 Regulations 'at Canton, from The Fankwee at Canton (1882), p. 29.

1840.—"Every town, every village, it is true, abounds with Joss-houses, upon which large sums of money have been spent."—Mem. Col. Mountain, 186.

1876.—"... the fantastic gables and tawdry ornaments of a large joss-house, or temple."—Fortnightly Review, No. cxxiii. 222.

1876.—"One Tim Wang he make-stay-travel, Makee stop one night in Joss-house."—Leland, Pidgin-English Sing-Song, p. 42.

Thus also in "pidgin," Joss-house-man or Joss-pidgin-man is a priest, or a missionary.

Jostick, Joss-stick, s. "A stick of fragrant tinder (powdered costus, sandalwood, &c.) used by the Chinese as incense in their temples, and formerly exported for use, as cigar-lights. The name appears to be from the temple use. (See Putchock.)"

1876.—"Burnee joss-stick, talkee plitty."—Leland, Pidgin-English Sing-Song, p. 43.

1879.—"There is a recess outside each shop, and at dusk the joss-sticks burning in these fill the city with the fragrance of incense."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 49.

Jow, s. Hind. jhāā. The name is applied to various species of the shrubby tamarisk which abound on the low alluvials of Indian rivers, and are useful in many ways, for rough basket-making and the like. It is the usual material for gabions and fasces in Indian siege-operations.

[c. 1860.—"... by the natives it is called jhow; but this name is generic, and is applied not only to another species of Tamarisk, but to the Casuarina of Bengal, and to the cone-bearing plants that have been introduced by Europeans."—Buchanan-Hamilton, Eastern India, iv. 357.

1810.—"... on the opposite Jhow, or bastard tamarisk jungle ... a native ... had been attacked by a tiger. ..."—Davidson, Travels, ii. 326.]

Jowaulla Mookhee, n.p. Skt.—Hind. Jwāla-mukhi, 'flame-mouthed'; a generic name for quasi-volcanic phenomena, but particularly applied to a place in the Kangra district of the Punjab mountain country, near the Bias River, where jets of gas issue from the ground and are kept constantly burning. There is a shrine of Devi, and it is a place of pilgrimage famous all over the Himalaya as well as in the plains of India. The famous fire-jets at Baku are sometimes visited by more adventurous Indian pilgrims, and known as the Great Jwāla-mukhi. The author of the following passage was evidently ignorant of the phenomenon worshipped, though the name indicates its nature.

[c. 1360.—"Sultān Firoz ... marched with his army towards Nagarkot (see Nugu-Gurcote) ... the idol Jwāla-mukhi, much worshipped by the infidels, was situated on the road to Nagarkot .... Some of the infidels have reported that Sultan Firoz went specially to see this idol, and held a golden umbrella over its head. But... the infidels slandered the Sultan. Other infidels said that Sultan Muhammad Shah bin Tughlik Shah held an umbrella over this same idol, but this also is a lie,...—Shams-i Siraj Afj', in Elliot, iii. 915.

1769.—... a place called Jalla mookoo, where out of cold Springs and hard Rocks, there are daily to be seen incessant Eruptions of Fire, before which the Infidolatrous people fall down and worship.—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1167.

1783.—"At Taullah Mhookee (sic) a small volcanic fire issues from the side of a mountain, on which the Hindus have raised a temple that has long been of celebrity, and favourite resort among the people of the Punjab."—G. Forster's Journey, ed. 1788, i. 308.

1799.—"Prason Poory afterwards travelled... to the Maha or Buree (i.e. larger) Jowalla Mookhi or Jula Mochi, terms that mean a 'Flaming Mouth,' as being a spot in the neighbourhood of Bakee Bute, on the west side of the (Caspian) Sea... whence fire issues; a circumstance that has rendered it of great veneration with the Hindus."—Jonathan Duncan, in As. Res. v. 41.

JOWAUR, JOWARREE, s. Hind. Jowâr, Jöor; [Skt. Jâpâkátra or Akâra, 'of the nature of barley';] Sorghum vulgare, Pers. (Holcus sorghum, L.) one of the best and most frequently grown of the tall millets of southern countries. It is grown nearly all over India in the unflooded tracts; it is sown about July and reaped in November. The reedy stems are 8 to 12 feet high. It is the chobun of the Tamil regions. The stalks are Kirbee. The Ar. dura or dhara is perhaps the same word ultimately as jowâr; for the old Semitic name is dôn, from the smoky aspect of the grain. It is an odd instance of the looseness which used to pervade dictionaries and glossaries that R. Drummond (Illus. of the Gram. Parts of Guzerattee, &c., Bombay, 1808) calls "Jooar, a kind of pulse, the food of the common people."

[c. 1590.—In Khandesh "Jowari is chiefly cultivated of which, in some places, there are three crops in a year, and its stalk is so delicate and pleasant to the taste that it is regarded in the light of a fruit."—Ain, ed. Jarrett, ii. 223.]

1760.—"En suite mauvais chemin sur des levées faites de boue dans des quarrés de Jouari et des champs de Néelis (see NELLY) remplis d'eau."—Anquetil du Perron, I. cxcxxiii.

1800.—"... My industrious followers must live either upon jowarry, of which there is an abundance everywhere, or they must be more industrious in procuring rice for themselves."—Wellington, i. 175.

1813.—Forbes calls it "jowarry or cushion" (!). [See CUSCUS.]—Dr. Mem. ii. 406; [2nd ed. ii. 35, and 1. 23.]

1819.—"In 178-8 jowarree sold in the Meechoo Kaunta at six rupees per cabal (see CULSEY) of 24 maunds."—Macnurdie, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 257.

[1826.—And the sabre began to cut away upon them as if they were a field of Joaanee (standing corn).—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873 i. 66.]

JOY, s. This seems from the quotation to have been used on the west coast for jœrel (Port. joão).

1510.—"... The vanity of parents sometimes leads them to dress their children, even while infants, in this manner, which affords a temptation... to murder these helpless creatures for the sake of their ornaments or joys."—Marie Graham, 3.

JUBTEE, JUPTEE, &c., s. Guz. japtî, &c. Corrupt forms of zebî, ["Watan-zebî, or zaptî, Mahr., Produce of lands sequestered by the State, an item of revenue; in Guzerat the lands once exempt, now subject to assessment" (Wilson).] (See ZEBT.)

1808.—"The Sindias as Sovereigns of Broach used to take the revenues of Mouj- mocadars and Jowarre (see DESSAYE) of that district every third year, amounting to Rs. 5,390, and called the periodical confiscation Juptee."—R. Drummond. [Majmudâr "in Guzerat the title given to the keepers of the pargana revenue records, who have held the office as a hereditary right since the settlement of Todar Mal, and are paid by fees charged on the villages." (Wilson)]

JUDEA, ODIA, &c., n.p. These names are often given in old writers to the city of Ayuthia, or Ayodhya, or Yuthia (so called apparently after the Hindu city of Râma, Ayodhya, which we now call Oudh), which was the capital of Siam from the 14th century down to about 1767, when it was destroyed by the Burmese, and the Siamese royal residence was transferred to Bangkok [see BANCOCK].

1522.—"All these cities are constructed like ours, and are subject to the King of Siam, who is named Siri Zambedera, and who inhabits Iudia."—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. 150.
JUGGURNAUT. worshipped as Vishnu at the famous shrine of Puri in Orissa. The image so called is an amorphous idol, much like those worshipped in some of the South Sea Islands, and it has been plausibly suggested (we believe first by Gen. Cunningham) that it was in reality a Buddhist symbol, which has been adopted as an object of Brahmanical worship, and made to serve as the image of a god. The idol was, and is, annually dragged forth in procession on a monstrous car, and as masses of excited pilgrims crowded round to drag or accompany it, accidents occurred. Occasionally also persons, sometimes sufferers from painful disease, cast themselves before the advancing wheels. The testimony of Mr. Stirling, who was for some years Collector of Orissa in the second decade of the last century, and that of Sir W. W. Hunter, who states that he had gone through the MS. archives of the province since it became British, show that the popular impression in regard to the continued frequency of immolations on these occasions—a belief that has made Juggurnaut a standing metaphor—was greatly exaggerated. The belief indeed in the custom of such immolation had existed for centuries, and the rehearsal of these or other cognate religious suicides at one or other of the great temples of the Peninsula, founded partly on fact, and partly on popular report, finds a place in almost every old narrative relating to India. The really great mortality from hardship, exhaustion, and epidemic disease which frequently ravaged the crowds of pilgrims on such occasions, doubtless aided in keeping up the popular impressions in connection with the Juggurnaut festival.

JUGBOOLAK. s. Marine Hind. for jack-block (Roebuck).

JUGGURNAUT. n.p. A corruption of the Skt. Jagannatha, 'Lord of the Universe,' a name of Krishna

e. 1546.—"The capitol City of all this Empire is Odia, whereof I have spoken heretofore: it is fortified with walls of brick and mortar, and contains, according to some, four hundred thousand fires, whereof an hundred thousand are strangers of divers countries."—Pinto, in Cogan's E.T. p. 285; orig. cap. elxxix.

1553.—"For the Realm is great, and its Cities and Towns very populous; insomuch that the city Huda alone, which is the capital of the Kingdom of Siam (Sido), and the residence of the King, furnishes 50,000 men of its own."—Barros, III. ii. 5.

1614.—"As regards the size of the City of Odia... it may be guessed by an experiment made by a curious engineer with whom we communicated on the subject. He says that... he embarked in one of the native boats, small, and very light, with the determination to go all round the City (which is entirely compassed by water), and that he started one day from the Portuguese settlement, at dawn, and when he got back it was already far on in the night, and he affirmed that by his calculation he had gone more than 8 leagues."—Cotto, VI. vii. 9.

1617.—"The merchants of the country of lan John, in a place joining to the country of Jangomay (see JANGOMAY) arrived at the city of Judea before Eaton's coming away from thence, and brought great store of merchandize."—Stainsbury, ii. 90.

"1 (letter) from Mr. Benjamin Farri in Judea, at Syam."—Cocks's Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 272.

[1639.—"The chief of the Kingdom is Iduia by some called Odia... the city of Iduia, the ordinary Residence of the Court is seated on the Menam."—Mandelslo, Travels, E.T. ii. 122.

[1693.—"As for the City of Siam, the Siamese do call it Si-yo-thi-yay, tho o of the syllable yo being closer than our (French) Diphthong ou."—La Louvière, Siam, E.T. 177.]

1727.—"... all are sent to the City of Siam or Odia for the King's Use. The City stands on an Island in the River Menam, which by Turnings and Windings, makes the distance from the Bar about 50 Leagues."—J. Hamilton. ii. 180; [ed. 1744].

[1827.—"The powerful Lord... who dwells ever every head in the city of the sacred and great kingdom of Si-a-yoo-thaya."—Treaty between E.I.C. and King of Siam, in Wilson, Documents of the Burmese War, App. lxxvii.]

c. 1430. — "In Bizenegro (see BIS-NAGAR) also, at a certain time of the year, this idol is carried through the city, placed between two chariots... accompanied by a great concourse of people. Many, carried away by the fervour of the faith, cast themselves on the ground before the wheels, in order that they may be crushed to death,—a mode of death which they say is very acceptable to their god." — N. Conti, in India in XVth Cent., 28.

c. 1581. — "All for devotion attach themselves to the trace of the car, which is drawn in this manner by a vast number of people... and on the annual feast day of the Pagod this car is dragged by crowds of people through certain parts of the city (Negapatam), some of whom from devotion, or the desire to be thought to make a devoted end, cast themselves down under the wheels of the car, and so perish, remaining all ground and crushed by the said cars." — Giuseppe Balsi, f. 84. The preceding passages refer to scenes in the south of the Peninsula.

c. 1590. — "In the town of Purtoistan on the banks of the sea stands the temple of Jagannat, near to which are the images of Kishen, his brother, and their sister, made of Sandal-wood, which are said to be 4,000 years old... The Brahmins... at certain times carry the image in procession upon a chariot of sixteen wheels, which in the Hindooese language is called Raath (see RUT); and they believe that whoever assists in drawing it along obtains remission of all his sins." — Gladshein's Ayen, i. 13-15; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 127].

— Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 583.]

1632. — "Vnto this Pagod or house of Xathen, doe belong 9,000 Brammines or Priests, which doe daily offer sacriifice vnto their great God Jagannat, from which Idoll the City is so called... And when it (the chariot of Jagannat) is going along the city, there are many that will offer themselves a sacrifice to this Idoll, and desperately lye downe on the ground, that the Chariott wheels may runne over them, whereby they are killed outright; some get broken armes, some broken legges, so that many of them are destroyed, and by this means they thinke it to merit Heauen." — W. Brutton, in Hakl. v. 57.

1667. — "In the town of Jagannat, which is seated upon the Gulf of Bengala, and where is that famous Temple of the Idol of the same name, there yearly celebrates a certain day that they shew this Idol with Ceremony in the Temple, the Crowe is usually so great to see it, that there is not a year, but some of those poor Pilgrims, that come afar off, tired and haressed, are suffocated there; all the people blessing them for having been so happy... And when this Hellish Triumphant Chariot marcheth, there are found (which is no Fable) persons so foolishly credulous and superstitious as to throw themselves with their bellies under those large and heavy wheels, which bruise them to death." — Bernier, A Letter to Mr. Chapelain, in Eng. ed. 1684, 97; [ed. Constable, 304 sq.].

[1692-79. — "In that great and Sumptuous Diabolicall Pagod, there Standeth theere greatest God Jno. Gernaot, which once ye Pagod rescued that name also." — Ms. Jtn. &c., by T. B. f. 12. Col. Temple adds: "Throughout the whole Ms. Jaganath is repeatedly called Jno. Gernaot, which obviously stands for the common transposition Janganath."

1682. — "... We lay by last night till 10 o'clock this morning, ye Captaine being desirous to see ye Jagernot Pagodas for his better satisfaction..." — Hedges, Diary, July 16; [Hak. Soc. i. 90].

1727. — His (Jagarnyat's) Effigy is often carried abroad in Procession, mounted on a Coach, or armes... they fasten small Ropes to the Cable, two or three Fathoms long, so that upwards of 2,000 People have room enough to draw the Coach, and some old Zealots, as it passes through the Street, fall flat on the Ground, to have the Honour to be crushed to Pieces by the Coach Wheels." — A. Hamilton, i. 357; [ed. 1744].

1809. — "A thousand pilgrims strain Arm, shoulder, breast, and thigh, with and main.
To drag that sacred wain,
And scarce can draw along the enormous load.
Prose fall the frantic votaries on the road,
And calling on the God
Their self-devoted bodies there they lay
To pave his chariot way.
On Jaga-Naut they call,
The ponderous car rolls on, and crushes all,
Through flesh and bones it ploughs its dreadfull path.
Groans rise unheard; the dying cry.
And death, and agony
Are trodden under foot by you mad throng.
Who follow close and thrust the deadly wheels along."

Curse of Kehana, xiv. 5.

1814. — "The sight here beggars all description. Though Juggurnaut made some progress on the 19th, and has travelled daily ever since, he has not yet reached the place of his destination. His brother is ahead of him, and the lady in the rear. One woman has devoted herself under the wheels, and a shocking sight it was. Another also intended to devote herself, missed the wheels with her body, and had her arm broken. Three people lost their lives in the crowd." — In Asiatic Journal—quoted in Beveridge, Hist. of India, ii. 54, without exacter reference.

c. 1815. — "That excess of fanaticism which formerly prompted the pilgrims to court death by throwing themselves in crowds under the wheels of the car of JAGANNATH has happily long ceased to actuate the worshippers of the present day. During 4 years that I have witnessed the ceremony, three cases only of this revolting species of immolation have occurred, one of which I may observe is doubtful, and should probably be ascribed to accident; in the others the victims had long been suffering from some exasperating complaints, and chose this method of ridding themselves of the burden of life in preference to other modes of suicide so prevalent with the lower orders under similar circumstances."—i. Stirling, in As. Res. xvi. 324.

1827.—March 28th in this year, Mr. Poynder, in the E. I. Court of Proprietors, stated that "about the year 1790 no fewer than 28 Hindus were crushed to death at Ishera on the Ganges, under the wheels of Juggernaut."—As. Journal, 1821, vol. xxiii. 792.

[1864.—"On the 7th July 1864, the editor of the Friend of India mentions that, a few days previously, he had seen, near Sarampore, two persons crushed to death, and another frightfully lacerated, having thrown themselves under the wheels of a car during the Rathi Jatra festival. It was afterwards stated that this occurrence was accidental."—Cheers, Ind. Med. Jurispr. 665.

1871.—"... poor Johnny Tetterby stagger ing under his Mohol of an infant, the Juggernaut that crushed all his enjoyment."—Forster's Life of Dickens, ii. 415.

1876.—"Le monde en marchant n'a pas beaucoup plus de sens de ce qu'il écrase que le char de l'idole de Jagarnata."—E. Renan, in Revue des Deux Mondes, 3e Série, xviii. p. 504.

JULIBDAR, s. Pers. jilândár, from jilán, the string attached to the bridle by which a horse is led, the servant who leads a horse, also called jânúbhâdár, jânúbâkâsh. In the time of Hedges the word must have been commonly used in Bengal, but it is now quite obsolete.

[c. 1590.—"For some time it was a rule that, whenever he (Akbar) rode out on a khágah horse, a rupee should be given, viz., one dâm to the Atbegi, two to the Jilândár..."—Ann. ed. Blochmann, i. 142. (And see under PYKE.)

1673.—"In the heart of this Square is raised a place as large as a Mountebank's Stage, where the Gelâbdar, or Master Muliteer, with his prime Passengers or Servants, have an opportunity to view the whole Caphote."—Fryer, 341.

1683.—"Your Jilábâdor, after he had received his letter would not stay for the Genâb, but stood upon departure."—Hedges, Diary, Sept. 15; [Hak. Soc. i. 112].

"We admire what made you send peons to force our Gyllibdar back to your Factory, after he had gone 12 cosses on his way, and dismiss him again without any reason for it."—Hedges, Diary, Sept. 26; [Hak. Soc. i. 120].

1754.—"100 Gilodar; those who are charged with the direction of the couriers and their horses."—Hanway's Travels, i. 171; 252.

[1812.—"I have often admired the courage and dexterity with which the Persian Jelodars or grooms throw themselves into the thickest engagement of angry horses." —Morier, Journey through Persia, 63 seq.]

1850.—"It would make a good picture, the surroundings of canals, horses, donkeys, and men... Palse and Remise cooking for me; the Jellaudars, enveloped in felt coats, smoking their kalifins, amid the light of fast fading day..."—MS. Journal in Persia of Capt. W. Gill, R.E.

JUMBEAA, s. Ar. jambiya, probably from jamb, 'the side'; a kind of dagger worn in the girdle, so as to be drawn across the body. It is usually in form slightly curved. Sir R. Burton (Camões, Commentary, 413) identifies it with the agomia and gomio of the quotations below, and refers to a sketch in his Pilgrimage, but this we cannot find, [it is in the Memorial ed. i. 236], though the jambiyah is several times mentioned, e.g. i. 347, iii. 72. The term occurs repeatedly in Mr. Egerton's catalogue of arms in the India Museum. Janbwa occurs as the name of a dagger in the Aina (orig. i. 119); why Blochmann in his translation [i. 110] spells it jambreak we do not know. See also Dozy and Eng s.v. jambette. It seems very doubtful if the latter French word has anything to do with the Arabic word.

c. 1328.—"Taki-ud-din refused roughly and pushed him away. Then the maimed man drew a dagger (khanjar) such as is called in that country janiyba, and gave him a mortal wound."—Blunt, i. 584.

1774.—"Autour du corps ils ont un ceinturon de cuir brodé, ou garni d'argent, JUMDUD. s. H. jandad, jamdhar. A kind of dagger, broad at the base and slightly curved, the hilt formed with a cross-grip like that of the Katār (see KUTTAUR). [A drawing of what he calls a jamdhar katār is given in Egerton's Catalogue (Pl. IX. No. 344-5).] F. Johnson's Dictionary gives jamdar as a Persian word with the suggested etymology of jaub-dar, 'shanksrender.' But in the Ain the word is spelt jamdhar, which seems to indicate Hind. origin; and its occurrence in the poem of Chand Bardai (see Ind. Antiq. i. 281) corroborates this. Mr. Beames there suggests the etymology of yveama-dant 'Death's Tooth.' The drawings of the jumhad or jamdhar in the Ain illustrations show several specimens with double and triple toothed points, which perhaps favours this view; but Yama-dhara, 'death-wielder,' appears in the Sanskrit dictionaries as the name of a weapon. [Rather, perhaps, yama-dhara, 'death-bearer.']

c. 1596.—"Jamdher." See quotation under KUTTAUR.

[1616-17.—"I proposed for a water worke, web might give the Chief Citty of the Mogors content . . . web is to be don vppon the River Jeminy web passeth by Agr a . . ."]—Birdwood, First Letter Book. 460.

[1813.—" . . . visited the jamdar khan, or treasury containing his jewels . . . curious arms . . ."]—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 469.

JUMMA, s. Hind. from Ar. jama*. The total assessment (for land revenue) from any particular estate, or division of country. The Arab. word signifies 'total' or 'aggregate.'

1781.—"An increase of more than 26 lacs of rupees (was) effected on the former jumma."—Fifth Report, p. 8.

JUMMABUNDEE, s. Hind. from P.—Ar. jama' bandoth. A settlement (q.v.), i.e. the determination of the amount of land revenue due for a year, or a period of years, from a village, estate, or parcel of land. [In the N.W.P. it is specially applied to the annual village rent-roll, giving details of the holding of each cultivator.]

JUMNA. n.p. The name of a famous river in India which runs by Delhi and Agra. Skt. Jamuna, Hind. Jarund and Jumna, the Δομοκοα of Ptolemy, the Ἰεζαφίς of Arrian, the Jumans of Pliny. The spelling of Ptolemy almost exactly expresses the modern Hind. form Jamunā. The name Jamunā is also applied to what was in the 18th century, an unimportant branch of the Brahmaputra R. which connected it with the Ganges, but which has now for many years been the main channel of the former great river. (See JENNYE.) Jamund is the name of several other rivers of less note.

JUNGEERA. n.p., i.e. Janjira. The name of a native State on the coast, south of Bombay, from which the Fort and chief place is 44 m. distant. This place is on a small island, rising in the entrance to the Râjpūrî inlet, to which the name Janjira properly pertains, believed to be a local corruption of the Ar. jazira, 'island.' The State is also called Hubshān, meaning 'Hubshee's land,' from the fact that for 3 or 4 centuries its chief has been of that race. This was not at first continuous, nor have the chiefs, even when of African blood, been always of one family; but they have apparently been so for the last 200 years. 'The Sidi' (see SEEDY) and 'The Habšah,' are titles popularly applied to this chief. This State has a port and some land in Kāthūwār.

Gen. Keatinge writes: "The members of the Sidi's family whom I saw were, for natives of India, particularly fair." The old Portuguese writers call this harbour Danda (or as they write it Danada), e.g. João de Castro in Primeiro Roteiro, p. 48. His rude chart shows the island-fort.

JUNGLE, s. Hind. and Mahr. jangal, from Skt. jangala (a word which occurs chiefly in medical treatises). The native word means in strictness only waste, uncultivated ground; then, such ground covered with shrubs, trees or long grass; and thence again the Anglo-Indian application is to forest, or other wild growth, rather than to the fact that it is not cultivated. A forest; a thicket; a tangled wilderness. The word seems to have passed at a rather early date into Persian, and also into use in Turkistan. From Anglo-Indian it has been adopted into French as well as in English. The word does not seem to occur in FRYER, which rather indicates that its use was not so extremely common among foreigners as it is now.

c. 1200.—"... Now the land is humid, jungle (jangalāh), or of the ordinary kind." —Sūrata, i. ch. 33.

c. 1370.—"Elephants were numerous as sheep in the jangal round the Rāi's dwelling."—Tārīkh-i-Fīroz-Shāhī, in Elliot, iii. 314.

c. 1450.—"The Kings of India hunt the elephant. They will stay a whole month or more in the wilderness, and in the jungle (jangal)."—Ahburarazāk, in Not. et Ext. xiv. 51.

1474.—"... Bicheneger. The vast city is surrounded by three ravines, and intersected by a river, bordering on one side on a dreadful Jungle."—Ath. Nikitin, in India in XVth Cent., 29.

1776.—"Land waste for five years... is called Jungle."—Hulhed's Gentoo Code, 190.

1809.—"The air of Calcutta is much affected by the closeness of the jungle around it."—Id. Valenti, i. 207.

1809.—"They built them here a bower of jointed cane, Strong for the needful use, and light and long Was the slight framework rear'd, with little pain; Lith the creepers then the wicker sides supply, And the tall jungle grass fit roofing gave Beneath the genial sky." —Curse of Kehama, xiii. 7.

c. 1830.—"C'est là que je rencontrai les jungles, les jungles... j'avoue que je fus très désappointé."—Jaucquet, Correspond., i. 134.

c. 1833-38.—"L'Hippotamau au large ventre Habite aux Jungles de Java, Oh grandement, au fond de chaque antre Plus de monstres qu'on ne réva."—Theoph. Gautier, in Poésies Complètes, ed. 1876, i. 325.

1848.—"But he was as lonely here as in his jungle at Bogglywala." —Thackeray, Vanity Fair, ch. iii.

"... Was there ever a battle won like Salamanca? Hey, Dobbin? But where was it he learnt his art? In India, my boy. The jungle is the school for a general, mark me that."—Ibid., ed. 1863, i. 312.

c. 1858.—"La bête formidable, habitante des jungles... S'endort, le ventre en l'air, et dilate ses ongles."—Leconte de Lisle.

"Des jungles du Pendj-Ab Aux sables du Karnate."—Ibid.

1865.—"To an eye accustomed for years to the wild wastes of the jungle, the whole country presents the appearance of one continuous well-ordered garden." —Waring, Tropical Resident at Home, 7.

1867.—"... here are no cobwebs of pea and counterpane, no jungles of argument and brakes of analysis."—Scrutineer, Essays and Studies, 133.

1873.—"Jungle, derived to us, through the living language of India, from the Sanskrit, may now be regarded as good English." —Fitz - Edward Hall, Modern English, 306.

1878.—"... Cet animal est commun dans les forêts, et dans les djungles."—Marre, Kata-Kata-Malayun, 53.

1879.—"The owls of metaphysics hooted from the gloom of their various jungles."—Fortnightly Rev. No. clxv., N.S., 19.

JUNGLE-FEVER, s. A dangerous remittent fever arising from the malaria of forest or jungle tracts.

1805.—"I was one day sent to a great distance, to take charge of an officer who had been seized by jungle-fever."—Letter in Morton's L. of Leyden, 43.

JUNGLE-FOWL, s. The popular name of more than one species of those birds from which our domestic poultry are supposed to be descended; especially Gallus Sonneratii, Temminck, the Grey Jungle-cock, and Gallus ferrugineus, Gmelin, the Red Jungle-cock. The former belongs only to Southern India; the latter from the Himalaya, south to the N. Circars on the east, and to the Râjïpûla Hills south of the Nerbudda on the west.

1800.—"... the thickets bordered on the village, and I was told abounded in jungle-fowl."—Simx. Embasy to Ava, 66.

1883.—"The common jungle-cock ... was also obtained here. It is almost exactly like a common game-cock, but the voice is different."—Wallace, Malay Archip., 108.

The word jungle is habitually used adjectively, as in this instance, to denote wild species, e.g. jungle-cat, jungle-dog, jungle-fruit, &c.

JUNGLE-MAHALS. n.p. Hind. Jangal-Mahal. This, originally a vague name of sundry tracts and chiefship-tains lying between the settled districts of Bengal and the hill country of Chûtia Nagpûr, was constituted a regular district in 1805, but again broken up and redistributed among adjoining districts in 1838 (see Imperial Gazetteer, s.v.).

JUNGLE-TERRY. n.p. Hind. Jangal-tarâî (see TEHA). A name formerly applied to a border-tract between Bengal and Behar, including the inland parts of Monghyr and Bhâgâlpûr, and what are now termed the Santal Pargâns. Hodges, below, calls it the "westward" of Bhâgâlpûr; but Barkope, which he describes as near the centre of the tract, lies, according to Rennell's map, about 35 m. S.E. of Bhâgâlpûr town; and the Cleveland inscription shows that the term included the tract occupied by the Râjmahâl hill-people. The Map No. 2 in Rennell's Bengal Atlas (1779) is entitled "the Jungleerry District, with the adjacent provinces of Birbhum, Rajemal, Bogilpour, &c., comprehending the countries situated between Moorsheadabad and Bahar." But the map itself does not show the name Jungleerry anywhere.

1751.—"Early in February we set out on a tour through a part of the country called the Jungle-Terry, to the westward of Banglepore ... after leaving the village of Barkope, which is nearly in the centre of the Jungle Terry, we entered the hills.... In the great famine which raged through Indostan in the year 1770 ... the Jungle Terry is said to have suffered greatly."—Hodges, pp. 90-95.

1784.—"To be sold ... that capital collection of Paintings, late the property of A. Cleveland, Esq., deceased, consisting of the most capital views in the districts of Monghyr, Rajemahal, Bogilpoor, and the Jungleerry, by Mr. Hodges. ..."—In Seton-Karr's i. 64.

JUNGLO. s. Guz. Junglo. This term, we are told by R. Drummond, was used in his time (the beginning of the 19th century), by the less polite, to distinguish Europeans: "wild men of the woods," that is, who did not understand Guzerati.

1808.—"Joseph Maria, a well-known scribe of the order of Toque-wallahs, was actually method on the first circuit of 1807, in the town of Firland, by parties of curious old women and young, some of whom gazong upon him put the question, Are Junglo, too mane pirmesh? 'O wid one, wilt thou marry me?' He knew not what they asked, and made no answer, whereupon they declared that he was indeed a very Junglo, and it required all the address of Kripaun (the worthy Brahmin who related this anecdote to the writer, uncontradicted in the presence of the said Senhor) to draw off the dames and damsel's from the astonished Joseph."—R. Drummond, Hms. (s.v.).
JUNK, s. A large Eastern ship; especially (and in later use exclusively) a Chinese ship. This indeed is the earliest application also; any more general application belongs to an intermediate period. This is one of the oldest words in the Europeo-Indian vocabulary. It occurs in the travels of Friar Odorico, written down in 1331, and a few years later in the rambling reminiscences of John de Marignolli. The great Catalan World-map of 1375 gives a sketch of one of those ships with their sails of bamboo matting and calls them ękchi, no doubt a clerical error for ńńchi. Dobner, the original editor of Marignolli, in the 18th century, says of the word (junkos): "This word I cannot find in any medieval glossary. Most probably we are to understand vessels of platted reeds (a juncis textu) which several authors relate to be used in India." It is notable that the same erroneous suggestion is made by Amerigo Vespucii in his curious letter to one of the Medici, giving an account of the voyage of Da Gama, whose squadron he had met at C. Verde on its way home.

The French translators of Ibn Batuta derive the word from the Chinese tjohen (cheen), and Littré gives the same etymology (s.v. jonque). It is possible that the word may be eventually traced to a Chinese original, but not very probable. The old Arab traders must have learned the word from Malay pilots, for it is certainly the Javanese and Malay jong and ajong, 'a ship or large vessel.' In Javanese the Great Bear is called Lintung jong, 'The Constellation Junk,' [which is in Malay Bintang Jong.] The various forms in Malay and cognate languages, with the Chinese words which have been suggested as the origin, are very fully given by Scott, Malayam Words in English, p. 59 seq.]

c. 1300.—"Large ships called in the language of China 'Junks' bring various sorts of choice merchandise and cloths from Chin and Machtin, and the countries of Hind and Sind."—Raskidaddin, in Elliot, i. 69.

1381.—"And when we were there in harbour at Polumnum, we embarked in another ship called a Junk (aliam navim nominata Zuncum). . . . Now on board that ship were good 700 souls, what with soldiers and with merchants."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., p. 76.

c. 1313.—"They make no voyages on the China Sea except with Chinese vessels . . . of these there are three kinds; the big ones which are called junk, in the plural juncūk. . . . Each of these big ships carries from three up to twelve sails. The sails are made of bamboo mats; they are never hauled down, but are shifted round as the wind blows from one quarter or another."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 91. The French translators write the words as gonk (and gonāk). Ibn Batuta really indicates chunk (and čunkě); but both must have been quite wrong.

c. 1348.—"Wishing them to visit the shrine of St. Thomas the Apostle . . . we embarked on certain Junks (ascendentes Junkos) from Lower India, which is called Minabur."—Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., p. 356.

1459.—"About the year of our Lord 1420, a Ship or Junk of India, in crossing the Indian Sea, was driven . . . in a westerly and south-westerly direction for 40 days, without seeing anything but sky and sea. . . . The ship having touched on the coast to supply its wants, the mariners beheld there the egg of a certain bird called chrocko, which egg was as big as a butt."—Rubric on Fr. Mauro's Great Map at Venice.

"The Ships or junks (Zonchi) which navigate this sea, carry 4 masts, and besides that they can set up or strike (at will); and they have 40 to 60 little junks, for the merchants, and they have only one rudder . . ."—Ibid.

1516.—"Many Moorish merchants reside in it (Malacca), and also Gentiles, particularly Chetis (see CHETTY), who are natives of Cholmendel; and they are all very rich, and have many large ships which they call jungos."—Barbosa, i. 191.

1540.—"Exclusus isto concilio, applicavit animum ad naven Sinensis formae, quain juncem vocant."—Sctt. Franc. Xavhei Epist. 337.

1563.—"Juncos are certain long ships that have stern and prow fashioned in the same way."—Garcia, ii. 58.

1591.—"By this Negro, we were advertised of a small Bark of some thirtie tunnes (which the Moors call a Juncos)"—Barber's Arc. of Lancaster's Voyage, in Hakl. ii. 589.

1616.—"And doubtles they had made havock of them all, had they not presently been relieved by two Arabian Junks (for so their small ill-built ships are named . . .)"—Terry, ed. 1655, p. 342.

1625.—"An hundred Prawses and Junces."—Parchus, Pilgrimage, i. 2, 43.

1627.—"China also, and the great Atlantis (that you call America), which have now but Juncs and Canos, abounded then in tall Ships."—Bacon, New Atlantis, p. 12.

1630.—"So repairing to Joques (see JASK), a place in the Persien Gulph, they obtained a flute of Seaven Juncos, to convey them and theirs as Merchantein bond for the Shores of India."—Lord, Religion of the Persers, 8.
1673.—Fryer also speaks of ‘Portugal Junkys.’ The word had thus come to mean any large vessel in the Indian Seas. Barker’s use for a small vessel (above) is exceptional.

JUNKAMEER. s. This word occurs in Wheeler, i. 300, where it should certainly have been written Juncanieer. It was long a perplexity, and as it was the subject of one of Dr. Burnell’s latest, if not the very last, of his contributions to this work, I transcribe the words of his communication:

"Working at improving the notes to v. Linschoten, I have accidentally cleared up the meaning of a word you asked me about long ago, but which I was then obliged to give up—‘Jonkamir.’ It = a collector of customs."

"(1745).—Notre Supérieur qui savoit qu’a moitié chemin certaines Jonquanières mettaient les passans à contribution, nous avoit donné un ou deux janons (see PANAM) pour les payer en allant et en revenant, au cas qu’ils exigeassent de nous."—P. Norbert, Mémoires, pp. 159-160.

"The original word is in Malayalam chungakudran, and do, in Tamil, though it does not occur in the Dictionaries of that language; but chungam (= ‘Customs’) does.

"I was much pleased to settle this curious word, but I should never have thought of the origin of it, had it not been for that rascally old Capuchin P. Norbert’s note."

My friend’s letter (from West Stratton) has no date, but it must have been written in July or August 1852. [H.Y.] (See JUNKON.)

1630.—The Didowan (see DEWAUN) returned with Lingapas Roccs (see ROOCA) upon the Ataldar (see HAVILDIR) at St. Thomas, and upon the two chief Juncaneers in this part of the country, ordering them not to stop goods or provisions coming into the town. [Fort St. Geo. Consr., Nov. 22, Notes and Extts., iii. 39.]

1746.—‘Given to the Governor’s Servants, Juncaneers, &c., as usual at Christmas, Salamors’ (see SALEMPOOBY, 1Sp. P. 13).—Act. of Extra Charges at Fort St. David, to Dec. 31. M.S. Report, in India Office.

JUNK-CEYLON, n.p. The popular name of an island off the west coast of the Malay Peninsula. Forrest (Voyage to Merqui, pp. iii. and 29-30) calls it Jan-Sylan, and says it is properly Ujong (i.e. in Malay, ‘Cape’) Sylang. This appears to be nearly right. The name is, according to Crawburn (Malay Diet, s.v. Salanka, and Diet. Ind. Archip. s.v. Ujung) Ujung Salana, ‘Salang Headland.’ [Mr. Skeat doubts the correctness of this. ‘There is at least one quite possible alternative, i.e. jung salang, in which jung means ‘a junk,’ and salang, when applied to vessels, ‘heavily tossing’ (see Klinkert, Diet. s.v. salang). Another meaning of salang is ‘to transfuse a person with a dagger,’ and is the technical term for Malay executions, in which the kris was driven down from the collar-bone to the heart. Parls in the first quotation is now known as Perlis.’]

1539.—‘There we went over to the firm Land, and passing by the Port of Junculan (Juncaldão) we sailed two days and a half with a favourable wind, by means whereof we got to the River of Parls in the Kingdom of queda...’—Pinto (orig. cap. xix) in Cogan, p. 22.

1592.—‘We departed thence to a Bay in the Kingdom of Junculan, which is between Malaca and Pegu, 5 degrees to the Northward.’—Barker, in Hkdl. ii. 591.

1727.—‘The North End of Jonk Ceylon lies within a mile of the Continent.’—A. Hamilton, 69; [ed. 1744, ii. 67.]

JUNKAEEER. Wilson gives Telugu Sunkam, which might be used in Orissa, where Bruton was. [Shungum (Mal. chunkam) appears in the sense of toll or customs duties in many of the old treaties in Logan, Malabar, vol. iii.]

1638.—‘Any Junkoon or Custome.’—Bruton’s Narrative, in Hkdl. v. 53.

1756.—‘These practices (claims of perquisite by the factory chiefs) hath occasioned some to apply to the Govenour for relief, and chosen rather to pay Juncan than submit to the unreasonable demands aforesaid.’—Major Puchet’s Proposals, in Fort St. Geo. Consr., Feb. 16. Notes and Extts., i. 39.

1727.—‘... at every ten or twelve Miles end, a Fellow to demand Junkaun or Poll-Money for me and my Servants. ...’—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 392.

JURIBASSO. s. This word, meaning ‘an interpreter,’ occurs constantly in the Diary of Richard Cocks, of the English Factory in Japan, admirably edited for the Hakluyt Society by Mr. Edward Maunde Thompson (1883). The work is really Malayo-Javanese juradahasa, lit. ‘language-master,’ juru being an expert, ‘a master of a craft,’ and bahasa the Skt. bhāṣā, ‘speech.’

1603.—At Patani the Hollander's having arrived, and sent presents—'ils furent pris par un officier nommé Omar kaa (see ORAN, KAY) Jurabassà, qui en fit trois portions.'—In Rec. du Voyages, ed. 1793, ii. 697. See also pp. 672, 673.

1613.—(Said the Mandarin of Ancôa) . . . Captain-major, Auditor, residents, and jurubacas, for the space of two days you must come before me to attend to these instructions capitulados, in order that I may write to the Atão.' . . .

"These communications being read in the Chamber of the City of Macau, before the Vereadores, the people, and the Captain-Major then commanding in the said city, João Serrio da Cunha, they sought for a person who might be charged to reply, such as had knowledge of the Chinese, and of their manner of speech, and finding Lawrence Carvalho . . . he made the reply in the following form of words . . . To this purpose we the Captain-Major, the Auditor, the Vereadores, the Padres, and the Jurubassa, assembling together and beating our foreheads before God . . ."— Boscaro, pp. 725-729.

"The fourteenth, I sent M. Cockes, and my Jurebassà to both the Kings to entreat them to provide me of a dozen Seamen."—Capt. Sews, in Purchas, 378.

1615.—"... his desire was that, for his sake, I would give over the pursuit of this matter against the said bonge, for that ye if it were followed, of force the said bonge must cut his bellie, and then my jurebasso must do the lyke. Unto which my request was content to agree."—Cockes's Diary, i. 32.

JUTE, s. The fibre (gunny-fibre) of the bark of Corchorus capsularis, L., and Corchorus olitorius, L., which in the last 45 years has become so important an export from India, and a material for manufacture in Great Britain as well as in India. "At the last meeting of the Cambridge Philosophical Society, Professor Skeat commented on various English words, Jute, a fibrous substance, he explained from the Sanskrit jāta, a less usual form of jata, meaning, 1st, the matted hair of an ascetic; 2ndly, the fibrous roots of a tree such as the banyan: 3rdly, any fibrous substance" (Academy, Dec. 27, 1879). The secondary meanings attributed here to jata are very doubtful.* The term jute appears to have been first used by Dr. Roxburgh in a letter dated 1795, in which he drew the attention of the Court of Directors to the value of the fibre "called jute by the natives." [It appears, however, as early as 1746 in the Log of a voyage quoted by Col. Temple in J.R.A.S., Jan. 1900, p. 158.] The name in fact appears to be taken from the vernacular name in Orissa. This states to be properly hōtō, but hātō is used by the uneducated. See Report of the Jute Commission, by Bahu Hemchundra Kerr, Calcutta, 1874; also a letter from Mr. J. S. Cotton in the Academy, Jan. 17, 1880.

JUTKA, s. From Dak.—Hind. jhatka, 'quick.' The native cab of Madras, and of Mofussil towns in that Presidency; a conveyance only to be characterised by the epithet ramshackle, though in that respect equalled by the Calcutta cranchee (q.v.). It consists of a sort of box with venetian windows, on two wheels, and drawn by a miserable pony. It is entered by a door at the back. (See SHIGRAM, with like meanings).

JUZAIL, s. This word jazail is generally applied to the heavy Afghan rifle, fired with a forked rest. If it is Ar. it must be jazai, the plural of jazil, 'big,' used as a substantive. Jazil is often used for a big, thick thing, so it looks probable. (See GINGALL) Hence jazil'dehi, one armed with such a weapon.

JYEDAD, s.—P.—H. jāidād. Territory assigned for the support of troops.

[1824.—"Rampoo on the Chumbul . . . had been granted to Dudermaine, as Jaidad, *

* This remark is from a letter of Dr. Burnell's dtd. Tanjore, March 16, 1880. or temporary assignment for the payment of his troops."—Malcolm, Central India, i. 223.]

JYSHE. s. This term, Ar. jaish, 'an army, a legion,' was applied by Tippoo to his regular infantry, the body of which was called the Jaish Kachari (see under CUTCERRY).

c. 1752.—"About this time the Bar or regular infantry, Kutcheri, were called the Jysh Kutcheri."—Hist. of Tipu Sultan, by Hussein Ali Khan Kermâni, p. 52.

1758.—"At such times as new levies or recruits for the Jyshe and Piadehs are to be entertained, you two and Syed Peer assembling in Kutcheri are to entertain none but proper and eligible men."—Tippoo's Letters, 258.

KAJEE. s. This is a title of Ministers of State used in Nepaul and Sikkim. It is no doubt the Arabic word (see CAZEE for quotations). Ḿāji is the pronunciation of this last word in various parts of India.

[KALA JUGAH. s. Anglo-H. kāli jāgha for a 'dark place,' arranged near a ball-room for the purpose of flirtation.

[1855.—"At night it was rather cold, and the frequenters of the Kala Jaga' (or dark places) were unable to enjoy it as much as I hoped they would."—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life, 41.]

KALLA-NIMMACK. s. Hind. kāla-namak, 'black salt,' a common mineral drug, used especially in horse-treatment. It is muriate of soda, having a mixture of oxide of iron, and some impurities. (Royle.)

KAPAL. s. Kāpāl, the Malay word for a ship, [which seems to have come from the Tam. kappal,] "applied to any square-rigged vessel, with top and top-gallant masts" (Marsden, Memoirs of a Malay Family, 57.)

KARBAREE. s. Hind. kârdâr, 'an agent, a manager,' Used chiefly in Bengal Proper.

[e. 1557.—"The Founjdar's report stated that a police Carbaree was sleeping in his own house."—Chevers, Ind. Med. Jurisp. 156.]

1857.—"The Lushai Karbari (literally men of business) duly arrived and met me at Kassalong."—Levin, A Fly on the Wheel, 283.

KARCANNA. s. Hind. from Pers. kār-khāna, 'business-place.' We cannot improve upon Wilson's definition: "An office, or place where business is carried on; but it is in use more especially applied to places where mechanical work is performed: a workshop, a manufactory, an arsenal; also, fig., to any great fuss or bustle." The last use seems to be obsolete.

[1842.—"I further insist upon the offending Kardar being sent a prisoner to my head-quarters at Sukkur within the space of five days, to be dealt with as I shall determine."—Sir C. Napier, in Napier's Conquest of Scinde, 149.]

KAREETA. s. Hind. from Ar. kharita, and in India also khalita. The silk 'bag' (described by Mrs. Parkes, below) in which is enclosed a letter to or from a native noble; also, by transfer, the letter itself. In 2 Kings v. 23, the bag in which Naaman bound the silver is kharit; also in Isaiah iii. 22, the word translated 'crisping-pins' is kharit'um, rather 'purse.'

[e. 1350.—"The Sheriff Ibrahim, surnamed the Kharitadâr, i.e. the Master of the Royal Paper and Pens, was governor of the territory of Hansi and Sarstî."—Ibn Batutah, iii. 337.]

1838.—"Her Highness the Khâna Bâ 'id me the honour to send me a Kharitâ, that is a letter enclosed in a long bag of Kirr-khârâb (see KINCBO), crimson silk brocaded with flowers in gold, contained in another of fine muslin: the mouth of the bag was tied with a gold and tasseled cord, to which was appended the great seal of her Highness."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim (Mrs. Parkes), ii. 260.

In the following passage the thing is described (at Constantinople).

1673.—"... le Visir prenant un sachet de beau brocâd d'or à fleurs, long tout au moins d'une demi aule et large de cinq ou six doigts, lié et scellé par le haut avec une KAUL, s. Hind. Kāl, properly "Time," then a period, death, and popularly the visitation of famine. Under this word we read:

1808.—"Scarcity, and the scourge of civil war, embittered the Mahatta nation in A.D. 1804, of whom many emigrants were supported by the justice and generosity of neighbouring powers, and (a large number) were relieved in their own capital by the charitable contributions of the English at Bombay alone. This and opening of Hospitals for the sick and starving, within the British settlements, were gratefully told to the writer afterwards by many Mahattas in "the heart, and from distant parts, of their own country."—R. Drummond, Illustrations, &c.

KAUNTA, CAUNTA, s. This word, Mahr. and Guz. kāntha, 'coast or margin,' [Skt. kāntha, 'immediate proximity, kānṭhi, 'the neck,'] is used in the northern part of the Bombay Presidency in composition to form several popular geographical terms, as Mahā Kāṇtha, for a group of small States on the banks of the Mahi River; Rēva Kāṇtha, south of the above; Śindhā Kāṇtha, the Indus Delta, &c. The word is no doubt the same which we find in Ptolemy for the Gulf of Kachh, Ḍvḗk kōṃsō. Kāṇṭhi-Kot was formerly an important place in Eastern Kachh, and Kāṇṭhi was the name of the southern coast district (see Ritter, vi. 1038).

KEBULEE. (See MYROBOLANS.)

KEDDAH, s. Hind. Khēdā (kedāt, ‘to chase,’ from Skt. ḍheta, ‘hunting’). The term used in Bengal for the enclosure constructed to entrap elephants. [The system of hunting elephants by making a trench round a space and enticing the wild animals by means of tame decoys is described by Arrian, Indika, 13.] (See CORRAL.)

[c. 1590. — "There are several modes of hunting elephants. 1. khedā (then follows a description).—Av., i. 284."

1780-90.—"The party on the plain below have, during this interval, been completely occupied in forming the Keddah or enclosure."—Lives of the Littreys, iii. 191.

1810. — "A term called a Keddah."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 436.

1890.—"The custom in Bengal is to construct a strong enclosure (called a Kedda) in the heart of the forest."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 342.

KEDGEREE, KITCHERY, s. Hind. khichri, a mess of rice, cooked with butter and dāl (see DHALL), and flavoured with a little spice, shred onion, and the like; a common dish all over India, and often served at Anglo-Indian breakfast tables, in which very old precedent is followed, as the first quotation shows. The word appears to have been applied metaphorically to mixtures of sundry kinds (see Fryer, below), and also to mixt jargon or lingua franca. In England we find the word is often applied to a mess of re-cooked fish, served for breakfast; but this is inaccurate. Fish is frequently eaten with kedgeree, but is no part of it.["Fish Kitcherie" is an old Anglo-Indian dish, see the recipe in Riddell, Indian Domestic Economy, p. 437.]

c. 1310.—"The munj (Moong) is boiled with rice, and then buttered and eaten. This is what they call Kishri, and on this dish they breakfast every day."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 131.

c. 1443.—"The elephants of the palace are fed upon Kitcheri."—Abdurrazzāk, in India in Xvth Cent. 27.

c. 1475.—"Horses are fed on peas; also on Kichris, boiled with sugar and oil; and early in the morning they get shisheniro" (I).—Athan. Nībita, in do., p. 10.

The following recipe for Kedgeree is by Abu'l Faql:-

[c. 1590.—"Khichri, Rice, split dāl, and gūt, 5 ser of each; ½ ser salt; this gives 7 dishes."—Ihe, i. 59.

1648.—"Their daily gains are very small,... and with these they fill their hungry bellies with a certain food called Kisteserye."—Van Twill, 57.

1653.—"Kicheri est vne sorte de legume dont les Indiens se nourrissent ordinairement."—De la Boulaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 545.

1672.—Baldaeus has Kitzerry, Tavernier Quicheri [ed. Bull, i. 282, 391].

1679.—"The Diet of this Sort of People admits not of great Variety or Cost, their delightfulfust Food being only Cutcherry a sort of Pulse and Rice mixed together, and boiled in Butter, with which they grow fat."—Fryer, 81.

Again, speaking of pearls in the Persian Gulf, he says: "Whatever is of any Value is very dear. Here is a great Plenty of what they call Ketchery, a mixture of all together, or Refuse of Rough, Yellow, and Unequal, which they sell by Bushels to the Russians."—Ibid, 320.
1727.—"Some Doll and Rice, being mingled together and boiled make Kitcheree, the common Food of the Country. They eat it with Butter and Atchar (see ACHAR)."—A. Hamilton, i. 161; [ed. 1744, i. 182].

1750-60.—"Kitcharee is only rice stewed, with a certain pulse they call Dhall, and is generally eaten with salt-fish, butter, and pickles of various sorts, to which they give the general name of Atchar."—Grose, i. 150.

[1818.—"He was always a welcome guest ... and ate as much of their rice and Cutcheree as he chose."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 502.]

1850.—"A correspondent of the Indian Mirror, writing of the annual religious fair at Ajmere, thus describes a feature in the proceedings: "There are two tremendous copper pots, one of which is said to contain about eighty maunds of rice and the other forty maunds. To fill these pots with rice, sugar, and dried fruits requires a round sum of money, and it is only the rich who can afford to do so. This year His Highness the Nawab of Tonk paid Rs. 3,000 to fill up the pots. ... After the pots filled with khichri had been inspected by the Nawab, who was accompanied by the Commissioner of Ajmere and several civil officers, the distribution or more properly the plunder, of khichri commenced, and men well wrapped up with clothes, stuffed with cotton, were seen leaping down into the boiling pot to secure their share of the booty."—Pioneer Mail, July 5. [See the reference to this custom in Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 314, and a full account in Rajputana Gazetteer, ii. 63.]

KEDGEREE, n.p. Khijri or Kijri, a village and police station on the low lands near the mouth of the Hoogly, on the west bank, and 68 miles below Calcutta. It was formerly well known as a usual anchorage of the larger Indiamen.

1658.—"This morning early we weighed anchor with the tide of Ebb, but having little wind, got no further than the Point of Kegaria Island."—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 26; [Hak. Soc. i. 64].

1684.—"Signor Nicolo Pareres, a Portuguese Merchant, assured me their whole community had worn ye Vice King of Goa ... to send them 2 or 3 Frigates with ... Soldiers to possess themselves of ye Islands of Kegaria and Ingellee."—Ibid. Dec. 17; [Hak. Soc. i. 172].

1727.—"It is now inhabited by Fishers, as are also Inghill and Kidgerie, two neighbouring Islands on the West Side of the Mouth of the Ganges."—A. Hamilton, ii. 2; [ed. 1744]. (See HIDGELEE.)

1753.—"De l'autre côté de l'entrée, les rivières de Cajori et de l'Inghil (see HIDGELEE), puis plus au large la rivière de Pipil et celle de Balosar (see BALASORE), sont avec Tombali (see TUMLOOK), rivière mentionné plus haut, et qu'on peut ajouter ici, des dérivations d’un grand fleuve, dont le nom de Ganga lui est commun avec le Gange. ... Une carte du Golfe de Bengale insérée dans Blaeu, fera même distinguer les rivières d'Inghil et de Cajori (si on prend la peine de l’examiner) comme des bras du Gange."—D'Argente, p. 63.

As to the origin of this singular error, about a river Ganga flowing across India from W. to E., see some extracts under GODAVERY. The Rupnaram River, which joins the Hoogly from the W., just above Diamond Harbour, is the great 'fleeve' here spoken of. The name Ganges or Old Ganga is applied to this in charts late in the 15th century. It is thus mentioned by A. Hamilton, 1727: "About five leagues farther up on the West Side of the River of Hughly, is another Branch of the Ganges, called Ganga, it is broader than that of the Hughly, but much shallower."—ii. 3; [ed. 1744].

KEDGEREE-POT. s. A vulgar expression for a round pipkin such as is in common Indian use, both for holding water and for cooking purposes. (See CHATTY, GHURA.)

1511.—"As a memorial of such misfortunes, they plant in the earth an ear bearing a cudgeri, or earthen pot."—Socyrois, Les Hidnous, iii.

1830.—"Some natives were in readiness with a small raft of Kedgeree-pots, on which the palkee was to be ferried over."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 110.

KENNERY. n.p. The site of a famous and very extensive group of cave-temples on the Island of Salsette, near Bombay, properly Kapheri.

1602.—"Holding some conversation with certain very aged Christians, who had been among the first converts there of Padre Fr. Antonio de Porto, one of them, who alleged himself to be more than 120 years old, and who spoke Portuguese very well, and read and wrote it, and was continually reading the Flos Sanctorum, and the Lives of the Saints, assured me that without doubt the work of the Pagoda of Canari was made under the orders of the father of Sidut Josaft the Prince, whom Bariaam converted to the Faith of Christ. ..."—Couto, VII. iii. cap. v. 526.

1673.—"Next Morn before Break of Day we directed our steps to the anciently famed, but now rain'd City of Canorein ... all cut out of a Rock."—Fryer, 71-72.

1625.—"The principal curiosities of Salsette ... are the cave temples of Kennery. These are certainly in every way remarkable, from their number, their beautiful situation, their elaborate carving, and their marked connection with Budh and his religion."—Heber, ii. 130.

KERSEYMERE, s. This is an English draper's term, and not Anglo-Kersey, Khraki.

Indian. But it is through forms like cassimere (also in English use), a corruption of cashmere, though the corruption has been shaped by the previously existing English word kersey for a kind of woollen cloth, as if kersey were one kind and kerseyone another, of similar goods. Kersey is given by Minsheu (2nd ed. 1627), without definition, thus: "etoffe 211)". The only word like the last given by Litré is "Casisel, sorte de canevas." . . . This does not apply to kersey, which appears to be represented by "Crosseau—Terme de Commerce; ètoffe de laine croissee à deux envers; etyn. croiser." Both words are probably connected with croiser or with carre'. Planche indeed (whose etymologies are generally worthless) says: "made originally at Kersey, in Suffolk, whence its name." And he adds, equal to the occasion, "Kersey, so named from the position of the original factory on the mere, or water which runs through the village of Kersey" (!) Mr. Skeat, however, we see, thinks that Kersey, in Suffolk, is perhaps the origin of the word Kersey: [and this he repeats in the new ed. (1901) of his Concise Etym. Dict., adding, "Not from Jersey, which is also used as the name of a material." Kersey, he says, is "a corruption of Cashmere or Cassimere, by confusion with kersey".

1580.—(no date given) "Kersey. Cassimere. A finer description of kersey . . . (then follows the absurd etymology as given by Planche). . . . It is principally a manufacture of the west of England, and except in being tweed (sic) and of narrow width it in no respect differs from superfine cloth."

Khadir, s. H. khadad; the recent alluvial bordering a large river. (See under Bangur.)

1828.—"The river . . . meanders fantastically . . . through a Khader, or valley between two ranges of hills."—Mundy, Pen and Pencil Sketches, ed. 1858, p. 130.

KHAKEE, vulgarly KHRKI, KRKEARE, s. or adj. Hind. khaki, 'dusty or dust-coloured,' from Pers. khalk, 'earth,' or 'dust'; applied to a light drab or chocolate-coloured cloth. This was the colour of the uniform worn by some of the Punjab regiments at the siege of Delhi, and became very popular in the army generally during the campaigns of 1857-58, being adopted as a convenient material by many other corps. [Gubbins (Mutinies in Oudh, 296] describes how the soldiers at Lucknow dyed their uniforms a light brown or dust colour with a mixture of black and red office inks, and Cave Brown (Punjab and Delhi, ii. 211) speaks of its introduction in place of the red uniform which gave the British soldier the name of "Lal Coertee Wallahs."

1853.—"It has been decided that the full dress will be of dark blue cloth, made up, not like the tunic, but as the native gateooh (aunakchoo), and set off with red piping. The undress clothing will be entirely of Khakee."—Madras Govt. Order, Feb. 18, quoted in Calcutta Rec. cir. 407.

1862.—"Khrkee does not catch in brambles so much as other stuffs."—Brackman, Rouge in Cashmere, 136.]

1878.—"The Amir, we may mention, wore a khaki suit, edged with gold, and the well-known Harati cap."—Sat. Revieuer, Nov. 30, 683.

1890.—"The lattories to be painted with the Kirkee colour, which being similar to the roads of the country, will render the vehicles invisible."—Times, July 12.

1890-91.—The newspapers have constant references to a khaki election, that is an election started on a war policy, and the War Loan for the Transvaal Campaign has been known as "khakis."

Recent military operations have led to the general introduction of khaki as the service uniform. Something like this has been used in the East for clothing from a very early time:

[1611. "See if you can get me a piece of very fine brown calico to make me clothes." —Dauvers, Letters, i. 109.]

KHALSA, s. and adj. Hind. from Ar. khāla (properly khāliṣṭ) 'pure, genuine.' It has various technical meanings, but, as we introduce the word, it is applied by the Sikhs to their community and church (so to call it) collectively.

1783.—"The Sīyāṣṭe salute each other by the expression Wāj Gūrū, without any inclination of the body, or motion of the hand. The Government at large, and their armies, are denominated Khalsa, and Khalsajee." —Forester's Journey, ed. 1808, i. 397.

1851.—"And all the Punjab knows me, for my father's name was known In the days of the conquering Khalsa, when I was a boy half-grown." —Attar Nīghā loqītār, by Sōmār, in an Indian paper; name and date lost.

KHAN, s. a. Turki through Pers. Khān. Originally this was a title, equivalent to Lord or Prince, used among the Mongol and Turk nomad hordes. Besides this sense, and an application to various other chiefs and nobles, it has still become in Persia, and still more in Afghanistan, a sort of vague title like "Esq."); whilst in India it has become a common affix to, or in fact part of, the name of Hindustānis out of every rank, properly, however, of those claiming a Pathān descent. The tendency of swelling titles is always thus to degenerate, and when the value of Khān had sunk, a new form, Khān-Khānān (Khān of Khān) was devised at the Court of Delhi, and applied to one of the high officers of State.

[1675.—"Cawn." See under GINGI.]

KHANSAMA. See CONSUMAH.

KHANUM, s. Turki, through Pers. khānum and khānim, a lady of rank: the feminine of the title Khān, a (q.v.).

1404.—"... la mayor delles avia nòbre Cañon, que quiere dezir Reyna, o Señora grande." —Clavijó, f. 52v.

"... The great wall and tents were for the use of the chief wife of the Lord, who was called Caño, and the other was for the second wife, called Quiñchi Caño, which means 'the little lady.'" —Markham's Clavijó, 145.

1505.—"The greatest of the Beys of the Sagharichie was then Shir Haji Beg, whose daughter, Ais-doulet Begum, Yunis Khan married. ... The Khan had three daughters by Ais-doulet Begum. ... The second daughter, Kullāk Niger Khānum, was my mother. ... Five months after the taking of Kabul she departed to God's mercy, in the year 911" (1505). —Babur, p. 12.

b. Pers. khān. A public building for the accommodation of travellers, a caravanserai. [The word appears in English as early as about 1400; see Stanf. Dict. s.v.]

1533.—"Han est vn Serrail ou endoques les Arabes appeilent fonduz ou se retiennent les Caravannes, ou les Marchands Estrangers, ... ce mot de Han est Turq, et est le mesmo que kurawanaaou ou karlasara (see CARAVANSERAY) dont parle Belon. ..." —De la Boulaye-le-Gonzi, ed. 1657, p. 540.

1527.—"He lost all hope, being informed by his late fellow-traveller, whom he found at the Khan, that the Nuwab was absent on a secret expedition." —W. Scott, The Suryong's Daughter, ch. xiii.

KHANNA. CONNAH, &c. s. This term (Pers. khānum, 'a house, a compartment, apartment, department, receptacle,' &c.) is used almost ad libitum in India in composition, sometimes with most incongruous words, as bobachee (for bāvārchi) connah, 'cook-house,' buggy-connah, 'buggy, or coach-house,' bottle-khanna, toshakhana (q.v.), &c. &c.

KHANUM. See CONSUMAH.
KHASS, KAUSS, &c., adj. Hind. from Ar. khas, ‘special, particular, Royal.’ It has many particular applications, one of the most common being to estates retained in the hands of Government, which are said to be held khas. The khas-mahal again, in a native house, is the women’s apartment. Many years ago a white-bearded khasamain (see CONSUMAH), in the service of one of the present writers, indulging in reminiscences of the days when he had been attached to Lord Lake’s camp, in the beginning of the last century, extolled the sâhîb of those times above their successors, observing (in his native Hindustani): ‘In those days I think the Sahibs all came from London khas; now a great lot of Liverpoolwâlâs come to the country!’

There were in the Palaces of the Great Mogul and other Mahommedan Princes of India always two Halls of Audience, or Durbar, the Devân-i-l‘âm, or Hall of the Public, and the Devân-i-Khâss, the Special or Royal Hall, for those who had the entrée, as we say.

In the Indian Vocabulary, 1788, the word is written Coss.

KHÂSYA, n.p. A name applied to the oldest existing race in the cis-Tibetan Himalaya, between Nepal and the Ganges, i.e. in the British Districts of Kumaun and Garhwal. The Khâsyan are Hind in religion and customs, and probably are substantially Hind also in blood; though in their aspect there is some slight suggestion of that of their Tibetan neighbours. There can be no ground for supposing them to be connected with the Mongoloid nation of Kasias (see COSSYA) in the mountains south of Assam.

[1526.—“About these hills are other tribes of men. With all the investigation and enquiry I could make... All that I could learn was that the men of these hills were called Kas. It struck me that as the Hindustanis frequently confound shin and shin and as Kashmir is the chief... city in those hills, it may have taken its name from that circumstance.”—Legden’s Baber, 313.]

1799.—“The Vakeel of the rajâh of Comanch (i.e. Kamkâ) of Almoro, who is a learned Pandit, informs me that the greater part of the zemindars of that country are Chhasas... They are certainly a very ancient tribe, for they are mentioned as such in the Institutes of Menu; and their great ancestor Chasa or Chasya is mentioned by Sanchoniathon, under the name of Cassius. He is supposed to have lived before the Flood, and to have given his name to the mountains he seized upon.”—Wilford (Wilfordizing!), in As. Res. vi. 456.

1824.—“The Khasya nation pretend to be all Rajpots of the highest caste... they will not even sell one of their little mountain cows to a stranger... They are a modest, gentle, respectful people, honest in their dealings.”—Iheber, i. 264.

KHELÀT, n.p. The capital of the Bilûch State upon the western frontier of Sind, which gives its name to the State itself. The name is in fact the Ar. kâla, ‘a fort.’ (See under KILLA-DAR.) The terminal t of the Ar. word (written Kula) has for many centuries been pronounced only when the word is the first half of a compound name meaning ‘Castle of... No doubt this was the case with the Bilûch capital, though in its case the second part has been completely dropped out of use. Khelât (Kula-t)-i-Ghilji is an example where the second part remains, though sometimes dropped.

KHIRÀJ, s. Ar. kharîj (usually pron. in India kharîj), is properly a tribute levied by a Musulman lord upon conquered unbelievers, also land-tax; in India it is almost always used for the land-revenue paid to Government; whence a common expression (also Ar.) là kharîj, treated as one word, lukhârîj, ‘rent-free.’

[c. 1590.—“In ancient times a capitation tax was imposed, called khiraj.”—Tin, ed. Jarrett, ii. 55. “Some call the whole produce of the revenue khiraj.”—Ibid. ii. 57.]

1781.—“... 138 beegahs, 18 of which are Lackherage land, or land paying no rent.”—In Seton-Karr, i. 49.

KHOA, s. Hind. and Beng. khoâ, a kind of concrete, of broken brick, lime, &c., used for floors and terrace-roofs.

KHOT, s. This is a Mahrâti word, khot, in use in some parts of the Bombay Presidency as the designation of persons holding or farming villages on a peculiar tenure called khoti, and coming under the class legally defined as 'superior holders.'

The position and claims of the khot have been the subject of much debate and difficulty, especially with regard to the rights and duties of the tenants under them, whose position takes various forms; but to go into these questions would carry us much more deeply into local technicalities than would be consistent with the scope of this work, or the knowledge of the editor. Practically it would seem that the khot is, in the midst of provinces where ryotwarry is the ruling system, an exceptional person, holding much the position of a petty zamindar in Bengal (apart from any question of permanent settlement); and that most of the difficult questions touching khoti have arisen from this its exceptional character in Western India.

The khot occurs especially in the Konkan, and was found in existence when, in the early part of the last century, we occupied territory that had been subject to the Mahratta power. It is apparently traceable back at least to the time of the Adil Shâbi (see IDALCAN) dynasty of the Deccan. There are, however, various denominations of khot. In the Southern Konkan the khoti has long been a hereditary zamindar, with proprietary rights, and also has in many cases replaced the ancient patel as headman of the village; a circumstance that has caused the khoti to be sometimes regarded and defined as the holder of an office, rather than of a property. In the Northern Konkan, again, the Khotis were originally mere revenue-farmers, without proprietary or hereditary rights, but had been able to usurp both.

As has been said above, administrative difficulties as to the Khotis have been chiefly connected with their rights over, or claims from, the ryots, which have been often exorbitant and oppressive. At the same time it is in evidence that in the former distracted state of the country, a Khoti was sometimes established in compliance with a petition of the cultivators. The Khoti "acted as a buffer between them and the extortionate demands of the revenue officers under the native Government. And this is easily comprehended, when it is remembered that formerly districts used to be farmed to the native officials, whose sole object was to squeeze as much revenue as possible out of each village. The Khot bore the brunt of this struggle. In many cases he prevented a new survey of his village, by consenting to the imposition of some new patti. This no doubt he recovered from the ryots, but he gave them their own time to pay, advanced them money for their cultivation, and was a milder master than a rapacious revenue officer would have been" (Candy, pp. 20-21). See Selections from Records of Bombay Government, No. cxxiv., N.S., viz., Selection with Notes, regarding the Khoti Tenure, compiled by E. T. Candy, Bo. C. S. 1873; also Abstract of Proceedings of the Gort. of Bombay in the Revenue Dept., April 24, 1876, No. 2474.

KHOI. s. The holder of the peculiar khot tenure in the Bombay Presidency.

KHUD, KUDD. s. This is a term chiefly employed in the Himalaya, kudd, meaning a precipitous hill-side, also a deep valley. It is not in the dictionaries, but is probably allied to the Hind. khat, 'a pit,' Dakh, —Hind. khoti. [Platts gives Hind. khaud. This is from Skt. khanda, 'a gap, a chasm,' while khot comes from Skt. khatta, 'an excavation.'] The word is in constant Anglo-Indian colloquial use at Simla and other Himalayan stations.

1837.—"The steeps about Mussoori are so very perpendicular in many places, that a person of the strongest nerve would scarcely be able to look over the edge of the narrow footpath into the Khud, without a shudder."

—Bacon, First Impressions, ii. 146.

1838.—"On my arrival I found one of the ponies at the estate had been killed by a fall over the precipice, when bringing up water from the khud."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 249.

1866.—"When the men of the 13th Regt. refused to carry the guns any longer, the Eurasian gunners, about 20 in number, accompanying them, made an attempt to bring them on, but were unequal to doing so, and under the direction of this officer (Capt. Cockburn, R.A.) threw them down a Khud, as the ravines in the Himalaya are called. . . .—Bhutan and the H. of the Dover War, by Sorbon Rennie, M.D. p. 199.

1879.—"The commander-in-chief . . . is perhaps alive now because his horse so judiciously chose the spot on which suddenly . . ."

* Pati is used here in the Mahratti sense of a 'contribution' or extra cess. It is the regular Mahratti equivalent of the ahidh of Bengal, on which see Wilson, s.v.
to swerve round that its hind hooves were only half over the chud” (sic).—Times Letter, from Simla, Aug. 15.

KHURREEF. s. Ar. khatirf; ‘autumn’; and in India the crop, or harvest of the crop, which is sown at the beginning of the rainy season (April and May) and gathered in after it, including rice, the tall millets, maize, cotton, rape, sesamum, &c. The obverse crop is rubbee (q.v.).

[1889.—“Three weeks have not elapsed since the Kureef crop, which consists of Bajra (see BAJRA), Jowar (see JOWAUR), several smaller kinds of grain, and cotton, was cleared from off the fields, and the same ground is already ploughed ... and sown for the great Rubbee crop of wheat, barley and chana (see GRAM).”—Broughton, Letters from a Makratta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 215.]

KHUTPUT, s. This is a native slang term in Western India for a prevalent system of intrigue and corruption. The general meaning of khutput in Hind. and Mahr. is rather ‘wrangling’ and ‘worry,’ but it is in the former sense that the word became famous (1850-54) in consequence of Sir James Outram’s struggles with the rascality, during his tenure of the Residency of Baroda.

[1881.—“Khutput, or court intrigue, rules more or less in every native State, to an extent incredible among the more civilised nations of Europe.”—Fryer, Records of Sport, 201.]

KHUTTRY, KHETTRY, CUTTRY. s. Hind. Khattri, Khatri, Skt. Khatriya. The second, or military, caste, in the theoretical or fourth division of the Hindus. [But the word is more commonly applied to a mercantile caste, which has its origin in the Punjab, but is found in considerable numbers in other parts of India. Whether they are really of Khatriya descent is a matter on which there is much difference of opinion. See Crooke, Tribes and Castes of N.W.P., iii. 264 seqq.] The Xapnao whom Ptoleny locates apparently towards Rajputana are probably Khataryas.

[1623.—“They told me Ciautra was a title of honour.”—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 312.
1630.—“And because Cuttrey was of a martiall temper God gave him power to sway Kingdomes with the sceptre.”—Lord, Britannia, 5.
1838.—“Les habitans ... sont la plus part Boogians et Ketteris, tissersans, tauintiers, et autres ouvriers en coton.”—Mandelo, ed. 1559, 139.

[1671.—“There are also Cuttarees, another Sect Principally about Agra and those parts up the Country, who are as the Baniun Gentooes here.”—In Yule, Hedges’ Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cccxi.]

1673. — “Opium is frequently eaten in great quantities by the Rashpoots, Quateries, and Patans.”—Fryer, 193.
1726.—“The second generation in rank among these heathen is that of the Settreas.”—Valetexia, Charon, 57.
1782.—“The Chittery occasionally betakes himself to trade, and the Sooder has become the inheritor of prinicipalities.”—G. Forster’s Journey, ed. 1808, i. 64.
1836.—“The Banians are the mercantile caste of the origin Hindooos, ... They call themselves Shudderis, which signifies innocent or harmless(!)”—Sir R. Phillips, Million of Facts, 322.

KHYBER PASS. n.p. The famous gorge which forms the chief gate of Afghanistan from Peshawur, properly Khaiiber. [The place of the same name near Al-Madinah is mentioned in the Jin (iii. 57), and Sir R. Burton writes: “Khaybar in Hebrew is supposed to mean a castle. D’Herbelot makes it to mean a pact or association of the Jews against the Moslems.” (Pilgrimages, ed. 1893, i. 346, note.)]

1519.—“Early next morning we set out on our march, and crossing the Kheiber Pass, halted at the foot of it. The Khizer-Khill had been extremely licentious in their conduct. Both on the coming and going of our army they had shot upon the stragglers, and such of our people as lagged behind, or separated from the rest, and carried off their horses. It was clearly expedient that they should meet with a suitable chastisement.”

“On Thursday Jamrud was our encamping ground.

“On Friday we went through the Khaibar Pass, and encamped at ‘Ali Musjid.”—Johangir, in Elliot, vi. 311.

1783.—“The stage from Timroord (read Timrood) to Dickah, usually called the Hyber-pass, being the only one in which danger is to be apprehended from banditti, the officer of the escort gave orders to his party to ... march early on the next morning. ... Timur Shah, who used to pass the winter at Peshour ... never passed through the territory of the Hybers, without their attacking his advanced or rear guard.”—Forster’s Travels, ed. 1808, ii. 63-66.

And crowding through the Khyber’s rocky strait, Sweep like a bloody harrow o’er the land.”

The Banyan Tree, p. 6.
KIDDERPORE, n.p. This is the name of a suburb of Calcutta, on the left bank of the Hooghly, a little way south of Fort William, and is the seat of the Government Dockyard. This establishment was formed in the 18th century by Gen. Kyd, "after whom," says the Imperial Gazetteer, "the village is named." This is the general belief, and was mine [H.Y.] till recently, when I found from the chart and directions in the English Pilot of 1711 that the village of Kidderpore (called in the same chart Kitherepore) then occupied the same position, i.e. immediately below "Governerpore" and that immediately below "Chittanutte" (i.e. Govindpâr and Chatâññâ) (see CHUTTANUTTY).

1711.—"... then keep Rounding Chittnutte (Chitpore) Bite down to Chitty Natty Point (see CHUTTANUTTY). ... The Bite below Gover Napore (Govindpâr) is Shool, and below the Shool is an Eddy; therefore from Gover Napore, you must stand over to the Starboard-Shore, and keep it aboard till you come up almost with the Point opposite to Kidderpore, but no longer..."—The English Pilot, p. 65.

KIL, s. Pitch or bitumen. Tam. and Mal, kil, Ar. kir, Pers. kir and kil.

C. 1330.—"In Persia are some springs, from which flows a kind of pitch which is called kâ (read kir) (pîr diço ou pûna), with which they smear the skins in which wine is carried and stored."—Friar Jordanus, p. 10.

C. 1500.—"These are pitched with a bitumen which they call quill, which is like pitch."—Corea, Hak. Soc. 240.

KILLADAR, s. P.—H. kîl'adâr, from Ar. kalâ, 'a fort.' The commandant of a fort, castle, or garrison. The Ar. kalâ is always in India pronounced kîlā. And it is possible that in the first quotation Ibn Batuta has misinterpreted an Indian title; taking it as from Pers. kîlîd, 'a key.' It may be noted with reference to kîlā that this Ar. word is generally represented in Spanish names by Acula, a name borne by nine Spanish towns entered in K. Johnston's Index Geographicus; and in Sicilian ones by Calata, e.g. Calatafimi, Cutlassettu, Calataquiro.

C. 1340.—... Kâdhi Khân, Sadraul-Jîhân, who became the chief of the Amirs, and had the title of Kîlt-dâr, i.e. Keeper of the keys of the Palace. This officer was accustomed to pass every night at the Sultan's door, with the bodyguard."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 196.

1757.—"The fugitive garrison... returned with 500 more, sent by the Kellidar of Vandywass."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 217.

1817.—"The following were the terms... that Ami should be restored to its former governor or Kellidar."—Mill, iii. 340.

1829.—"Among the prisoners captured in the Fort of Hattrass, search was made by us for the Keeledar."—Mem. of John Skipp, ii. 210.

KILLA-KOTE, s. pl. A combination of Ar.—P. and Hind. words for a fort (kîlîa for kûla, and kôt), used in Western India to imply the whole fortifications of a territory (B. Drummond).

KILLUT, KILLAUT. &c., s. Ar.—H. kîlît. A dress of honour presented by a superior on ceremonial occasions; but the meaning is often extended to the whole of a ceremonial present of that nature, of whatever it may consist. [The Ar. kîlît-ch properly means 'what a man strips from his person.' There were (among the later Moguls) five degrees of kîlît, those of three, five, six, or seven pieces; or they might as a special mark of favour consist of clothes that the emperor had actually worn." (See for further details Mr. Irvine in J.R.A.S., N.S., July 1890, p. 533.)] The word has in Russian been degraded to mean the long loose gown which forms the most common dress in Turkistan, called generally by Schuyler 'a dressing-gown' (Germ. Schlafrock). See Frejahn, Wolga Bulgar., p. 43.

1411.—"Several days passed in sumptuous feasts. Khîlîats and girdles of royal magnificence were distributed."—Abd-ulrazzâk, in Not. et Extr. xiv. 209.

1673.—"Sir George Oxenden held it... He defended himself and the Merchants bravely, that he had a Collat or SeerpaW (q.v.) a Robe of Honour from Head to Foot, offered him from the Great Mogul."—Fryer, 57.

1676.—"This is the Wardrobe, where the Royal Garments are kept; and from whence the King sends for the Calaat, or a whole Habit for a Man, when he would honour any Stranger."—Tavernier, E. T. ii. 46; [ed. Bâll, ii. 95].

1774.—"A flowered satin gown was brought me, and I was dressed in it as a khîlat."—Bopp, in Markham's Tibet, 25.

1786.—"And he the said Warren Hastings did send kellauts, or robes of honour (the most public and distinguished mode of acknowledging merit known in India) to the sailed ministers in testimony of his approbation of their services."—Articles of Charge against Hastings, in Burke's Works, vii. 25.

1809.—"On paying a visit to any Asiatic Prince, an inferior receives from him a complete dress of honour, consisting of a khelaut, a robe, a turban, a shield and sword, with a string of pearls to go round the neck."—Ed. Valentia, i. 99.

1813.—"On examining the khelauts. . . . from the great Maharajah Madajee Sindia, the serpeyeh (see SIRPECH) . . . presented to Sir Charles Malet, was found to be composed of false stones."—Fortes, Or. Memos. iii. 50; [2nd ed. ii. 418].

KINCOB. s. Gold brocade. P.—H. kamkhab, komkhab, vulgarly kinckhab. The English is perhaps from the Guja-ratii, as in that language the last syllable is short.

This word has been twice imported from the East. For it is only another form of the medieval name of an Eastern damask or brocade, camocca. This was taken from the medieval Persian and Arabic forms kamkhab or kinckhab, 'damask silk,' and seems to have come to Europe in the 13th century. F. Johnson's Dict, distinguishes between kamkha, 'damask silk of one colour,' and kinckha, 'damask silk of different colours.' And this again, according to Dozy, quoting Hoffmann, is originally a Chinese word kin-kho; in which doubtless kin, 'gold,' is the first element. Kim is the Fuhkien form of the word; ku, kin-hou, 'gold-flower? We have seen kinckhab derived from Pers. kom-khab, 'less sleep,' because such cloth is rough and prevents sleep! This is a type of many etymologies. [*The ordinary derivation of the word supposes that a man could not even dream of it who had not seen it (*kom, 'little,' khab, 'dream')] (Yusef Ali, Momo, on Silk, 86). Platts and the Mandius gloss, take it from *kam, 'little,' khab, 'nap.') Ducange appears to think the word survived in the French moquece (or moquete); but if so the application of the term must have degenerated in England. (See in Drapery Dict. mockado, the form of which has sug-ished a sham stuff.)

1781.—"My holiday suit, consisting of a flowered Velvet Coat of the Carpet Pattern, with two rows of broad Gold Lace, a rich Kingcoc Waistcoat, and Crimson Velvet Breeches with Gold Garters, is now a butt to the shafts of Macaroni ridicule."—Letter

1756—"... but not until the nabob's mother aforesaid had engaged to pay for the said change of prison, a sum of £10,000... and that she would ransom the zenana... for Kincoobs, muslins, cloths, &c. &c. &c."

1859. "Twenty trays of shawls, khenkaubs... were tendered to me."—Ed. Valentia, i. 117.

[1813.—Forbes writes keemcob, keemcab. Or. Memo. 2nd i. 311: ii. 418.]

1829. "Tired of this service we took possession of the town of Muttra, driving them out. Here we had glorious plunder—shawls, silks, satins, khenkaubs, money, &c."

—Mem. of John Slop, i. 124.

KING-CROW. s. A glossy black bird, otherwise called Drongo shrike, about as large as a small pigeon, with a long forked tail, Dicrurus macrocerus, Vieillot, found all over India. "It perches generally on some bare branch, whence it can have a good look-out, or the top of a house, or post, or telegraph-wire, frequently also on low bushes, hedges, walks, or ant-hills" (Jordan).

1853.—"... the King-crow... leaves the whole bird and beat tribe far behind in originality and force of character... He does not come into the house, the telegraph wire suits him better. Perched on it he can see what is going on... drops, beat foremost, on the back of the kite... spies a bee-eater capturing a goodly moth, and after a hot chase, forces it to deliver up its booty."—The Tribes on My Frontier, 148.

KIOSQUE. s. From the Turki and Pers. kishk or kushk, 'a pavilion, a villa,' &c. The word is not Anglo-Indian, nor is it a word, we think, at all common in modern native use.

c. 1550.—"When he was returned from his expedition, and drawing near to the capital, he ordered his son to build him a palace, or as these people call it a kushk, by the side of a river which runs at that place, which is called Afghanpūr."—Ibn Batūta, iii. 212.

1623.—"There is (in the garden) running water which issues from the entrance of a great kiosk, or covered place, where one may stay to take the air, which is built at the end of the garden over a great pond which adjoins the outside of the garden, so that, like the one at Surat, it serves also for the public use of the city."—P. della Valle, i. 393; [Hak. Soc. i. 65].

KIRBEE. KURBEE, s. Hind. karbī, kirbī. Skt. kalamā, 'the stalk of a pot-herb.' The stalks of juvir (see JOWAUR), used as food for cattle.

[1596.—"... We also fell in with large crops of kurbee, the dried stalks of Bajiree and Jocay, two inferior kinds of grain; an excellent fodder for the camels."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahattas Camp, ed. 1892, p. 41.]

KISHM. n.p. The largest of the islands in the Persian Gulf, called by the Portuguese Quezome and the like, and sometimes by our old travellers, Kishmish. It is now more popularly called Jucirat-al-tawila, in Pers. Jac. darbā, 'the Long Island' (like the Lewes), and the name of Kishm is confined to the chief town, at the eastern extremity, where still remains the old Portuguese fort taken in 1622, before which William Baillie the Navigator fell. But the oldest name is the still not quite extinct Brokht, which closely preserves the Greek Oaracta.

B.C. 325.—"... And setting sail (from Hormozia), in a run of 300 stadia they passed a desert and bushy island, and moored beside another island which was large and inhabited. The small desert island was named Organa (no doubt Greco), afterwards the site of N. Hormuz—see ORMUS; and the one at which they anchored 'Oasara, planted with vines and date-palms, and with plenty of corn.'—Arr. Voyages of Nearchus, ch. xxxvii.

1538.—"... so I hasted with him in the company of divers merchants for to go from Babylon (orig. Babylonia) to Caixem, whence he carried me to Ormuz..."—F. M. Pinto, chap. vi. (Cupra, p. 9).

1553.—"... Finally, like a timorous and despairing man... he determined to leave the city (Ormuz) deserted, and to pass over to the Isle of Queixome. That island is close to the mainland of Persia, and is within sight of Ormuz at 3 leagues distance."

—Barros, III. vii. 4.

1554.—"... Then we departed to the Isle of Kais or Old Hormuz, and then to the island of Brakhta, and some others of the Green Sea, i.e. in the Sea of Hormuz, without being able to get any intelligence."—Sidī Ali, 67.

[1600. — "Queixome." See under RESHIRE.

[1623.—"They say likewise that Ormuz and Keschiome are extremely well fortified by the Moors."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 188; in i. 2, Kesom.

1673. — "The next morning we had brought Left on the left hand of the Island of Kismash, leaving a woody Island uninhabited between Kismash and the Main." — Fryer, 229.

1682. — "The Island Queixome, or Queixome, otherwise called by travellers and geographers Kechmiche, and by the natives Broki. ... — Niedzey, Zee on Land-Heize, ii. 103.

1817. — "... Vases filled with Kishmei's golden wine. And the red weepings of the Shiraz vine." — Moore, Mokutan.

1821. — "We are to keep a small force at Kishmi, to make descents and destroy boats and other means of maritime war, whenever any symptoms of piracy reappear." — Elphinstone, in Life, i. 123.

KISHMISH, s. Pers. Small stoneless raisins originally imported from Persia. Perhaps so called from the island Kishm. Its vintages are mentioned by Arrian, and by T. Moore! (See under KISHM.) [For the manufacture of Kishmish in Afghanistan, see Watt, Econ. Dict. VI. pt. iv. 284.]

[c. 1665. — "Usur being the country which principally supplies Delhi with these fruits. ... Kichmiches, or raisins, apparently without stones. ..." — Baeutier, ed. Constable, 118.]

1673. — "We refreshed ourselves an entire day at Girou, where a small White Grape, without any Stone, was an excellent Cordial ... they are called Kismas Grapes, and the Wine is known by the same Name farther than where they grow." — Fryer, 242.

1711. — "I could never meet with any of the Kishmishes before they were turned. These are Raisins, a size less than our Malagas, of the same Colour, and without Stones." — Lockyer, 233.

1883. — "Kishmish, a delicious grape, of white elongated shape, also small and very sweet, both eaten and used for wine-making. When dried this is the Sultana raisin. ..." — Wills, Modern Persia, 171.

KISSMISS, s. Native servant's word for Christmas. But that festival is usually called Bajri din, 'the great day.' (See BURRA DIN.)

KIST, s. Ar. Kist. The yearly land revenue in India is paid by instalments which fall due at different periods in different parts of the country; each such instalment is called a kist, or quota. [The settlement of these instalments is Kist-bundi.]

[1767. — "This method of comprising the whole estimate into so narrow a compass ... will convey to you a more distinct idea ... than if we transmitted a monthly account of the deficiency of each person's Kistbundee." — Verelst, View of Bengal, App. 56.]

1809. — "Force was always requisite to make him pay his Kists or tribute." — Lt. Valenta, i. 317.

1810. — "The heavy Kists or collections of Bengal are from August to September." — Williamson, V. M. ii. 498.

1817. — "So desperate a malady," said the President, 'requires a remedy that shall reach its source. And I have no hesitation in stating my opinion that there is no mode of eradicating the disease, but by removing the original cause; and placing these districts, which are pledged for the security of the Kists, beyond the reach of his Highness's management." — Mill, vi. 55.

KITMUTGAR, s. Hind. khidmatg ar, from Ar. , service, therefore 'one rendering service.' The Anglo-Indian use is peculiar to the Bengal Presidency, where the word is habitually applied to a Musulman servant, whose duties are connected with serving meals and waiting at table under the Consumah, if there be one. Kismutgar is a vulgarism, now perhaps obsolete. The word is spelt by Hadley in his Grammar (see under MOORS) khusmutgar. In the word khidmat, as in khil'at (see KILLUT), the terminal t in uninflected Arabic has long been dropped, though retained in the form in which these words have got into foreign tongues.

1765. — "... they were taken into the service of Sanjak Daurak as immediate attendants on his person: Hadje (see HADJEE) in capacity of his first Kistmutgar (or valet)." — Hevel, Hist. Events, &c., i. 60.

1782. — "I therefore beg to caution strangers against those race of vagabonds who ply about them under the denomination of Consumahs and Kismutdars." — Letter in India Gazette, Sept. 28.

1784. — "The Bearer ... perceiving a quantity of blood ... called to the Hookabardar and a Kistmutgar." — In Stow-Kurr, i. 13.

1810. — "The Khedmutgar, or as he is often termed, the Kismutgar, is with very few exceptions, a Musalman; his business is to ... wait at table." — Williamson, V. M. i. 212.

c. 1819. — "The Kitmutgaur, who had attended us from Calcutta, had done his work, and made his harvests, though in no very large way of the 'Tarse Willant' or white people."—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog. 283. The phrase in italics stands for 'Willant' (see BILAYUT). "fresh or green Europeans"—Griffins (q.v.).

1513. "... We ... saw nothing remarkable on the way but a Khdmutgar of Chimnage Appa, who was rolling from Poona to Funderpoor, in performance of a vow which he made for a child. He had been a month at it, and had become so expert that he went on smoothly and without pausing, and kept rolling evenly along the middle of the road, over stones and everything. He travelled at the rate of two cases a day."—Elphinstone, in L.F., i. 257-8.

1578. "We had each our own ... Kitzmutgar or table servant. It is the custom in India for each person to have his own table servant, and when dining out to take him with him to wait behind his chair."—Life in the Mogul's, l. 32.

Kittysol, Kitisol. s. This word survived till lately in the Indian Tariff, but it is otherwise long obsolete. It was formerly in common use for 'an umbrella,' and especially for the kind, made of bamboo and paper, imported from China, such as the English fashion of to-day has adopted to screen fire-places in summer. The word is Portuguese, quita-sol, 'bar-sun.' Also quita-sol occurs in Scot's Discourse of Jane, quoted below from Purchas. See also Hulsten, Coll. of Voyages, in German, 1602, i. 27. [Mr. Scot points out that in Howison's Malay Diet. (1801) we have, s.v. Payong: "A kitta-sol, sombraria," which is nearer to the Port. original than any of the examples given since 1611. This may be due to the strong Portuguese influence at Malacca.]

1558. "The present was forty piecees of silke, ... a litter chaire and gult, and two quita-soles of silke."—Parker's Mendoza, ii. 105.

1605. "... Before the shewes came, the King was brought out upon a man's shoulders, bestriding his necke, and the man holding his legs before him, and had many rich tyrasoles carried over and round about him."—E. Not, in Purchas, i. 151.

1611. "... Of Kittasoles of State for to shadwow him, there bee twentie" (in the Treasury of Akbar).—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 215.

1759. —In Expenses of Nawab's entertainment at Calcutta, we find: "A China Kittisal ... Rs. 3."—Long, 194.

1761. —A chart of Chittagong, by Barth. Painted, marks on S. side of Chittagong R., an umbrella-like tree, called "Kittysoll Tree.

1755. —"To finish the whole, a Kittisaw (a kind of umbrella) is suspended not infrequently over the lady's head."—Diary, in Besant, Echoes, 3rd ed. 112.

1792. —"In those days the Kettesal, which is now sported by our very Cooks and Boat-swains, was prohibited, as I have heard, to you, see to any one below the rank of field officer."—Letter, in Madras Courier, May 3.

1813. —In the table of exports from Macao, we find:

1816. "Kittisols. large, 2,000 to 3,000, do. small, 5,000 to 10,000."—Milburn, ii. 514.

1817. —"Umbrellas, Chinese, of paper, or Keetysols."—India Tariff.

In another table of the same year: "Chinese paper Kettysolls, valuation Rs. 30 for a box of 110, duty 5 per cent." (See CHATTA ROUNDDEL, UMBRELLA.)

Kittysol-Boy. s. A servant who carried an umbrella over his master. See Milburn, ii. 62. (See examples under ROUNDDEL.)

KLING. m.p. This is the name (Kellou) applied in the Malay countries, including our Straits Settlements, to the people of Continental India who trade thither, or are settled in those regions, and to the descendants of those settlers. [Mr. Skeat remarks: “The standard Malay form is not Kālinga, which is the Sumatran form, but Keling (K'ling or Kling). The Malay use of the word is, as a rule, restricted to Tamils, but it is very rarely used in a wider sense.”]

The name is a form of Kālinga, a very ancient name for the region known as the “Northern Circars,” (q.v.), i.e. the Telugu coast of the Bay of Bengal, or, to express it otherwise in general terms, for that coast which extends from the Kistna to the Mahānadi. “The Kalingas” also appear frequently, after the Panharic fashion, as an ethnic name in the old Sanskrit lists of races. Kālinga appears in the earliest of Indian inscriptions, viz. in the edicts of Aśoka, and specifically in that famous edict (XIII) remaining in fragments at Girnār and Kapardī-giri, and more completely at Khālṣī, which preserves the link, almost unique from the Indian side, connecting the histories of India and of the Greeks, by recording the names of Antiochus, Ptolemy, Antigonus, Magas, and Alexander.

Kālinga is a kingdom constantly mentioned in the Buddhist and historical legends of Ceylon; and we find commemoration of the kingdom of Kālinga and of the capital city of Kālinganagara (e.g. in Ind. Antiq. iii. 152, x. 245). It was from a daughter of a King of Kālinga that sprang, according to the Mahawanso, the famous Wijayo, the civilizer of Ceylon and the founder of its ancient royal race.

Kalingapatam, a port of the Ganjam district, still preserves the ancient name of Kālinga, though its identity with the Kālinganagara of the inscriptions is not to be assumed. The name in later, but still ancient, inscriptions appears occasionally as Tri-Kalinga, “the Three Kalingas”; and this probably, in a Telugu version Mādū-Kalinga, having that meaning, is the original of the Madoyalinga of Plini in one of the passages quoted from him. (The possible connection which obviously suggests itself of this name Tri-Kalinga with the names Telinga and Telingāna, applied, at least since the Middle Ages, to the same region, will be noticed under TELINGA).

The coast of Kālinga appears to be that part of the continent whence commerce with the Archipelago at an early date, and emigration thither, was most rife; and the name appears to have been in great measure adopted in the Archipelago as the designation of India in general, or of the whole of the Peninsula, part of it. Throughout the book of Malay historical legends called the Śiśa Malaya the word Kaling or Kling is used for India in general, but more particularly for the southern parts (see Journ. Ind. Archip. v. 133). And the statement of Forrest (Voyage to Mergui Archip. 1792, p. 82) that Macassar “Indostan” was called “Neegree Telinga” (i.e. Nagara Telinga) illustrates the same thing and also the substantial identity of the names Telinga, Kālinga.

The name Kīling, applied to settlers of Indian origin, makes its appearance in the Portuguese narratives immediately after the conquest of Malacca (1511). At the present day most, if not all of the Klings of Singapore come, not from the “Northern Circars,” but from Tanjore, a purely Tamil district. And thus it is that so good an authority as Roorda van Eijssinga translates Kāling by ‘Coromandel people.’ They are either Hindūs or Lablais (see LUBEYE). The latter class in British India never take domestic service with Europeans, whilst they seem to succeed well in that capacity in Singapore. “In 1876,” writes Dr. Burnell, “the head-servant at Bekker’s great hotel there was a very good specimen of the Nagür Lablais; and to my surprise he recollected me as the head assistant-collector of Tanjore, which I had been some ten years before.” The Hindu Klings appear to be chiefly drivers of bazaar carriages and keepers of eating-houses. There is a Siva temple in Singapore, which is served by Pandārāms (q.v.). The only Brāhmins there in 1876 were certain convicts. It may be noticed that Cālingas is the name of a heathen tribe of (alleged) Malay origin in the east of N. Luzon (Philippine Islands).

KOEL, s. This is the common name in northern India of Eudynamys orientalis, L. (Fam. of Cuckoos), also called kokiki and koldi. The name koel is taken from its cry during the breeding season, "ko-il, ko-il," increasing in vigour and intensity as it goes on. The male bird has also another note, which Blyth syllables as Ho-rlen-lo, or Hoo-a, or Ho-y-o. When it takes flight it has yet another somewhat melodious and rich liquid call; all thoroughly cueline.” (Jerdon.)

c. 1526. — "Another is the Koel, which in length may be equal to the crow, but is much thinner. It has a kind of song, and is the nightingale of Hindustan. It is respected by the natives of Hindustan as much as the nightingale is by us. It inhabits gardens where the trees are close planted.” — Bunyan’s Travels, ed. 1854, p. 233.

c. 1590. — "The Koyil resembles the myneh (see MyNA), but is blacker, and has red eyes and a long tail. It is fabled to be enamoured of the rose, in the same manner as the nightingale.” — Aesop, ed. Collinck, ii. 383; [ed. Jarrett, iii. 121].

c. 1790. — "Le plaisir que cause la fraîcheur dont on jouit sous cette belle verdure est augmenté encore par le gavouillement des coqs et les cris clairs et perçants du Kowli.” — Houter, ii. 9.

1883. — "This same crow-pleasant has a second or third cousin called the Koel, which deposits its eggs in the nest of the crow, and has its young brought up by that discreetable foster-parent. Now this bird supposes that it has a musical voice, and devotes the best part of the night to vocal exercises, after the manner of the nightingale. You may call it the Indian nightingale if you like. There is a difference however in its song ... when it gets to the very top of its pitch, its voice cracks and there is an end of it, or rather there is not, for the persevering musician begins again. ... Does not the Maratha novelist, dwelling on the delights of a spring morning in an Indian village, tell how the air is filled with the dulcet melody of the Koel, the green parrot, and the peacock?” — Trises on My Frontier, 156.
KOHINOR, n.p. Pers. Koh-i-nur, 'Mountain of Light': the name of one of the most famous diamonds in the world. It was an item in the Deccan booty of Alauddin Khilji (dd. 1316), and was surrendered to Baber (or more precisely to his son Humayün) on the capture of Agra (1526). It remained in the possession of the Moghul dynasty till Nadir exorted it at Delhi from the conquered Mahomed Shah (1739). After Nadir's death it came into the hands of Ahmed Shah, the founder of the Afghan monarchy. Shah Shuja, Ahmed's grandson, had in turn to give it up to Ranjit Singh when a fugitive in his dominions. On the annexation of the Punjab in 1849 it passed to the English, and is now among the Crown jewels of England. Before it reached that position it ran through strange risks, as may be read in a most diverting story told by Bosworth Smith in his Life of Lord Lawrence (i. 327-8). In 1850-51, before being shown at the Great Exhibition in Hyde Park, it went through a process of cutting which, for reasons unintelligible to ordinary mortals, reduced its weight from 186.5 to 106.4. [See an interesting note in Ball's Tavernier, ii. 431 seqq.]

1526.—"In the battle in which Ibrahim was defeated, Bikermajt (Raja of Gwalior) was sent to hell. Bikermajt's family . . . were at this moment in Agra. When Humâlîn arrived . . . he (did not permit them) to be plundered. Of their own free will they presented to Humâlîn a peskhah (see PESHCUSCH), consisting of a quantity of jewels and precious stones. Among these was one famous diamond which had been acquired by Sultân Alâeddin. It is so valuable that a judge of diamonds valued it at half the daily expense of the whole world. It is about eight mishkals . . ."—Baber, p. 393.

1676.—(With an engraving of the stone.) "This diamond belongs to the Great Mogul . . . and it weighs 319 Rattis (see RUTTEE) and a half, which make 279 and nine 16ths of our Carats; when it was rough it weighed 907 Rattis, which make 783 carats.—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 148; [ed. Ball, ii. 129]."

1842.—"In one of the bracelets was the Cobi Noor, known to be one of the largest diamonds in the world."—Elphinston, Cumbul, i. 63.

1856.—"He (Akbar) bears no weapon, save his dagger, hid. Up to the ivory haft in muslin swathes; No ornament but that one famous gem; Mountain of Light: bound with a silken thread. Upon his nervous wrist; more used, I ween. To feel the rough strap of his buckler there."—The Bragg's Tree.

1866.—"A dense jungle of bamboo, through which we had to cut a way, taking it by turns to lead, and hew a path through the tough stems with my 'kukri,' which here proved of great service."—Lt. Col. T. Lenox, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 269.

KOOMKY, s. (See COOMKY.)

KOONEE, KUNBEE, KOOLUMBEE. n.p. The name of the prevalent cultivating class in Guzerat and the Konkan, the Kurmi of N. India. Skt. kuõuũba. The Kuõuũ is the pure Sudra, [but the N. India branch are beginning to assert a more respectable origin]. In the Deccan the title distinguished the cultivator from him who wore arms and preferred to be called a Mahratta (Drammond).

KOOZA. 9. A goglet, or pitcher of porous clay; corr. of Pers. kāza. Commonly used at Bombay.

1690.—"Therefore they carry about with them Kousers or Jars of Water, when they go abroad, to quench their thirst."—Owington, 255.

1871.—"Many parts of India are celebrated for their Coojahs or goglets, but the finest are brought from Bussorah, being light, thin, and porous, made from a whitish clay."—Riddell, Ind. Domest. Econ., 362.

KOSHOOH. 9. This is a term which was affected by Tippoo Sahib in his military organisation, for a brigade, or a regiment in the larger Continental use of that word. His *Pādah 'askar, or Regular Infantry, was formed into 5 Kachakris (see CUTCHERRY), composed in all of 27 Kushāns. A MS. note on the copy of Kirkpatrick's Letters in the India Office Library says that Kushan was properly Skt. kshnu or kshānī, 'a grand division of the force of an Empire, as used in the Abul-aibhārata. But the word adopted by Tippoo appears to be Turki. Thus we read in Quatremère's transl. from Abdurrazazzik: "He (Shah Rukh) distributed to the emirs who commanded the tomāns (corps of 10,000), the koshūn (corps of 1000), the sadeh (of 100), the deleh (of 10), and even to the private soldiers, presents and rewards" (Nots. et Ext., xiv. 91; see also p. 89). Again: "The soldiers of Isfahan having heard of the amnesty accorded them, arrived, koshūn by koshūn." (Ibid. 130.) Vambrény gives koshūn as Or. Turki for an army, a troop (literally whatever is composed of several parts).

c. 1782.—"In the time of the deceased Nawab, the exercises ... of the regular troops were ... performed, and the word given according to the French system ... but now, the Sultan (Tippoo) ... changed the military code ... and altered the technical terms or words of command ... to words of the Persian and Turkish languages. ... From the regular infantry 5000 men being selected, they were named Kushoon, and the officer commanding that body was called a Sipahdar. ..."—Hist. of Tipu Sultan, p. 31.

KOTOW, KOTOW, s. From the Chinese K'o-t'ou, lit. 'knock-head'; the salutation used in China before the Emperor, his representatives, or his symbols, made by prostrations repeated a fixed number of times, the forehead touching the ground at each prostration. It is also used as the most respectful form of salutation from children to parents, and from servants to masters on formal occasions, &c.

This mode of homage belongs to old Pan-Asian practice. It was not, however, according to M. Pauthier, of indigenous antiquity at the Court of China, for it is not found in the ancient Book of Rites of the Cheu Dynasty, and he supposes it to have been introduced by the great destroyer and reorganiser, Tsin shi Hwangti, the Builder of the Wall. It had certainly become established by the 8th century of our era, for it is mentioned that the Ambassadors who came to Court from the famous Hārūn-al-Rashīd (a.d. 798) had to perform it. Its nature is mentioned by Marco Polo, and by the ambassadors of Shāh Rukh (see below). It was also the established ceremonial in the presence of the Mongol Khāns, and is described by Baber under the name of kornish. It was probably introduced into Persia in the time of the Mongol Princes of the house of Hūlākū, and it continued to be in use in the time of Shāh 'Albās. The custom indeed in Persia may possibly have come down from time immemorial, for, as the classical quotations show, it was of very ancient prevalence in that country. But the interruptions to Persian monarchy are perhaps against this. In English the term, which was made familiar by Lord Amherst's refusal to perform it at Pekin in 1816, is frequently used for servile acquiescence or adulation. 'Ko-to-k'o-to' is often colloquially used for 'Thank you' (E. C. Biber).

c. B.C. 454.—"And afterwards when they were come to Susa in the king's presence, and the guards ordered them to fall down and do obeisance, and went so far as to use force to compel them, they refused, and said they would never do any such thing, even were their heads thrust down to the ground, for it was not their custom to worship men, and they had not come to Persia for that purpose.' —Herodotus, iii. 196.

c. B.C. 464.—'Themistocles . . . first meets with Artabanus the Chilarch, and tells him that he was a Greek, and wished to have an interview with the king. . . . But quoth he; 'Stranger, the laws of men are various. . . . You Greeks, 'tis said, most admire liberty and equality, but to us of our many and good laws the best is to honour the king, and adore him by prostration, as the Image of God, the Preserver of all things.' . . . Themistocles, on hearing these things, says to him: But I, O Artabanus, . . . will myself obey your laws.' . . . —Plutarch, Themistocles, xxvii.

c. B.C. 390.—'Conon, being sent by Pharnabazus to the king, on his arrival, in accordance with Persian custom, was introduced first to the Chilarch Tithraustes who held the second rank in the empire, and stated that he desired an interview with the king; for no one is admitted without this. The officer replied: 'It can be at once; but consider whether you think it best to have an interview, or to write the business on which you come. For if you come into the presence you must needs worship the king (what they call ποσειων). If this is disagreeable to you you may commit your wishes to me, without doubt of their being as well accomplished.' Then Conon says: 'Indeed it is not disagreeable to me to pay the king any honour whatever. But I fear lest I bring discredit upon my city, if belonging to a state which is wont to rule over other nations I adopt manners which are not her own, but those of foreigners.' Hence he delivered his wishes in writing to the officer.'—Corin. Nepos, Conon, c. iv.

B.C. 324.—'But he (Alexander) was now downhearted, and beginning to despairing towards the divinity, and suspicious towards his friends. Especially he dreaded Antipater and his sons. Of these Iolas was the Chief Cupbearer, whilst Kasander had come out lately. So the latter, seeing certain Barbarians prostrating themselves (ποσειωντας), a sort of thing which he, having been brought up in Greek fashion, had never witnessed before, broke into fits of laughter. But Alexander in a rage gript him fast by the hair with both hands, and knocked his head against the wall.'—Plutarch, Alexander, lixiv.

A.D. 798.—'In the 14th year of Tchin- yunn, the Khalif Galun (Hārān) sent three ambassadors to the Emperor; they performed the ceremony of kneeling and beating the forehead on the ground, to salute the Emperor. The earlier ambassadors from the Khalifs who came to China had at first made difficulties about performing this ceremony. The Chinese history relates that the Mahomedsians declared that they knelt only to worship Heaven. But eventually, being better informed, they made scruple no longer.'—Gaudefroy, Abrégé de l'Histoire des Thaïes, in Amoy, Mémoires cons. les Chinois, xvi. 141.

c. 1245.—'Tartari de mandato ipsius principes suos Baiuchonoy et Bato violenter ab omnibus naeucis ad ipsos venientibus faciunt adorari cum triplei genui floxione, triplici quodque capitum surorum in terram allisione.'—Testo Latinus ejusdem, Spec. Historiae, l. xxix. cap. 74.

1298.—'And when they are all seated, each in his proper place, then a great prelate rises and says with a loud voice: 'Bow and adore!' And as soon as he has said this, the company bow down until their foreheads touch the earth in adoration towards the Emperor as if he were a god. And this adoration they repeat four times.'—Marco Polo, Bk. ii. ch. 15.

1104.—'E fieracore vestir dos ropas de cotonen (see KINCOB), é la usanza era, quando estas roupas pómian por el Señor, de fazer un gran yantar, é despues de comer de les vestir de las ropas, é entónces de fincar los finos tres veces en tierra por reverencia del gran Señor.'—Clarín, § xii.

'And the custom was, when these robes were presented as from the Emperor, to make a great feast, and after eating to clothe them with the robes, and then that they should touch the ground three times with the knees to show great reverence for the Lord.'—See Markham, p. 104.

121.—'His worship Hajji Yusuf the Kazi, who was . . . chief of one of the twelve imperial Councils, came forward accompanied by several Mussulmans acquainted with the languages. They said to the ambassadors: 'First prostrate yourselves, and then touch the ground three times with your heads.'—Embassy from Shah Ruth, in Cathay, p. civi.

1502.—'My uncle the elder Khan came three or four farsangs out from Tashkend, and having erected an awning, seated himself under it. The younger Khan advanced . . . and when he came to the distance at which the korish is to be performed, he knelt nine times . . .'—Baber, 106.
c. 1590. — The kowrish under Akbar had been greatly modified:

"His Majesty has commanded the palm of the right hand to be placed upon the forehead, and the head to be bent downwards. This mode of salutation, in the language of the present age, is called Kournish." — [Ibid., ed. Blochmann, i. 158.]

For his position as the head of religion, in his new faith he permitted, or claimed prostration (ajdada) before him:

"As some perversive and dark-minded men look upon prostration as blasphemous manship, His Majesty, from practical wisdom, has been deemed to be done by the ignorant, and remitt it to all ranks. . .

However, in the private assembly, when any of those in waiting, upon whom the star of good fortune shines, and they receive the order of seating themselves, they certainly perform the prostration of gratitude by bowing down their foreheads to the earth."

— [Ibid., p. 159.]

1615. — "...Whereat some officers called me to sze-da (adj-dah), but the King answered no, no, in Persia." — [Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 241; and see ii. 296.]

1618. — "The King (Shāh 'Abbās) halted and looked at the Sultan, the latter on both knees, as is their fashion, near him, and advanced his right foot towards him to be kissed. The Sultan having kissed it, and touched it with his forehead . . . made a circuit round the king, passing behind him, and making way for his companions to do the like. This done the Sultan came and kissed a second time, as did the other, and this they did three times." — P. della Valle, i. 646.

[c. 1686. — "Job (Charnock) made a salam, Kowris, or low obeisance, every second step he advanced." — Orme, Fragments, quoted in Yale, Hedges Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. xvii.]

1816. — "Lord Amherst put into my hands . . . a translation . . . by Mr. Morrison of a dozen lines recited at Tanchow with some others from Chang, containing an official description of the ceremonies to be observed at the public audience of the Embassador. . .

The Embassador was then to have been conducted by the Mandarins to the level area, where kneeling . . . he was next to have been conducted to the lower end of the hall, where facing the upper part . . . he was to have performed the ko-tou with 9 prostrations; afterwards he was to have been conducted to the hall, and having prostrated himself once behind the row of Mandarins, he was to have been allowed to sit down; he was further to have prostrated himself with the attendant Princes and Mandarins when the Emperor drank. Two other prostrations were to have been made, the first when the milk-tea was presented to him, and the other when he had finished drinking." — Ellis's Journal of Lord Amherst's Embassy to China, 212-214.

1821. — "The first ambassador, with all his following, shall then perform the ceremonial of the three kneeling and the nine prostrations; they shall then rise and be led away in proper order." — Ceremonial observed at the Court of Peking for the Reception of Ambassadors, ed. 1824, in Panthier, 182.

1855. — "... The spectacle of one after another of the aristocracy of nature making the kotow to the aristocracy of the accident." — [H. Martinius, Autobiog. ii. 377.]

1860. — "Some Seiks, and a private in the Bivs having remained behind with the greg-garts, fell into the hands of the Chinese. On the next morning they were brought before the authorities, and commanded to perform the kotow. The Seiks obeyed; but Mouye, the English soldier, declaring that he would not prostrate himself before any Chinaman alive, was immediately knocked upon the head, and his body thrown upon a dunghill" (see China Correspondent of the Times). This passage prefaces some noble lines by Sir F. Doyle, ending:

"Vain mightiest fleets, of iron framed;
Vain those all-shattering guns;
Unless proud England keep, untamed,
The strong heart of her sons.
So let his name through Europe ring—
A man of mean estate,
Who died, as fain as Sparta's king,
Because his soul was great." — Macmillan's Mag. iii. 130.

1876. — "Nebba more kotow big people." — Leland, 46.

1879. — "We know that John Bull adores a lord, but a man of Major L'Estrange's social standing would scarcely kotow to every shabby little title to be found in stuffy little rooms in Mayfair." — Sat. Revie. Apr. 19, p. 505.

KOTUL, s. This appears to be a Turki word, though adopted by the Afghans. Kotal, 'a mountain pass, a col.' Pavet de Courteille quotes several passages, in which it occurs, from Baber's original Turki.

[1809. — "We afterwards went on through the hills, and crossed two Cotuls or passes." — Elphinstone, Cazbell, ed. 1842, i. 51.]

KUBEER, KUHBER, s. Ar. — P. H. khabber, 'news,' and especially as a sporting term, news of game, e.g. "There is pucka kukbber of a tiger this morning."

[1828. — "... the servant informed us that there were some gong-walas, or villagers, in waiting, who had some khabber (news) about this to give us." — Mundy, Pen and Pencil Sketches, ed. 1858, p. 53.]

1878. — "Khabber of innumerable black partridges had been received." — Life in the Mogul, i. 159.

1879. — "He will not tell me what khabbar has been received." — Vanity Fair, Nov. 29, p. 299.
KUKBEDAUR. An interjectional exclamation, 'Take care!' Pers. khabardar, 'take heed.' (see KUBBER). It is the usual cry of chokidars to show that they are awake. [As a substantive it has the sense of a 'scout' or 'spy."

c. 1664. — "Each a wudah causeth a guard to be kept all the night long, in his particular camp, of such men that perpetually go the round, and cry khabdar, have a care." — Bernard, E.T. 119; [ed. Contable, 389].

c. 1665. — "Les archers orient ensuit a pleine tete, Caberdar, c'est a dire prends garde." — Ther. v. 68.

[1813. — "There is a strange custom which prevails at all Indian courts, of having a servant called a khabudar, or manservant, who is an admitted spy upon the chief, about whose person he is employed." — Buckingham, Letters from a Maharatta Camp, ed. 1842, p. 25.]

KUHAR. s. Hind. Khar, [Skt. skandha-kdhra, 'one who carries loads on his shoulders']. The name of a Sindia caste of cultivators, numerous in Bahar and the N.W. provinces, whose specialty is to carry palankins. The name is, therefore, in many parts of India synonymous with 'palankin-bearer, and the Hindu body-servants called bearers (q.v.) in the Bengal presidency are generally of this caste.

c. 1590. — "It is the custom for every traveller in India, ... also to hire kahaars, who carry the kitchen furniture, whilst others carry himself in the palanquin, of which we have spoken, and carry the latter when it is not in use." — Ibn Batuta, iii. 415.

c. 1590. — "So saying he began to make ready a present, and sent for bulks, roots, and fruit, birds and beasts, with the finest of fish, ... which were brought by kahaars in baskets." — Ramayana of Tulsidas, by Groce, 1573, ii. 101.

1673. — "He (the President of Bombay) goes sometimes in his coach, drawn by large Milk-white Oxen, sometimes on Horseback, other times in Palankeens, carried by Cohors, Massalmen Porters." — Peter. 95.

1510. — "The Cahar, or palanquin-bearer, is a servant of peculiar utility in a country where, for four months, the intense heat precludes Europeans from taking much exercise." — Ibid., iii. 209.

1573. — "Bhai Kharar. A widely spread caste of rather inferior rank, whose occupation is to carry palatis, dolis, water-skins, &c., to act as Porters ... they eat flesh and drink spirits; they are an ignorant but industrious class." Buchanan describes them as of Teltinga descent. ..." — Dr. H. V. Carter's Notices of Castes in Bombay Presy., quoted in Ind. Antq., ii. 151.

KULA. KLA, n.p. Burmese name of a native of Continental India; and hence misapplied also to the English and other Westerners who have come from India to Burma; in fact used generally for a Western foreigner.

The origin of this term has been much debated. Some have supposed it to be connected with the name of the Indian race, the Kols; another suggestion has connected it with Kalinga (see KLING); and a third with the Skt. cola, 'castle or tribe'; whilst the Burmese popular etymology renders it from kah, 'to cross over,' and 1a, 'to come,' therefore 'the people that come across (the sea).'

But the true history of the word has for the first time been traced by Professor Forchhammer, to Gola, the name applied in old Pegu inscriptions to the Indian Buddhist immigrants, a name which he identifies with the Skt. Gauya, the ancient name of Northern Bengal, whence the famous city of Gaur (see GOUR, c).

14th cent. — "The Heroes Sonam and Uttama were sent to Ramahana, which forms a part of Suvannabhum, to propagate the holy faith. ... This town is called to this day Gola-mattikanagara, because of the many houses it contained made of earth in the fashion of houses of the Gola people," — Lasor, at Kalaari near Pegu, in Forchhammer, ii. 5.

1795. — "They were still anxious to know why a person consulting his own amusement, and master of his own time, should walk so fast; but on being informed that I was a 'Colar,' or stranger, and that it was the custom of my country, they were reconciled to this. ..." — Symes, Embassy, p. 290.

1855. — "His private dwelling was a small place on one side of the court, from which the women peeped out at the Kalas: ..." — Yule, Mission to the Court of Ava (Phyri), p. 5.

... "By a curious self-delusion, the Burmans would seem to claim that in theory at least they are white people. And what is still more curious, the Bengalies appear indirectly to admit the claim; for our servants, by speaking of themselves and their countrymen, as distinguished from the Burmans, constantly made use of the term kola utma — 'black man,' as the representative of the Burmese kala, a foreigner." — Ibid., p. 37.

KUMPASS, s. Hind. kumpaa, corruption of English compass, and hence applied not only to a marine or a surveying compass, but also to theodolites, levelling instruments, and other elaborate instruments of observation, and even to the shaft of a carriage. Thus the sextant used to be called tikunda kumpass, “the 3-cornered compass.”

[1866.—“Many an amusing story did I hear of this wonderful kumpass. It possessed the power of reversing everything observed. Hence if you looked through the doorbeen at a fort, everything inside was revealed. Thus the Feringhees so readily took forts, not by skill or by valour, but by means of the wonderful power of the door-been.”—Conf. of an Orderly, 175.]

KUNKUR, CONKER, &c., s. Hind. kunkur, ‘gravel.’ As regards the definition of the word in Anglo-Indian usage it is impossible to improve on Wilson: “A coarse kind of limestone found in the soil, in large tabular strata, or interspersed throughout the superficial mould, in nodules of various sizes, though usually small.” Nodular kunkur, wherever it exists, is the usual material for road metalling, and as it binds when wetted and rammed into a compact, hard, and even surface, it is an admirable material for the purpose.

c. 1781.—“Etaya is situated on a very high bank of the river Jumna, the sides of which consist of what in India is called concha, which is originally sand, but the constant action of the sun in the dry season forms it almost into a vitrification” (!)—Hodges, 110.

1791.—“Konker” appears in a Notiﬁcation for tenders in Calcutta Gazette. In Seton-Kerr, ii. 135.

c. 1809.—“We came within view of Cawnpore. Our long, long voyage terminated under a high conkur bank.”—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog. 381.

1810.—“... a weaker kind of lime is obtained by burning a substance called kunkur, which, at ﬁrst, might be mistaken for small rugged ﬂints, slightly coated with soil.”—Williamson, V. M. ii. 13.

KUREEF, KHUREEF, s. Hind. adopted from Ar. kharef (‘autumn’). The crop sown just before, or at the beginning of, the rainy season, in May or June, and reaped after the rains in November—December. This includes rice, maize, the tall millets, &c. (See RUBBEE).

[1824.—“The basis on which the settlements were generally founded, was a measurement of the Khureef, or ﬁrst crop, when it is cut down, and of the Rubbee, or second, when it is about half a foot high...”—Malcolm, Central India, ii. 29.]

KURNOOL, n.p. The name of a city and territory in the Deccan, Kurnool of the Tippu Gazetteer; till 1858 a tributary Nawabship; then resumed on account of treason; and now since 1858 a collectorate of Madras Presidency. Properly Kandavan; Camool of Orme. Kirkpatrick says that the name Kurnool, Kunnool, or Kundnool (all of which forms seem to be applied corruptly to the place) signifies in the language of that country ‘ﬁne spin, clear thread,’ and according to Meer Husain it has its name from its beautiful cotton fabrics. But we presume the town must have existed before it made cotton fabrics? This is a specimen of the stuff that men, even so able as Kirkpatrick, sometimes repeat after those native authorities who “ought to know better,” as we are often told. [The Madras Gloss. gives the name as Tam. karnālu, from kundana, ‘a mixture of lamp-oil and burnt straw used in greasing cart-wheels’ and prob. village,’ because when the temple at Alampur was being built, the wheels of the carts were greased here, and thus a settlement was formed.]

KUTTAUR, s. Hind. katār, Skt. katāra, ‘a dagger,’ especially a kind of dagger peculiar to India, having a solid blade of diamond-section, the handle of which consists of two parallel bars with a cross-piece joining them. The hand grips the cross-piece, and the bars pass along each side of the wrist. [See a drawing in Egerton, Handbook, Indian Arms, pl. ix.] Ibn Batuta’s account is vivid, and perhaps in the matter of size there may be no exaggeration. Through the kindness of Col. Waterhouse I have a prototype of some Travancore weapons shown at the Calcutta Exhibition of 1883-4; among them two great katāras, with sheaths made from the snouts of two sawﬁshes (with the teeth remaining in). They are done to scale, and one of the blades is 20 inches long, the other 26. There is also a plate in the Ind. Antiq. (vii. 133) representing some curious weapons from the Tanjore Palace Armoury, among which are katār-hilted daggers evidently of great length, though the entire length is not shown. The plate accompanies interesting notes by Mr. M. J. Wallhouse, who states the curious fact that many of the blades mounted katār-fashion.
were of European manufacture, and that one of these bore the famous name of Andrea Ferrara. I add an extract. Mr. Wallhouse accounts for the adoption of these blades in a country possessing the far-famed Indian steel, in that the latter was excessively brittle. The passage from Stavorinus describes the weapon, without giving a native name. We do not know what name is indicated by ‘belly piercer.’

1543.—‘The villagers gathered round him, and one of them stabbed him with a kattāra. This is the name given to an iron weapon resembling a plough-share; the hand is inserted into it so that the fore-arm is shielded; but the blade beyond is two cubits in length, and a blow with it is mortal.’— Ibn Battuta, iv. 31-32.

1452.—‘The blacks of this country have the body nearly naked. In one hand they hold an Indian poignard (katārah-Hindī) and in the other a buckler of ox-hide... this costume is common to the king and the beggar.’—Abederrazzak, in India in the XVth Cent., p. 17.

1526.—‘On the whole there were given one tip-chace horse with the saddle, two pairs of swords with the belts, 25 sets of enamelled daggers (khānar—see HANGER), 16 enamelled kiltārehs, two daggers (jandier—see JUMDUD) set with precious stones.’—Boyer, 338.

[c. 1550.—In the list of the Moghul arms we have: ‘10. Katārah. price 4 R. to 1 Muhur.’—Ain, ed. Blockmann, i. 110, with an engraving, No. 9, pl. xii.]

1690.—‘... which chafes and ferments him to such a pitch; that with a Cattarry or Bagonet in his hands he easily falls upon those that are near him... killing and stabbing as he goes.’—Oxford, 287.

1754.—‘To these were added an enamelled dagger (which the Indians call cutturari) and two swords...’—H. of Nadir, in Hunter’s Travels, ii. 356.

1765-71.—‘They (the Moghuls) on the left side..., wear a weapon which they call by a name that may be translated belly-piercer; it is about 14 inches long; broad near the hilt, and tapering away to a sharp point; it is made of fine steel: the handle has, on each side of it, a catch, which, when the weapon is gripped by the hand, shuts round the wrist, and seems ready to be dropped.’—Stavorinus, E.T. i. 457.

1813.—‘After a short silent prayer, Lalabhy, in the presence of all the company, waved his catarra, or short dagger, over the bed of the expiring man... The patient continued for some time motionless: in half an hour his heart appeared to beat, circulation quickened,... at the expiration of the third hour Lullabhy had effected his cure.’—Forbes, Gough, Mem., iii. 249; [2nd ed. ii. 272, and see i. 69.]

1556.—‘The manners of the bardic tribe are very similar to those of their Rajput clients; their dress is nearly the same, but the bard seldom appears without the ‘Kutār,’ or dagger, a representation of which is serrated beside his signature, and often rudely engraved upon his monumental stone, in evidence of his death in the sacred duty of Trāgā’ (p. v.)—Forbes, Rās Māḥā, ed. 1578, pp. 559-560.

1578.—‘The ancient Indian smiths seem to have had a difficulty in hitting on a medium between this highly refined brittle steel and a too soft metal. In ancient sculptures, as in Srirangam near Trichinappall, life-sized figures of armed men are represented, bearing Kuttars or long daggers of a peculiar shape; the handles, not so broad as in the later Kuttars, are covered with a long narrow guard, and the blades 2½ inches broad at bottom, taper very gradually to a point through a length of 15 inches, more than ⅛ of which is deeply channelled on both sides with 9 converging grooves. There were many of these in the Tanjor armoursy, perfectly corresponding... and all were so soft as to be easily bent.’—Ind. Antq. vii.

KUZZANNA. s. Ar.—H. khizānah, or khazānah, ‘a treasury.’ [In Ar. khazīnah, or khaznah, means ‘a treasure,’ representing 1000 kis or purses, each worth about £5 (see Burton, Ar. Nights, i. 405).] It is the usual word for the district and general treasuries in British India; and khazāneh for the treasurer.

[1757.—‘A mint has been established in Calcutta; continue coinage gold and silver into Siccas and Mohurs... they shall pass current in the provinces of Bengal, Bahar and Orissa, and be received into the Cadganna...’—Perwannah from Jaffyr Ally Khan, in Virelo, App. 145.]

KUZZILBASH. n.p. Turki kizilbash, ‘red-head.’ This title has been since the days of the Satavi (see SOPHY) dynasty in Persia, applied to the Persianized Turks, who form the ruling class in that country, from the red caps which they wore. The class is also settled extensively over Afghanistan. ["At Kabul," writes Bel'lew (Races of Afghanistan, 107), "he (Nadir) left as Chendal, or 'rear guard,' a detachment of 12,000 of his Kizilbash (so named from the red caps they wore), or Mughal Persian troops. After the death of Nadir they remained at Kabul as a military colony, and their descendants occupy a distinct quarter of the city, which is called Chendal. These Kizilbash hold their own ground here, as a distinct Persian community of the Shia persuasion, against the native population of the Sunni profession. They constitute an important element in the general population of the city, and exercise a considerable influence in its local politics. Owing to their isolated position and antagonism to the native population, they are favourably inclined to the British authority."

Many of them used to take service with the Delhi emperors; and not a few do so now in our frontier cavalry regiments.

c. 1510. — "L'vasanza loro é di portare vna berretta rossa, chiamanza sopra la testa mazza braceato, a guisa d'un zon ('like a top'), che dalla parte, che si mette in testa, viene a esser larga, ristregiendosi tuttavia sino in cima, et é fatta con dodici coste grosse vn dito ... ne mai tagliano barba ne mostaechi." — G. 1550. — "Oltre il deserto che è sopra il Corassam fino a Samarcand ... signorreggianoiesel has, cioè le berretto verdi, le quali benette verdi sono alcuni Tartari Musulmani che portano le loro berrette di feltro verde acuto, e così si fanno chiamare à differenza de Soffiani suoi capitali nemici che signorreggiano la Persia, pur anche essi Musulmani, i quali portano le berrette rosse, quali berretto verdi o rosse, hanno continuamente haunuta fra se guerra crudelissima per causa di diversité di opinione nella loro religione." — Chhoji Moeil, in Rasnovi, ii. f. 16r.

"Beyond the desert above Corassam, as far as Samarkand and the idolatrous cities, the Yoshilbas (Iseelbas) or 'Green-caps,' are predominant. These Green-caps are certain Muslim Tartars who wear pointed caps of green felt, and they are so called to distinguish them from their chief enemies the Soffians, who are predominant in Persia, who are indeed also Muslims, but who wear red caps."

1574. — "These Persians are also called Red Turks, which I believe is because they have behind on their Turbants, Red Marks, as Cotton Ribbands &c, with Red Brims, whereby they are soon discerned from other Nations." — Ranwell, 173.

"Keselbache est vn mot composé de Kesl, qui signifiuo rouge, et bachi, teste, comme qui drioit teste rouge, et par ce terme s'entendent les gens de guerre de Perso, à cause du bonnet de Sophi qui est rouge." — Uld, 515.

1673. — "Those who compose the Main Body of the Cavalry, are the Cusle-Bashees, or with us the Chevaliers." — Fryer, 356. Fryer also writes Cusselbash (Index).

1815. — "The seven Turkish tribes, who had been the chief promoters of his (Isma'il's) glory and success, were distinguished by a particular dress; they wore a red cap, from which they received the Turkish name of Kuzzilbash, or 'golden heads,' which has descended to their posterity." — Malcolm, II. of Persia, ii. 502-3.

1825. — "The Kuzzilbash, a Tale of Khorasan. By James Baillie Fraser." 1853. — "For there are rats and rats, and a man of average capacity may as well hope to distinguish scientifically between Ghilzais, Kuki Kheyils, Logar Maliks, Shigwals, Ghazis, Jezailchis, Hazaras, Logarins, Wardaks, Mandozais, Lepel-Griffin, and Kizilbashes, as to master the division of the great race of rats." — Tribes on My Frontier, 15.

KYFE, n. One often meets with this word (Ar. keif) in books about the Levant, to indicate the absolute enjoyment of the dolce far niente. Though it is in the Hindustani dictionaries, we never remember to have heard it used in India; but the first quotation below shows that it is, or has been, in use in Western India, in something like the Turkish sense. The proper meaning of the Ar. word is 'how?' 'in what manner?' the secondary is 'partial intoxication.' This looks almost like a parallel to the English vulgar slang of 'how comed you so?' But in fact a man's keif is his 'howness,' i.e. what pleases him, his humour; and this passes into the sense of gaiety caused by bhashi, &c.

1908. — "... a kind of confectio Japonica loaded with opium, Gánja or Bang, and causing keif, or the first degree of intoxication, dulling the senses and disposing to sleep." — R. Drummond.

KYOUNG, s. Burn, kyawng. A Buddhist monastery. The term is not employed by Padre Sangermano, who uses bao, a word, he says, used by the LAC. s. Hind. lakb, from Skt. laksha, for rākṣa. The resinous incrustation produced on certain trees (of which the dhak (see DHALK) is one, but chiefly Peepul. and Khusum [kusum, kusumb], i.e. Schleichera bijuga, trijuga) by the puncture of the Lac insect (Coccus Lacca, L.). See Roxburgh, in Vol. III. As. Res., 384 seq.; [and a full list of the trees on which the insect feeds, in Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 410 seq.]. The incrustation contains 60 to 70 per cent. of resinous lac, and 10 per cent. of dark red colouring matter from which is manufactured lac-dye. The material in its original crude form is called stick-lac; when boiled in water it loses its red colour, and is then termed seed-lac; the melted clarified substance, after the extraction of the dye, is turned out in thin irregular laminae called shell-lac. This is used to make sealing-wax, in the fabrication of varnishes, and very largely as a stiffening for men’s hats.

Though lak bears the same sense in Persian, and lakb or lak are used in modern Arabic for sealing-wax, it would appear from Dozy (Glos. pp. 295-6, and Oosterlingen, 57), that identical or approximate forms are used in various Arabic-speaking regions for a variety of substances giving a red dye, including the coccus ilicis or Kermes. Still, we have seen no evidence that in India the word was applied otherwise than to the lac of our heading. (Garcia says that the Arabs called it loc-sumutri, ‘lac of Sumatra’; probably because the Pegu lac was brought to the ports of Sumatra, and purchased there.) And this the term in the Periplus seems unquestionably to indicate: whilst it is probable that the passage quoted from Aelian is a much misconceived account of the product. It is not nearly so absurd as De Monfort’s account below. The English word lace for a certain red colour is from this. So also are laqueur and lacquered ware, because lac is used in some of the varnishes with which such ware is prepared.

c. A.D. 80-90.—These articles are imported to the ports of Barbaricci, on the W. of the Red Sea from the interior parts of Ariakū:

“Σίδηρα Αριάκου και στήλων (Indian iron and steel)

λάκκος χρυσάνθεισ (Lac-dye)”

c. 250.—“There are produced in India animals of the size of a beetle, of a red colour, and if you saw them for the first time you would compare them to cinnabar. They have very long legs, and are soft to the touch: they are produced on the trees that bear lacca, and they feed on the fruit of these. The Indians catch them and crush them, and with these dye their red cloaks, and the tunics under these, and everything else that they wish to turn to this colour, and to dye. And this kind of clothing is carried also to the King of Persia.”—Aelian. de Nat. Animal. iv. 46.

c. 1313.—The notice of lacca in Pegolotti is in parts very difficult to translate, and we do not feel absolutely certain that it refers to the Indian product, though we believe it to be so. Thus, after explaining that there are two classes of lacca, the metara and ochrula, or ripe and unripe, he goes on: “It is produced attached to stalks, i.e. to the branches of shrubs, but it ought to be clear from stalks, and earthy dust, and sand, and from ostiere (i). The stalks are the twigs of the wood on which it is produced, the ostiere or Figs, as the Catalans call them, are composed of the dust of the thing, which when it is fresh heaps together and hardens like pitch; only that pitch is black, and those ostiere or Figs are red and of the colour of unripe lacca. And more of these ostiere is found in the unripe than the ripe lacca,” and so on.—Stalin, Decima, iii. 365.

1510.—“There also grows a very large quantity of lacca or hochi for making red colour, and the tree of this is formed like our trees which produce walnuts.”—Vulturina, 235.

1516.—“Here (in Pegu) they load much fine laqar, which grows in the country.”—Barbosa, Lisbon Acad., 306.
1519.—“And because he had it much in charge to get all the lac (alacre) that he could, the governor knowing through information of the merchants that much came to the Coast of Choromandel by the ships of Pegu and Martaban that frequented that coast...”—Correa, i. 567.

1563.—“Now it is time to speak of the lacere, of which so much is consumed in this country in closing letters, and for other seals, in the place of wax.”—García, f. 112c.

1582.—“Laker is a kind of gum that proceeded of the ant.”—Castañeda, tr. by N.L., f. 93.

c. 1590.—(Recipe for Lac varnish). "Lac is used for chiglhe (see CHICK, a)." If red, 4 s. of lac, and 1 s. of vervilion; if yellow, 4 s. of lac, and 1 s. zernitkh."—Tin, ed.-blockman, i. 226.

1615.—“In this Island (Goa) is the hard Waxe made (which we call Spanish Waxe), and is made in the manner following. They inclose a large plotte of ground, with a little trench filled with water; then they sticke up a great number of small staves upon the said plot, that being done they bring hither a sort of pisamires, farre bigger than ours, which being delard by the water to issue out, are constrained to retire themselves vpone the said staves, where they are kil’d with the Heate of the Sunne, and thereof is that Lacka is made.”—De Montfort, 55-36.

c. 1610.—"... Vne maniere de boite ronde, vernie, et lacere, qui est vne ormage de ces isles."—P. gard de Lacet, i. 127; [Hak. Soc. i. 170].

1627.—"Lac is a strange druggie, made by certain winged Pismires of the gummee of Trees."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 590.

1644.—"There are in the territories of the Mogor, besides those things mentioned, other articles of trade, such as Lacere, both the insect lacere and the cake" (de formigue e de pano).—Boeux, M.S.

1663.—"If one of these Halls you shall find Embroiderers, in another ye shall see Goldsmiths... in a fourth Workmen in Lacca."—Bernier, E.T. 83; [ed. Constable, 259].

1727.—"Their lackt or japow’d Ware is without any Doubt the best in the World."—A. Hamilton, ii. 305; [ed. 1744].

LACCADE IV ISLANDS. 11P. Probably Skt. Laksadweep, '100,000 Islands'; a name however which would apply much better to the Maldives, for the former are not really very numerous. There is not, we suspect, any ancient or certain native source for the name as specifically applied to the northern group of islands. Barbosa, the oldest authority we know as mentioning the group (1516), calls them Malandira, and the Maldives Polindira. Several of the individual islands are mentioned in the Tahjit-al-Majhūdīn (E.T. by Rovellandson, pp. 150-52), the group itself being called "the islands of Malabar."

LACK, s. One hundred thousand, and especially in the Anglo-Indian colloquial 100,000 Rupees, in the days of better exchange the equivalent of £10,000. Hind. lākh, lak, &c., from Skt. laksha, used (see below) in the same sense, but which appears to have originally meant "a mark." It is necessary to explain that the term does not occur in the earlier Skt. works. Thus in the Talavakāra Brāhmaṇā, a complete series of the higher numerical terms is given. After šatu (10), sahasra (1000), comes ayuta (10,000), prayuta (now a million), niyuta (now also a million), arbuda (100 millions), nyarbuda (not now used), vihkarna (Go.), and padma (now 10,000 millions). Laksha is therefore a modern substitute for prayuta, and the series has been expanded. This was probably done by the Indian astronomers between the 5th and 10th centuries A.D.

The word has been adopted in the Malay and Javanese, and other languages of the Archipelago. But it is remarkable that in all of this class of languages which have adopted the word it is used in the sense of 10,000 instead of 100,000 with the sole exception of the Lampungs of Sumatra, who use it correctly. (Crawford). (See CRORE."

We should observe that though a lack, used absolutely for a sum of money, in modern times always implies rupees, this has not always been the case. Thus in the time of Akbar and his immediate successors the revenue was settled and reckoned in laks of dams (q.v.). Thus:

c. 1594.—"In the 40th year of his majesty's reign (Akbar's), his dominions consisted of 105 Sireas, subdivided into 2737 Kesabs (see CUSSAH), the revenue of which he settled for ten years, at the annual rent of 3.192, 62 Crore, 97 Lacks, 55.246 Hans. ..."—Jesuit, ed. Gladwin, ii. 1; [ed. Forrest, i. 115].

At Oromuz again we find another lack in vogue, of which the unit was apparently the dinār, not the old gold coin, but a degenerate dinār of small value. Thus:
1534.—"(Money of Ormuz).—A leque is equivalent to 50 pardoos of gazis, which is called 'bad money,' (and this leque is not a coin but a number by which they reckon at Ormuz); and each of these pardoos is equal to 2 everas, and each evera to 10 gazis, everas to 100 divdars, and after this fashion they calculate in the books of the Custom-house.

—'Nunnez, Lyco dos Persos, &c., in Subsidios, 25.

Here the evera is the Persian lukar or 1000 (divdars); the gazl Pers. sad or 100 (divdars); the leque or lak. 100,000 (divdars); and the tomân (see TOMAUN), which does not appear here, is 10,000 (divdars).

c. 1300.—"They went to the Kâfir's tent, killed him, and came back into the town, whence they carried off money belonging to the Sultan amounting to 12 lakhs. The lak is a sum of 100,000 (silver) divdars, equivalent to 10,000 Indian gold divdars."—The Battles, iii. 106.

c. 1340.—"The Sultan distributes daily two lakhs in alms, never less; a sum of which the equivalent in money of Egypt and Syria would be 160,000 pieces of silver."—Shikâbuddin Dimîshki, in Notes and Echoes, xiii. 192.

In these examples from Pinto the word is used apart from money, in the Malay form, but not in the Malay sense of 10,000:

c. 1540.—"The old man desiring to satisfy Antonio de Faria's demand, Sir, said he . . . the chronicles of those times affirm, how in only four years and ten half sixteen Lacazas (lakas) of men were slain, every Lacaza containing an hundred thousand."—Pinto (orig. cap. xlv.) in Cogan, p. 53.

c. 1546.—". . . he ruined in 4 months space all the enemies countries, with such a destruction of people as, if credit may be given to our histories ... there died fifty Luqueasas of persons."—ibid. p. 224.

1615.—And the whole present was worth ten of their Leakes, as they call them; a Leake being 10,000 pounds sterling; the whole 100,000 pounds sterling."—Cogan's Letters from India (Creditudes, iii. i. 25).

1616.—"He received twenty leacks of rupees towards his charge (two hundred thousand pounds sterling)."—Sir T. Roe, reprint, p. 35; [Hak. Soc. i. 201, and 2, 3, 18, 23, 28.]

c. 1665.—"If faint cent mile roupees pour faire un lek, cent mile leks pour faire un cowron, cent mile cowrons pour faire un podan, et cent mile podan pour faire un mil."—Theretot, v. 54.

1673.—"In those great Solemnities, it is usual for them to set it around with Lamps to the number of two or three Leagues, which is so many hundred thousand in our account."—Fryer, p. 104; reading Leagues.

1684.—"They have by information of the servants dug in several places of the house, where they have found great sums of money. Under his bed were found Lacks 41. In the House of Office two Lacks. They in all found ten Lacks already, and make no doubt but to find more."—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 145].

1692.—". . . a lack of Pagodas . . ."—In Wheeler, p. 262.

1747.—"The Nabob and other Principal Persons of this Country are of such an extreme lucrative (sic) Disposition and . . . are so exceedingly avertions, occasioned by the large Profits they have received from the French, that nothing less than Lacks will go near to satisfy them."—Letter from Pt. St. Davids to the Court, May 2 (MS. Records in India Office).

1775.—"Sir Matthew Mite will make up the money already advanced in another name, by way of future mortgage upon his estate, for the entire purchase, 5 lacks of roupees."—Foote, The Nabob, Act i. sc. i.

1785.—"Your servants have no Trade in this country: neither do you pay them high wages, yet in a few years they return to England with many lacs of pagodas."—Nabob of Ava, in Burke's Speech on his Debts, Works, iv. 18.

1833.—"Tout le reste (et dans le reste il y a des intendants riches de plus de vingt lacs) s'assied par terre."—Jacquemont, Correspond. i. 120.

1870.—"In modern times the only numbers in practical use above 'thousands' are lakhs ('lac' or 'lakh') and laks (a crore'); and an Indian sum is wont to be pointed thus: 123, 15, 67, 890, to signify 123 crores, 45 lakhs, + 67 thousand, eight hundred and ninety."—Whitney, Sansk. Grammar, 161.

The older writers, it will be observed (c. 1600-1620), put the lakh at £10,000; Hamilton (c. 1700) puts it at £12,500; and Williamson (c. 1710) at the same; then for many years stood again as the equivalent of £10,000; now (1850) it is little more than £2500; [now (1901) about £6666].

LACKERAGE. (See KHIRAJ.)

LALL-SHRAUB, s. Englishman's Hind. lal-shrubh, 'red wine.' The universal name of claret in India.

[c. 1750.—"To every plate are set down two glasses; one a pyramidal (like goblet glasses in England) for Loll Shrub (ciliced, claret); the other a common sized wineglass for whatever beverage is most agreeable."—Diary of Mrs. Fug, in Busied, Echoes, 123.]

LALLA. s. P.—H. lild. In Persia this word seems to be used for a kind of domestic tutor; now for a male nurse, or as he would be called in India, 'child's bearer.' In N. India it is usually applied to a native clerk writing the vernacular, or to a respectable merchant. [For the Pers. usage see Blochmann, Ain, i. 426 note.]

[1841.—"Where there are no tigers, the Lalia (scribe) becomes a shikaree."—Society in India, II. 176.]

LAMA. s. A Tibetan Buddhist monk. Tibet. blama (b being silent). The word is sometimes found written Llama; but this is nonsense. In fact it seems to be a popular confusion, arising from the name of the S. American quadruped which is so spelt. See quotation from Tims below.

c. 1590.—"Fawning Court doctors ... said it was mentioned in some holy books that men used to live up to the age of 1000 years ... and in Tibet there were even now a class of Lamanah or Mongolian devotees, and recluse, and hermits that live 200 years and more. ..."—Bodleian, quoted by Blochmann, Ain, i. 201.

1664.—"This Ambassador had in his suit a Physician, which was said to be of the Kingdom of Lassa, and of the Tribe Lany or Lama, which is that of the men of the Law in that country, as the Brahmanes are in the Indies ... he related of his great Lama that when he was old, and ready to die, he assembled his council, and declared to them that now he was passing into the Body of a little child lately born...."—Bernier, E.T. 135; [ed. Constable, 421].

1771.—"... ma questo primo figlio ... rinunzjò la corona al secondo e lui difatti si fece religioso o lama del paese."—Della Tomba, 61.

c. 1818.—"The Parliament of Tibet met—The little Lama, called before it, Did there and then his whipping get, And, as the Nursery Gazette Assures us, like a hero bore it."—T. Moore, The Little Grand Lama.

1876.—"... Hastings ... touches on the analogy between Tibet and the high valley of Quito, as described by De la Condamine, an analogy which Mr. Markham brings out in interesting detail. ... But when he enlarges on the wool which is a staple of both countries, and on the animals producing it, he risks confusing in careless readers that popular impression which might be expressed in the phraseology of Fluellen—"Tis all one; 'tis alike as my fingers is to my fingers, and there is Llamas in both."—Rec. of Markham's Tibet, in Times, May 15.

The passage last quoted is in jesting vein, but the following is serious and delightful:—

1879.—"The landlord prostrated himself as reverently, if not as lowly, as a Peruvian before his Grand Llama."—Patty's Dream, a novel reviewed in the Academy, May 17.

LAMASERY, LAMASERIE, s. This is a word, introduced apparently by the French R. C. Missionaries, for a lama convent. Without being positive, I would say that it does not represent any Oriental word (e.g. compound of lami and serai), but is a factitious French word analogous to monastère, vacherie, &c.

[c. 1844.—"According to the Tartars, the Lamasesy of the Five Towers is the 'best place you can be buried in.'"—Har, Travels in Tartary, i. 78.]

LAMBALLIE, LOMBALLIE, LOMBARDIE, LUMBANAH, &c., s. Dakh. Hind. Lāmbārd, Mahr. Lāmbā, with other forms in the languages of the Peninsula. [Platts connects the name with Skt. lamba, 'long, tall'; the Madras Gloss. with Skt. lampada, 'creedy.'] A wandering tribe of dealers in grain, salt, &c., better known as Lanjāras (see BRINJARRY). As an Anglo-Indian word this word is now obsolete. It was perhaps a corruption of Lumbāna, the name of one of the great clans or divisions of the Banjāras. [Another suggestion made is that the name is derived from their business of carrying salt (Skt. lāvana); see Crooke, Tribes of N.W.P. i. 158.]

1756.—"The army was constantly supplied ... by bands of people called Lamballis, peculiar to the Deccan, who are constantly moving up and down the country, with their flocks, and contract to furnish the armies in the field."—Grane, ii. 102.

1756.—"What you say of the purity of grain in your army, notwithstanding your having a cutwal (see COTWAL), and so many Lumbānchās with you, has astonished us."—Letters of Tippoo, 49.

LANCHARA. s. A kind of small vessel often mentioned in the Portuguese histories of the 16th and 17th centuries. The derivation is probably Malay lanchar, 'quick, nimble.' [Mr. Skeat writes: "The real Malay form is lanxhar-an, which is regularly formed from Malay lanchar, 'swift,' and lanchara I believe to be a Port. form of lanxhar-an, as lanchara could not possibly, in Malay, be formed from lanchar, as has hitherto been implied or suggested."

QUALI VI SONO LI NAUILI DETTI LANCHARIS, ED LI QUALI VANO NAUGANDO LA COSTA DI SIAM...."
—SUMARIO DE REGAI, &C., IN RAMUSIO, I. f. 336.

c. 1539.—"This King (of the Batas) understanding that I had brought him a letter and a Present from the Captain of Malaca, caused me to be entertained by the Xabundar (see SHABUNGER). . . . This General, accompanied with five Lanchares and twelve Ballons, came to me to the Port where I rode at anchor."—Pinto, E.T. p. 51.

LANDWIND, s. Used in the south of India. A wind which blows seaward during the night and early morning. [The dangerous effects of it are described in Madras Gloss. s.v.] In Port. Terrenho.

1561.—"Correndo a costa com terrenhos."—Correa, Lendas, i. f. 115.

1585.—"The East winds beginne to blow from off the land into the seas, whereby they are called Terrenhos."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 294.

1612.—"Send John Dench . . . that in the morning he may go out with the landborne and return with the seaforne."—Dancers, Letters, i. 206.

1584.—"And as it is between monsoon and monsoon (mossano) the wind is uncertain only at the beginning of summer. The N.W. prevails more than any other wind . . . and at the end of it begin the land winds (terrenhos) from midnight to about noon, and these are E. winds."—Bocarro, MS.

1673.—". . . we made for the Land, to gain the Land Breezes. They begin about Midnight, and hold till Noon, and are by the Portugals named Terrenhoes."—Fryer, 28.

1838.—"We have had some very bad weather for the last week: furious landwind, very fatigueing and weakening. . . . Everything was so dry up, that when I attempted to walk a few yards towards the beach, the grass crunched under my feet like snow."—Letters from Madras, 190-200.

LANGASAQUE, n.p. The most usual old form for the Japanese which we now call Naganaki (see Sainsbury, passim).

1611.—"After two or three days space a Jesuite came vnto vs from a place called Langesacke, to which place the Carake of Macao is yeerely wont to come."—H. Adams, in Purchas, i. 126.

1613.—The Journal of Capt. John Saris has both Langasque and Langasaque.—Ibid. 366.

1615.—"It has now com to passe, which before I feared, that a company of rich usurers have gotten this sentence against us, and com doun together everye year to Langasaque and this place, and have allwaies hym accustomed to buy by the parcado (as they call it), or whole sale, all the goodes which came in the carick from Amacaen, the Portingalees having to prevelegese as we have."—The same to the E. i. Co. ii. 207-8.

Two years later Cocks changes his spelling and adopts Nagasaque (Ibid. 300 and to the end).

LAN JOHN, LANGIANNE, &c. n.p. Such names are applied in the early part of the 17th century to the Shan or Laos State of Luang Prabon on the Mekong. Lan-cham is one of its names signifying in Siamese, it is said, 'a million of elephants.' It is known to the Burmes by the same name (Len-Shen). It was near this place that the estimable French traveller Henri Monhot died, in 1681.

1557.—"I went from Pegn to Jambur (see JANGOMAY), which is in the country of the Langeiannes; it is five and twentie dazes journey North-east from Pegn."—Fitch, in Hakl. ii.

c. 1598.—"Thus we arrived at Lanichan, the capital of the Kingdom (Lao) where the King resides. It is a Kingdom of great extent, but thinly inhabited, because it has been frequently devastated by Pegn."—De Morgo, 98.

1617.—"The merchants of the country of Lan John, a place joining to the country of Jangoma (JANGOMAY) arrived at the city of Judea . . . and brought great store of merchandize."—Sainsbury, ii. 20.

1663.—"Entre tant et de si puissans Royaumes du dernier Orient, desquels on n'a presque jamais entendu parler en Europe, il y en a un qui se nomme Lao, et plus proprement le Royaume des Langiens . . . le Royaume n'a pris un nom que du grand nombre d'Elephants qui s'y rencontrent: de vray ce mot de Langiens signifie proprement, miliers d'Elephants."—Morini, H. Nouvelle et Curiouse des Royaumes de Tampkin et de Lima (Fr. Tr., Paris, 1668), 329, 337.
It would appear from Lieut. Macleod's narrative, and from Garnier, that the name of Laos is that by which the branch of these people on the Lower Mekong, i.e. of those two States, used to designate themselves. Muang Praban is still quasi independent. Vien-Shan was annexed with great cruelties by Siam, c. 1828.

1535.—"Of silver of 11 dinheiroes alloy he (Albuquerque) made only a kind of money called Malaguezes, which silver came thither from Pegu, whilst from Siam came a very pure silver of 12 dineroes assay, procured from certain people called Laos, lying to the north of these two kingdoms."—Barros, II. vi. 6.

1535.—"... certain very rugged mountain ranges, like the Alps, inhabited by the people called Gueos who fight on horseback, and with whom the King of Siam is continually at war. They are near him only on the north, leaving between the two the people called Laos, who encompass this Kingdom of Siam, both on the North, and on the East along the river Meeon ... and on the south adjoin these Laos the two Kingdoms of Camboja and Champa (see CHAMPA), which are on the sea-board. These Laos ... though they are lords of so great territories, are all subject to this King of Siam, though often in rebellion against him."—Ibid. III. ii. 5.

"...Three Kingdoms at the upper part of these, are those of the Laos, who (as we have said) obey Siam through fear; the first of these is called Janggoma (see JANGOMAY), the chief city of which is called Chany ... the second Chaworny Chenara; the third Lanchaa (see LAN JOHN) which is below the others, and adjoins the Kingdom of Cambodia, or Cauchichina."—Ibid.

c. 1560.—"... Those Laos came to Cambon, downe a River many daies Iournie, which they say to have his beginning in China as many others which runne into the Sea of India: it hath eight, fiftene, and twentie fathomke water, as myselfe saw by experience in a great part of it: it passeth through manie vrnkowne and desart Countreys of great Woods and Forests where there are innumerable Elephants, and many Buffoes ... and certayne beastes which in that Countrie they call Budas (see ABADA)."—Gaspar do Cruz, in Parches, iii. 169.

c. 1598.—"... I offered to go to Laos by land, at my expense, in search of the King of Cambodion, as I knew that that was the road to go by."—H. de Hernan Gonzalez, in the Memoria, E.T. by Hon. H. Stanley, Hak. Soc. p. 97.

1641.—"Concerning the Land of the Lowen, and a Journey made thereunto by our Father J. P. de la Louwen 1641" (Sc.).—Valentijn, III. Pri. pp. 50 seqq.

1668.—Lanchang appears in the Map of Siam in De la Loubère's work, but we do not find it in the book itself.

c. 1692.—"Laos est situé sous le même Climat que Tonquin; c'est un royaume grand et puissant, séparé des Etats voisins par des forêts et par des déserts. ... Les principales villes sont Landjam et Tsiamay."—Kuempfer, II. du Japon, ii. 22-3.

LANEA, s. A swift kind of boat frequently mentioned by F. M. Pinto and some early writers on China; but we are unable to identify the word.

c. 1540.—"... that ... they set sail from Lianpoo for Malaco; and that being advanced as far as the Isle of Sumbor they had been set upon by a Prat, a Escudary by Nation, called Coiu Acco, who had three Junks, and four Lanteas. ..."—Pinto, E.T. p. 69.

c. 1590.—"There be other lesser shipping than Junkes, somewhat long, called Barcones, they place three Oares on a side, and rowe very well, and lead a great deal of goods; there be other lesse called Lanteas, which doe rowe very swift, and beare a good barthen also: and these two sorts of Ships, viz., Barcones and Lanteas, because they are swift, the theenes do commonly vse."—Gaspar de Cruz, in Parches, iii. 174.

LAOS, n.p. A name applied by the Portuguese to the civilised people who occupied the inland frontier of Burma and Siam, between those countries on the one hand and China and Tonking on the other; a people called by the Burmese Shans, a name which we have in recent years adopted. They are of the same race of Thai to which the Siamese belong, and which extends with singular identity of manners and language, though broken into many separate communities, from Assam to the Malay Peninsula. The name has since been frequently used as a singular, and applied as a territorial name to the region occupied by this people immediately to the North of Siam. There have been a great number of separate principalities in this region, of which now one and now another predominated and conquered its neighbours. Before the rise of Siam the most important was that of which Sakotai was the capital, afterwards represented by Xiang-nai, the Zimmé of the Burmese and the Jangomay of some old English documents. In later times the chief States were Muang Luang Praban (see LAN JOHN) and Vien-shan, both upon the Mekong.

Toute l'Asie convient que nous dansons beaucoup mieux qu'eux."—Voltaire, Dialogue XV. André des Couches à Siam.

LAR., n.p. This name has had several applications.

(a) To the region which we now call Guzerat, in its most general application. In this sense the name is now quite obsolete; but it is that used by most of the early Arab geographers. It is the Arar of Prolemy; and appears to represent an old Skt. name Lāṭā, adj. Latake, or Latika. [The name Lāṭa appears to be derived from some local tribe, perhaps the Lattus, who, as r and l are commonly used for each other, may be the well-known Rashtrakūṭas since their great King Amoghavarma (A.D. 851-879) calls the name of the dynasty Ratta."—Bombay Gazetteer, I. pt. i. 7.]

(b) To the Delta region of the Indus, and especially to its western part. Sir H. Elliot supposes the name in this use, which survived recently, to be identical with the preceding, and that the name had originally extended continuously over the coast, from the western part of the Delta to beyond Bombay (see his Historians, i. 378).

We have no means of deciding this question (see LARRY BUNDER).

c. 1820.—"Dīwān . . . was reduced to ruins by a Muhammadan invasion, and another site chosen to the eastward. The new town still went by the same name . . . and was succeeded by Lārī Bandar or the port of Lār, which is the name of the country forming the modern dīla, particularly the western part."—M'Murdoch, in J.R. 14. Sec. i. 29.

(c) To a Province on the north of the Persian Gulf, with its capital.

c. 1220.—Lār is erroneously described by Yakūt as a great island between Sirāf and Kish. But there is no such island.* It is an extensive province of the continent. See Barbier de Meynard, Hist. de la Perse, p. 501.

c. 1330.—"We marched for three days through a desert . . . and then arrived at Lār, a big town having springs, considerable streams, and gardens, and fine bazaars. We lodged in the hermitage of the pious Sayyid Abu Dulaf Muhammad. . . ."—Ibn Battuta, ii. 240.

c. 1417.—"Returning along the coast, fornoe againstOrmouos there is a town called Lār, a great and good town of merchandise, about jināl houses."—Josua Barbaro, old E.T. (Hak. Soc.) 50.

[c. 1590.—"Lār borders on the mountains of Great Tibet. To its north is a lofty mountain which dominates all the surrounding country, and the ascent of which is arduous."—Ite, ed. Jurvet, ii. 363.]

1553.—"These benefactions the Kings of Ormou ... pay to this day to a mosque which that Chez (see CASĪS had made in a district called Honzer of Sheikh Donar, adjoining the city of Lār, distant from Ormouz over 40 leagues."—Barco, H. ii. 2.

1602.—"This man was a Moor, a native of the Kingdom of Lara, adjoining that of Ormuz: his proper name was Cufo, but as he was a native of the Kingdom of Lār he took a surname from the country, and called himself Cufo Larya."—Conte, IV, viii. 6.

1622.—"Lār, as I said before, is capital of a great province or kingdom, which till our day had a prince of its own, who rightfully or wrongfully reigned there absolutely: but about 23 years since, for reasons rather generous than covetous, as it would seem, it was attacked by Abbas K. of Persia, and the country forcibly taken. . . . Now Lār is the seat of a Sultan dependent on the Khan of Shiraz. . . ."—Ibn Battuta, ii. 322.

1737.—"... And 4 Days Journey within Land, is the City of Lār, which according to their fabulous tradition is the Burying-place of Lot..."—A. Hamilton, i. 92; [ed. 1744].

* It is possible that the island called shan Shalib, which is off the coast of Lār, and not far from Sirāf, may be meant. Barbosa also mentions Lār among the islands in the Gulf subject to the K. of Ormouz (p. 25).

LARAI, s. This Hind. word, meaning 'fighting' is by a curious idiom applied to the biting and annoyance of fleas and the like. [It is not mentioned in the dictionaries of either Fallon or Platt's.] There is a similar idiom (jung kudan) in Persian.

LAREK, n.p. Larak; an island in the Persian Gulf, not far from the island of Jerum or Ornus.

[1623. — "At noon, being near Lareck, and no wind stirring, we cast Anchor."—V. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 3.]

1685. — "We came up with the Islands of Ornus and Arack..." (called Lareck afterwards).—Hedges, Diary, May 23; [Hak. Soc. i. 202].

LARIN, s. Pers. lari. A peculiar kind of money formerly in use in the Persian Gulf, W. Coast of India, and in the Maldives Islands, in which last it survived to the last century. The name is there retained still, though coins of the ordinary form are used. It is sufficiently described in the quotations, and representations are given by de Bry and Tavernier. The name appears to have been derived from the territory of Lar on the Persian Gulf. (See under that word, [and Mr. Gray's note on Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 232 seq.])

c. 1563. — "I have seen the men of the Country who were Gentiles take their children, their sons and their daughters, and have desired the Portuguese to buy them, and I have seen them sold for eight or ten larines apiece, which may be of our money x x, or xii s. ill d."—Master Caesar Frederike, in Hakl. ii. 343.

1583.—Gasparo Balbi has an account of the Larino, the greater part of which seems to be borrowed Literarius by Fitch in the succeeding quotation. But Balbi adds: "The first who began to strike them was the King of Lar, who formerly was a powerful King in Persia, but is now a small one."—f. 35.

1587. — "The said Larine is a strange piece of money, not being round, as all other current money in Christianitie, but is a small rod of silver, of the greatnesse of the pen of a goose feather... which is wrested so that two ends meet at the just half part, and in the head thereof is a stamp Terbocco, and these be the best current money in all the Indias, and 6 of these Larines make a dutchuck."—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 407.

1598. — "An Ox or a Cow is there to be bought for one Larin, which is as much as a halfe a Gilderne."—Linshoteson, 28; [Hak. Soc. i. 94; in i. 48 Larynen; see also i. 242].

c. 1610. — "La monnay du Royaume n'est que d'argent et d'une sorte. Ce sont des pieces d'argent qu'ils appellent larins, de valeur de huit sols ou environ de nostre monnay... longues comme le doigt mais redoublees..."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 163; [Hak. Soc. i. 232].

1616. — "We agreed with one of the Governor's kinred for twenty larines (twenty shillings) to conduct us..."—N. Whittington, in Purchas, i. 484.

1622. — "The lari is a piece of money that I will exhibit in Italy, most eccentric in form, for it is nothing but a little rod of silver of a fixed weight, and bent double unequally. On the bend it is marked with some small stamp or other. It is called Lar because it was the peculiar money of the Persiaes invented by them when they were separated from the Kingdom of Persia... In value every 5 larì are equal to a piastre or patache of reals of Spain, or 'piece of eight' as we choose to call it."—V. della Valle, ii. 344.

Larkin, s. (obsolete). A kind of drink—apparently a sort of punch—which was popular in the Company's old factories. We know the word only on the authority of Pietro della Valle; but he is the most accurate of travellers. We are in the dark as to the origin of the name. On the one hand its form suggests an eponymus among the old servants of the Company, such as Robert Larkin, whom we find to have been engaged for the service in 1616, and to have died chief of the Factory of Patani, on the E. coast of the Malay Peninsula, in 1616. But again we find in a Vocabulary of "Certaine Words of the Naturall Language of Java," in Drake's Voyage (Hak. iv. 246): "Larmike═Drinke." Of this word we can trace nothing nearer than (Javan.) larik, 'to pledge, or invite to drink at an entertainment,' and (Malay) larik-larahan, 'mutual pledging to drink.' It will be observed that della Valle assigns the drink especially to Java.

1623. — "Meanwhile the year 1622 was drawing near its close, and its last days were often celebrated of an evening in the House of the English, with good fellowship. And on one of these occasions I learned from them how to make a beverage called LASCAR.

LASCAR. in. adverse branch called it. This is a very important fact, not for use at every meal (it is too strong for that), but as a tonic in case of debility, and to make tasty possets, much better than those we make with Muscatel wines or Cretan malmsseys. So I asked for the recipe; and am taking it to Italy with me. It seemed odd to me that those hot southern regions, as well as in the environs of Hormuz here, where also the heat is great, theMohammedan tribes there put spirits in their drink, as well as sundry other hot beverages like this larkin."—P. della Valle, ii. 475.

LARRY-BUNDER. n.p. The name of an old seaport in the Delta of the Indus, which succeeded Daubul (see DIUL-SIND) as the chief haven of Sind. We are doubtful of the proper orthography. It was in later Mahanomedan times called Lahori-bandar, probably from presumed connection with Lahore as the port of the Punjab (Elliot, i. 378). At first sight M'Murdo's suggestion that the original name may have been Ltrib-bandar, from Lar, the local name of the southern part of Sind, seems probable. M'Murdo, indeed, writing about 1820, says that the name Ltrib-bandar was not at all familiar to natives; but if accustomed to the form Lahori-bandar they might not recognize it in the other. The shape taken however by what is apparently the same name in our first quotation is adverse to M'Murdo's suggestion.

1030. — "This stream (the Indus) after passing (Alor) . . . divides into two streams: one empties itself into the sea in the neighbourhood of the city of Laharani, and the other branches off to the East, to the borders of Kach, and is known by the name of Sind Nagar, i.e., Sea of Sind."—Al-Biräin, in Elliot, ii. 49.

e. 1383. — "I travelled five days in his company with Alî-ul-Mulk, and we arrived at the seat of his Government, i.e., the town of Lahari, a fine city situated on the shore of the great Sea, and near which the River Sind enters the sea. Thus two great waters join near it; it possesses a grand haven, frequented by the people of Yemen, of Fars (etc.). . . . The Amir Alî-ul-Mulk . . . told me that the revenue of this place amounted to 60,000 a year."—Ibn Battuta, iii. 112.

1565. — "Blood had not yet been spilled, when sudden news came from Thatta, that the Firingis had passed Lahori-bandar, and attacked the city."—Tarikh-Tahir, in Elliot, i. 277.

[1607. — "Then you are to sail for Lawrie in the Bay of the River Sydus."—Birdwood, First Letter-book, 251.]

[1611. — "I took . . . Larree, the port town of the River Sinda."—Dancers, Letters, i. 162.]

e. 1665. — "Il se fait aussi beaucoup de trafic au Loure-bender, qui est à trois jours de Tatta sur la mer, où la rade est plus excellente pour Vaisseaux, qu'en quelques autre lieu que ce soit des Indes."—Thenen, v. 159.

1679. — . . . If Suratt, Barach, and Bundurlarre in Scinda may be included in the same Phyrmaund to be customs free . . . then that they get these places and words inserted."—P. St. Cro., Cosm., Feb. 29, in Notes and Extr., No. I. Madras, 1571.

1727. — "It was my Fortune . . . to come to Larribunder. with a Cargo from Malabar, worth above £10,000."—A. Hamilton, i. 115; [ed. 1744. i. 117. Larribunder.]

1759. — "But the Castle and town of Lohre Bender, with all the country to the eastward of the river Attok, and of the waters of the Scinda, and Nala Soenkhra, shall, as before, belong to the Empire of Hindostan."—M. of Nadir, in Hownav, ii. 357.

1753. — "Le bras gauche du Sind se rend à Laheri, où il s'étanche en un lac; et ce port, qui est celui de Tattanagar, communément est nommé Laurebender."—D'Anville, p. 49.

1763. — "Les Angois ont sur cette côte encore plusieurs petits établissements (sic) où ils envoient des premiers Marchands, des sous-Marchands, ou des Facteurs, comme en Scinda, à trois endroits, à Tatta, une grande ville et la résidence du Sénégnur du pays; à Lar Bunder, et à Shab-Bunder."—Niebula, Voyage, ii. 8.

1789. — "The first place of any note, after passing the bar, is Laribunda, about 5 or 6 leagues from the sea."—Burn's Oriental Navigator, 5th ed. p. 96.

1813. — "Laribunder. This is commonly called Scinda River, being the principal branch of the Indus, having 15 feet water on the bar, and 6 or 7 fathoms inside; it is situated in latitude about 24° 30' north. . . . The town of Laribunder is about 5 leagues from the sea, and vessels of 200 tons used to proceed up to it."—M. Burn's, i. 146.

1831. — "We took the route by Durajee and Meerpoor. . . . The town of Lahory was in sight from the former of these places, and is situated on the same, or left bank of the Pitter."—A. Buenos, 2nd ed. i. 22.

LASCAR. s. The word is originally from Pers. laskhar, 'an army,' 'a camp.' This is usually derived from Ar. al'askar, but it would rather seem that Ar. 'askar, 'an army' is taken from this Pers. word: whence lasbkar, 'one belonging to an army, a soldier.' The word luscár or lásáir (both these pronunciations are in vogue) appears to have been corrupted, through the Portuguese use of laskhāri in the forms lasquarin, lassari, &c., either by the Portuguese themselves, or by the Dutch and English who took up the word from them, and from these laskār has passed back again into native use in this corrupt shape. The early Portuguese writers have the forms we have just named in the sense of 'soldier'; but lascar is never so used now. It is in general the equivalent of khalās, in the various senses of that word (see CLASSY), viz. (1) an inferior class of artilleryman ('gen-luscár'); (2) a tent-pitcher, doing other work which the class are accustomed to do; (3) a sailor. The last is the most common Anglo-Indian use, and has passed into the English language. The use of luscár in the modern sense by Pyrrard de Laval shows that this use was already general on the west coast at the beginning of the 17th century, [also see quotation from Pringle below]; whilst the curious distinction which Pyrrard makes between luscár and lascari, and Dr. Fryer makes between Luscár and Lascars (accenting probably Luscár and Lascár) shows that laslákar for a soldier was still in use. In Ceylon the use of the word lascaren for a local or civil soldier long survived; perhaps is not yet extinct. The word laslákar does not seem to occur in the Ain.

—Alguns documentos, Tombo, p. 479.

[1583.—"My mother only bore me to be a Captain, and not your Lascar (lascarin)."
—Letter of Nuno de Cunha, in Barros, Dec. IV. bk. 19, ch. 21.]

1541.—"It is a proverbial saying all over India (i.e. Portuguese India, see s.v.) that the good Lasquarin, or 'soldier' as we should call him, must be an Abyssinian."—Costa, Relatores, 73.

1516.—"Besides these there were others (who fell at Din) whose names are unknown, being men of the lower rank, among whom I knew a lascarom (a man getting only 500 reis of pay!) who was the first man to lay his hand on the Moorish wall, and shouted aloud that they might see him, as many have told me. And he was immediately thrown down wounded in five places with stones and bullets, but still lived; and a noble gentleman sent and had him rescued and carried away by his slaves. And he survived, but being a common man he did not even get his pay!"—Correa, iv. 567.

1552.—"... eles os reparte polos lasca-rins de suas capitâncias, &c. assi chamão soldados..."—Cашandoa, ii. 67. [Mr. White- way notes that in the original, repartem for reparte, and the reference should be ii. 16.]

1554.—"Moreover the Senhor Governor conceded to the said ambassador that if in the territories of Idâshah (see IDALCAN), or in those of our Lord the King there shall be any differences or quarrels between any Portuguese lascarins or peons (píros) of ours, and lascarins of the territories of Idâshah and peons of his, that the said Idâshah shall order the delivery up of the Portuguese and peons that they may be punished if culpable. And in like manner..."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 44.

1615.—"We came to the Lasker the 7th of February in the evening."—Field, iii. 58.]

1616.—"I took horse to avoid press, and other inconvenience, and crossed out of the Lasker, before him."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 559; see also 596; [Hakl. Soc. ii. 324].

1882.—"... presents to the Seer Lascarr (sir-i-laskar, 'head of the army') this day received."—Pingle, Diary Pt. St. Geo., 1st ser. i. 54.]

LAT, LAT SAHIB. s. This, a popular corruption of Lord Sahib, or Lord Sahib, as it is written in Hind., is the usual form from native lips, at least in the Bengal Presidency, of the title by which the Governor-General has long been known in the vernacul.

The term also extends nowadays to Lieutenant-Governors, who in contact with the higher authority become Chota ("Little") Lat, whilst the Governor-General and the Commander-in-Chief are sometimes discriminated as the Mulki Lat Sahib [or Bare Lat], and the Jangi Lat Sahib ('territorial' and 'military'), the Bishop as the Lat Padré Sahib, and the Chief Justice as the Lat Justy Sahib. The title is also sometimes, but very incorrectly, applied to minor dignitaries of the supreme Government. [whilst the common form of blessing addressed to a civil officer is "Huzur Lat Guv- nar, Lat Sikirtar ho-jirin.

1824.—"He seemed, however, much puzzled to make out my rank, never having heard (he said) of any 'Lord Sahib,' except the Governor-General, and he was still more perplexed by the exposition of 'Lord Bishop Sahib,' which for some reason or other my servants always prefer to that of Lord Padre."—Heber, i. 99.

1837.—"The Arab, thinking I had purposely stolen his khan, ran after the buggy at full speed, shouting as he passed Lord Auckland's tent, 'Dohat, dohat! Sahib! dohat.' Lord Sahib!"—see DOAI. "May, mercy, sir! mercy, Governor-General!" The faster the horse rushed on. the faster followed the shouting Arab."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 142.

1838.—"The old barber at Roorkee, after telling me that he had known Strachey when he first began, added, 'Ab Lát-Sekretur hah! Ah! hum bhi boodda bogya?' (Now he is Lord Secretary! Ah! I too have become Sahib!')"—Letter from the late M. Gen. W. H. Greathed.

1777.—"... in a rare but most valuable book (Gallows's Observations on India, 1725, pp. 254-8), in which the author reports, with much quiet humour, an aged native's account of the awful consequences of contempt of an order of the (as he called the Supreme Court) 'Shureen Kowurt,' the order of Impye being 'Lord Justey Sahib-ba-boolm,' the instruments of whose will were 'abuldeba' or 'affilavits.'"—Letter from Sir J. F. Stephen, in Times, May 31.

LAT, s. Hind. lát, used as a corruption of the English 'lot,' in reference to an auction (Caragi).

LAT, LÁTH, s. This word, meaning a staff or pole, is used for an obelisk or columnar monument; and is specifically used for the ancient Buddhist columns of Eastern India.

[1861-62.—"The pillar (at Besarh) is known by the people as Bhim-Sa-lát and Bhim-Sa-ku-julda."—Cunningham, Arch. Rep. i. 61.]
LATERITE, s. A term, first used by Dr. Francis Buchanan, to indicate a reddish brick-like argillaceous formation much impregnated with iron peroxide, and hardening on exposure to the atmosphere, which is found in places all over South India from one coast to the other, and the origin of which geologists find very obscure. It is found in two distinct types: viz., (1) High-level Laterite, capping especially the trap-rocks of the Deccan, with a bed from 30 or 40 to 200 feet in thickness, which perhaps at one time extended over the greater part of Peninsular India. This is found as far north as the Rajmahal and Monghyr hills. (2) Low-level Laterite, forming comparatively thin and sloping beds on the plains of the coast. The origin of both is regarded as being, in the most probable view, modified volcanic matter; the low-level laterite having undergone a further rearrangement and deposition; but the matter is too complex for brief statement (see Newbold, in J.R.A.S., vol. viii.; and the Manual of the Geol. of India, pp. 348 seqq.). Mr. King and others have found flint weapons in the low-level formation. Laterite is the usual material for road-metal in S. India, as kunkur (q.v.) is in the north. In Ceylon it is called cabook (q.v.).

1860.—"It is diffused in immense masses, without any appearance of stratification, and is placed over the granite that forms the basis of Malabar: . . . It is very soon becomes as hard as brick, and resists the air and water much better than any brick I have seen in India. . . As is usually cut into the form of bricks for building, in several of the native dialects it is called the brick-stone (Ricawater) [Malayal. sethun]. . . The most proper English name would be Laterite, from Laterus, the appellation that may be given it in science."—Buchanan, Myore, &c, ii. 140-141.

1860.—"Natives resident in these localities (Galle and Colombo) are easily recognisable elsewhere by the general hue of their dress. This is occasioned by the prevalence along the western coast of laterite, or, as the Singhalese call it, cabook, a product of disintegrated gneiss, which being subjected to detritus communicates its hue to the soil."—Temple's Ceylon, i. 17.

LATEEAL, s. Hind. latithiyal, or, more cumbrously, lathitwil, a clubman, a hired ruffian. Such gentry were not many years ago entertained in scores by planters in some parts of Bengal, to maintain by force their claims to lands for sowing indigo on.

1875.—"Doubtless there were hired lattis . . . on both sides."—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 6.

LAW-OFFICER. This was the official designation of a Mahommenden officer learned in the (Mahommedan) law, who was for many years of our Indian administration an essential functionary of the judges' Courts in the districts, as well as of the Sudder or Courts of Review at the Presidency.

It is to be remembered that the law administered in Courts under the Company's government, from the assumption of the Dewanny of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa, was the Mahommedan law; at first by the hands of native Cazees and Mutfies, with some superintendence from the higher European servants of the Company; a superintendence which, while undergoing sundry vicissitudes of system during the next 30 years, developed gradually into a European judiciary, which again was set on an extended and quasi-permanent footing by Lord Cornwallis's Government, in Regulation IX. of 1793.

The word is Hind. latthi and lath, Mahr. latthi. This is from Prakrit latthi, for Skt. yasti, 'a stick,' according to the Prakrit grammar of Vavarruchi (ed. Corell, ii. 23); see also Lassen, Institutions, Ling. Prakrit, 195. Jiski latthi, us ki bhais, is a Hind. proverb (cujus borebun ejus bubalus), equivalent to the "good old rule, the simple plan."

1830.—"The natives use a very dangerous weapon, which they have been forbidden by Government to carry. I took one as a curiosity, which had been seized on a man in a fight in a village. It is a very heavy lathi, a solid male bamboo, 5 feet 5 inches long, headed with iron in a most formidable manner. There are 6 jagged semi-elliptic irons at the top, each 2 inches in length, 1 in height, and it is shod with iron bands 16 inches deep from the top."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 183.

1878.—After driving some 6 miles, we came upon about 100 men seated in rows on the roadside, all with latties."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 114.

LATEE. s. A stick; a bludgeon, often made of the male bamboo (Dendrocalamus strictus), and sometimes bound at short intervals with iron rings, forming a formidable weapon.
The Mahommedan law continued, however, to be the professed basis of criminal jurisprudence, though modified more and more, as years went on, by new Regulations, and by the recorded constructions and circular orders of the superior Courts, until the accomplishment of the great changes which followed the Mutiny, and the assumption of the direct government of India by the Crown (1858). The landmarks of change were (a) the enactment of the Penal Code (Act XLV. of 1860), and
(b) that of the Code of Criminal Procedure (Act. XXV. of 1861), followed by (c) the establishment of the High Court (July 1. 1862), in which became merged both the Supreme Court with its peculiar jurisdiction, and the (quondam-Company's) Sudder Courts of Review and Appeal, civil and criminal (Devanny Adawlut, and Nizamat Adawlut).

The authoritative exposition of the Mahommedan Law, in aid and guidance of the English judges, was the function of the Mahommedan Law-officer. He sat with the judge on the bench at Sessions, i.e. in the hearing of criminal cases committed by the magistrate for trial; and at the end of the trial he gave in his written record of the proceedings with his Futwa (q.v.) (see Regn. IX. 1793, sect. 47), which was his judgment as to the guilt of the accused, as to the definition of the crime, and as to its appropriate punishment according to Mahommedan Law. The judge was bound attentively to consider the futwa, and if it seemed to him to be consonant with natural justice, and also in conformity with the Mahommedan Law, he passed sentence (save in certain excepted cases) in its terms, and issued his warrant to the magistrate for execution of the sentence, unless it were one of death, in which case the proceedings had to be referred to the Sudder Nizamat for confirmation. In cases also where there was disagreement between the civilian judge and the Law-officer, either as to finding or sentence, the matter was referred to the Sudder Court for ultimate decision.

In 1832, certain modifications were introduced by law (Regn. VI. of that year), which declared that the futwa might be dispensed with either by referring the case for report to a punchayet (q.v.), which sat apart from the Court; or by constituting assessors in the trial (generally three in number).
The frequent adoption of the latter alternative rendered the appearance of the Law-officer and his futwa much less universal as time went on. The post of Law-officer was indeed not actually abolished till 1864. But it would appear from enquiry that I have made, among friends of old standing in the Civil Service, that for some years before the issue of the Penal Code and the other reforms already mentioned, the Moolvее (maulavi) or Mahommedan Law-officer had, in some at least of the Bengal districts, practically ceased to sit with the judge, even in cases where no assessors were summoned.* I cannot trace any legislative authority for this, nor any CircULAR of the Sudder Nizamat; and it is not easy, at this time of day, to obtain much personal testimony. But Sir George Yule (who was Judge of Runagore and Bogra about 1855-56) writes thus:

"The Moolvее-ship . . . must have been abolished before I became a judge (I think), which was 2 or 3 years before the Mutiny:
for I have no recollection of ever sitting with a Moolvее, and I had a great number of heavy criminal cases to try in Runagore and Bogra. Assessors were substituted for the Moolvее in some cases, but I have no recollection of employing these either."

Mr. Seton-Kurr, again, who was Civil and Sessions Judge of Jessore (1857-1860), writes:

"I am quite certain of my own practice . . .
and I made deliberate choice of native assessors, whenever the law required me to have such functionaries. I determined never to sit with a Maulavi, as, even before the Penal Code was passed, and came into operation. I wished to get rid of futwas and differences of opinion."

The office of Law-officer was formally abolished by Act XI. of 1864.

In respect of civil litigation, it had been especially laid down (Regn. of April 11, 1780, quoted below) that in suits regarding successions, inheritance, mARRIAGE, CASTE, AND ALL RELIGIOUS USAGES

* Reg. 1. of 1810 had empowered the Executive Government, by an official communication from its Secretary in the Judicial Department, to discharge with the attendance and futwa of the Law-officers of the courts of circuit, when it seemed advisable. But in such case the judge of the court passed no sentence, but referred the proceedings with an opinion to the Nizamat Adawlut.
and institutions, the Mahommedan laws with respect to Mahommedans, and the Hindù laws with respect to Hindûs, were to be considered as the general rules by which the judges were to form their decisions. In the respective cases, it was laid down, the Mahommedan and Hindû law-officers of the court were to attend and expound the law.

In this note I have dealt only with the Mahommedan law-officer, whose presence and co-operation was so long (it has been seen) essential in a criminal trial. In civil cases he did not sit with the judge (at least in memory of man now living), but the judge could and did, in case of need, refer to him on any point of Mahommedan Law. The Hindû law-officer (Pundit) is found in the legislation of 1793, and is distinctly traceable in the Regulations down at least to 1821. In fact he is named in the Act XI. of 1864 (see quotation under CAZEE abolishing Law-officers. But in many of the districts it would seem that he had very long before 1860 practically ceased to exist, under what circumstances exactly I have failed to discover. He had nothing to do with criminal justice, and the occasions for reference to him were presumably not frequent enough to justify his maintenance in every district. A Pundit continued to be attached to the Sudder Dewanny, and to him questions were referred by the District Courts when requisite. Neither Pundit nor Moolvee is attached to the High Court, but native judges sit on its Bench. It need only be added that under Regulation III. of 1821, a magistrate was authorized to refer for trial to the Law-officer of his district a variety of complaints and charges of a trivial character. The designation of the Law-officer was Maulavi. (See ADAWULT, CAZEE, FUTWA, MOLVVEE, MUFTY.)

1780.—"That in all suits regarding inheritance, marriage, and caste, and other religious usages or institutions, the laws of the Koran with respect to Mahommedans, and those of the Shaster with respect to Gentooes, shall be invariably adhered to. On all such occasions the Molavies or Brahmins shall respectively attend to expound the law; and they shall sign the report and assist in passing the decree."—Regulation passed by the G.-G. and Council, April 11, 1780.

1783.—"H. The Law Officers of the Sudder Dewanny Adawult, the Nizamut Adawult, the provincial Courts of Appeal, the courts of circuit, and the zillah and city courts... shall not be removed but for incapacity or misconduct. ..."—Reg. XII. of 1783.

In §§ iv., v., Cauzy and Mufty are substituted for Law-Officer, but referring to the same persons.

1799.—"IV. If the futwa of the law officers of the Nizamut Adawult declare any person convicted of wilful murder not liable to suffer death under the Mahommedan law on the ground of... the Court of Nizamut Adawult shall notwithstanding sentence the prisoner to suffer death. ..."—Reg. VIII. of 1799.

LAXIMANA, LAQUESIMENA. &c., s. Malay Laksamana, from Skt. lakshmana, 'having fortunate tokens' (which was the name of a mythical hero, brother of Râma). This was the title of one of the highest dignitaries in the Malay State, commander of the forces.

o. 1539.—"The King accordingly set forth a Fleet of two hundred Sails. And of this Navy he made General the great Laque Xemena, his Admiral, of whose Valor the History of the Indies hath spoken in divers places."—Ploto, in Cogan, p. 38.

1563.—"Lаксамана was harassed by the King to engage Dom Garcia; but his reply was: Sire, against the Portuguese and their high-sided vessels it is impossible to engage with low-cut lancharas like ours. Leave me (to act) for I know this people well, seeing how much blood they have cost me; good fortune is now with thee, and I am about to avenge you on them. And so he did."—Barros, III. viii. 7.

[1615.—"On the morrow I went to take my leave of Laxman, to whom all strangers' business are resigned."—Foster, Letters, iv. 6.]

LEAGUER, s. The following use of this word is now quite obsolete, we believe, in English; but it illustrates the now familiar German use of Lager-Bier, i.e. 'beer for laying down, for keeping' (primarily in cask). The word in this sense is neither in Minshew (1627), nor in Bayley (1730).

1747.—"That the Storekeeper do provide Leaguers of good Columbo or Batavia arrack."—Pt. St. David Comm., May 5 (MS. Record in India Office).

1782.—"Will be sold by Public Auction by Mr. Bondfield, at his Auction Room, formerly the Court of Cutcherry... Square and Globe Lanthorns, a quantity of Country Rum in Leaguers, a Slave Girl, and a variety of other articles."—India Gazette, Nov. 23.

not an Anglo-Indian word. But it has come into European languages through the Ar. leimán, and is, according to Hehn, of Indian origin. In Hind. we have both lime and nimbá, which last, at least, seems to be an indigenous form. The Skt. dictionaries give nimbáka. In England we get the word through the Romance languages, Fr. limon, It. limone, Sp. limón, &c., perhaps both from the Crusades and from the Moors of Spain. [Mr. Skeat writes: "The Malay form is lima, 'a lime, lemon, or orange.' The Port. limão may possibly come from this Malay form. I feel sure that lima, which in some dialects is limar, is an indigenous word which was transferred to Europe."

LEOPARD, s. We insert this in order to remark that there has been a great deal of controversy among Indian sportsmen, and also among naturalists, as to whether there are or are not two species of this Cat, distinguished by those who maintain the affirmative, as panther (F. pardus) and leopard (Felix leopards), the latter being the smaller, though by some these names are reversed. Even those who support this distinction of species appear to admit that the markings, habits, and general appearance (except size) of the two animals are almost identical. Jerdon describes the two varieties, but (with Blyth) classes both as one species (Felix pardus). Mr. Blanford takes the same view: "I cannot help suspecting that the difference is very often due to age. . . . I have for years endeavoured to distinguish the two forms, but without success." (Mammalia of India, 68 seq.)

LEWCHEW, LIU KIU. LOO-

CHOO, &c., n.p. The name of a group of islands to the south of Japan, a name much more familiar than in later years during the 16th century, when their people habitually navigated the China seas, and visited the ports of the Archipelago. In the earliest notices they are perhaps mixt up with the Japanese. [Mr. Chamberlain gives the name Lucbo, and says that it is pronounced Dūchā by the natives and Ryūkō by the Japanese (Things Japanese, 3rd ed. p. 267).] Mr. Pringle traces the name in the "Gold flowered loes" which appear in a Madras list of 1684, and which he supposes to be "a name invented for the occasion to describe some silk stuff brought from the Liu Kiu islands." (Diary Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 174.)

1516.—"Opposite this country of China there are many islands in the sea, and beyond them at 175 leagues to the east there is one very large, which they say is the mainland, from whence there come in each year to Malaca 3 or 4 ships like those of the Chinese, of white people whom they describe as great and wealthy merchants. . . . These islands are called Lequeos, the people of Malaca say they are better men, and greater and wealthier merchants, and better dressed and adorned, and more honourable than the Chinese."— Barbosa, 207.

1540.—"And they, demanding of him whencesoever he came, and what he would have, he answered them that he was of the Kingdom of Siam [of the settlement of the Tanaucarim foreigners, and that he came from Venizaga] and as a merchant was going to Macau in the Isle of Lequios."—Pinto (orig. cap. xlii), in Cogan, p. 26.

1553.—"Fernao Peres, whilst he remained at that island of Benigua, saw there certain junkes of the people called Lequios, of whom he had already got a good deal of information at Malaca, as that they inhabited certain islands adjoining that coast of China; and he observed that the most part of the merchandise that they brought was a great quantity of gold ... and they appeared to him a better disposed people of the Chinese. ..."—Barros, III. ii. 8. See also II. vi. 6.

1556.—(In this year) a Portuguese arrived at Japan, named Pero de Uzes d'Almego, servant to the Gran Master of Sindiage with a rich Present, and letters from the Viceroy of Sindiage, Prince of the Island of Tanzeuana, directed to King John the third ... to have five hundred Portugals granted to him, to the end that with them, and his own Forces, he might conquer the Island of Lequio, for which he would remain tributary to him at 5000 Kintals of Copper and 1000 of Lattin, yearly. ..."—Pinto in Cogan, p. 185.

1815.—"The King of Mashona (qu. Shashma?) ... is King of the westernmost islands of Japan ... has conquered the Leques Islands, which not long since were under the Government of China."— Stadlbury, i. 447.

"... The King of Shashma ... a man of great power, and hath conquered the islaned called the Leques, which not long since were under the government of China. Leque Grande yeeldeth great store of amber greece of the best sorte, and will vent 1,000 or 15,000 (sic) ps. of coarse cloth, as法庭s and such like, per annum."—Letter of Raph Collindell, in Cork, ii. 275.

LIAMPO, n.p. This is the name which the older writers, especially Portuguese, give to the Chinese port which we now call Ning-Po. It is a form of corruption which appears in other cases of names used by the Portuguese, or of those who learned from them. Thus Yunking is similarly called Lunchin in the publications of the same age, and Yumna appears in Mendoza as Olam.

1540.—"Sailing in this manner we arrived six days after at the Ports of Liampo, which are two Islands one just against another, distant three Leagues from the place, where at that time the Portugals used their commerce: There they had built above a thousand houses, that were governed by Sheriffs, Auditors, Consuls, Judges, and 6 or 7 other kinds of Officers [com governança de Vereadores, & Ouvidor, Gentes & Aleiados, etc. de Acção & justiça de Oficiales de Republica], where the Notaries underneath the publice Acts which they made, wrote thus, I, such a one, publice Notarie of this Town of Liampo for the King our Sovereign Lord. And this they did with as much confidence and assurance as if this Place had been seattuated between Santarem and Lisbon; so that there were houses there which cost three or four thousand Duckats the building, but both they and all the rest were afterwards demolished for our sins by the Chinese. ..."—Pinto (orig. cap. xlii), in Cogan, p. 82.

What Cogan renders 'Ports of Liampo' is ports, i.e. Gates. And the expression is remarkable as preserving a very old tradition of Eastern navigation: the oldest document regarding Arab trade to China (the Relation, tr. by Reinand) says that the ships after crossing the Sea of Shoil pass the Gates of China. These Gates are in fact mountains washed by the sea: between these mountains is an opening, through which the ships pass' (p. 19). This phrase was perhaps a translation of a term used by the Chinese themselves—see under BOCCA TIGRIS.

1553.—"The eighth (division of the coasts of the Indies) terminates in a notable cape, the most easterly point of the whole continent so far as we know at present, and which stands about midway in the whole cast of that great country China. This our people call Cabo de Liampo, after an illustrious city which lies in the bend of the cape. It is called by the natives Nimpo, which our countrymen have corrupted into Liampo."—Barros, i. ix. 1.

1696.—"Those Junkes commonly touch at Lympo, from whence they bring Petre, Geelongs, and other Silks."— Bourgeois, in Dulcynple, i. 87.

1727.—"The Province of Chupian, whose chief city is Limpoo, by some called Nimpoo, and by others Nimpo."—A. Hamilton, ii. 283; (ed. 1744, ii. 352).

1770.—"To these articles of importation may be added those brought every year, by a dozen Chinese Junkes, from Eemy, Limpo, and Cantoon."—Raynal, tr. Triss, i. 219.

LIKIN, LEKIN. s. We borrow from Mr. Giles: "An arbitrary tax, originally of one cash per tael on all kinds of produce, imposed with a view of making up the deficiency in the land-tax of China caused by the Taiping and Nienfei troubles. It was to be set aside for military purposes only—hence its common name of ‘war tax’. The Chefoo Agreement makes the area of the Foreign concessions at the various Treaty Ports exempt from the tax of Lekin” (Gloss. of Reference, s.v.). The same authority explains the term as “li (le, i.e. a cash or ½ara of a tael-money,” because of the original rate of levy. The likin is professedly not an imperial customs-duty, but a provincial tax levied by the governors of the provinces, and at their discretion as to amount; hence varying in local rate, and from time to time changeable. This has been a chief difficulty in carrying out the Chefoo Agreement, which as yet has never been authoritatively interpreted or finally ratified by England. [It was ratified in 1886. For the conditions of the Agreement see Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. 629 seq.] We quote the article of the Agreement which deals with opium, which has involved the chief difficulties, as leaving not only the amount to be paid, but the line at which this is to be paid, undefined.

1876.—“Sect. III. . . . (iii). On Opium Sir Thomas Wade will move his Government to sanction an arrangement different from that affecting other imports. British merchants, when opium is brought into port, will be obliged to have it taken cognizance of by the Customs, and deposited in Bond . . . until such time as there is a sale for it. The importer will then pay the tariff duty upon it, and the purchasers the likin: in order to the prevention of the evasion of the duty. The amount of likin to be collected will be decided by the different Provincial Governments, according to the circumstances of each.”—Agreement of Chefoo.

—Roussel, A Travers la Chine, 221.

LILAC. s. This plant-name is eventually to be identified with anil (q.v.), and with the Skt. nila, ‘of a dark colour (especially dark blue or black)’; a fact which might be urged in favour of the view that the ancients in Asia, as has been alleged of them in Europe, belonged to the body of the colour-blind (like the writer of this article). The Indian word takes in the sense of indigo, in Persian the form ilāng; in Ar. this, modified into lilāk and lilāk, is applied to the lilac (Syringa spp.). Marcel Devic says the Ar. adj. lilāk has the modified sense ‘bleuatre.’ See a remark under BUCKEYNE. We may note that in Scotland the ‘striving after meaning’ gives this familiar and beautiful tree the name among the undecimated of ‘lily-oak.’

LIME. s. The fruit of the small Citrus medica, var. acida, Hooker, is that generally called lime in India, approaching as it does very nearly to the fruit of the West India Lime. It is often not much bigger than a pigeon’s egg, and one well-known miniature lime of this kind is called by the natives from its thin skin kāphozī nimbā, or ‘paper lime.’ This seems to bear much the same relation to the lemon that the miniature thinskinned orange, which in London shops is called Tangerine, bears to the “China orange.” But lime is also used with the characterising adjective for the Citrus medica, var. Linetta, Hooker, or Sweet Lime, an insipid fruit.

The word no doubt comes from the Sp. and Port. lima, which is from the Ar. līma; Fr. lima, Pers. līmā, limān (see LEMON). But probably it came into English from the Portuguese in India. It is not in Minshew (2nd ed. 1727).

1404.—“And in this land of Guilan snow never falls, so hot is it; and it produces abundance of citrons and limes and oranges (citrus & limas & naranjas).”—Clavijo, §lxxvi. c. 1526.—“Another is the lime (lìmâ), which is very plentiful. Its size is about that of a hen’s egg, which it resembles in shape. If one who is poisoned boils and eats its fibres, the injury done by the poison is averted.”—Boyer, 328.

1563.—“It is a fact that there are some Portuguese so pig-headed that they would rather die than acknowledge that we have here any fruit equal to that of Portugal; but there are many fruits here that bear the bell, as for instance all the fructas de espinho. For the lemons of those parts are so big that they look like citrons, besides being very tender and full of flavour, especially those of Bagaim; whilst the citrons themselves are much better and more tender (than those of Portugal); and the limes (limas) vastly better . . .”—Garcia, f. 183.

1830.—“The Hēe enrich us with many good things; Buffolfs, Goats, Turtle, Hens, huge Batts... also with Oranges, Lemons, Lymes,' etc. —Sir T. Herbert, 28.

1690. —"The Island (Johanna) abounds with Fowls and Rice, with Pepper, Yams, Plantens, Bonanos, Potatoes, Oranges, Lemons, Limes, Pine-apples, &c."—Oriental, 198.

LINGAIT, LINGAYET, LINGUIST, LINGAVANT, LINGA-DHARI. s. Mahr, Lingayit, Can Linggyata, a member of a Sivite sect in W. and S. India, whose members wear the linga (see LINGAM) in a small gold or silver box suspended round the neck. The sect was founded in the 12th century by Basava. They are also called Jangama, or Vira Siva, and have various subdivisions. [See Nelson, Madura, pt. iii, 45 sq; Monier Williams, Brahmanism, 88.]

1873. —"At Hadji in this Kingdom are a caste called Linguits, who are buried upright."—Fryer, 128. This is still their practice.

Lingga is given as the name of a title to the King of Cumbolum (see QUILON) in the 14th century, by Friar Jordanus (p. 41), which might have been taken to denote that he belonged to this sect; but this seems never to have had followers in Malabar.

LINGAM. s. This is taken from the S. Indan form of the word, which in N. India is Skt. and Hind. linga, 'a token, badge,' and thence the symbol of Siva which is so extensively an object of worship among the Hindus, in the form of a cylinder of stone. The great idol of Somnath, destroyed by Mahmud of Ghazni, and the object of so much romantic narrative, was a colossal symbol of this kind. In the quotation of 1835 below, the word is used simply for a badge of caste, which is certainly the original Skt. meaning, but is probably a mistake as attributed in that sense to modern vernacular use. The man may have been a lingait (q.v.), so that his badge was actually a figure of the lingam. But this clever authoress often gets out of her depth.

1311. —"The stone idols called Ling Mahadeo, which had been a long time established at that place... these, up to this time, the kick of the horse of Islam had not attempted to break. Deo Narain fell down, and the other gods who had seats there raised their feet, and jumped so high, that at one leap they reached the roof of Khana, and in that affright the linga themselves would have died, had they had any legs to stand on."—Amur Khaer, in Elliot, iv, 91.

1816. —"...above this there is elevated the figure of an idol, which in decency I abstain from naming, but which is called by the heathen Linga, and which they worship with many superstitions: and indeed they regard it to such a degree that the heathen of Canara carry well-wrought images of the kind round their necks. This abominable custom was abolished by a certain Canara King, a man of reason and righteousness."—Costa, Dec. VII, iii, 11.

1793. —"...There are also some of them who wear a certain stone idol called Lingam... round the neck, or else in the hair of the head..."—Valentius, Chaps. 74.

1871. —"These Pagodas have each a small chamber in the center of twelve feet square, with a lamp hanging over the Lingham."—Hodges, 94.

1799. —"I had often remarked near the banks of the rivulet a number of little altars, with a linga of Mahadeva upon them. It seems they are placed over the ashes of Hindus who have been burnt near the spot."—Colorskite, in Lit', p. 152.

1859. —"Without was an immense lingam of black stone."—Ed. Valen. i, 371.

1814. —"...two respectable Brahmins, a man and his wife, of the secular order; who, having no children, had made several religious pilgrimages, performed the accustomed ceremonies to the linga, and consulted the divinity..."—Fryer, in Mem. ii, 394; [2nd ed. ii, 4; in ii, 184, lingam].

1833. —"In addition to the preaching, Mr. G. got hold of a man's Lingum, or badge of caste, and took it away."—Letters from Madras, 156.

1833. —"The homage was paid to Lingamism. The insult was offered to Mahometanism. Lingamism is not merely idolatry, but idolatry in its most pernicious form."—Maccabury, Speech on Trials of Somnath.

LINGUIST. s. An old word for an interpreter, formerly much used in the East. It long survived in China, and is there perhaps not yet obsolete. Probably adopted from the Port. lingua, used for an interpreter.

1564. —"To a lingua of the factory (at Goa) 2 paradas monthly..."—S. Boteio, Tombs, 62.

... "To the lingua of this kingdom (Ormuz) a Portuguese... To the lingua of the custom-house, a baramen."—Ibid. 104.

1612. —"Did Captain Sars' Linguist attend?"—Inwards, Letters, 1, 55.
1709.—“I carried the Linguist into a Merchant’s House that was my Acquaintance to consult with that Merchant about removing that Remora, that stopt the Man of War from entering into the Harbour.”—A. Hamilton, lii. 254; [ed. 1744].

1711.—“Linguists require not too much haste, having always five or six to make choice of, never a Barrel the better Herring.”—Lockyer, 102.

1760.—“I am sorry to think that your Honour should have reason to think, that I have been any way concerned in that unlucky affair that happened at the Noreges, in the month of October 1759: but give me leave to assure your Honour that I was no further concerned, than as a Linguist for the King’s Officer who commanded the Party.”—Letter to the Gov. of Fort St. George, from Antonio the Linguist, in Dalrymple, i. 396.

1760-1810.—“If the ten should presume to enter villages, public places, or bazaars, punishment will be inflicted on the linguist who accompanies them.”—Regulations at Canton, from The Panorama at Canton, p. 29.

1882.—“As up to treaty days, neither Consul nor Vice-Consul of a foreign nation was acknowledged, whenever either of these officers made a communication to the Nepo, it had to be done through the Hong merchants, to whom the dispatch was taken by a Linguist.”—The First Rate at Canton, p. 50.

LIP-LAP, s. A vulgar and disparaging nickname given in the Dutch Indies to Eurasians, and corresponding to Anglo-Indian chee-chee (q.v.). The proper meaning of lip-lap seems to be the uncoagulated pulp of the coco-nut (see Rumphius, bk. i. ch. 1). [Mr. Skeat notes that the word is not in the dicts., but Klinkert gives Jav. lap-lap, a ‘dish-clout.’] 1768-71.—“Children born in the Indies are nicknamed liplaps by the Europeans, although both parents may have come from Europe.”—Victories, E.T. i. 315.

LISHTEE, LISTEE, s. Hind. lishi, English word, ‘a list.’

LONG-CLOTH, s. The usual name in India for (white) cotton shirtings, or Lancashire calico; but first applied to the Indian cloth of like kind exported to England, probably because it was made of length unusual in India; cloth for native use being ordinarily made in pieces sufficient only to clothe one person. Or it is just possible that it may have been a corruption or mis-apprehension of langi (see LONGHEE). [This latter view is accepted without question by Sir G. Birdwood (Rep. on Old Rec., 224), who dates its introduction to Europe about 1675.]

1670.—“We have continued to supply you ... in regard the Dutch do so fully fall in with the Calico trade that they had the last year 50,000 pieces of Long-cloth.”—Letter from Court of E.I.C. to Madras, Nov. 9th. In Notes and Extracts, No. i. p. 2.

1682.—“... for Long cloth brown English 72: Coveds long & 2 broad No. 1. ...”—Pringle, Diary, P. St. Geo. 1st ser. i. 40.

1727.—“Suderass, or Suderass Patam, a small Factory belonging to the Dutch, to buy up long cloth.”—I. Hamilton, i. 358; [ed. 1744].

1785.—“The trade of Fort St. David’s consists in long clothes of different colours.”—Caracciolo’s Life of Ctive, i. 5.

1865.—“Long-cloth, as it is termed, is the material principally worn in the Tropics.”—Waring, Tropical Resident, p. 111.

1880.—“A Chinaman is probably the last man in the world to be taken in twice with a fraudulent piece of long-cloth.”—Fall Mall Budget, Jan. 9, p. 9.

LONG-DRAWERS, s. This is an old-fashioned equivalent for pyjamas (q.v.). Of late it is confined to the Madras Presidency, and to outfitters’ lists. [Mosquito drawers were probably like these.]

1623.—“They wear a pair of long drawers of the same Cloth, which cover not only their Thighs, but legs also to the Feet.”—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 45.

1711.—“The better sort wear long drawers, and a piece of Silk, or wrought Calico, thrown loose over the Shoulders.”—Lockyer, 57.

1774.—“... gave each private man a frock and long drawers of chintz.”—Forrest, V. to N. Guinet, 100.

1780.—“Leroy, one of the French hussars, who had saved me from being cut down by Hyder’s horse, gave me some soup, and a shirt, and long-drawers, which I had great want of.”—Hon. John Lindsay in Lives of the Linleys, iv. 266.

1789.—“It is true that they (the Nore) wear only a short blue jacket, and blue long draw.”—Note by Translator of Steele Magquirer, i. 87.

1810.—“For wear on board ship, pantaloons ... together with as many pair of wove cotton long-drawers, to wear under them.”—Williamson, V. M. i. 9.

1853.—“The Doctor, his gaunt figure very scantily clad in a dirty shirt and a pair of mosquito drawers.”—Campbell, Old Forest Ranger, 3rd ed. 108.

(See PYJAMAS, MOGUL BREECHES, SHULWAURS, SIRDARS.)
LONG-SHORE WIND, s. A term used in Madras to designate the damp, unpleasant wind that blows in some seasons, especially July to September, from the south.

1837.—"This longshore wind is very disagreeable—a sort of sham sea-breeze blowing from the south; whereas the real sea-breeze blows from the east; it is a regular cheat upon the new-comers, feeling damp and fresh as if it were going to cool one."—Letters from Madras, 75.

LONTAR, s. The palm leaves used in the Archipelago (as in S. India) for writing on are called lontar-leaves. Filet (No. 5179, p. 209) gives lontar as the Malay name of two palms, viz., Borassus flabelliformis (see PALMYRA, BRAB), and Livistona tundifolia. [See CADJAN.] [Mr. Skeat notes that Klinkert gives—'Lontar, metathesis of row-tal, leaf of the tal tree, a fan-palm whose leaves were once used for writing on, borassus flabelliformis.' Ron is thus probably equivalent to the Malay dawun, or in some dialects don, 'leaf.' The tree itself is called p'hum (pohun) ter in the E. coast of the Malay Peninsula, tar and tal being only variants of the same word. Scott, Malayian Words in English, p. 121, gives: "Lontar, a palm, dial. form of dawun tal (tal, Hind.)." (See TODDY.)

LOOCHER, s. This is often used in Anglo-Ind. colloquial for a blackguard libertine, a lewd loafer. It is properly Hind. luchha, having that sense. Orme seems to have confounded the word, more or less, with lathiya (see under LOOTY). [A rogue in Pamdurom Hari (ed. 1873, ii. 168) is Loochajrai. The place at Matheran originally called "Lounia Point" has become "Loocha Point!"]

LOONGHEE. s. Hind. lungi, perhaps originally Pers. lung and lunggi; [but Platts connects it with linga]. A scarf or web of cloth to wrap round the body, whether applied as what the French call pagne, i.e. a cloth simply wrapped once or twice round the hips and tucked in at the upper edge, which is the proper Mussulman mode of wearing it; or as a cloth tucked between the legs like a dhoty (q.v.), which is the Hindu mode, and often followed also by Mahomedans in India. The Quran-e-Islam further distinguishes between the lunggi and dhoti that the former is a coloured cloth worn as described, and the latter a cloth with only a coloured border, worn by Hindus alone. This explanation must belong to S. India. [The lungi is really meant to be worn round the waist, and is very generally of a checked pattern, but it is often used as a pagari (see PUGGRY), more especially that known as the Kohat lungi." (Cookson, Mon. on Punjab Silk, 4). For illustrations of various modes of wearing the garment, see Forbes Watson, Textile Manufactures and Costumes, pl. iii. iv.]

1673.—"The Elder sat in a Row, where the Men and Women came down together to wash, having Lungies about their Wastes only."—Fryer, 101. In the Index, Fryer explains as a "Waste-Clout."

1726.—"Silk Longis with red borders, 100 pieces in a pack, 14 cubits long and 2 broad."—Valenti, v. 178.

1727.—"... For some coarse chequered Cloth, called Cambuye (see COMBOY), Lungies, made of Cotton-Yarn, the Natives would bring Elephant's Teeth."—1. Hamilton, i. 9: (ed. 1744).

"... (In Pegu) 'Under the Frock they have a Scarf or Lungie doubled fourfold, made fast about the Middle. ..."—Ibid. ii. 49.

c. 1760.—"Instead of petticoats they wear what they call a loongee, which is simply a long piece of silk or cotton stuff."—Grose, i. 148.

c. 1809-10.—"Many use the Lunggi, a piece of blue cotton cloth, from 5 to 7 cubits long and 2 wide. It is wrapped simply two or three times round the waist, and hangs down to the knee."—F. Buchanan, in Eastern India, iii. 102.

LOOT, s. & v. Plunder; Hind. lät, and that from Skt. lōt, for lyttra, root lōp, 'rob, plunder'; [rather lōp, 'to rob']. The word appears in Stockdale's Vocabulary, of 1788, as "Loot—plunder, pillage." It has thus long been a familiar item in the Anglo-Indian colloquial. But between the Chinese War of 1841, the Crimean War (1854-5), and the Indian Mutiny (1857-8), it gradually found acceptance in England also, and is now a recognised constituent of the English Slang Dictionary. Admiral Smyth has it in his Nautical Glossary (1867) thus:—

"Loot, plunder, or pillage, a term adopted from China."

1545.—St. Francis Xavier in a letter to a friend in Portugal admonishing him from encouraging any friend of his to go to India, seems to have the thing Loot in his mind, though of course he does not use the word:—

1842.—"I believe I have already told you that I did not take any loot—the Indian word for plunder—so that I have nothing of that kind, to which so many in this expedition helped themselves so bountifully."—Coln Campbell to his sister, in L. of Lt. Clyde, i. 120.

"In the Sengor district the plunderers are beaten whenever they are caught, but there is a good deal of burning and 'looting,' as they call it."—Indian Administration of Lt. Ellenborough. To the D. of Wellington, May 17, p. 194.

1817.—"Went to see Marshal Soult's pictures which he looted in Spain. There are many Murillos, all beautiful."—Lt. Methuen, Mem. of an Eco-Minister, i. 192.

1858.—"There is a word called 'loot,' which gives, unfortunately, a venial character to what would in common English be styled robbery."—Lt. Elgin, Letters and Journals, 215.

1860.—"Loot, swag or plunder."—Stong Diet. s.v.

1864.—"When I mentioned the 'looting' of villages in 1845, the word was printed in italics as little known. Unhappily it requires no distinction now; custom having rendered it rather common of late."—Admiral W. H. Smyth, Quoyns, p. 52.

1875.—"It was the Colonel Sahib who carried off the loot."—The Dilemma, ch. xxxvii.

1876.—"Public servants (in Turkey) have vised with one another in a system of universal loot."—Blackwood's Mag. No. cxix. p. 115.

1878.—"The city (Hongkong) is now patrolled night and day by strong parties of marines and Sikhs, for both the disposition to loot and the facilities for looting are very great."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 34.

1883.—"'Loot' is a word of Eastern origin, and for a couple of centuries past . . . the looting of Delhi has been the daydream of the most patriotic among the Sth race."—Bos. Smith's Life of Lt. Lawrence, ii. 245.

"At Ta li fu . . . a year or two ago, a fire, supposed to be an act of incendiarism, broke out among the Tibetan encampments which were then looted by the Chinese."—Official Memo. on Chinese Trade with Tib., 1883.

LOOTY, LOOTIEWALLA, s.

1757.—"A body of their Louchees (see LOOCHER) or plunderers, who are armed with clubs, passed into the Company's territory."—Ld. Elgin, ed. 1803, ii. 129.

1782.—"Even the rascally Looty wallahs, or mongolian hussars, who had just before been meditating a general desertion to us, now pressed upon our flanks and rear."—Munro's Narrative, 295.

1792.—"The Colonel found him as much dismayed as if he had been surrounded by the whole Austrian army, and busy in placing an ambuscade to catch about six looters."—Letter of T. Munro, in Life.

"This body (horse plunderers round Madras) had been branded generally by the name of Looties, but they had some little title to a better appellation, for they were . . . not guilty of those sanguinary and inhuman deeds . . ."—Munro's Narrative, Jan. 26.

1793.—"A party was immediately sent, who released 27 half-starved wretches in heavy irons, among them was Mr. Randal Cadman, a midshipman taken 10 years before by Suffren. The remainder were private soldiers; some of whom had been taken by the Looties; others were deserters. . . ."—Dixon's Narrative, p. 157.

b. A different word is the Ar.—Pers. lați, bearing a worse meaning, 'one of the people of Lot,' and more generally 'a blackguard.'

1824.—"They were singing, dancing, and making the lutti all the livelong day."—Hepplewhite, ed. 1851, p. 441.

1858.—"The Loutie, who wandered from town to town with monkeys and other animals, taught them to cast earth upon their heads (a sign of the deepest grief among Asiatics) when they were asked whether they would be governors of Balkh or Akchehel."—Ferrier, H. of the Afghans, 101.

1883.—"Monkeys and baboons are kept and trained by the Lütis, or professional buffoons."—Will's Modern Persia, ed. 1891, p. 306.]

The people of Shiraz are noted for a fondness for jingling phrases, common enough among many Asiatics, including the people of India, where one constantly hears one's servants speak of chauki-anka (for chairs and tables), navkar-chaker (where both are however real words), 'servants,' lokri-arki, 'sticks and staves,' and so forth. Regarding this Mr. Wills tells a story (Modern Persia, p. 239). The late Minister, Kawam-ud-Daulat, a Shiраз, was asked by the Shah:

"Why is it, Kawân, that you Shirâzis always talk of Kalob-mahob and so on? You always add a nonsense-word: is it for euphony?"

"Oh, Asylum of the Universe, may I be your sacrifice! No respectable person in Shirzâd does so, only the ìtti-pâtì says it!"

LOQUOT, LOQUAT, s. A sub-acid fruit, a native of China and Japan, which has been naturalised in India and in Southern Europe. In Italy it is called nespola giapponese (Japan medlar). It is Erubatyra japonica, Lindl. The name is that used in S. China, lu-kâh, pron. at Canton lu-kâat, and meaning 'rush-orange.' Elsewhere in China it is called pi-pa.

1821.—"The Lacott, a Chinese fruit, not unlike a plum, was produced also in great plenty (at Bangalore); it is sweet when ripe, and both used for tarts, and eaten as dessert."—Hodg. Missions in Madras and Malaya, 2nd ed. 158.]

1858.—"... the yellow loquat, peach-skinned and pleasant, but prodigal of stones."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 49, c. 1860.—"A loquat tree in full fruit is probably a sight never seen in England before, but 'the phenomenon' is now on view at Richmond. (This was in the garden of Lady Parker at Stawell House.) We are told that it has a fine crop of fruit, comprising about a dozen bunches, each bunch being of eight or ten beautiful berries. ... "—Newspaper cutting (source lost).

LORCHA, s. A small kind of vessel used in the China coasting trade. Giles explains it as having a hull of European build, but the masts and sails Chinese fashion, generally with a European skipper and a Chinese crew. The word is said to have been introduced by the Portuguese from S. America (Giles, 81). But Pinto's passage shows how early the word was used in the China seas, a fact which throws doubt on that view. [Other suggestions are that it is Chinese lo-chuen, a sort of fighting ship, or Port. lancea, our launch (2 N. d. Q. iii. 217, 236).]

1540.—"Now because the Lorch (lorcho), wherein Antonio de Faria came from Patama leaked very much, he commanded all his soldiers to pass into another better vessel ... and arriving at a River that about evening we found towards the East, he cast anchor a league out at Sea, by reason his Junk ... drew much water, so that fearing the Sands ... he sent Christoto-anu Lorchio with 14 Soldiers in the Lorch up the River. ..."—Pinto (orig. cap. xiii.), Cogan, p. 50.

"Go into nos partemus deste lugar de Laito muyto embandeirados, com as gavias toldadas de paños de seda, et os juncos e lorchas çõ duas ordens de paveses por banda."—Pinto, ch. lviii. 'And so we started from Laito all dressed out, the tops draped with silk, and the junk and lorchas with two tiers of banners on each side.'

1513.—"... and they use smaller vessels called lorches and loqado, (!), and these never use more than 2 oars on each side, which serve both for paddlers and for oars in the river traffic."—Godin de Levrau, t. 296.

1856.—"... Mr. Parkes reported to his superior, Sir John Bowring, at Hong Kong, the facts in connexion with an outrage which had been committed on a British-owned Lorch, or Canton Lorch, Arrow, employed in the river trade between Canton and the mouth of the river, commanded by an English captain and flying an English flag, had been boarded by a party of Mandarins and their escort while at anchor near Dutch Folly."—Bougier, H. of China, 1554, iii. 396.

LORY. s. A name given to various brilliantly-coloured varieties of parrot, which are found in the Moluccas and other islands of the Archipelago. The word is a corruption of the Malay nurî, a parrot; but the corruption seems not to be very old, as Fryer retains the correct form. Perhaps it came through the French (see Lullier below). [Mr. Skeat writes: 'L traversal is hardly a corruption of nurî; it is rather a parallel form. The two forms appear in different dialects. Nurî may have been first introduced, and louri may be some dialectic form of it.'] The first quotation shows that lories were imported into S. India as early as the 14th century. They are still imported thither, where they are called in the vernacular by a name signifying 'Five-coloured parrots.' [Can. panchovarnagini.]

c. 1330.—“Parrots also, or popinjays, after their kind, of every possible colour, except black, for black ones are never found; but white all over, and green, and red, and also of mixed colours. The birds of this India seem really like the creatures of Paradise.”—Friar Jordanus, 29.

c. 1130.—“In Bandan three kinds of parrot are found, some with red feathers and a yellow beak, and some parti-coloured which are called Nori, that is brilliant.”—Conti, in India in the XVth Cent., 17. The last words, in Poggio’s original Latin, are:—“quos Noros appellant hoc est lucidos,” showing that Conti connected the word with the Pers. nūz, “luz.”

1516.—“In these islands there are many coloured parrots, of very splendid colours; they are tame, and the Moors call them nure, and they are much valued.”—Borrow, 202.

1555.—“There are hogs also with horns (see BABI-ROUSSA), and parrots which prattle much, which they call Noris.”—Galvano, E.T. in Hakl. iv. 324.

[1598.—“There cometh into India out of the Island of Moluccas beyond Malacca a kind of birds called Noyras; they are like Parrattes. . . .”—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 307.]

1601.—“PSittacorum passim in sylvis mutiae turmae obvallant. Sed in Moluccan Insulis per Malaccan a visus alia, Noya dicta, in Indian importetur, quae psittaci faciencem universim exprimit, quem cantu quoque adamussim aemulatur, nisi quod pennis rubricundis erubriorias vestitum.”—De Bry, v. 4.

1682.—“The Lorys are about as big as the parrots that one sees in the Netherlands. . . . There are no birds that the Indians value more: and they will sometimes pay 30 rix dollars for one. . . .”—Niclaau, Zee en Lant-Reize, ii. 257.

1698.—“Brought ashore from the Resolution . . . a Newry and four yards of broad cloth for a present to the Havilard.”—In Wheeler, i. 333.

1705.—“On y trouve de quatre sortes de perroquets, scavoir, perroquets, lauris, perruches, & cacatoris.”—Le Galliard, 72.

1780.—“Twas Camdeo riding on his lory, “Twas the immortal Youth of Love.”—Kehama, x. 19.

1817.—“Gay sparkling lorries, such as gleam between The crimson blossoms of the coral-tree In the warm Isles of India’s summer sea.”—Mokum.

LOTA. s. Hind. loṭā. The small spheroidal brass pot which Hindus use for drinking, and sometimes for cooking. This is the exclusive Anglo-

Indian application; but natives also extend it to the spherical pippkins of earthenware (see CHATTY or GHURRA.)

1810.—“. . . a looth, or brass water vessel.”—Williamson, V. M. ii. 284.

LOTE, s. Mod. Hind. lōt, being a corruption of Eng. ‘note.’ A bank-note; sometimes called bānklōt.

LOTOO, s. Burm. Ḥlʊṣ-d’haw, ‘Royal Court or Hall’; the Chief Council of State in Burma, composed nominally of four Wungvis (see WOON) or Chief Ministers. Its name designates more properly the place of meeting; compare Star-Chamber.

1792.—“. . . in capital cases he transmits the evidence in writing, with his opinion, to the Lutoo or grand council of consultation, whereof the council of state assemblies.”—Sykes, 307.

1819.—“The first and most respectable of the tribunals is the Lutto, comprised of four presidents called Vungki, who are chosen by the sovereign from the oldest and most experienced Mandarins, of four assistants, and a great chancery.”—Sangermano, 161.

1827.—“Every royal edict requires by law, or rather by usage, the sanction of this council: indeed, the King’s name never appears in any edict or proclamation, the acts of the Lut d’hau being in fact considered his acts.”—Crawford’s Journal, 401.

LOUTEA, LOYTIA, &c. s. A Chinese title of respect, used by the older writers on China for a Chinese official, much as we still use mandarin. It is now so obsolete that Giles, we see, omits it. “It would almost seem certain that this is the word given as follows in C. C. Baldwin’s Manual of the Foochow Dialect: ‘Lo-tin.’ . . . (in Mandarin Lao-tye) a general appellative used for an officer. It means ‘Venerable Father’ (p. 215). In the Court dialect Tu-loo-yey, ‘Great Venerable Father’ is the appellative used for any officer, up to the 4th rank. The ye of this expression is quite different from the tie or tia of the former” (Note by M. Terrien de la Courperie). Mr. Baber, after giving the same explanation from Carstairs Douglass’s Away Diet., adds: “It would seem ludicrous to a Pekingese. Certain local functionaries (Prefects, Magistrates, &c.) are, however, universally known in China as Fu-mu-know, ‘Parental Officers’ (lit. ‘Father-and-Mother Officers') and it is very likely that the expression 'Old Papa' is intended to convey the same idea of paternal government."

e. 1560. "Everyone that in China hath any office, command, or dignitie by the King, is called Louthia, which is to say with us Seior."—Gaspar da Cruz, in Purchas, iii. 169.

"I shall have occasion to speak of a certain Order of gentlemen that are called Lootea: I will first therefor expound what this word signifieth. Lootea 'as much as to say in our language as Sire."—Giacomo Perrino, by R. Wller, in Hakl. ii.; [ed. 1810, ii. 518].

1585. "And although all the King's officers and justices of what sort of administration they are, be generally called by the name of Loitya: yet enerie one hath a special and a particular name besides, according unto his office."—Mendoza, tr. by R. Parke, 11. 101.

1586. "Not any Man in China is esteemed or accounted of, for his birth, family, or riches, but only for his learning and knowledge, such as they that serve at every townye, and have the government of the same. They are called Loitias and Mandortijas."—Linschoten, 30; [Hakl. Soc. i. 133].

1618. "The China Capt. had letters this day per way of Xaxma (see SATSUMA: that the letters I sent are received by the noblemen in China in good parts, and a mandarin, or loytea, appointed to com for Japon."—Cocks, Diary, ii. 44.

1651. "They call ... the lords and gentlemen Loytias. ..."—Martinez de la Puente, Compendia, 26.

LOVE-BIRD, s. The bird to which this name is applied in Bengal is the pretty little lori-ketke, Loricus vernalis, Sparrman, called in Hind, batbon or 'pendant,' because of its quaint habit of sleeping suspended by the claws, head downwards.

LUBBEYE, LUBBEE, s. [Tel. Lubbi, Tam. Uppu] according to C. P. Brown and the Madras Gloss, a Dravidian corruption of 'Arabi. A name given in S. India to a race, Mussulmans in creed, but speaking Tamil, supposed to be, like the Moplahs of the west coast, the descendants of Arab emigrants by inter-marriage with native women. "There are few classes of natives in S. India, who in energy, industry, and perseverance, can compete with the Lubbay": they often, as pedlars, go about selling beads, precious stones, &c.

1810. "Some of these (early emigrants from Kufa) landed on that part of the Western coast of India called the Concan; the others to the eastward of C. Moplah: the descendants of the former are the Nervyets; of the latter the Lubbe: a name probably given to them by the natives, from that Arabic particle (a modification of Lubbei) corresponding with the English here I am, indicating attention on being spoken to. The Lubbe pretend to one common origin with the Nervyets, and attribute their black complexion to inter-marriage with the natives; but the Nervyets affirm that the Lubbe are the descendants of their domestic slaves, and there is certain in the physiognomy of this very numerous class, and in their stature and form, a strong resemblance to the natives of Abyssinia."—Wills, Hist. Sketches, i. 243.

1586. "Mr. Boyd ... describes the Moors under the name of Cholias (see CHOLUMIA); and Sir Alexander Johnston designates them by the appellation of Lubbes. These epithets are however not admissible: for the former is only confined to a particular sect among them, who are rather of an inferior grade; and the latter to the priests who officiate in their temples; and also as an honorary affix to the proper names of some of their chief men."—Simon Caile Chitty on the Moors of Ceylon, in J.R. As. Soc. iii. 358.

1685. "The Lubbeis are a curious caste, said by some to be the descendants of Hindus foreishly converted to the Mahometan faith some centuries ago. It seems most probable, however, that they are of mixed blood. They are, comparatively, a fine strong active race, and generally contrive to keep themselves in easy circumstances. Many of them live by traffic. Many are smiths, and do excellent work as such. Others are fishermen, boatmen and the like."—Nelson, Madura Manual, Pt. ii. 86.

1689. In a paper by Dr. Shortt it is stated that the Lubbays are found in large numbers on the East Coast of the Peninsula, between Punicat and Negapatam. Their headquarters are at Nagoor, the burial place of their patron saint Nagori Mr. Sahib. They excel as merchants, owing to their energy and industry.—In Trans. Ethn. Soc. of London. N. S. vii. 189-190.

LUCKERBAUG, s. Hind, lakrā, laghrā, laghraghā, laghraghā, 'a hyena.' The form laghraghā is not in the older dict. but is given by Platts. It is familiar in Upper India, and it occurs in Hickey's Bengal Gazette, June 24, 1781. In some parts the name is applied to the leopard, as the extract from Buchanan shows. This is the case among the Hindi-speaking people of the Himalaya also (see Jordon). It is not clear what the etymology of the name is, lakrā, lakrā meaning in their everyday sense, a stick or piece of timber. But both in LUCKNOW, n.p. Properly Lakhnaw; the well-known capital of the Nawabs and Kings of Oudh, and the residence of the Chief Commissioner of that British Province, till the office was united to that of the Lieut.-Governor of the N.W. Provinces in 1877. [The name appears to be a corruption of the ancient Lakshmanavati, founded by Lakshman, brother of Ramaandra of Ayodhya.]

1528.—"On Saturday the 29th of the latter Madni, I reached Lakhnow; and having surveyed it, passed the river Gumi and encamped."—Roper, p. 381.

[1690.—"Lakhnow is a large city on the banks of the Gumi, delightful in its roundings."—Lanc. ed. Jarrett, ii. 173.]

1663.—"In Agra the Hollander have also a House. . . . Formerly they had a good ade there in selling Scurlet . . . as also in buying those cloths of Jelapour and Lakhnau, at 7 or 8 days journey from Agra, where they also keep an house. . . ."

LUDDOO, s. II. luddo. A common native sweetmeat, consisting of balls of sugar and ghee, mixed with wheat and gram flour, and with coconut kernel rasped.

[1826.—"My friends . . . called me boor by ludoor, or the great man's sport."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 197.

1828.—"When at large we cannot even get caber (porridge), but in prison we eat laddoo (a sweetmeat)."—Tod, Annals, Calcutta reprint, ii. 185.]

LUGOW, TO. v. This is one of those imperatives transformed, in Anglo-Indian jargon, into infinitives, which are referred to under BUNOW.

FUCKEROW. H. inf. lagad-nâ, imperative lagad-a. The meanings of lagadînà, as given by Shakespear, are:—"to apply, close, attach, join, fix, affix, ascribe, impose, lay, add, place, put, plant, set, shut, spread, fasten, connect, planter, put to work, employ, engage, use, impute, report anything in the way of scandal or malice"—in which long list he has omitted one of the most common uses of the verb, in its Anglo-Indian form lugow, which is "to lay a boat alongside the shore or wharf, to moor." The fact is that lagatûnà is the active form of the neuter verb lagad-nâ, 'to touch, lie, to be in contact with,' and used in all the neuter senses of which lagadînà expresses the transitive senses. Besides neuter lagadînà, active lagadîd, we have a secondary casual verb, lagowînà, 'to cause to apply;' &c. Lagad, lagadînà are presumably the same words as our lie, and lay, A. S. liegen, and liegen, mod. Germ. liegen and legen. And the meaning 'lay' underlies all the senses which Shakespear gives of lagadînâ. [See Skew, Concise Etym. Dict. s. v. lie.]

LUMBERDAR, s. Hind. lambardar, a word formed from the English word 'number' with the Pers. termination -dâr, and meaning properly 'the man who is registered by a number,' "the registered representative of a coparcenary community, who is responsible for Government revenue." (Carnegy). "The cultivator who, either on his own account or as the representative of other members of the village, pays the Government dues and is registered in the Collector's Roll according to his number; as the representative of the rest he may hold the office by descent or by election." (Wilson).

by Hindus, and identified with the monkey-god Hanuman. The genus is Presbytes, Illiger, of which several species are now discriminated, but the differences are small. [See Blanford, Mammalia, 27, who classes the Langur as Semnopithecus entellus.] The animal is well described by Aelian in the following quotation, which will recall to many what they have witnessed in the suburbs of Benares and other great Hindu cities. The Langār or ... Prasi is P. Entellus.

c. 250.—‘Among the Prasis of India they say that there exists a kind of ape with human intelligence. These animals seem to be about the size of Hyrcanian dogs. Their front hair looks all grown together, and any one ignorant of the truth would say that it was dressed artificially. The beard is like that of a satyr, and the tail strong like that of a lion. All the rest of the body is white, but the head and the tail are red. These creatures are tame and gentle in character, but by race and manner of life they are wild. They go about in crowds in the suburbs of Latāgē (now Latāgā is a city of the Indianis) and eat the boiled rice that is put out for them by the King’s order. Every day their dinner is elegantly set out. Having eaten their fill it is said that they return to their parents in the woods in an orderly manner, and never hurt anybody that they meet by the way.’—Aelian, De Nat. Animal. xvi. 10.

1825.—‘An alarm was given by one of the sentries in consequence of a baboon drawing near his post. The character of the intruder was, however, soon detected by one of the Suwars, who on the Sepoy’s repeating his exclamation of the broken English ‘Who goes there?’ said with a laugh, ‘Why do you challenge the lungoor? he cannot answer you.’”—Heber, ii. 85.

1859.—‘I found myself in immediate proximity to a sort of parliament or general assembly of the largest and most human-like monkeys I had ever seen. There were at least 200 of them, great lungoors, some quite four feet high, the jetty black of their faces enhanced by a fringe of snowy whisker.”—Lucia, A Fly on the Wheel, 49.

1884.—‘Less interesting personally than the gibbon, but an animal of very developed social instincts, is Semnopithecus entellus, otherwise the Bengal langur. (He) fights for his wives according to a custom not unheard of in other cases; but what is peculiar to him is that the vanquished males receive charge of all the young ones of their own sex, with whom they retire to some neighbouring jungle.’ Schoolmasters and private tutors will read this with interest, as showing the origin and early disabilities of their profession.”—Saturday Rev., May 31, on Sterndale’s Nat. Hist. of Mammalia of India, &c.

LUNGOOR.

LUNGOOTY, s. Hind. langōti. The original application of this word seems to be the scantiest modicum of covering worn for decency by some of the lower classes when at work, and tied before and behind by a string round the waist; but it is sometimes applied to the more ample dhoti (see DHOOTY). According to R. Drummond, in Guzerat the “Langoth or Lungota” (as he writes) is “a pretty broad piece of cotton cloth, tied round the breech by men and boys bathing. ... The diminutive is Langotee, a long slip of cloth, stitched to a loin band of the same stuff, and forming exactly the T bandage of English Surgeons.” This distinction is probably originally correct, and the use of langōta by Abdurrazzożak would agree with it. The use of the word has spread to some of the Indo-Chinese countries. In the quotation from Moequet it is applied in speaking of an American Indian near the R. Amazon. But the writer had been in India.

c. 1422.—“The blacks of this country have the body nearly naked; they wear only bandages round the middle called lankoutz, which descend from the navel to above the knee.”—Abdurrazzożak, in India in XV. Cent. 17.

1526.—“Their peasants and the lower classes all go about naked. They tie on a thing which they call a langōti, which is a piece of cloth that hangs down two spans from the navel, as a cover to their nakedness. Below this pendant modesty-clout is another slip of cloth, one end of which they fasten before to a string that ties on the langōti, and then passing the slip of cloth between the two legs, bring it up and fix it to the string of the langōti behind.”—Baker, 338.

c. 1609.—“Leur capitaine auoit fort bonne façon, encore qu’il faut tout nud et luy seul auoit un langoutin, qui est une petite pièce de coton peinte.”—Moequet, 77.

“They wear nothing but the langoty, which is a string round the loins, and a piece of cloth about a hand’s breadth fastened to it in front.”—(Ref. lost), p. 23.
LUNKA, n.p. Skt. Lauka. The oldest name of Ceylon in the literature both of Buddhism and Brahmanism. Also ‘an island’ in general.

—, s. A kind of strong cheroot much prized in the Madras Presidency, and so called from being made of tobacco grown in the ‘islands’ (the local term for which is bāk{"i}) of the Godavery Delta.

MA-BĀP, s. ʿĀp mā-bāp hai khudd-a-wand! ‘You, my Lord, are my mother and father!’ This is an address from a native, seeking assistance, or begging release from a penalty, or reluctant to obey an order, which the young sāhib hears at first with astonishment, but soon as a matter of course.

MABAR, n.p. The name given in the Middle Ages by the Arabs to that coast of India which we call Coromandel. The word is Ar. ma’bar, ‘the ferry or crossing-place.’ It is not clear how the name came to be applied, whether because the Arab vessels habitually touched at its ports, or because it was the place of crossing to Ceylon, or lastly whether it was not an attempt to give meaning to some native name. [The Madras Gloss, says it was so called because it was the place of crossing from Madura to Ceylon; also see Logan, Malabar, i. 280.] We know no occurrence of the term earlier than that which we give from Abdallatif.

c. 1203. — “I saw in the hands of an Indian trader very beautiful mats, finely woven and painted on both sides with most pleasing colours. . . . The merchant told me . . . that these mats were woven of the Indian plantain . . . and that they sold in Mabar for two dinars apiece.”—AbdAllatif, Relation de l’Egypie, p. 31.

1279-86. — In M. Pauthier’s notes on Marco Polo very curious notices are extracted from Chinese official annals regarding the communications, in the time of Kublai Kaan, between that Emperor and Indian States, including Ma-pa-rh. (See pp. 600-605).

c. 1292. — “When you leave the Island of Seluan and sail westward about 60 miles, you come to the great province of Maabar, which is styled India the Greater: it is the best of all the Indies, and is on the mainland.”—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 16.

c. 1300. — “The merchants export from Maabar silken stuffs, aromatic roots; large pearls are brought from the sea. The productions of this country are carried to Trık, Khorásán, Syria, Russia, and Europe.” —Robb-Ruddalyn, in Elliot, i. 69.

1303. — “In the beginning of this year (703 H.), the Maliki-Azam, Taki‘-d-din . . . departed from the country of Hind to the passage (ma’bar) of corruption. The King of Maabar was anxious to obtain his property and wealth, but Malik Mu‘az‘am Sirajü-d-din, son of the deceased, having secured his goodwill, by the payment of 200,000 dinars, not only obtained the wealth, but rank also of his father.”—Wassaf, in Elliot, ii. 45.

c. 1310. — “The country of Maabar, which is so distant from Delhi that a man travelling with all expedition could only reach it after a journey of 12 months, there the arrow of any holy warrior had not yet reached.”—Louis Kobe, in Elliot, iii. 55.

c. 1330. — “The third port (of India) is Maabar, which begins some three or four days journey to the eastward of Koulam; this territory lies to the east of Maabar. . . . It is stated that the territory Maabar begins at the Cape Kumhari, a name which applies both to a mountain and a city. . . . Bivyardawal is the residence of the Prince of Maabar, for whom horses are imported from foreign countries.”—Abulfeda, in Géde-merite, p. 155. We regret to see that M. Guyard, in his welcome completion of Reinard’s translation of Abulfeda, absolutely, in some places, substitutes “Coromandel” for “Maabar.” It is French fashion, but a bad one.

a. The name applied by the Portuguese to the small peninsula and the city built on it, near the mouth of Canton River, which they have occupied since 1557. The place is called by the Chinese Ngao-mon (N quo, ‘bay or inlet,’ Môn, ‘gate’). The Portuguese name is alleged to be taken from A-ma-quo, ‘the Bay of Anna,’ i.e. of the Mother, the so-called ‘Queen of Heaven,’ a patroness of seamen. And indeed Amacao is an old form often met with.

c. 1567.—"Hanno i Portoghesi fatta una piciola cittâde in una Isola vicina a’ i siti della China chiamato Machao . . . ma i dati sono del Rê della China, e vanno a pagarli a Canton, bellissima cittâde, e di grande importanza, distante da Machao due giorni e mezzo." — Cesare de’ Federicî, in Ramusio, iii. 391.

c. 1570.—"On the fifth day of our voyage it pleased God that we arrived at . . .
Lampacau, where at that time the Portugals exercised their commerce with the Chinese, which continued till the year 1551, when the Mandarins of Canton, at the request of the Merchants of that Country, gave us the port of Macao, where the trade now is: of which place (that was but a desert land before) our countrymen made a very goodly plantation, wherein there were houses worth three or four thousand Duckats, together with a Cathedral Church . . ." — Pinto, in Coega, p. 315.

1584.—"There was in Machao a religious man of the order of the barefooted friars of S. Francis, who understanding the good and good desire of this king, did sende him by certaine Portugal merchants . . . a cloth whereon was painted the day of judgement and hell, and that by an excellent workman." — Mondaca, i. 384.

1585.—"They came to Amacao, in July, 1555. At the same time it sensibly hapned that Lissian was commanded from the court to procure of the Strangers at Amacao, certaine goodly feathers for the King." — From the Jesuit Accounts, in Purchas, iii. 330.

1599 . . . "Amacao." See under MONSOON.

1602.—"Being come, as heretofore I wrote your Worship, to Macao a city of the Portugals, adjoyning to the firme Land of China, where there is a Colledge of our Company." — Letter from Diego de Pantoia, in Purchas, iii. 350.

[1611.—"There came a Jesuit from a place called Langasack (see LANGASIQUE), which place the Carrack of Amnakau yearly was wont to come." — Danvers, Letters, i. 146.]

1615.—"He adviseth me that 4 Juncks are arrived at Langasaque from Chanchew, which with this ship from Amacau, will cause all matters to be sold cheape." — Cock’s Diary, i. 35.

[ . . . carried them prisoners aboard the great ship of Amacan." — Foster, Letters, iv. 46.]

1625.—"That course continued divers years till the Chinosi growing lesse fearefull, granted them in the greater land a little Peninsule to dwell in. In that place was an Idol, which still remained to be seen, called Amoa, whence the Peninsula was called Amacao, that is Amas Bay." — Purchas, iii. 319.

b. MACAO. MACCAO, was also the name of a place on the Pegu River which was the port of the city so called in the day of its greatness. A village of the name still exists at the spot.

1554.—"The bear (see BAHAR of Macao contains 126 bigas, each biga 100 ticals

1568.—"Si fa commodo il viaggio sino a Macca distante da Pegu dodeci miglia, e qui si starca." — Ces. Federicî, in Ramusio, iii. 395.

1587.—"From Cirion we went to Macao, &e." — R. Fitch, in Hakt. ii. 391. (See DELING.)

1599.—"The King of Arrocan is now ending his business at the Town of Macao, carrying thence the Silver which the King of Tangia had left, exceeding three millions." —
N. Pimenta, in Purchas, iii. 1748.

MACAREO. s. A term applied by old voyagers to the phenomenon of the bore, or great tidal wave as seen especially in the Gulf of Cunmbay, and in the Sitang Estuary in Pegu.
The word is used by them as if it were an Oriental word. At one time we were disposed to think it might be the Skt. word makara, which is applied to a mythological sea-monster, and to the Zodiacal sign Capricorn. This might easily have had a mythological association with the furious phenomenon in question, and several of the names given to it in various parts of the world seem due to associations of a similar kind. Thus the old English word Oegir or Eagre for the bore on the Severn, which occurs in Drayton, "seems to be a reminiscence of the old Scandinavian deity Oegir, the god of the stormy sea."* [This theory is rejected by N.E.D. s.v. Eagre.] One of the Hindi names for the phenomenon is Manilâ, 'The Rain'; whilst in modern Guzerat, according to R.
Drummond, the natives call it ghôrd, "likening it to the war horse, or a squadron of them."† But nothing could illustrate the naturalness of such a figure as makara, applied to the bore, better than the following paragraph in the review-article just quoted (p. 401), which was evidently penned without any allusion to or suggestion of such an Review of Sept. 29, 1883, on Le Marmaret.

origin of the name, and which indeed makes no reference to the Indian name, but only to the French names of which we shall presently speak:

"Compared with what it used to be, if old descriptions may be trusted, the Mascaret is now stripped of its terrors. It resembles the great nature-force which used to ravage the valley of the Seine, like one of the mythical dragons which, as legends tell, laid whole districts waste, about as much as a lion confined in a cage resembles the free monarch of the African wilderness."

Take also the following:

1885.—"Here at his mouth Father Meghna is 20 miles broad, with islands on his breast as large as English counties, and a great tidal bore which made a daily and ever-varying excitement. . . . in deep water, it passed merely as a large rolling billow; but in the shallows it rushed along, roaring like a crested and devouring monster, before which no small craft could live."—Lt. Col. T. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, 161-162.

But unfortunately we can find no evidence of the designation of the phenomenon in India by the name of mausearet or the like; whilst both masearet (as indicated in the quotation just made) and macrê are found in French as terms for the bore. Both terms appear to belong properly to the Garonne, though masearet has of late begun on the Seine to supplant the old term barre, which is evidently the same as our bore. [The N.E.D. suggests O. N. bâre, 'wave.'] Littré can suggest no etymology for masearet; he mentions a whimsical one which connects the word with a place on the Garonne called St. Macaire, but only to reject it. There would be no imposibility in the transfer of an Indian word of this kind to France, any more than in the other alternative of the transfer of a French term to India in such a way that in the 16th century visitors to that country should have regarded it as an indigenous word, if we had but evidence of its Indian existence. The date of Littré's earliest quotation, which we borrow below, is also unfavourable to the probability of transplantation from India. There remains the possibility that the word is Basque. The Saturday Reviewer already quoted says that he could find nothing approaching to Mascaret in a Basque French Dict., but this hardly seems final.

The vast rapidity of the flood-tide in the Gulf of Cambay is mentioned by Mas'tidî, who witnessed it in the year H. 303 (A.D. 915) i. 255 ; also less precisely by Ibn Batutta (iv. 60). There is a paper on it in the Bo. Govt. Selections, N.S. No. xxvi., from which it appears that the bore wave reaches a velocity of 10½ knots. [See also Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 313.]

1558.—"In which time there came hither (to Din) a concourse of many vessels from the Red Sea, the Persian Gulf, and all the coast of Arabia and India, so that the places within the Gulf of Cambay, which had become rich and noble by trade, were by this port undone. And this because it stood outside of the Macareos of the Gulf of Cambay, which were the cause of the loss of many ships."—Barros, H. ii. cap 9.

1563.—"These Sholds (G. of Cambay) are an hundred and four-score miles about in a straight or gulfe, which they call Macareo (Macarae, Macarica) which is as much as to say the race of a Tide."—Master de Frederick, Hdbk. ii. 312; [and comp. ii. 362].

1583.—"And having sailed until the 23d of the said month, we found ourselves in the neighbourhood of the Macareo (of Martabun) which is the most marvellous thing that ever was heard of in the way of tides, and high waters. . . . The water in the channel rises to the height of a high tree, and then the boat is set to face it, waiting for the fury of the tide, which comes on with such violence that the noise is that of a great earthquake, insomuch that the boat is tossed from stem to stern, and carried by that impulse swiftly up the channel."—Gasparo Balbi, f. 91v, 92.

1644.—". . . thence to the Gulf of Cambay with the impetuosity of the currents which are called Macareo, of whose fury strange things are told, insomuch that a stone thrown with force from the hand even in the first speed of its projection does not move more swiftly than those waters run."—Beaver, M.N.

1727.—"A Body of Waters comes rolling in on the Sand, whose Front is above two Fathoms high, and whatever Body lies in its Way it overturns, and no Ship can evade its Force, but in a Moment is overturned, this violent Boer the Natives call a Mackrea."—J. Hamilton, ii. 33 : [ed. 1744, ii. 32].

1811.—Solynus uses the word Macrē as French for 'Fore,' and in English describes his print as "... the representation of a phenomenon of Nature, the Macrée or tide, at the mouth of the river Ongły."—Les Hindous, iii.

MACASSAR, n.p. In Malay Mang-kasar, probably the name of a people of Celebes (q.v.), but now the name of a Dutch seaport and seat of Government on the W. coast of the S.W. peninsula of that spider-like island. The quotation refers to a time when we occupied the place, an episode of Anglo-Indian history almost forgotten.

[1605-6.—"A description of the Island Selobes or Makassar."—Birdwood, Letter Book, 77.]

[1645-4.—... and anon to Gresham College, where, among other good discourse, there was tried the great penoy of Macassa upon a dog, but it had no effect all the time we sat there."—Pepys, Diary, March 15; ed. Whitelaw, iv. 372.]

1816.—"Letters from Macassar of the 20th and 27th of June (1815), communicate the melancholy intelligence of the death of Lt. T. C. Jackson, of the 1st Regt. of Native Bengal Infantry, and Assistant Resident of Macassar, during an attack on a fortified village, dependent on the desolated Raja of Boni."—Is. Journal, i. 297.

a. The crimson net-like mantle, which envelops the hard outer shell of the nutmeg, when separated and dried constitutes the mace of commerce. Hanbury and Flückiger are satisfied that the attempt to identify the Maci, Mace, &c., of Pliny and other ancients with mace is a mistake, as indeed the sagacious Garcia also pointed out, and Chr. Acosta still more precisely. The name does not seem to be mentioned by May-üdi; it is not in the list of aromatics, 25 in number, which he details (i. 367). It is mentioned by Edrisi, who wrote c. 1150, and whose information generally was of much older date, though we do not know what word he uses. The fact that nutmeg and mace are the product of one plant seems to have led to the fiction that clove and cinnamon also came from that same plant. It is, however, true that a kind of aromatic bark was known in the Arab pharmacopoeia of the Middle Ages under the name of kirfad-al-karnful 2 l. or 'bark of clove,' which may have been either a cause of the mistake or a part of it. The mistake in question, in one form or another, prevailed for centuries. One of the authors of this book was asked many years ago by a respectable Mahommadian of Delhi if it were not the case that cinnamon, clove, and nutmeg were the produce of one tree. The prevalence of the mistake in Europe is shown by the fact that it is contradicted in a work of the 16th century (Bodreui, Comment. in Theophrastum, 992); and by the quotation from Funnel.

The name mace may have come from the Ar. basbasa, possibly in some confusion with the ancient macir. [See Skeat, Concise Dict. who gives F. macis, which was confused with M. F. mazer, probably Lat. mace, macir, doubtless of Eastern origin.]

c. 1150.—"On its shores (i.e. of the sea of Sanf or Champa), are the dominions of a King called Mihris, who possesses a great number of populous and fertile islands, covered with fields and pastures, and producing ivory, camphor, nutmeg, mace, clove, aloeswood, cardamon, cubeb, &c."—Edrisi, 1., 79; see also 51.

c. 1347.—"The fruit of the clove is the nutmeg, which we know as the scented nut. The flower which grows upon it is the mace (basbasa). And this is what I have seen with my own eyes."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 248.

c. 1370.—"A great Yie and great Contree, that men elepen Java, ... There growen alle manere of Spicerie more plentifuly liche than in any other contree, as of Gyngever, Clowegyllores, Canelle, Zedewalle, Notermes, and Maces. And wytethel wel, that the Notermuere bereith the Maces. For righte as the Note of the Haselle hath an Husk withouten, that the Note is closed in, till it be ripe, and after falleth out: righte so it is of the Notermuere and of the Maces."—Sir John Manudelle, ed. 1596, p. 157-158. This is a remarkable passage for it is interpolated by Manudelle, from superior information, in what he is borrowing from Odorie. The comparison to the hazel-nut husk is just that used by Hanbury & Flückiger (Pharmacographiæ, 1st ed. 456).

c. 1430.—"Has (insulas Java) ultra xv dierum cursu duae reperientur insulae, orientem versus. Altera Sandali appelata, in qua nucis muscatae at maces, altera Bandam nomino, in qua soli garcinia producuntur."—Conti, in Paggius, De Indi Fortunæ.

1514.—"The tree that produces the nut (meg) and macis is all one. By this ship I send you a sample of them in the green state."—Letter of Gio. da Empoli, in Archiv. stor. Ital. 51.

1563.—"It is a very beautiful fruit, and pleasant to the taste; and you must know that when the nut is ripe it swells, and the first cover bursts as do the husks of our chestnuts, and shows the mace, of a bright vermilion like fine grain (i.e. coccus); it is the most beautiful sight in the world when the trees are loaded with it, and sometimes the mace splits seven, and then that is why the nutmegs often come without the mace."—

Garcia, f. 129r-c-130.

[1602-3. — "In ye Provision you shall make in Nutmeggs and Mace hau you a greate care to receiue such as be good."—

Birdwood, First Letter Book, 36; also see 67.]

1705.—"It is the commonly received opinion that Cloves, Nutmegs, Mace, and Cinnamon all grow upon one tree; but it is a great mistake."—Fawcet, in Bampier, iv. 179.

b. Jav. and Malay mās. [Mr. Skeat writes: "Mās is really short for mādūs or emās, one of those curious forms with prefixed a, as in the case of abada, which are probably native, but may have been influenced by Portuguese."]

A weight used in Sumatra, being, according to Crawford, 1-16th of a Malay tael (q.v.), or about 40 grains (but see below). Mace is also the name of a small gold coin of Achin, weighing 9 grs. and worth about 1s. 1d. And mace was adopted in the language of European traders in China to denominate the tenth part of the Chinese liang or tael of silver; the 100th part of the same value being denominated in like manner candareen (q.v.). The word is originally Skt. māsha, 'a beam,' and then "a particular weight of gold" (comp. CARAT. RUTTEE.)

1592.—"... by intervention of this thirdsman whom the Moor employed as broker they agreed on my price with the merchant at seven mazes of gold, which in our money makes a 1400 reys, at the rate of a half cruzado the maz."—Pinta, cap. xxv.

Cogan has, "the fishermen sold me to the merchant for seven mases of gold, which amounts in our money to seventeen shillings and sixpence."—p. 31.

1651.—"The weight with which they weigh (at Malacca) gold, musk, seed-pearl, coral, calanibuco... consists of catsa which contain 20 tael, each tael 16 mazes, each maze 20 candarungs. Also one panat 4 mazes, one maze 4 cupoids (see KOBANG), one cupido 5 candarungs (see CANDAREEN)."—

A. Macaen, 59.

1625.—"I have also sent by Master Tomkins of their coine (Achin).... that is of gold named a Mas, and is ninepence halfpence nearest."—Capt. T. Davis, in Purchas, i. 117.

1813.—"Milburn gives the following table of weights used at Achin, but it is quite inconsistent with the statements of Crawford and Linschoten above.

This name, Māhā-chīn, "Great China," is one by which China was known in India in the early centuries of our era, and the term is still to be heard in India in the same sense in which Al-Birūnī uses it, saying that all beyond the great mountains (Himalaya) is Māhā-chīn. But "in later times the majority, not knowing the meaning of the expression, seem to have used it pleonastically coupled with Chin, to denote the same thing, Chin and Māchīn, a phrase having some analogy to the way Sīnd and Hind was used to express all India, but a stronger one to Gōy and Mayqay, as applied to the northern nations of Asia." And eventually Chin was discovered to be the eldest son of Japhet, and Māchīn his grandson; which is much the same as saying that Britain was the eldest son of Brut the Trojan, and Great Britain his grandson! (Cathay and the Way Thither, p. cxix.).

In the days of the Mongol supremacy in China, when Chinese affairs were for a time more distinctly conceived in Western Asia, and the name of Māzā as denoting Southern China, unconquered by the Mongols till 1275, was current in the West, it would appear that this name was confounded with Māchīn, and the latter thus acquired a specific but erroneous application. One author of the 16th century also (quoted by Klapproth, J. As. Soc., ser. 2, tom. i. 115) distinguishes Chin and Māchīn as N. and S. China, but this distinction seems never to have been entertained by the Hindus Ibn Batuta sometimes distinguishes Sin (i.e. Chīn) as South China from Khitīt (see CATHAY), as North China. In times when intimacy will China had again ceased, the double-name seems to have recovered its old vagueness as a round way of saying China, and had no more plurality of sense than in modern parlance Sodor and Man. But then comes an occasional new application of Máchin to Indo-China, as in Conti (followed by Fra Mauro). An exceptional application, arising from the Arab habit of applying the name of a country to the capital or the chief port frequented by them, arose in the Middle Ages, through which Canton became known in the West as the city of Machin, or in Persian translation Chínkálán, i.e. Great Chin.

663.—"In what country exists the kingdom of the Great Thang?" asked the king (Silkdíyta of Kanaui), 'how far is it from this?'

'“It is situated," replied he (Hwen Tszang). to the N.E. of this kingdom, and is distant several ten-thousands of li. It is the country which the Indian people call Mahá-chinna."—Pé. Boud.ii. 254-255.

c. 661.—"Móchóchitán." See quotation under CHINA.

c. 1030.—"Some other mountains are called Harmakilt, in which the Ganges has its source. These are impassable from the side of the cold regions, and beyond them lies Machín."—Al-Birúní, in Elliot, i. 46.

1501.—In the Letter of Amerigo Vespucci on the Portuguese discoveries, written from C. Verde, 4th June, we find mention among other regions of Marchin. Published in Baldelli Boni's II Milione, p. 231.

c. 1590.—"Adjoining to Asham is Tibet, bordering upon Khatí, which is properly Mahacheen, vulgarly called Macheen. The capital of Khatí is Khan Baleezh, 4 days' journey from the sea."—From Italidín, ed. 1860, ii. 4: [ed. Jarrett, ii. 115].

[c. 1665.—... you told me... that Persia, Usbech, Kachnzer, Tartary, and Katch, Pegia, Siam, China and Machine (in orig. Tchine et Machine) trembled at the name of the Kings of the Indies."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 155 seq.]

c. 1300.—"Khatí is bounded on one side by the country of Máchin, which the Chinese call Manzi... In the Indian language S. China is called Mahá-chin, i.e. Great China," and hence we derive the word Manzi."—Rashid-ul-din, in II. des Mongols Quatremère, xi. xcii. xciii.

c. 1314.—"It was the Kaam's orders that we should proceed through Manzi, which was formerly known as Indie Maxima" (by which he indicates Mahá-Chíná, see below, in last quotation).—John Marignolli, in * Cathay*, p. 364.

Applied to Indo-China:

c. 1430.—"Et provincia (Ava)—Maci-nunum inoëae dicit—... referia est elephanta."—Conti, in Raggiol. De Var. Forinary.

Chin and Machin:

c. 1520.—"The curiosities of Chin and Máchin, and the beautiful products of Hind and Sind,"—Wassaf, in Elliot, iii. 32.

c. 1440.—"Poi si retrova in quella istessa provincia di Sagatai Sammarcate città grandissima e ben popolata, per la quall vanno e vengono tutti quelli di Cini e Macini e del Cataio, o mercanti o viandanti che siano."—Barbara, in Rommers, ii. f. 106v.

c. 1442.—"The merchants of the 7 climates from Egypt... from the whole of the realms of Chin and Machin, and from the city of Kánbalik, steer their course to this port."—Abdurnasch, in Notices et Extraits, iv. 429.

[1508.—"Sin and Masin." See under JAVA.]

Maháchin or Chin Kalán, for Canton.

c. 1030.—In Spruner's extracts from Al-Birúní we have "Shangpó, in Chinese San-fu. This is Great China (Mahásejn)."—Post und Reise-roman des orient, 90.

c. 1390.—"This canal extends for a distance of 40 days' navigation from Khán-balíkh to Khingsul and Zaïtun, the ports frequented by the ships that come from India, and from the city of Machín."—Rashid-ul-din, in Cathay, &c., 259-260.

c. 1332.—... after I had sailed eastward over the Ocean Sea for many days I came to that noble province Manzi... The first city to which I came in this country was called Cens-Kalan, and 'tis a city as big as three Venices."—Dyoric, in Cathay, &c., 103-105.

c. 1347.—"In the evening we stopped at another village, and so on till we arrived at Sin-Kalán, which is the city of Sin-ul-Sin... one of the greatest of cities, and one of those that has the finest of bazaars. One of the largest of these is the porcelain bazaar, and from it china-ware is exported to the other cities of China, to India, and to Yemen."—* Ibn Batuta*, iv. 272.

c. 1349.—"The first of these is called Manzi, the greatest and noblest province in the world, having no paragon in beauty, pleasantness, and extent. In it is that noble city of Campsay, besides Zayton. Cynkalan, and many other cities."—John Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., 373.

MÁCHIS. s. This is recent Hind. for 'lucifer matches.' An older and purer phrase for sulphur-matches is dívā, dívā-salātī.

cloth, and which often occurs in prices current, is taken from the name of a place on the Southern Delta-branch of the Godavery, properly Madhavapalām. [Tel. Madāhravaya-pālēm, 'fortified village of Madhava']. This was till 1833 [according to the Madras Gloss. 1827] the seat of one of the Company's Commercial Agencies, which was the chief of three in that Delta; the other two being Bunder Malunka and Injeram. Madapollam is now a staple export from England to India; it is a finer kind of white piece-goods, intermediate between calico and muslin.

1673.—"The English for that cause (the unhealthiness of Masulipatam), only at the time of shipping, remove to Madapolam, where they have a wholesome Seat Forty Miles more North."—Fryer, 35.

[1681-85.—"Mr. Benj. Northey bringing up Masters of the Madapolam Cloth, itt is thought convenient that the same be taken of him."
—Pringle's Diary F. T. St. Geo. 1st ser. iv. 49.]

1689.—"Pierrette cêt de jolies chemises en Madapolam."—Balzac, Pierrette.

1679.—"...liveliness seems to be the unfailing characteristic of autograph, fans, Cremona fiddles, Louis Quatorze snuff-boxes, and the like, however sluggish pig-iron and Madapolam's may be."—Sat. Review, Jan. 11, p. 45.

MADRAXAO, s. This appears in old Portuguese works as the name of a gold coin of Guzerat; perhaps representing Muzaffar-shahī. There were several kings of Guzerat of this name. The one in question was probably Muzaffar-Shah II. (1511-1525), of whose coinage Thomas mentions a gold piece of 185 grs. (Pathain Kings, 353).

1654.—"There also come to this city Madravoxas, which are a money of Cambay, which vary greatly in price; some are of 24 tangas of 60 reis the tanga, others of 23, 22, 21, and other prices according to time and value."—A. Navez, 32.

MADRAS, n.p. This alternative name of the place, officially called by its founders Fort St. George, first appears about the middle of the 17th century. Its origin has been much debated, but with little result. One derivation, backed by a fictitious legend, derives the name from an imaginary Christian fisherman called Madarasen; but this may be pronounced philologically impossible, as well as otherwise unworthy of serious regard.* Lassen makes the name to be a corruption of Manda-rāja, 'Realm of the Stupid!' No one will suspect the illustrious author of the Indische Alterthumskunde to be guilty of a joke; but it does look as if some malign Bengalee had suggested to him this gibe against the "Benighted"! It is indeed curious and true that, in Bengal, sepoys and the like always speak of the Southern Presidency as Madrāj. In fact, however, all the earlier mentions of the name are in the form of Madraspatnam, 'the city of the Madras,' whatever the Madras may have been. The earliest maps show Madraspatnam as the Mahommedan settlement corresponding to the present Trichinopoly and Rajapetah. The word is therefore probably of Mahommedan origin; and having got so far we need not hesitate to identify it with Madrasa, 'a college.' The Portuguese wrote this Madaraza (see Faria y Sousa, Africa Portuguesa, 1681, p. 6); and the European name probably came from them, close neighbours as they were to Fort St. George, at Mylapore or San Thomé. That there was such a Madrassa in existence is established by the quotation from Hamilton, who was there about the end of the 17th century.† Fryer's Map (1698, but illustrating 1672-73) represents the Governor's House as a building of Mahommedan architecture, with a dome. This may have been the Madras itself. Lockyer also (1711) speaks of a "College," of which the building was "very ancient"; formerly a hospital, and then used apparently as a residence for young writers. But it is not clear whether the name "College" was not given on this last account. [The Madras Admin. Mon says: "The origin of this name has been much discussed. Madrisa, a Mahommedan school, has been suggested, which considering the date at which the name is first found seem fanciful. Manda is in Sanscrit slow Mandara was a king of the lunar race.

* It is given in No. 11. of Selections from Records of S. A. Dist. p. 107.
† In a letter from poor Arthur Burnell, to which this paragraph is founded, he adds: "It is sad that the most Philistine town (in the German sense) in all the East should have such a name.
The place was probably called after this king" (ii. 91). The Madras Gloss. again writes: "Hind. Madras, Can. Madaradisam, from Tel. Mandaradzhu, name of a local Telugu Rover," or ruler. The whole question has been discussed by Mr. Pringle (Diary Fl. St. Geo., 1st ser. i. 106 seqq.). He points out that while the earliest quotation given below is dated 1653, the name, in the form Madraspatam, is used by the President and Council of Surat in a letter dated 29th December, 1640 (J. O. Records, O. C. No. 1764); "and the context makes it pretty certain that Francis Day or some other of the factors at the new Settlement must have previously made use of it in reference to the place, or 'rather,' as the Surat letter says, 'plot of ground' offered to him. It is no doubt just possible that in the course of the negotiations Day heard or caught up the name from the Portuguese, who were at the time in friendly relations with the English; but the probabilities are certainly in the opposite direction. The ngal from whom the plot was obtained must almost certainly have supplied the name, or what Francis Day conceived to be the name. Again, as regards Hamilton's mention of a 'college,' Sir H. Yule's remark certainly goes too far. Hamilton writes, 'There is a very Good Hospital in the Town, and the Company's Horse-stables are neat, but the Old College where a good many Gentlemen Factors are obliged to lodge, is ill-kept in repair.' This remark taken together with that made by Lockyer ... affords proof, indeed, that there was a building known to the English as the 'College.' But it does not follow that this, or any, building was distinctively known to Muslims as the 'madrasa.' The 'old College' of Hamilton may have been the successor of a Muslim 'madrasa' of some size and consequence, and if this was so the argument for the derivation would be strengthened. It is however equally possible that some old buildings within the plot of territory acquired by Day, which had never been a 'madrasa,' was turned to use as a College or place where the young writers should live and receive instruction; and in this case the argument, so far as it rests on a mention of 'a College' by Hamilton and Lockyer, is entirely destroyed. Next as regards the probability that the first part of 'Madraspatanam' is of Mahommedan origin, Sir H. Yule does not mention that date of the maps in which Madraspatanam is shown 'as the Mahommedan settlement corresponding to the present Triplicane and Royapettah'; but in Fryer's map, which represents the fort as he saw it in 1679, the name 'Madrossa'—to which is added 'the Indian Town with flat houses'—is entered as the designation of the collection of houses on the north side of the English town, and the next makes it evident that in the year in question the name of Madras was applied chiefly to the crowded collection of houses styled in turn the 'Heathen,' the 'Malabar,' and the 'Black' town. This consideration does not necessarily disprove the supposed Musulman origin of Madras,' but it undoubtedly weakens the chain of Sir H. Yule's argument." Mr. Pringle ends by saying: "On the whole it is not unfair to say that the chief argument in favour of the derivation adopted by Sir H. Yule is of a negative kind. There are fatal objections to whatever other derivations have been suggested, but if the mongrel character of the compound 'Madraspatanam' is disregarded, there is no fatal objection to the derivation from 'madrasa.' If however that derivation is to stand, it must not rest upon such accidental coincidences as the use of the word 'College' by writers whose knowledge of Madras was derived from visits made from 30 to 50 years after the foundation of the colony."
chiefly garrisoned by Torpases and Misties; from this place they annually send forth their ships, as also from Suratt."—Buddaeus, Germ. ed. 152.

1673.—"Let us now pass the Palk to the Heathen Town, only parted by a wide Parade, which is used for a Bazaar, or Mercate-place. Madras then divides itself into divers long streets, and they are chequered by as many transverse. It enjoys some Choutries for Places of Justice; one Exchange; one Papad. ..."—Freret, 38-39.

1727.—"Fort St. George or Maderaas, or as the Natives call it, China Petam, is a Colony and City belonging to the English East India Company, situated in one of the most incommodious Places I ever saw. There is a very good Hospital in the Town, and the Company's Horse-Stables are neat, but the Old College, where a great many Gentlemen Factors are obliged to lodge, is kept in ill Repair."—A. Hamilton, i. 364, (ed. 1744, ii. 182.) (Also see CHINAPATAM.)

MADRAS, s. This name is applied to large bright-coloured handkerchiefs, of silk warp and cotton woof, which were formerly exported from Madras, and much used by the negroes in the W. Indies as head-dresses. The word is preserved in French, but is now obsolete in England.

e. 1890.—"... We found President Petion, the black Washington, sitting on a very old ragged sofa, amidst a confused mass of papers, dressed in a blue military undress frock, white trousers, and the ever-lasting Madras handkerchief bound round his brows."—Tom Cringle, ed. 1863, p. 425.

1846.—"Et Madame se manifeste! C'était une de ces vieilles dévines par Adrien Brauwer dans ses sorcières pour le Sabbat ... coiffée d'un Madras, faisant encore papillottes avec les imprimés, que recevait gratuitement son maître."—Balaix, Le Cousin Pons, ch. xvii.

MADREMALUCO, n.p. The name given by the Portuguese to the Mahommedan dynasty of Benar, called 'Imad-ul-Mulk. The Portuguese name represents the title of the founder 'Imad-ul-Mulk, ('Pillar of the State'), otherwise Fath Ulah 'Imad Shiah. The dynasty was the most obscure of those founded upon the dissolution of the Bahmani monarchy in the Deccan. (See COTAMALUCO, IDALCAN, MELIQUE VERIDO, NIZAMALUCO, SABAIO.) It began about 1484, and in 1572 was merged in the kingdom of Ahmednagar. There is another Madremalucu (or 'Imad-ul-Mulk) much spoken of in Portuguese histories, who was an important personage in Guzerat, and put to death with his own hand the king Sikandar Shah (1526) (Barros, IV. v. 3; Correa, ii. 272, 344, &c.; Couto, Decs. v. and vi. passim).

1553.—"The Madre Maluco was married to a sister of the Hidalcan (see IDALCAN), and the latter treated this brother-in-law of his, and Mieque Verido as if they were his vassals, especially the latter."—Barros, IV. vii. 1.

1563.—"The Imadmalucu or Madremalucu, as we corruptly style him, was a Circassian (Cherques) by nation, and had originally been a Christian, and died in 1546. ... Imad is as much as to say 'prop,' and thus the other (of these princes) was called Imadmalucu, or 'Prop of the Kingdom.' ..."—Garcia, f. 36v.

Neither the chronology of De Orta here, nor the statement of Imad-ul-Mulk's Circassian origin, agree with those of Frishta. The latter says that Fath-Ulah Imad Shiah was descended from the heathen of Bijanagar (iii. 485).

MADURA, n.p., properly Maduré, Tam. Mathurá. This is still the name of a district in S. India, and of a city which appears in the Tables of Ptolemy as "Μαδούρα βασιλείων Βανδώνος." The name is generally supposed to be the same as that of Mathurá, the holy and much more ancient city of Northern India, from which the name was adopted (see MUTTRA), but modified after Tamil pronunciation.* [On the other hand, a writer in J.R. As. Soc. (xiv. 578, n. 3) derives Madura from the Dravidian Madur in the sense of 'Old Town,' and suggests that the northern Mathura may be an offshoot from it.] Madura was, from a date, at least as early as the Christian era, the seat of the Pandya sovereigns. These, according to Tamil tradition, as stated by Bp. Caldwell, had previously held their residence at Kolli near the Tamraparni, the Kole of Ptolemy. (See Caldwell, pp. 16, 95, 101.) The name of Madura, probably as adopted from the holier northern Muttra, seems to have been a favourite among the Eastern settlements under Hindu influence. Thus we have

* This perhaps implies an earlier spread of northern influence than we are justified in assuming.
Matura in Ceylon; the city and island of Madora adjoining Java; and a town of the same name (Madora) in Burma, not far north of Mandalé, Madeya of the maps.

[c. 1315.—"Mardi." See CRORE.]

Madora, the name is said to be Magpad-el-Shata, "Harbour of the Sheep," and the first syllable has been identified with that of Magdala and is said to mean "door" in some of the Galla dialects (Notes & Queries, 9 ser. ii. 193, 310. Also see Mr. Gray's note on Pyrard, Hak. Soc. i. 29, and Dr. Burnell on Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 19.)

c. 1330.—"On departing from Zaila, we sailed on the sea for 15 days, and then arrived at Makedshau, a town of great size. The inhabitants possess a great number of camels, and of these they slaughter (for food) several hundreds every day."—Ibn Batuta, li. 151.

1485.—"And we found ourselves before a great city with houses of several stories, and in the midst of the city certain great palaces; and about it a wall with four towers; and this city stood close upon the sea, and the Moors call it Magadoxo. And when we were come well abreast of it, we discharged many bombardas (at it), and kept on our way along the coast with a fine wind on the poop."—Retiro, 102.

1505.—"And the Viceroy (Don Francisco D'Almeida) made sail, ordering the course to be made for Magadoxo, which he had instructions also to make tributary. But the pilots objected saying that they would miss the season for crossing to India, as it was already the 26th of August."—Correia, i. 500.

1514.—"... The most of them are Moors such as inhabit the city of Zofalla ... and these people continue to be found in Mazambic, Melinda, Mogodecio, Marchilhinn (read Brava Chilve, i.e. Brava and Quibou), and Mombaza; which are all walled cities on the main land, with houses and streets like our own: except Mazambich."—Letter of Gio. da Empoli, in Archiv. Stor. Ital.

1516.—"Further on towards the Red Sea there is another very large and beautiful town called Magadoxo, belonging to the Moors, and it has a King over it, and is a place of great trade and merchandise."—Barbosa, 16.

1532.—"... and after they had passed Cape Guardafui, Dom Esteão was going along in such depression that he was like to die of grief, on arriving at Magadoxo, they stopped to water. And the King of the country, hearing that there had come a son of the Count Admiral, of whom all had ample knowledge as being the first to discover and navigate on that coast, came to the shore to see him, and made great offers of all that he could require."—Conte, iv. viii. 2.

1727.—"Magadoxo, or as the Portuguese call it, Magadocia, is a pretty large City, about 2 or 3 Miles from the Sea, from whence it has a very fine Aspect, being adorn'd with many high Steeples and Mosques."—A. Hamilton, i. 12-13, [ed. 1744].
MAHÁJUN, s. Hind. from Skt. maha-jan, 'great person.' A banker and merchant. In Southern and Western India the vernacular word has various other applications which are given in Wilson.

MAGAZINE, s. This word is, of course, not Anglo-Indian, but may find a place here because of its origin from Ar. makhāţīn, plur. of al-makhkan, whence Sp. almacein, almacenes, magazen, Port. almazem, armazem, Ital. magazzino, Fr. magasin.

c. 1310.—"The Sultan . . . made him a grant of the whole city of Sirî and all its houses with the gardens and fields of the treasury (makhzan) adjacent to the city (of Delhi)."—Don Batuta, iii. 262.

1539.—"A que Pero de Faria responden, que lhe desse elle commissão per mandar nos almazes, et que logo proveria no socorro que entendia ser necessário."—Pinto, cap. xxi.

MAHÁJAN, s. Hind. from Skt. mahan, 'great,' made the river Gazzino, whence the name of the French Mahé, being one of the names of Labourdonnais. A small settlement on the Malabar coast, 4 m. S.E. of Tellicherry, where the French established a factory for the sake of the pepper trade in 1722, and which they still retain. It is not now of any importance.

MAHI, n.p. The name of a considerable river flowing into the upper part of the Gulf of Cambay. "[The height of its banks, and the fierceness of its floods; the deep gullies through which the traveller has to pass on his way to the river, and perhaps, above all, the bad name of the tribes on its banks, explain the proverb: 'When the Mahi is crossed, there is comfort'" (Imp. Gazetteer, s.v.).

MAHOUT, s. The driver and tender of an elephant. Hind. mahout, from Skt. mahâ-matra, 'great in measure,' a high officer, &c., so applied. The Skt. term occurs in this sense in the Mahabharata (e.g. iv. 1761, &c.). The Mahout is mentioned in the 1st Book of Maccabees as the Indian. It is remarkable that we find what is apparently mahat-matra, in the sense of a high officer in Hesychius:

c. 1590.—"Most elephants (see MUST). There are five and a half servants to each, viz., first a Mahout, who sits on the neck of the animal and directs its movements. . . . He gets 200 dâmas per month. . . . Secondly a Bhî, who sits behind, upon the rump of the elephant, and assists in battle, and in quickening the speed of the animal; but he often performs the duties of the Mahout. . . . Thirdly the Melâs (see MATE). A Melâ fetches fodder, and assists in caparisoning the elephant. . . ."—An, ed. Blochmann, i. 125.

1826.—"I will now pass over the term of my infancy, which was employed in learning to read and write—my preceptor being a mahoulhet, or elephant-driver—and will take up my adventures."—Pandurang Hari, 21; [ed. 1873, i. 28].

1848.—"Then he described a tiger hunt, and the manner in which the Mahout of his elephant had been pulled off his seat by one of the infuriate animals."—Thackeray, Vanity Fair, ch. iv.

MAHÁRATTA, n.p. Hind. Mahr̄atta, Maharatta, Maharâta (Marathī, Marahtī, Marhattī), and Maruthul. The name of a famous Hindu race, from the old Skt. name of their country, Mahā-rāṣṭra, 'Magna Regio.' [On the other hand H. A. Aeworth (Ballads of the Marathas, Intro. vi.) derives the word from a tribal name Rathí or Rathā, 'chariot fighters,' from rath, 'a chariot,' thus Mahā-Rathā means 'Great Warrior.' This was transferred to the country and finally Sanskritised into Mahā-rāṣṭrapa. Again some authorities (Wilson, Indian Lists, ii. 48; Baden-Powell, J. R. As. Soc., 1897, p. 249, note) prefer to derive the word from the Mahrā or Mahrā, a once numerous and dominant race. —Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

The following is in the true Hobson-Jobson manner:

1850.—'This term Marhatta or Marhutta, is derived from the mode of warfare adopted by these men. Mar means to strike, and hutta, to get out of the way, i.e. those who struck a blow suddenly and at once retreated out of harm's way.'—H. Dundas Robertson, District Notices during the Recall in 1857, p. 104, note.]

MAHRATTA DITCH. n.p. An excavation made in 1742, as described in the extract from Orme, on the N. S. side of Calcutta, to protect the settlement from the Mahratta bands. Hence the term, or for shortness 'The Ditch' simply, as a disparaging name for Calcutta (see Ditcher). The line of the Ditch corresponded nearly with the outside of the existing Circular Road, except at the S. and S.E., where the work was never executed. [There is an excavation known by the same name at Madras excavated in 1780. (Murray, Handbook, 1859, p. 43.)]

1742.—'In the year 1742 the Indian inhabitants of the Colony requested and obtained permission to dig a ditch at their own expense, round the Company's bounds, from the northern parts of Sootanatty to the southern part of Gavingore. In six months three miles were finished: when the inhabitants . . . discontinued the work, which from the occasion was called the Morattoe ditch.'—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 43.

1755.—'That the Bounds of Calcutta are to extend the whole Circle of Ditch dug upon the Invasion of the Maraties: also 900 yards without it, for an Esplanade.'—Articles of Agreement sent by Colonel Clive (previous to the Treaty with the Nabob of May 13). MAHSEER, MASEER, MAISTRY, MISTRY.

MAHSEER, MASEER, MAHAL, &c. Hind. mahāsar, mahēser, mahāsaila, s. The name is applied to perhaps more than one of the larger species of Barbus (N.O. Cyprinidae), but especially to B. Mosul of Buchanan, B. Tor, Day, B. megalops, McClelland, found in the larger Himalayan rivers, and also in the greater perennial rivers of Madras and Bombay. It grows at its largest, to about the size of the biggest salmon, and more. It affords also the highest sport to Indian anglers; and from these circumstances has sometimes been called, misleadingly, the 'Indian salmon.' The origin of the name Mahseer, and its proper spelling, are very doubtful. It may be Skt. maha-siras, 'big-head,' or maha-salka, 'large-scaled.' The latter is most probable, for the scales are so large that Buchanan mentions that playing cards were made from them at Dacca. Mr. H. S. Thomas suggests maha-asaga, 'great mouth.' [The word does not appear in the ordinary dictionaries; on the whole, perhaps the derivation from maha-siras is most probable.]

c. 1809. "The Masal of the Kosi is a very large fish, which many people think still better than the Rohu, and compare it to the salmon."—Buchanan, Eastern India, iii. 191.

1822. "Mahasula and Tor, variously altered and corrupted, and with various additions may be considered as genuine appellations, amongst the natives for these fishes, all of which frequent large rivers."—F. Buchanan Hamilton, Fishes of the Ganges, 304.

1873. "In my own opinion and that of others whom I have met, the Mahseer shows more sport for its size than a salmon."—H. S. Thomas, The Rod in India, p. 9.

MAINATO, s. Tam. Mal. Mainittla, a washerman or dhoby (q.v.).

1516. "There is another sect of Gentiles which they call Mainatos, whose business it is to wash the clothes of the Kings, Bramins, and Naires; and by this they get their living; and neither they nor their sons can take up any other business."—Barbosa, Lisbon ed., 334.

c. 1542. "In this inclosure do likewise remain all the Landresses, by them called Maynates, which wash the linnen of the City (Pequim), who, as we were told, are above an hundred thousand."—Pinto, in Cogan, p. 133. The original (cap. ev.) has bodas or mainatos, whose sex Cogan has changed.

1554. "And the farm (renda) of mainatlos, which farm prohibits any one from washing clothes, which is the work of a mainato, except by arrangement with the farmer (Rendeiro). . . ."—Tombo, &c., 53.

1598. "There are some among them that do nothing else but wash clothes; . . . they are called Maynatos."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 260.

1614. (Expenses of Daman) "For two maynatos, three water boats (bois de aqoo), one sambre-ro hoyn, and 4 torch bearers for the said Captain, at 1 xerafin each a month, comes in the year 36,000 rês or m. 00120.0.00."—Tourro, MS. f. 181.

MAISTRY, MISTRY, sometimes even MYSTERY, s. Hind. mistri. This word, a corruption of the Portuguese mestre, has spread into the vernaculars all over India, and is in constant Anglo-Indian use. Properly 'a foreman,' 'a master-workman'; but used also, at least in Upper India, for any artisan, as rai-mistri (properly Pers. riz), 'a mason or bricklayer,' hothar-mistri, 'a blacksmith,' &c. The proper use of the word, as noted above, corresponds precisely to the definition of the Portuguese word, as applied to artisans in Bluteau: "Artifice que sabe bem o seu ofício. Peritus artifices . . . Opifer, alienorum operum inspexor." In W. and S. India maistry, as used in the household, generally means the cook, or the tailor. (See CALEFA.)

Mastër (Mæstër) is also the Russian term for a skilled workman, and has given rise to several derived adjectives. There is too a similar word in modern Greek, μαγίστρος.

1691. "And in these (chambers) there were works of gold and azure and of many other colours, made in the most marvellous way; insomuch that even in Paris whence come the subtle maestros, it would be reckoned beautiful to see."—Chas. [Iv. (Comp. Merckhan, p. 125).]

very light for fast rowing, and were greatly admired. But he ordered them to be burned, saying that he intended to show the Moors that we knew how to build better catars than they did; and he sent for Mestre Vyne the Genoese, whom he had brought to build galleys, and asked him if he could build boats that would row faster than the Malabar paroes (see PROW). He answered: 'Sir, I'll build you brigantines fast enough to catch a mosquito. . .'—Correa, ii. 830.

[1548.—'He ordered to be collected in the smithies of the dockyard as many smiths as could be had, for he had many misteres.'—Ibid. iv. 665.]

1800.—'I have not yet been able to remedy the mischief done in my absence, as we have the advantage here of the assistance of some Madras dubashes and maistres' (ironical).—Wellesley, i. 67.

1839.—'My mind goes back to my ancient Gezanese cook. He was only a maistry, or more vulgarly a bobbery (see Bobachee), yet his sonorous name recalled the conquest of Mexico, or the doubling of the Cape.'—Tribes on My Frontier, 35.

MAJOON, s. Hind, from Ar, mal-jūn, lit. 'kneeded,' and hence what old medical books call 'an elecutary' (i.e. a compound of medicines kneaded with syrup into a soft mass), but especially applied to an intoxicating confection of hemp leaves, &c., sold in the bazaar. [Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 159.] In the Deccan the form is ma-jūn. Moodeen Sheriff, in his Supp. to the Pharmac. of India, writes maqūjūn. "The chief ingredients in making it are ganja (or hemp) leaves, milk, ghee, poppy-seeds, flowers of the thorn-apple (see DATURA), the powder of mux vomica, and sugar" (Quoneen-e-Islam, Gloss. lxxxi.).

1519.—'Next morning I halted . . . and indulging myself with a maqūjūn, made them throw into the water the liquor used for intoxicating fishes, and caught a few fish.'—Babar, 272.

1563.—'And this they make up into an elecutary, with sugar, and with the things above-mentioned, and this they call majū.'—Garcia, f. 27c.

1781.—'Our ill-favoured guard brought in a dose of majū each, and obliged us to eat it . . . a little after sunset the surgeon came, and with him 30 or 40 Caffres, who seized us, and held us fast till the operation (circumcision) was performed.'—Soldier's Letter quoted in Hon. John Lindsay's Journal of Captivity in Mysore, Lives of Lindsay, iii. 263.

1874.—'It (Bhang) is made up with flour and various additions into a sweetmeat or majum of a green colour.'—Hainbury and Flackiger, 403.

MALABAR, n.p.

a. The name of the sea-board country which the Arabs called the 'Pepper-Coast,' the ancient Kerala of the Hindus, the Malabar, or rather Mal-a-bra, of the Greeks (see Tamil), is not in form indigenous, but was applied, apparently, first by the Arab or Arabo-Persian mariners of the Gulf. The substantive part of the name, Malai, or the like, is doubtless indigenous; it is the Dravadian term for 'mountain' in the Sanskritized form Malaya, which is applied specifically to the southern portion of the Western Ghats, and from which is taken the indigenous term Malayalam, distinguishing that branch of the Dravidian language in the tract which we call Malabar. This name—Male or Malai, Malayah, &c.—we find in the earlier post-classic notices of India; whilst in the great Temple-Inscription of Tanjore (11th century) we find the region in question called Malari-nadi (nadi, 'country'). The affix bār appears attached to it first (so far as we are aware) in the Geography of Edrisi (c. 1150). This (Persian i) termination, bār, whatever be its origin, and whether or no it be connected either with the Ar. bār, 'a continent,' on the one hand, or with the Skt. viśva, 'a region, a slope,' on the other, was most assuredly applied by the navigators of the Gulf to other regions which they visited besides Western India. Thus we have Zangi-bār (mod. Zanzibar), 'the country of the Blacks'; Kalâh-bār, denoting apparently the coast of the Malay Peninsula; and even according to the dictionaries, Hindā-bār for India. In the Arabic work which affords the second of these examples (Relation, &c., tr. by Reinward, i. 17) it is expressly explained: 'The word bār serves to indicate that which is both a coast and a kingdom.' It will be seen from the quotations below that in the Middle Ages, even after the establishment of the use of this termination, the exact form of the name as given by foreign travellers and writers, varies considerably. But, from the time of the Portuguese discovery of the Cape route, Malabar, or Malabar, as we have it now, is the persistent form. [Mr. Logan (Manual, I. 1) remarks that the name is not in use in the district itself except among foreigners and English-speaking natives; the ordinary name is Malayalam or Malayam, "the Hill Country].

c. 545.—"The imports to Taprobane are silk, aloeswood, cloves, sandalwood. . . . These again are passed on from Sigelidadha to the marts on this side, such as Malē, where the pepper is grown. . . . And the most notable places of trade are these, Sindu . . . and then the five marts of Malā, from which the pepper is exported, viz., Parti, Mangereth, Salopatana, and Pedapatana."—Cusma, Bk. xi. In Cathay, &c., p. cixviii.

c. 615.—"To the south this kingdom is near the sea. There rise the mountains called Mo-la-yē, with their precipitous sides, and their lofty summits, their dark valleys and their deep ravines. On those mountains grows the white sandalwood."—Hence Tswng, in Julian, iii. 122.

851.—"From this place (Maskat) ships sail for India, and run for Kaulam-Malai: the distance from Maskat to Kaulam-Malai is a month's sail with a moderate wind."—Relation, &c., tr. by Reinard, i. 15. The same work at p. 15 uses the expression "Country of Pepper" (Batal-n-al-Jufud).

890.—"From Sindūn to Malī is five days' journey; in the latter pepper is to be found, also the bamboo."—Ibn Khwāridhā, in Elliot, i. 15.

c. 1050.—"You enter then on the country of Lārūn, in which is Jaimūr (see under CHOUL), then Malīafrag, then Kānchā, then Dravira (see DRAVIDIAN)."—Al-Birūnī, in Reinard, Fragments, 121.

c. 1150.—"Fandurina (see PANDARAN) is a town built at the mouth of a river which comes from Manībar, where vessels from India and Sind cast anchor."—Idem, in Elliot, i. 90.

c. 1200.—"Haris ports here in the delightful spring . . . when the breeze from Malaya is fragrant from passing over the charming locana" (doves).—Gīta Corinida.

1270.—"Malībar is a large country of India, with many cities, in which pepper is produced."—Kauswā, in Gilldemester, 214.

1293.—"You can sail (upon that sea) between these islands and Ormes, and (from Ormes) to those parts which are called (Minbar), is a distance of 2,000 miles, in a direction between south and south-east; then 900 miles between east and south-east from Minbar to Manbar" (see MABAR).—Letter of Fr. John of Montevedio, in Cathay, i. 215.

1298.—"Meilbar is a great kingdom lying towards the west. . . . There is in this kingdom a great quantity of pepper."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 25.

c. 1300.—"Beyond Guzerat are Kankan (see CONCANC) and Tanā; beyond them the country of Malībar, which from the boundary of Karola to Kūlin (probably from Ghirita to Quilon) is 900 parasangs in length."—Rashalnudn, in Elliot, i. 68.

c. 1320.—"A certain traveller states that India is divided into three parts, of which the first, which is also the most westerly, is that on the confines of Kerman and Sind, and is called Guzerat; the second Minibar, or the Land of Pepper, east of Guzerat."—Ibn Bīlīfīda, in Gilldemeister, 184.

c. 1322.—"And now that ye may know how pepper is got, let me tell you that it grewth in a certain empire, whereunto I came to land, the name whereof is Minibar."—Friez Oderiv, in Cathay, &c., 74.

c. 1343.—"After 3 days we arrived in the country of the Mulīabar, which is the country of Pepper. It stretches in length a distance of two months' march along the sea-shore."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 71.

c. 1348-49.—"We embarked on board certain junks from Lower India, which is called Minubar."—John de Maraignollett, in Cathay, 336.

c. 1420-30.—". . . Departing thence he . . . arrived at a noble city called Coelosn. . . . This province is called Melibaria, and they collect in it the ginger called by the name sancū, pepper, brazil-wood, and the cinnamon, called canella grossa."—Cenr. corrected from Jones's tr. in India in XVth Cent. 17-18.

c. 1412.—"The coast which includes Calicut with some neighbouring ports, and which extends as far as (Kaell), a place situated opposite to the Island of Serenib . . . bears the general name of Melibar."—Ahdarrassāz, ibid. 19.

1459.—Fra Mauro's great Map has Milibar.

1514.—"In the region of India called Melibar, which province begins at Goa, and extends to Cape Comedias (Comorin) . . ."—Letter of Gios. da Empoli, 79. It is remarkable to find this Florentine using this old form in 1514.

1516.—"And after that the Moors of Mecca discovered India, and began to navigate near it, which was 610 years ago, they used to touch at this country of Mabbar on account of the pepper which is found there."—Barbona, 102.

1553.—"We shall hereafter describe particularly the position of this city of Calcut, and of the country of Malauar in which it stands."—Barros, Dec. I. iv. c. 6.

In the following chapter he writes Malabar.

1554.—"From Die to the Islands of Dib. Steer first S.S.E., the pole being made by five inches; side towards the land in the direction of E.S.E. and S.E. by E. till you see the mountains of Minibar."—The Mohit, in J. As. Soc. Ben. v. 461.

1577.—The form Malabar is used in a letter from Athanasius Peter III., "Patriarch of the Syrians of Antioch" to the Marquis of Salisbury, dated Cairo, July 15.

b. This word, through circumstances which have been fully elucidated by Bishop Caldwell in his Comparative Grammar (2nd ed. 10-12), from which we give an extract below,* was applied by the Portuguese not only to the language and people of the country thus called, but also to the Tamil language and the people speaking Tamil. In the quotations following, those under A apply, or may apply, to the proper people or language of Malabar (see MALAYALAM); those under B are instances of the misapplication to Tamil, a misapplication which was general (see e.g. in Orme, passim) down to the beginning of the last century, and which still holds among the more ignorant Europeans and Eurasians in S. India and Ceylon.

* "The Portuguese ... sailing from Malabar on voyages of exploration ... made their acquaintance with various places on the eastern or Coromandel Coast ... and finding the language spoken by the fishing and sea-faring classes on the eastern coast similar to that spoken on the western, they came to the conclusion that it was identical with it, and called it in consequence by the same name—viz. Malabar. ... A circumstance which naturally confirmed the Portuguese in their notion of the identity of the people and language of the Coromandel Coast with those of Malabar was that when they arrived at Câel, in Tanâvelly, on the Coromandel Coast ... they found the King of Quilon (one of the most important places on the Malabar Coast) residing there." —Bp. In the following passage the word Malabars is misapplied still further, though by a writer usually most accurate and intelligent:

1860.—"The term 'Malabar' is used throughout the following pages in the comprehensive sense in which it is applied in the Singhalese Chronicles to the continental invaders of Ceylon; but it must be observed that the adventurers in these expeditions, who are styled in the Mahawanso 'domillos,' or Tamils, came not only from... 'Malabar,' but also from all parts of the Peninsula as far north as Cuttack and Orissa."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 353.

MALABAR-CREEPER, s. Argyreia malabarica, Choisy.

[MALABAR EARS, s. The seed vessels of a tree which Ives calls Calapa pulli.

1773.—"From their shape they are called Malabar-Ears, on account of the resemblance they bear to the ears of the women of the Malabar coast, which from the large slit made in them and the great weight of ornamental rings put into them, are rendered very large, and so long that sometimes they touch the very shoulders."—Ives, 365.

MALABAR HILL, n.p. This favourite site of villas on Bombay Island is stated by Mr. Whitworth to have acquired its name from the fact that the Malabar pirates, who haunted this coast, used to lie behind it.

1674.—"On the other side of the great Inlet, to the Sea, is a great Point abutting against Old Woman's Island, and is called Malabar-Hill... the remains of a stupendous Pagod, near a Tank of Fresh Water, which the Malabars visited it mostly for."—Fryer, 68 seq.

[MALABAR OIL, s. "The ambiguous term 'Malabar Oil' is applied to a mixture of the oil obtained from the livers of several kinds of fishes frequenting the Malabar Coast of India and the neighbourhood of Karachi."—Watt, Econ. Dict. v. 113.

MALABAR RITES. This was a name given to certain heathen and superstitious practices which the Jesuits of the Madura, Carnatic, and Mysore Missions permitted to their converts, in spite of repeated prohibitions by the Popes. And though these practices were finally condemned by the Legate Cardinal de Tournon in 1704, they still subsist, more or less, among native Catholic Christians, and especially those belonging to the (so-called) Goa Churches. These practices are generally alleged to have arisen under Father de Nobili ("Robertus de Nobilibus"), who came to Madura about 1606. There can be no doubt that the aim of this famous Jesuit was to present Christianity to the people under the form, as it were, of a Hindu translation!

The nature of the practices of which we speak may be gathered from the following particulars of their prohibition. In 1623 Pope Gregory XV., by a constitution dated 31st January, condemned the following:—1. The investiture of Brahmins and certain other castes with the sacred thread, through the agency of Hindu priests, and with Hindu ceremonies. For these Christian ceremonies were to be substituted; and the thread was to be regarded as only a civil badge. 2. The ornamental use of sandalwood paste was permitted, but not its superstitious use, e.g., in mixture with cowdung ashes, &c., for ceremonial purification. 3. Bathing as a ceremonial purification. 4. The observance of caste, and the refusal of high-caste Christians to mix with low-caste Christians in the churches was disapproved.

The quarrels between Capuchins and Jesuits later in the 17th century again brought the Malabar Rites into notice, and Cardinal de Tournon was sent on his unlucky mission to determine these matters finally. His decree (June 23, 1704) prohibited:—1. A mutilated form of baptism, in which were omitted certain ceremonies offensive to Hindus, specifically the use of 'salvia, sal, et insufflato.' 2. The use of Pagan names. 3. The Hinduizing of Christian terms by translation. 4. Deferring the baptism of children. 5. Infant marriages. 6. The use of the Hindu tali (see TALEE). 7. Hindu usages at marriages. 8. Angury at marriages, by means of a coco-nut. 9. The exclusion of women from churches during certain periods. 10. Ceremonies on a girl's attainment of puberty. 11. The making distinctions between Pariahs and others. 12. The assistance of Christian musicians at heathen ceremonies. 13. The use of ceremonial washings and bathings.
15. The reading and use of Hindu books.

With regard to No. 11 it may be observed that in South India the distinction of castes still subsists, and the only Christian Mission in that quarter which has really succeeded in abolishing caste is that of the Basel Society.

MALABATHRUM. s. There can be very little doubt that this classical export from India was the dried leaf of various species of Cinnamonum, which leaf was known in Skt. as tambala-pattra. Some who wrote soon after the Portuguese discoveries took, perhaps not unnaturally, the pin or betel-leaf for the malabathrum of the ancients; and this was maintained by Dean Vincent in his well-known work on the Commerce and Navigation of the Ancients, justifying this in part by the Ar. name of the betel, tambál, which is taken from Skt. tambala, betel; tambala-pattra, betel-leaf. The tambala-pattra, however, the produce of certain wild spp. of Cinnamonum, obtained both in the hills of Eastern Bengal and in the forests of Southern India, is still valued in India as a medicine and aromatic, though in no such degree as in ancient times, and it is usually known in domestic economy as teját, or corruptly teját, i.e. 'pungent leaf.' The leaf was in the Arabic Materia Medica under the name of sidhaj or sidhají Hindi, as was till recently in the English Pharmacopoeia as Foliurn indicum, which will still be found in Italian drug-shops. The matter is treated, with his usual lucidity and abundance of local knowledge, in the Colloquios of Garcia de Orta, of which we give a short extract. This was evidently unknown to Dean Vincent, as he repeats the very errors which Garcia dissipates. Garcia also notes that confusion of Malabathrum and Foliurn indicum with spikenard, which is traceable in Pliny as well as among the Arab pharmacologists.

The ancients did no doubt apply the name Malabathrum to some other substance, an unguent or solid extract.
Rheedee, we may notice, mentions that in his time in Malabar, oils in high medical estimation were made from both leaves and root of the "wild cinnamon" of that coast, and that from the root of the same tree a camphor was extracted, having several of the properties of real camphor and more fragrance. (See a note by one of the present writers in Cathay, &c., pp. xlv.-xlii.) The name Cinnamonum is properly confined to the tree of Ceylon (C. Zeylanicum). The other Cinnamomum are properly Cassia barks. [See Watt, Econ. Diet. ii. 317 seqq.]

C. A.D. 60.—"Malabathrum étno iotálám-bháron éima tōi 'I'dhíxhí varón φιόλων, πλαύνωμοι útō tēi kátá tēn ómēn, ἐμφρειας, . . . ἵδων γαρ ἐστί γένος φιόλων ἐν τοίς 'I'dhíxhís tēmās, φιόλων ἀν ἐπινιχ-μενον ἰδατί."—Dioscorides, Mat. Med. i. 11.

C. A.D. 70.—"We are beholden to Syria for Malabathrum. This is a tree that beareth leaves rolled up round together, and seeming to the eye withered. Out of which there is drawn and pressed an Olle or perfumes for performers to use . . . And yet there commeth a better kind thereof from India.

. . . The rellish thereof ought to resemble Nardus at the tongue end. The perfume or smell that . . . the leaf yeeldeth when it is boiled in wine, passeth all others. It is strange and monstrous which is observed in the price; for it hath risen from one denler to three hundred a pound."—Pliny, xii. 26, in Ph. Holland.

C. A.D. 90.—". . . Getting rid of the fibrous parts, they take the leaves and double them up into little balls, which they stitch through with the fibres of the withies. And these they divide into three classes.

. . . And thus originate the three qualities of Malabathrum, which the people who have prepared them carry to India for sale."—Periplo, near the end. [Also see Yule, Intro. Gilt, River of Golden Sand, ed. 1853, p. 59.]

1563.—"R. I remember well that in speaking of betel you told me that it was not folium indu, a piece of information of great value to me: for the physicians who put themselves forward as having learned much from these parts, assert that they are the same: and what is more, the modern writers . . . call betel in their works tambal, and say that the Moors give it this name.

"O. That the two things are different as I told you is clear, for Avicenna treats them in two different chapters, viz. in 259, which treats of folium indu, and in 767, which treats of tambal . . ., and the folium indu is called by the Indians Tamalapatra, which the Greeks and Latins corrupted into Malabathrum." &c.—Garcia, ff. 56c, 96.

MALACCA, n.p. The city which gives its name to the Peninsula and the Straits of Malacca, and which was the seat of a considerable Malay monarchy till its capture by the Portuguese under D’Alboquerque in 1511. One naturally supposes some etymological connection between Malaya and Malacca. And such a connection is put forward by De Barros and D’Alboquerque (see below, and also under MALAY). The latter also mentions an alternative suggestion for the origin of the name of the city, which evidently refers to the Ar. malabic, ‘a meeting.’ This last, though it appears also in the Sijava Malaya, may be totally rejected. Crawfurd is positive that the place was called from the word malaka, the Malay name of the Phyllanthus emblica, or emblic Myrobolan (q.v.), ‘a tree said to be abundant in that locality’; and this, it will be seen below, is given by Godinho de Eредia as the etymology, Malaka again seems to be a corruption of the Skt. anala, from anb, ‘acid.’ [Mr. Skeat writes: “There can be no doubt that Crawfurd is right, and that the place was named from the tree. The supposed connection between Malaya and Malaka appears impossible to me, and, I think, would do so to any one acquainted with the laws of the language. I have seen the Malaka tree myself and eaten its fruit. Ridley in his Botanical Lists has laka-laka and malaka which he identifies as Phyllanthus emblica, L. and P. pectinatus Hooker (Euphorbiaceae). The two species are hardly distinct, but the latter is the commoner form. The fact is that the place, as is so often the case among the Malays, must have taken its name from the Sungai Malaka, or Malaka River.”]

In the year 1109, the imperial envoy Cheng Ho brought an order from the emperor and presented to the king three silver seals, he erected a stone and raised the place to a city, after which the land was called the Kingdom of Malacca (Mou-lu-ku).... Tin is found in the mountains... it is cast into small blocks weighing 1 catti 8 taels... ten pieces are bound together with rattan; and form a small bundle, whilst 10 pieces make a large bundle. In all their trading... they use these pieces of tin instead of money.”—Chinese Annals, in Groenewaldt, I, 123.

1498.—“Melequa... is 40 days from Quanzhit with a fair wind... hence proceeds all the clove, and it is worth there 9 cruzados for a balah (q.v.), and likewise nutmeg other 9 cruzados the bahan; and there is much porcelain and much silk, and much tin, of which they make money, but the money is of large size and little value, so that it takes 3 farazalas (see Prazala) of it to make a cruzado. Here too are many large parrots all red like fire.”—Roteiro do 1. do Gutem, 110-111.

1530.—“When we had arrived at the city of Melacha, we were immediately presented to the Sultan, who is a Moor... I believe that more ships arrive here than in any other place in the world...”—Ithake, 129.

1541.—“This Paremiqra gave the name of Malaca to the new colony, because in the language of Java, when a man of Palembang flees away they call him Malaya... Others say that it was called Malaca because of the number of people who came there from one part and the other in so short a space of time, for the word Malaca also signifies to meet... Of these two opinions let each one accept that which he thinks to be the best, for this is the truth of the matter.”—Commentaries of Alboquerque, E.T. by Birch, ii, 79-77.

1546.—“The said Kingdom of Ansyane (see Siam) throws out a great point of land into the sea, which makes there a cape, where the sea returns again towards China to the north; in this promontory is a small kingdom in which there is a large city called Malaca.”—Borbusa, 191.

1553.—“A son of Paramisora called Xa- quem Darxa, (i.e. Niksdor Stak) to form the town of Malaca, to which he gave that name in memory of the banishment of his father, because in his vernacular tongue (Javanese) this was as much as to say ‘banished,’ and hence the people are called Malaisio.”—De Barros, II, vi. 1.

“‘That which he (Alboquerque) regretted most of all was that lost on that vessel, was two lions cast in iron, a first-rate work, and most natural, which the King of China had sent to the King of Malaca, and which King Mahamed had kept, as an honourable possession, at the gate of his Palace, whence Affonso Alboquerque carried them off, as the principal item of his triumph on the capture of the city.”—Ibid. II, vii. 1.
1572.—
"Nem tu menos fugir poderás deste Posto que rica, e posto que assentada Ta no gremio d'a Aurora, onde nasceste, Opulenta ta Malaca nomeada!
Assetas venenosas, que fizesse, Os crisses, com que já te vejo armada, Malais nomorados, Jaos valentes, Todos farás ao Luso obedientes."

_Canões_, x. 44.

By Burton:

"Nor shalt thou 'scape the fate to fall his prize, albeit so wealthy, and so strong thy site there on Aurora's bosom, whence thy rise, thou Home of Opulence, Malaca hight; The poisoned arrows which thine art supplies, the Krises thristing, as I see, for fight, th' enamoured Malay-men, the Javan braves, all of the Lucian shall become the slaves."

1612.—"The Arabs call it Malakat, from collecting all merchants."—_Sijara Malayu_, in _J. Ind. Arch._ v. 322.

MALADOO, s. _Chicken maladoo_ is an article in the Anglo-Indian menu. It looks like a corruption from the French _cuisine_, but of what? [Malako or Manadoo, a lady informs me, is cold meat, such as chicken or mutton, cut into slices, or pounded up and re-cooked in batter. The Port. maldado, 'beaten-up,' has been suggested as a possible origin for the word.]

MALAY, n.p. This is in the Malay language an adjective, Maláyu; thus orang Maláyu, 'a Malay'; tahu [tánah] Maláyu, 'the Malay country'; bahasa [bháusa] Maláyu, 'the Malay language.'

In Javanese the word maláyu signifies 'to run away,' and the proper name has traditionally been derived from this, in reference to the alleged foundation of Malacca by Javanese fugitives; but we can hardly attach importance to this. It may be worthy at least of consideration whether the name was not of foreign, i.e. of S. Indian origin, and connected with the Maláyu of the Peninsula (see under MALABAR). [Mr. Skeat writes: "The tradition given me by Javanese in the Malay States was that the name was applied to Javanese refugees, who peopled the S. of Sumatra. Whatever be the original meaning of the word, it is probable that it started its life-history as a river-name in the S. of Sumatra, and thence became applied to the district through which the river ran, and so to the people who lived there; after which it spread with the Malay dialect until it included not only many allied, but also many foreign, tribes; all Malay-speaking tribes being eventually called Malays without regard to racial origin. A most important passage in this connection is to be found in Leyden's Tr. of the 'Malay Annals' (1821), p. 20, in which direct reference to such a river is made: 'There is a country in the land of Andalish named Paralambang, which is at present denominated Palembang, the raja of which was denominated Damang Lekar Dawn (chief-tenant Broad-leaf), who derived his origin from Raja Sulam (Chulan?), whose great-grandson he was. The name of its river Muartatang, into which falls another river named Sungey Malayu, near the source of which is a mountain named the mountain Sagantang Maha Miru.' Here Palembang is the name of a well-known Sumatran State, often described as the original home of the Malay race. In standard Malay 'Dumang Lekar Dimau' would be 'Démany Lekar Dimau.' Raja Chulan is probably some mythical Indian king, the story being evidently derived from Indian traditions. 'Muartatang' may be a mistake for Muar Tênah, which is a place one heard of in the Peninsula, though I do not know for certain where it is. 'Sungey Malayu' simply means 'River Malau.' 'Sagantang Maha Miru' is, I think, a mistake for Sa-gantang Maha Miru, which is the name used in the Peninsula for the sacred central mountain of the world on which the episode related in the _Annals occurred_" (see Skeat, _Malay Magic_, p. 2).]

It is a remarkable circumstance, which has been noted by Crawfiurd, that a name which appears on Prolemny's Tables as on the coast of the Golden Chersonese, and which must be located somewhere about Maulmain, is Maláoó Káloó, words which in Javanese (Maláyu-Kulon) would signify "Malays of the West." After this the next (possible) occurrence of the name in literature is in the _Geography of Edrisi_, who describes Malai as a great island in the eastern seas, or rather as occupying the position of the Lemuria of Mr. Selater, for (in partial accommodation to the Ptolemaic theory of the Indian Sea) it stretched eastward nearly from the coast of Zinj, i.e. of Eastern Africa, to the vicinity of China. Thus it must be uncertain without further accounts whether it is an adumbration of the great Malay islands (as is on the whole probable) or of the Island of the Malagashe (Madagascar), if it is either. We then come to Marco Polo, and after him there is, we believe, no mention of the Malay name till the Portuguese entered the seas of the Archipelago.

[A.D. 690.—Mr. Skeat notes: "I Tsing speaks of the 'Moio-yu country,' i.e. the district W. or N.W. of Palembang in Sumatra.]"

c. 150.—"The Isle of Malai is very great. . . . The people devote themselves to very profitable trade; and there are found here elephants, rhinoceroses, and various aromatic spices, such as clove, cinnamon, card . . . and nutmeg. In the mountains are mines of gold, of excellent quality . . . the people also have windmills."—Edisi, by Joubert, i. 915.

c. 1273.—A Chinese notice records under this year that tribute was sent from Siam to the Emperor. "The Siamese had long been at war with the Malay, or Malurh, but both nations laid aside their feud and submitted to China."—Notice by Sir T. Wade, in Baring's Siam, i. 72.

c. 1292.—"You come to an Island which forms a kingdom, and is called Malaur. The people have a king of their own, and a peculiar language. The city is a fine and noble one, and there is a great trade carried on there. All kinds of spicery are to be found there."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 8.

c. 1539.—". . . as soon as he had delivered to him the letter, it was translated into the Portuguese out of the Malay language wherein it was written."—Pinto, E.T. p. 15.

1548.—". . . having made a breach in the wall twelve fathoms wide, he assaulted it with 10,000 strangers, Turks, Aligiesas, Moors, Malassas, Adenois, Jao, and Malays."—Ibid. p. 279.

1553.—"And so these Gentiles like the Moors who inhabit the sea-coasts of the Island (Sumatra), although they have each their peculiar language, almost all can speak the Malay of Malaca as being the most general language of those parts."—Barros, ii. i. v. 1.

1610.—"I cannot imagine what the Hollander means, to suffer these Malaysians, Chinasans, and Moors of these countries, and to assist them in their free trade thurow all the Indies, and forbid it their owne servants, countrymen, and Brethern, upon paine of death and losse of goods."—Peter Williamson Florus, in Purchas, i. 321.

[Mr. Skeat writes: "The word Malaya is now often applied by English writers to the Peninsula as a whole, and from this the term Malaysia as a term of wider application (i.e. to the Archipelago) has been coined (see quotation of 1610 above). The former is very frequently miswritten by English writers as 'Malay,' a barbarism which has even found place on the title-page of a book—Travel and Sport in Burma, Siam and Malaya, by John Bradley, London, 1876."

MALAYÁLAM. This is the name applied to one of the cultivated Dravidian languages, the closest in its relation to the Tamil. It is spoken along the Malabar coast, on the Western side of the Ghauts (or Malaya mountains), from the Chandra-giri River on the North, near Mangalore (entering the sea in 12° 29'), beyond which the language is, for a limited distance, Tulu, and then Canarese, to Trevandum on the South (lat. 8° 29'), where Tamil begins to supersede it. Tamil, however, also intertwines with Malayalam all along Malabar. The term Malayalam properly applies to territory, not language, and might be rendered "Mountain region" [See under MALABAR, and Logan, Man. of Malabar, i. 90.]

MALDIVES, MALDIVE ISLDS., n.p. The proper form of this name appears to be Male-diva; not, as the estimable Garcia de Orta says, Male-diva; whilst the etymology which he gives is certainly wrong, hard as it may be to say what is the right one. The people of the islands formerly designated themselves and their country by a form of the word for 'island' which we have in the Skt. dvipa and the Pali dīpā. We find this reflected in the Dīvī of Ammiannus, and in the Dīva and Dība-jāt (Pers. plural) of old Arab geographers, whilst it survives in letters of the 18th century addressed to the Ceylon Government (Dutch) by the Sultan of the Isles, who calls his kingdom Dīvēhi Rāja, and his people Divēhi mibun. Something like the modern form first appears in Ibn Batuta. He, it will be seen, in his admirable account of these islands, calls them, as it were, Mahal-dives, and says they were so called from the chief group Mahal, which was the residence of the Sultan, indicating a connection with Mahal, 'a palace.' This form of the name looks like a foreign 'striving after meaning.' But Pyrard de Laval, the author of the most complete account in existence, also says that the name of the islands was taken from Mālē, that on which the King resided. Bishop Caldwell has suggested that these islands were the dives, or islands, of Male', as Malēbar (see MALABAR) was the coast-tract or continent, of Male'. It is, however, not impossible that the true etymology was from malīd, 'a garland or necklace,' of which their configuration is highly suggestive.

The Madras Gloss gives Malavāl, malī, 'black,' and dīripa, 'island,' from the dark soil. For a full account of early notices of the Maldives, see Mr. Gray's note on Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 423 seqq. Milburn (Or. Commerc.e. i. 335) says: 'This island was (these islands were) discovered by the Portuguese in 1507. Let us see!

c. 545.—'And round about it (Sitakula or Taprobana, i.e. Ceylon) there are a number of small islands, in all of which you find fresh water and coco-nuts. And these are almost all set close to one another.'—Chamias, in Cathay, &c., cxxvii.

831.—'Between this Sea (of Hormand) and the Sea called Laravī there is a great number of isles: their number, indeed, it is said, amounts to 1,000: ... the distance from island to island is 2, 3, or 4 parasangs. They are all inhabited, and all produce coco-palms ... The last of these islands is Serendib, in the Sea of Hormand: it is the chief of all: they give the islands the name of Dibajāt' (i.e. Dibas).—Relation, &c., tr. by Reinaud. i. 4-5.

c. 1030.—'The special name of Diva is given to islands which are formed in the sea, and which appear above water in the form of accumulations of sand; these sands continually augment, spread, and unite, till they present a firm aspect ... these islands are divided into two classes, according to the nature of their staple product. Those of one class are called Diva-Kāza, (or the Cowry Divas), because of the cowries which are gathered from coco-branches planted in the sea. The others are called Diva-Kanbār, from the word kābār (see GOIR), which is the name of the twine made from coco-fibres, with which vessels are stitched.'—Al-Brāeni, in Reinaud, Fragmens, 124.

1150.—See also Edisi, in Jaubert's Transl. i. 68. But the translator prints a bad reading, Rabibhāt, for Dibajāt.

c. 1343.—'Ten days after embarking at Calecut we arrived at the Islands called Dhibat-al-Mahāl. ... These islands are reckoned among the wonders of the World; there are some 2000 of them. Groups of a hundred, or not quite so many, of these islands are found clustered into a ring, and each cluster has an entrance like a harbour-mouth, and it is only there that ships can enter. ... Most of the trees that grow on these islands are coco-palms. ... They are divided into regions or groups ... among which are distinguished ... 3' Mahāl, the group which gives a name to the whole, and which is the residence of the Sultans.'—Ibn Batuta, iv. 110 seqq.

1503.—'But Dom Vasco ... said that things must go on as they were to India, and there he would inquire into the truth. And so arriving in the Gulf (gof/bin) where the storm befel them, all were separated, and that vessel which steered badly, parted company with the fleet, and found itself at one of the first islands of Maldiva, at which they stopped some days enjoying themselves. ... For the island abounded in provisions, and the men indulged to excess in eating coconuts, and fish, and in drinking bad stagnant water, and in disorders with women; so that many died.'—Correa, i. 347.

1512.—'Mafamede Maqay with two ships put into the Maldivie islands (ilhas de Maldiva).—Albuquerque, Cartas, p. 30.]

1563.—'R. Though it be somewhat to interrupt the business of hand, why is that chain of islands called 'Islands of Maldiva'?

'O. In this matter of the nomenclature of lands and seas and kingdoms, many of our people make great mistakes even in regard to our own lands: how then can you expect that one can give you the rationale of etymologies of names in foreign tongues? But, nevertheless, I will tell you what I have heard say. And that is that the right name is not Maldiva, but Malādives; for male in Malabar means 'four,' and diva 'island,' so that in the Malabar tongue the name is as much as to say 'Four Islands.' ... And in the same way we call a certain island that is 12 leagues from Gon Angdvīla (see ANCHEDIVA), because there are five in the group, and so the name in Malabar...
MAMIRAN, MAMIRA. s. A medicine from old times of much repute in the East, especially for eye-diseases, and imported from Himalayan and Trans-Himalayan regions. It is a popular native drug in the Punjab bazaars, where it is still known as maimira, also as piltri. It seems probable that the name is applied to bitter roots of kindred properties but of more than one specific origin. Hanbury and Flückiger describe it as the rhizome of Copris Trema, Wallisch, titu being the name of the drug in the Mishmi country at the head of the Assam Valley, from which it is imported into Bengal. But Stewart states explicitly that the maimira of the Punjab bazaars is now "known to be" mostly, if not entirely, derived from Thalictrum foliosum D.C., a tall plant which is common throughout the temperate Himalaya (5000 to 8000 feet) and on the Kasia Hills, and is exported from Kumann under the name of Momiri. [See Wutt, Econ. Diet. vi. pt. iv. 42 seq.] "The Maimira of the old Arab writers was identified with Xel disob nigya, by which, however, Liow (Arum. Plaeneuamen, p. 290) says they understood curcum longa."—W.R.S.

e. 1020. "Memirem quid est? Est ligurn sient nodi decinnes ad nigredinem..."—García, Collection, f. 11.

1593. "... among whom (at Melinda) came a Moor, a Guzarate by nation, called Malem Cann, who, as much for the satisfaction he had in conversing with our people, as to please the King, who was inquiring for a pilot to give them, agreed to accompany them."—Barros, 1. iv. 6.

c. 1683. "Mr. Beard sent up his Couries, which he had received from ye Maudivis, to be put off and passed by Mr. Charnock at Cassambazar."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 122].

MALUM, s. In a ship with English officers and native crew, the mate is called malum sùthib. The word is Ar. mu'allim, literally 'the Instructor,' and is properly applied to the pilot or sailing-master. The word may be compared, thus used, with our 'master' in the Navy. In regard to the first quotation we may observe that Nakhoda (see NACODA) is, rather than Mu'allim, 'the captain'; though its proper meaning is the owner of the ship; the two capacities of owner and skipper being doubtless often combined. The distinction of Mu'allim from Nakhoda accounts for the former title being assigned to the mate.

1197. "And he sent 29 cruzados in gold, and 20 testoons in silver for the Malems, who were the pilots, for of these coins he would give each month whatever he (the Sheikh) should direct."—Correa, i. 38 (E.T. by Ld. Stanley of Alderley, 88). On this passage the Translator says: "The word is perhaps the Arabic for an instructor, a word in general use all over Africa." It is curious that his varied experience should have failed to recognise the habitual marine use of the term.

1541. "Meanwhile he sent three caturas (i.e.) to the Port of the Malems (Porto dos Malemos) in order to get some pilot. . . . In this Port of the Bandel of the Malems the ships of the Moors take pilots when they enter the Straits, and when they return they leave them here again."—Correa, iv. 168.

* This Port was immediately outside the Straits, as appears from the description of Dom João de Castro (1444): "Now turning to the 'Gate' of the Strait, which are the chief object of our description, we remark that here the land of Arabia juts out into the sea, forming a prominent Point, and very prolonged. . . . This is the point or promontory which Ptolomy calls Possidiada. . . . In front of it, a little more than a gunshot

c. 1200.—"Some maintain that this plant (ουκ ἀλ-γαβχίν) is the small karkum (turmeric), and others that it is mamrān. . . . The karkum is brought to us from India. . . . The mamrān is imported from China, and has the same properties as karkum."—Ibn Battûthah ii. 186-188.

c. 1550.—"But they have a much greater appreciation of another little root which grows in the mountains of Suchur (i.e. Suchan in Shensi), where the rhubarb grows, and which they call Mambroni-Chini (i.e. Mamrān-i-Chinit). This is extremely dear, and is used in most of their ailmens, but especially when the eyes are affected. They grind it on a stone with rose water, and anoint the eyes with it. The result is wonderfully benefical."—Hujji Muhammad's Account of Cathay, in Ramusio, ii. f. 12c.

c. 1573.—(At Aleppo). "Mamiranitchini, good for eyes as they say."—Ravencliff, in Ray's 2nd ed. p. 114.

Also the following we borrow from Dozy's Suppl. aux Dicct. Arabeis:—

1582.—"Mehr haben ihre Krämer kleine wirtzelein zu verkaufen mamrani tchini genanntet, in gebresten der Augen, wie sie fürgeben ganz dienlich; diese seind geblicht wie die Circuma umb ein zinlich lenger, auch diinner und knopfet das solche unsern weiss wirtzten sehr chnlich, und wol für das rechte mamiran mögen gehalten werden, dessen sonnderlich Rhasen an mehr orten gedencket."—Ravencliff, Algemeine Beschreibung der Reizen, 126.

c. 1605.—"These caravans brought back Musk, China-root, Rhubarb, and Mamiron, which last is a small root exceeding good for ill eyes."—Bernier, E.T. 136; [ed. Constable, 426].

MANDALAY, MANDALÉ, n.p.

The capital of the King of Burmah, founded in 1860, 7 miles north of the preceding capital Amarpura, and between 2 and 3 miles from the left bank of the Irawadi. The name was taken from that of a conical isolated hill, rising high above the alluvial plain of the Irawadi, and crowned by a gilt pagoda. The name of the hill (and now of the city at its base) probably represents Mandara, the sacred mountain which in Hindu mythology served the gods as a churning-staff at the churning of the sea. The hill appears as Mandye-taung in Major Grant Allan's Map of the Environs of Amarpura (1855), published in the Narrative of Major Phayre's Mission, but the name does not occur in the Narrative itself.

1861. — "Next morning the son of my friendly host accompanied me to the Mandalay Hill, on which there stands in a gilt chapel the image of Shwesayatta, pointing down with outstretched finger to the Palace of Mandalay, interpreted as the divine command there to build a city ... on the other side where the hill falls in an abrupt precipice, sits a gigantic Buddha going in motionless meditation on the mountains opposite. There are here some caves in the hard rock, built up with bricks and whitewashed, which are inhabited by eremites." ... "— Bastian's Travels (German), ii. 89-90.

MANDARIN, s. Port. Mandarif, Mandarin. Wedgwood explains and derives the word thus: "A Chinese officer, a name first made known to us by the Portuguese, and like the Indian caste, erroneously supposed to be a native term. From Portuguese mandar, to hold authority, command, govern, &c." So also T. Hyde in the quotation below. Except as regards the word having been first made known to us by the Portuguese, this is an old and persistent mistake. What sort of form would mandarif be as a derivative from mandar? The Portuguese might have applied to Eastern officials some such word as mandador, which a preceding article (see MANDARE) shows that they did apply in certain cases. But the parallel to the assumed origin of mandarin from mandar would be that English voyagers on visiting China, or some other country in the far East, should have invented, as a title for the officials of that country, a new and abnormal derivation from 'order,' and called them orderumfas.

The word is really a slight corruption of Hind. (from Skt.) mantri, 'a counsellor, a Minister of State,' for which it was indeed the proper old pre-Mahommedan term in India. It has been adopted, and specially affected in various Indo-Chinese countries, and particularly by the Malays, among whom it is habitually applied to the highest class of public officers (see Crawford's Malay Diet. s.v. [and Klinkert, who writes mantei, colloquially manti]). Yet Crawford himself, strange to say, adopts the current explanation as from the Portuguese (see J. Ind. Archip. iv. 189). [Klinkert adopts the Skt. derivation.] It is, no doubt, probable that the instinctive "striving after meaning" may have shaped the corruption of mantri into a semblance of mandar. Marsdon is still more oddly perverse, videns meliora, deteriora scutis, when he says: 'The officers next in rank to the Sultan are Mantree, which some apprehend to be a corruption of the word Mandarin, a title of distinction among the Chinese (H. of Sumatra, 2nd ed. 285). Ritter adopts the etymology from mandar, apparently after A. W. Schlegel.*

The true etymology is pointed out in Notes and Queries in China and Japan, iii. 12, and by one of the present writers in Ocean Highways for Sept. 1872, p. 186. Several of the quotations below will show that the earlier applications of the title have no reference to China at all, but to officers of state, not only in the Malay countries, but in Continental India.

We may add that mantri (see MUNTREE) is still much in vogue among the less barbarous Hill Races on the Eastern frontier of Bengal (e.g. among the Kasias (see COSSYA) as a denomination for their petty dignitaries under the chief. Gibbon was perhaps aware of the true origin of mandarina; see below.

MANDARIN LANGUAGE, s.
The language spoken by the official and literary class in China, as opposed to local dialects. In Chinese it is called Kwan-Hua. It is substantially the language of the people of the northern and middle zones of China, extending to Yuen-nan. It is not to be confounded with the literary style which is used in books. [See Ball, Things Chinese, 169 seq.]

1674.—"The Language... is called Quenka (kwa), or the Language of Mandarines, because as they spread their command they introduced it, and it is used throughout all the Empire, as Latin in Europe. It is very barren, and as it has more letters far than any other, so it has fewer words."—Faria y Sousa, E.T. ii. 468.

MANGALORE, n.p. The only place now well known by this name is (a) Mangalur, a port on the coast of Southern Canara and chief town of that district, in lat. 12° 51' N. In Mir Husain Ali's Life of Haidar it is called "Gorial Bunder," perhaps a corroboration, which is said in the Imp. Gaz. to be the modern native name. [There is a place called Gorumpur close by; see Madras Gloss. s.v. Gooppur.] The name in this form is found in an inscription of the 11th century, whatever may have been its original form and etymology. [The present name is said to be taken from the temple of Mangala Devi.] But the name in approximate forms (from maṅgaḷa, 'gladness') is common in India. One other port (b) on the coast of Peninsular Guzerat was formerly well known, now commonly called Munugore. And another place of the name (c) Mangalore in the valley of Swat, north of Peshawar, is mentioned by Hwen T'sang as a city of Gandhara. It is probably the same that appears in Skt. literature (see Williams, s.v. Manayla) as the capital of Udhyana.

1843.—"Quitting Fakanur (see BACANORE) we arrived after three days at the city of Manjarur, which is large and situated on an estuary... It is here that most of the merchants of Fars and Yemen land; pepper and ginger are very abundant."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 79-80.

1442.—"After having passed the port of Bandimanee (see PANDARANI) situated on the coast of Melibar, (he) reached the port of Mangalore, which forms the frontier of the kingdom of Bidjanagar..."—Abdurrazzaq, in India in the XVth Cent., 20.

1516.—"There is another large river towards the south, along the sea-shore, where there is a very large town, peopled by Moors and Gentiles, of the kingdom of Narsinga, called Mangalore... They also ship there much rice in Moorish ships for Aden, also pepper, which thenceforward the earth begins to produce."—Barboza, 83.

1727.—"The Fields here bear two Crops of Corn yearly in the Plains; and the higher Grounds produce Pepper, Betelnut, Sandalwood, Iron and Steel, which make Mangulore a Place of pretty good Trade."—A. Hamilton, i. 285, [ed. 1744].

1536.—"... for there was come another catur with letters, in which the Captain of Din urgently called for help; telling how the King (of Cambay) had equipped large squadrons in the Ports of the Gulf... alleging that he was sending them to Mangalore to join others in an expedition against Shinde... and that all this was false, for he was really sending them in the expectation that the Romans would come to MANGELIN, s. A small weight, corresponding in a general way to a carat (q.v.), used in the S. of India and in Ceylon for weighing precious stones. The word is Telegu _manjādi_, in Tamil _mangādi_, [from Skt. _manji_, "beautiful"]; the seed of the _Adenanthera pavonina_ (Compare RUTTEE). On the origin of this weight see Sir W. Elliot's _Coins of S. India_. The _mangādi_ seed was used as a measure of weight from very early times. A parcel of 50 taken at random gave an average weight of 4·13 grs. Three parcels of 10 each, selected by eye as large, gave average 5·02 and 5·03 (op. cit. p. 47).

1516.—Diamonds "... sell by a weight which is called a Mangiar, which is equal to 2 tare and 3, and 2 tare make a carat of good weight, and 4 tare weigh one fanam."—_Barbou_, in _Romusio_, i. f. 321f.

1554.—(In Ceylon) "A calamuja contains 20 mangamles, each mangamel 8 grains of rice; a Portugues of gold weighs 8 calamjas and 2 mangamles."—_Neres_, 95.

1554.—"There is another sort of weight called Mangallion, which is 5 grains of Venetian weight, and therewith they weigh diamants and other jewels."—_Istven_, in _Hokl_. ii. 409.

1665.—"Le poids principal des Diamans est le mangelin; il pese cinq grains et trois cinquièmes."—_Thévenot_, v. 293.

1676.—"At the mine of _Racolonda_ they weigh by Mangelins, a Mangelin being one carat and three quarters, that is 7 grains. ... At the Mine of Soumelpore in Bengal they weigh by Rati (see RUTTEE), and the Rati is 1 of a Carat, or 33 grains. In the Kingdoms of Golconda and Visapur, they make use of Mangelins, but a Mangelin in those parts is not above 1 carat and 3/8. The Portugals in Goa make use of the same Weights in Goa; but a Mangelin there is not above 5 grains."—_Tavernier_, E.T. ii. 141; [ed. Ball, ii. 87, and see ii. 433.]

MANGO, s. The royal fruit of the Mangifera indica, when of good quality it is one of the richest and best fruits in the world. The original of the word is Tamil _mān-lāy_ or _mān-gīy_, i.e. _mān_ fruit (the tree being _mān-mār_ or _māntree_). The Portuguese formed from this _mangī_, which we have adopted as mango. The tree is wild in the forests of various parts of India; but the fruit of the wild tree is uneatable.

The word has sometimes been supposed to be Malaya; but it was in fact introduced into the Archipelago, along with the fruit itself, from S. India. Rumphius (_Herb. Ambonyg_, i. 95) traces its recent introduction into the islands, and says that it is called (Malaiçé) "_mangka_, vel vulgo _Mangga et Mapelam._" This last word is only the Tamil _Māpēlam_, i.e. _mān_ fruit' again. The close approximation of the Malay _mangka_ to the Portuguese form might suggest that the latter name was derived from Malacca. But we see _manga_ already used by Varthema, who, according to Garcia, never really went beyond Malabar. [Mr. Skeat writes: "The modern standard Malay word is _mangga_, from which the Port. form was probably taken. The other Malay form quoted from Rumphius is in standard Malay _mapelam_, with _mepelam_, _mapelam_, _ampelam_, and _pelam_ or _plam_ as variants. The Javanese is _pelêm_."]

The word has been taken to Madagascar, apparently by the Malayan colonists, whose language has left so large an impression there, in the precise shape _mangka_. Had the fruit been an Arab importation it is improbable that the name would have been introduced in that form.

The N. Indian names are _Ām_ and _Amba_, and variations of these we find in several of the older European writers. Thus Fr. Jordanus, who had been in the Konkan, and appreciated the progenitors of the Goa and Bombay Mango (c. 1328), calls the fruit Aniba. Some 30 years later John de' Marignolli calls the tree "anabaru, having a fruit of excellent fragrance and flavour, somewhat like a peach" (Cathay, &c., ii. 302). Garcia de Orta shows how early the Bombay fruit was prized. He seems to have been the owner of the parent tree. The Skt. name is Amra, and this we find in Hwen Ts'ang (c. 645) phoneticised as 'Au-mo-lo.

The mango is probably the fruit alluded to by Theophrastus as having caused dysentery in the army of Alexander. (See the passage s.v. JACK.)

c. 1328.—"Est etiam alia arbor quae frutues facit ad medium pruni, grossissimas, qui vocantur Aniba. Hi sunt frutus ita dulces et amabilis, quod ore tenus exprimit, hce minime passit."—Fr. Jordanus, in Rec. de Voyages, &c., i., iv. 42.

c. 1334.—"The mango tree (aniba) resembles an orange-tree, but is larger and more leafy; no other tree gives so much shade, but this shade is unwholesome, and whoever sleeps under it gets fever."—Ibn Battuta, iii. 125. At ii. 185 he writes 'anba.' [The same charge is made against the tamarind; see Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 81.]

c. 1319.—"They have also another tree called 'amborum,' having a fruit of excellent fragrance and flavour, somewhat like a peach."—John de' Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., 302.

1510.—"Another fruit is also found here, which is called Anba, the stem of which is called Mango," &c.—Varthema, 160-161.

c. 1526.—"Of the vegetable productions peculiar to Hindostan one is the mango (ambel). ... Such mangoes are as good are excellent." &c.—Ib., 324.

1563.—"O, Boy! go and see what two vessels those are coming in—you see them from the verandah here—and they seem but small ones."

"Scratch. I will bring you word presently.

"S, Sir! it is Simon Tescano, your tenant in Bombay, and he brings this hamper of mangoes for you to make a present to the Governor, and says that when he has moored the boat he will come here to stop.

"O. He couldn't have come more a propos. I have a mango-tree (manguirin) in that island of mine which is remarkable for both its two crops, one at this time of year, the other at the end of May, and much as the other crop excels this in quality for fragrance and flavour, this is just as remarkable for coming out of season. But come, let us taste them before His Excellency. Boy! take out six mangoes."—Garcia, ii. 134, 135. This author also mentions that the mangoes of Ormuz were the most cele-bribated; also certain mangas of Guzerat, not large, but of surpassing fragrance and flavour, and having a very small stone. Those of Balaghat were both excellent and big; the Doctor had seen two that weighed 4 arratels and a half (44 lbs.); and those of Bengal, Pegu, and Malacca were also good.

[1569.—"There is much fruit that comes from Arabia and Persia, which they call mangoes (mangas), which is very good fruit."—Granvia dos Reyes Dornuez, translated from the Arabic in 1569.]

c. 1590.—"The Mangoe (Anba). . . . This fruit is unrivalled in colour, smell, and taste; and some of the gourmands of Túrin and Irán place it above musk melons and grapes. . . . If a half-ripe mango, together with its stalk to a length of about two fingers, be taken from the tree, and the broken end of its stalk be closed with warm wax, and kept in butter or honey, the fruit will retain its taste for two or three months."—Ia, ed. Blochmann, i, 67-68.

[1615.—"George Duroys sent in a present of two potters of Mangesas."—Cock's Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 79.]

"There is another very liquorish fruit called Amangues growing on trees, and it is as big as a great quince, with a very great stone in it."—De Monfret, 20.

1622.—P. della Valle describes the tree and fruit at Miná (Minao) near Hormuz, under the name of Anba, as an exotic introduced from India. Afterwards at Goa he speaks of it as "mango or anba,"—ii. pp. 313-14, and 581; [Hak. Soc. i. 40].

[1663.—"Hubus, or Mangues, are in season during two months in summer, and are plentiful and cheap; but those grown at Delhi are indifferent. The best come from Bengal, Golkonda, and Goa, and those are indeed excellent. I do not know any sweet-meat more agreeable."—Browne, ed. Constable, 249.]

1673.—Of the Goa Mango,* Fryer says justly: "When ripe, the Apples of the Hessiprides are but Fables to them; for Taste, the Nectarine, Peach, and Apricots fall short. . . ."—p. 182.

1679.—"Mango and saio (see SOY), two sorts of sauces brought from the East Indies."—Locke's Journal, in Ed. King's Life, 1830, i. 219.

* The excellence of the Goa Mangos is stated to be due to the care and skill of the Jesuits (see Manuscript, Marriages, c. 270). In S. India all good kinds have Portuguese or Mahommedan names. The author of Tribes on My Frontier, 1883, p. 148, mentions the lascivious péril and the delicate ajoos as two line varieties, supposed to bear the names of a certain Pero and a certain Agosto.
MANGO-TRICK.

1727.—"The Geo mango is reckoned the largest and most delicious to the taste of any in the world, and I may add, the wholesomest and best tasted of any Fruit in the World."—A. Hamilton, i. 255. [ed. 1744, i. 255].

1853.—"... the unsophisticated ryt... conceives that cultivation could only emasculate the pronounced flavour and firm fibrous texture of that prince of fruits, the wild mango, likest a ball of tow soaked in turpentine."—Tribes on My Frontier, 149.

The name has been carried with the fruit to Mauritius and the West Indies. Among many greater services to India the late Sir Proby Castley diffused largely in Upper India the delicious fruit of the Bombay mango, previously rare there, by creating and encouraging groves of grafts on the banks of the Ganges and Jumna canals. It is especially true of this fruit (as Sultan Baber indicates) that excellence depends on the variety. The common mango is coarse and strong of turpentine. Of this only an evanescent suggestion remains to give peculiarity to the finer varieties. [A useful account of these varieties by Mr. Maries, will be found in Watt, Econ. Dict. v. 148 seqq.]

MANGO-BIRD. s. The popular Anglo-Indian name of the beautiful golden oriole (Oriolus aureus, Jerdon). Its "loud mellow whistle" from the mango-groves and other gardens, which it affects, is associated in Upper India with the invasion of the hot weather.

1875.—"The mango-bird glances through the groves, and in the early morning announces his beautiful but unwelcome presence with his merle melody."—J. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 39.

MANGO-FISH. s. The familiar name of an excellent fish (Polyprion Vizala of Buchanan, P. paradises of Day), in flavour somewhat resembling the smelt, but, according to Dr. Mason, nearly related to the mullets. It appears in the Calcutta market early in the hot season, and is much prized, especially when in roe. The Hindu-stani name is tapa or tapas, 'an ascetic,' or 'penitent,' but we do not know the rationale of the name. Buchanan says that it is owing to the long fibres (or tree rays), proceeding from near the head, which lead the natives to associate it with penitents who are forbidden to shave. [Dr. Grierson writes: "What the connection of the fish with a hermit was I never could ascertain, unless it was that like wandering Fakirs, they disappear directly the rains begin. Compare the uposatha of the Buddhists." But tapasvī means 'produced by heat,' and is applied to the month Phagun (Feb.-March) when the fish appears; and this may be the origin of the name.]

1751.—"The Board of Trustees assemble on Tuesday at the New Tavern, where the Committee meet to eat Mangoee Fish for the benefit of the Subscribers and on other special affairs."—Hickey's Bengal Gazette, March 3.

[1820.—... the mangoee fish (so named from its appearing during the mango season)... By the natives they are named the Tapasvī (penitent) fish, (abbreviated by Europeans to Tapas) from their resembling a class of religious penitents, who ought never to shave."—Hamilton, Des. of Hindostan, i. 58.]

MANGO-SHOWERS. s. Used in Madras for showers which fall in March and April, when the mangoes begin to ripen.

MANGO-TRICK. One of the most famous tricks of Indian jugglers, in which they plant a mango-stone, and show at brief intervals the tree shooting above ground, and successively producing leaves, flowers, and fruit. It has often been described, but the description given by the Emperor Jahangir in his Autobiography certainly surpasses all in its demand on our belief.

c. 1010.—... Khaun-e-Jehaun, one of the nobles present, observed that if they spoke truly he should wish them to produce for his conviction a mulberry-tree. The men arose without hesitation, and having in ten separate spots set some seed in the ground, they recited among themselves... when instantly a plant was seen springing from each of the ten places, and each proving the tree required by Khaun-e-Jehaun. In the same manner they produced a mango, an apple-tree, a cypress, a pine-apple, a fir-tree, an almond, a walnut... open to the observation of all present, the trees were perceived gradually and slowly springing from the earth, to the height of one or perhaps of two cubits... Then making a sort of procession round the trees as they stood... in a moment there appeared on the respective trees a sweet mango without the rind, an almond fresh and ripe, a large fig of the most delicious kind... the fruit being pulled in my presence, and every one present was allowed to taste it. This, however, was not all; before the trees were removed there appeared among the foliage birds of a curious kind, in colour and shape, and melody and song, as the world never saw before. At the close of the operation, the foliage, as in autumn, was seen to put on its variegated tints, and the trees gradually disappeared into the earth. —Mangosteen.

c. 1650.—"Then they thrust a piece of stick into the ground, and asked the Company what Fruit they would have. One told them he would have Mangoes; then one of the Mountebanks hiding himself in the middle of a Sheet, stood out in the ground five or six times one after another. I was so curious to go upstairs, and look out of a window, to see if I could spy what the Mountebank did, and perceived that after he had cut himself under the armpits with a Razor, he rubb'd the stick with his Blood. After the two first times that he raised himself, the stick seemed to the very eye to grow. The third time there sprung out branches with young buds. The fourth time the tree was covered with leaves; and the fifth time it bore flowers. The English Minister protested that he could not give his consent that any Christian should be Spectator of such delusions. So that as soon as he saw that these Mountebanks had of a dry stick, in less than half-an-hour, made a Tree four or five foot high, that bare leaves and flowers as in the Spring-time: he went about to break it, protesting that he went not into the Company with any person that should stay any longer to see those things."—Tavernier, Travels made English, by J.P., ii. 36; [ed. Bell, i. 67, seq.].

1667.—"When two of these Jauguis (see Jaugee) that are eminent, do meet, and you stir them up on the point and power of their knowledge or Jaugisme, you shall see them do such tricks out of sight to one another, that I know not if Simon Mage could have outdone them. For they divine what one thinketh, make the Branch of a Tree disappear, a Shop in the ground, hatch eggs in their bosoms in less than half a quarter of an hour, and bring forth such birds as you demand. I mean, if what is said of them is true. For, as for me, I am with all my curiosity none of those happy Men, that are present at, and see these great feats."—Bernier, E.T. 103; [ed. Constable, 321].

1673.—"Others presented a Mock-Creation of a Mango-Tree, arising from the Stone in a short space (which they did in Hugger-Mugger, being very careful to avoid being discovered) with Fruit, Green and Ripe; so that a Man must stretch his Fancy, to imagine it Witchcraft; though the common Sort think no less."—Fryer, 192.

1690.—"Others are said to raise a Mango-Tree, with ripe Fruit upon its Branches, in the space of one or two Hours. To confirm which Relation, it was affirmed confidently to me, that a Gentleman who had pluckt one of these Mangoes, fell sick upon it, and has new as well as long as he kept it; till he consulted a Doctor for his Health, who prescrib'd his only Remedy would be the restoring of the Mango, by which he was restor'd to his Health again."—Ovington, 258-259.

1726.—"They have some also who will show you the kernel of a mango-fruit, or may be only a twig, and ask if you will see the fruit or this stick planted, and in a short time see a tree grow from it and bear fruit: after they have got their answer the jugglers (Koord-dressers) wrap themselves in a blanket, stick the twig into the ground, and then put a basket over them (Ke. &c.).

"There are some who have prevailed on these jugglers by much money to let them see how they have accomplished this.

"These have revealed that the jugglers made a hole in their bodies under the armpits, and rubbed the twig with the blood from it, and every time that they stuck it in the ground they wetted it, and in this way they clearly saw it to grow and to come to the perfection before described.

"This is asserted by a certain writer who has seen it. But this can't move me to believe it."—Valentijn, v. (Chamor), 58.

Our own experience does not go beyond Dr. Fryer's, and the hugger-mugger performance that he disapparages. But many others have testified to more remarkable skill. We once heard a traveller of note relate with much spirit such an exhibition as witnessed in the Deccan. The narrator, then a young officer, determined with a comrade, at all hazards of fair play or foul, to solve the mystery. In the middle of the trick one suddenly seized the conjuror, whilst the other uncovered and snatched at the mango-plant. But lo! it came from the earth with a root, and the mystery was darker than ever! We tell the tale as it was told.

It would seem that the trick was not unknown in European conjuring of the 16th or 17th centuries, e.g.

MANGOSTEEN, s. From Malay manggusta (Crawfurd), or manggistan (Favre), in Javanese Manggis. [Mr. Skeat writes: "The modern standard Malay form used in the W. coast of the Peninsula is manggis, as in Javanese, the forms manggusta and manggistan never being heard there. The Siamese form maangkhut given in M'Farland's Siamese Grammar is probably from the Malay manggiastar. It was very interesting to me to find that some distinct trace of this word was still preserved in the name of this fruit at Patani-Kelantan on the E. coast, where it was called bautah 'seta (or 'setar), i.e. the 'setar fruit;' as well as occasionally mesetar or mesetar, clearly a corruption of some such old form as manggistar." This delicious fruit is known throughout the Archipelago, and in Siam, by modifications of the same name; the delicious fruit of the Garinia Mangostana (Nat. Ord. Guttiferae). It is strictly a tropical fruit, and, in fact, near the coast does not bear fruit further north than lat. 14°. It is a native of the Malay Peninsula and the adjoining islands.

1585.—"There are yet other fruits, as Mangostaine [in Hak. Soc. Mangostains . . . but because they are of small account I think it not requisite to write severally of them."—Linnaeus, "The Natural System of Plants," 1737.

1692.—"The Mangostan is a Fruit growing by the Highways in Java, upon bushes, like our Sloes."—Dict. de la Langue Françoise, "Mangostan," 1727.

1727.—"The Mangostane is a delicious Fruit, almost in the Shape of an Apple, the Skin is thick and red, being dried it is a good Astringent. The Kernels (if I may so call them) are like Cloves of Garlic, of a very agreeable Taste, but very cold."—J. Hamilton, "The Natural History of the East," 1741.

MANGROVE. s. The sea-loving genera Rhizophora and Avicennia derive this name, which applies to both, from some happy accident, but from which of two sources may be doubtful. For while the former genus is, according to Crawfurd, called by the Malays manggi-manggi, a term which he supposes to be the origin of the English name, we see from Oviedo that one or other was called mangle in S. America, and in this, which is certainly the origin of the French mangle, we should be disposed also to seek the derivation of the English word. Both genera are universal in the tropical tidal estuaries of both Old World and New. Prof. Sayce, by an amusing slip, or oversight probably of somebody else's slip, quotes from Humboldt that "maihe, mangle, hamucho, canoe, tobacco, are all derived through the medium of the Spanish from the Haytian mahic, mangle, huanaco, canoe, and tabaco." It is, of course, the French and not the English mangle that is here in question. [Mr. Skeat observes: "I believe the old English as well as French form was mangle, in which case Prof. Sayce would be perfectly right. Mangrove is probably manglier-groove. The Malay manggi-manggi is given by Klinkert, and is certainly on account of the reduplication, native. But I never heard it in the Peninsula, where mangrove is always called bakow." The mangrove abounds on nearly all the coasts of further India, and also on the sea margin of the Ganges Delta, in the backwaters of S. Malabar, and less luxuriantly on the Indus mouths.

1585.—"Of the Tree called Mangle . . . These trees grow in places of mire, and on the shores of the sea, and of the rivers, and streams, and torrents that run into the sea. They are trees very strange to see . . . they grow together in vast numbers, and many of their branches seem to turn down and change into roots . . . and these plant themselves in the ground like stems, so that the tree looks as if it had many legs joining one to the other."—Oviedo, in "Narration," iii. f. 145. . . . "So coming to the coast, embarked in a great Canoa with some 30 Indians, and 5 Christians, whom he took with him, and coasted along amid solitary places and islets, passing sometimes into the sea itself for 4 or 5 leagues,—among certain trees, lofty, dense and green, which grow in the very sea-water, and which they call mangle."—Pil. f. 224.

MANILLA-MAN.

The title of a book, with reference to its author and publication.

MANNICKJORE, s. Hind. manik-jor; the white-necked stork (Ciconia leuconephala, Gmelin); sometimes, according to Jordan, called in Bengal the 'Beef-steak bird,' because palatable when cooked in that fashion. "The name of Manikjor means the companion of Manik, a Saint, and some Mussulmans in consequence abstain from eating it" (Jordan). [Platts derives it from manik, 'a ruby."

MANJEE, s. The master, or steersman, of a boat or any native river-craft; Hind. mānjī, Beng. mijī and mējī, [all from Skt. मानी, 'one who stands in the middle']. The word is also a title borne by the head men among the Pahāris or Hill-people of Rajmahal (Wilson), [and as equivalent for Majāvac, the name of an important Dravidian tribe on the borders of the N.W. Provinces and Chota Nāgar].

MANJEE, n. A small fish; Hind. मण्डी, Beng. manāti, &c. [Compare COBRA-MANILLA.]

MANUCODIATA. (See BIRD OF PARADISE.)

MARRAMUT, MURRUMUT, s. Hind. from Ar. مَرَامِع, 'repair.' In this sense the use is general in Hindustani (in which the terminal t is always pronounced, though not by the Arabs), whether as applied to a stocking, a fortress, or a ship. But in Madras Presidency the word had formerly a very specialised sense as the recognised title of that branch of the Executive which included the conservation of irrigation tanks and the like, and which was worked under the District Civil Officers, there being then no separate department of the State in charge of Civil Public Works. It is a curious illustration of the wide spread at one time of Musulman power that the same Arabic word, in the form Maram, is still applied in Sicily to a standing committee charged with repairs to the Duomo or Cathedral of Palermo. An analogous instance of the wide grasp of the Saracenic power is mentioned by one of the Musulman authors whom Amari quotes in his History of the Mahomedan rule in Sicily. It is that the Caliph Al-Mamūn, under whom conquest was advancing in India and in Sicily simultaneously, ordered that the idols taken from the infidels in India should be sent for sale to the infidels in Sicily!
MARGOSA. 559

MARGOSA. s. A name in the S. of India and Ceylon for the Nim (see NEEM) tree. The word is a corruption of Port. amargosa, 'bitter,' indicating the character of the tree. This gives rise to an old Indian proverb, traceable as far back as the Jatakas, that you cannot sweeten the nim tree though you water it with syrup and ghee (Natura expeIlaS fureo, &c.).

1727.—"The wealth of an evil man shall another evil man take from him, just as the crows come and eat the fruit of the margoise tree as soon as it is ripe."—Apophthegms translated in Valentijn, v. (Ceylon) 380. 1782.—"... ils laivent le malade avee de l'eau froide, ensuite ils le frottent rude-ment avee de la feuille de Margosier."—Soucera, i. 208. 1834.—"Adjacent to the Church stand a number of tamarind and margoise trees."—Clitty, Ceylon Gazetteer, 183.

MARKHORE. s. Pers. mar-khor, 'snake-eater.' A fine wild goat of the Western Himalaya; Capra megaceros, Hutton.

1851.—"Hence the people of the country call it the Markhor ('eater of serpents')."—Edeceades, A Year on the Punjab Frontier, i. 474. 1895.—"Never more would he chase the ibex and makor."—Mrs. Croker, Village Tales, 112.

MARTABAN, n.p. This is the conventional name, long used by all the trading nations, Asiatic and European, for a port on the east of the Irawadi Delta and of the Sitang estuary, formerly of great trade, but now in comparative decay. The original name is Talang, Mdt-ta-man, the meaning of which has been unable to ascertain.

1541.—"... passed then before Marta-man, the people also heathens: men expert in everything, and first-rate merchants; great masters of accounts, and in fact the greatest in the world. They keep their accounts in books like us. In the said country is great produce of lae, cloths, and provisions."—Letter of Gio. da Empoli, p. 50.

1554.—"At the end of these two days the King... caused the Captains that were at the Guard of the Gates to leave them and retire; whereupon the miserable City of Martabano was delivered to the mercy of the Southerners... and therein showed themselves so cruel-minded, that the thing they made least reckoning of was to kill 100 men for a crown."—Pico, in Ceylon, 263.

1553. —"And the towns which stand outside this gulf of the Isles of Pegu (of which we have spoken) and are placed along the coast, which count are Vagara, Martaban, a city notable in the great trade that it enjoys, and further on Rey, Talaga, and Tavay."—Barros, i. ix. 1. 1568.—"Tromassimo nella città di Mar- tanaun intorno a nozonti Portoghesi, tra mercadanti e huomini vagabondi, li quali stauano in gran differenza co' Rettori della città."—Ces. Fedreri, in Rumisio, iii. 336. 1584.—The city of Martaban hath its front to the south-east, south, and south-west, and stands on a river which there enters the sea... it is a city of Maupa-ragia, a Prince of the King of Pegun's."—Gasparo Bathi, f. 129e, 130r.

1689.—"That the English may settle factories at Serian, Pegun, and Ava... and also that they may settle a factory in like manner at Mortavan... "—Articles to be proposed to the King of Burma and Pegun in Notes and Exa., No. iii. p. 8.

1695.—"Concerning Bartolomeo Rodriguez,... I am informed and do believe he put into Mortavan for want of wood and water, and was there seized by the King's officers, because not bound to that Place."—Governor Higgison, in India- graph, Or. Repert. ii. 342-b.

MARTABAN. s. This name was given to vessels of a peculiar pottery, of very large size, and glazed, which were famous all over the East for many centuries, and were exported from Martaban. They were sometimes called Pegu jars, and under that name specimens were shown at the Great Exhibition of 1851. We have not been able to obtain recent information on the subject of this manufacture. The word appears to be now obsolete in India, except as a colloquial term in Telegu. [The word is certainly not obsolete in Upper India: 'The martaban' (Plate ii. fig. 10) is a small deep jar with an elongated body, which is used by Hindus and Muhammadans to keep pickles and acid articles" (Halli-fus, Mono. of Punjab Pottery, p. 9). In the endeavour to supply a Hindi derivation it has been derived from im-rata-ban, 'the holder of the water of immortality.' In the Arabian Nights the word appears in the form bartumae, and is used for a crock in which gold is buried. (Burton, xi. 26). Mr. Bell saw some large earthenware jars at Malé, some about 2 feet high, called rumba; others larger and barrel-shaped, called matabán. (Pyrard, Hak. Soc. i. 259.) For the modern manufacture, see Scott, Gazetteer of Upper Burma, 1900, Pt. i. vol. ii. 399 seq.

c. 1350.—"Then the Princess made me a present consisting of dresses, of two elephant-loads of rice, of two she-buffaloes, ten sheep, four roots of coriand syrup, and four Martabans, or huge jars, filled with pepper, coriander, and mungo, all prepared with salt, as for a sea-voyage."—Ibn Batatu, iv. 253.

1508.—"The lac (lacre) which your Highness desired me to send, will be a piece of good luck to get, because those ships depart early, and the vessels from Pegu and Martaban come late. But I hope for a good quantity of it, as I have given orders for it."—Letter from the Vice-roy, Dom. Francisco Almeida to the King. In Correl. i. 909.

1516.—"In this town of Martaban are made very large and beautiful porcelain vases, and some of glazed earthenware of a black colour, which are highly valued among the Moors, and they export them as merchandize."—Barbotin, 156.

1588.—"In this town many of the great earthen pots are made, which in India are called Martanans, and many of them carried throughout all India, of all sorts both small and great; some are so great that they will hold full two pipes of water. The cause why so many are brought into India is for that they use them in every house, and in their ships instead of casks."—Linschoten, p. 30; [Hak. Soc. i. 101; see also i. 28, 268.]

c. 1610.—"... des iaroos les plus belles, les mieux vernis et les mieux façonnées que j'ay eu ailleurs. Il y en a qui tiennent autant qu'une pippin et plus. 1673.—"Je vis un vase d'une certaine terre verte qui vient des Indes, dont les Tures ... font un grand estime, et qu'ils achépent bien cher à cause de la propiéte qu'elle a de se rompre à la presence du poison. ... Cette terre se nomme Merdebani."—Journal d'Ant. Galland, ii. 110.

1673.—"... to that end offer Rice, Oyl, and Cocoa-Nuts in a thick Grove, where they piled an huge Heap of long Jars like Martivans."—Fryer, 180.

1688.—"They took it out of the cask, and put it into earthen Jars that held about eight Barrels apiece. These they call Montaban Jars, from a town of that name in Pegu, whence they are brought, and carried all over India."—Dampier, ii. 98.

c. 1690.—"... Sunt autem haece vastissimae ac turgitae olae in regionibus Martavan et Siana confectae, quae per totum transferruntur Indian ad varias ligueos conservandos."—Raumphius, i. ch. iii.

1711.—"... Pegu, Quedah, Jahore and all their own Coasts, whence they are plentifully supply'd with several Necessarys, they otherwise must want; As Ivory, Beeswax, Mortivan and small Jars, Pepper, &c."—Lavater, 35.

1728.—"... and the Martavanas contain the water to drink, when empty require two persons to carry them."—Valentijn, v. 251.

"... the goods exported hitherward (from Pegu) are ... glazed pots (called Martavans after the district where they properly belong), both large and little."—Ibid. v. 128.

1727.—"Martavan was one of the most flourishing Towns for Trade in the East. ... They make earthen Ware there still, and glaze them with Lead-spar. I have seen some Jars made there that could contain two Hogsheads of Liquor."—I. Hamilton, i. 63, ed. 1744, ii. 62.

1710.—"The Pay Master is likewise-ordered ... to look out for all the Pegu Jars in Town, or other vessels proper for keeping water."—In Wheeler, iii. 194.

Such jars were apparently imitated in other countries, but kept the original name. Thus Baillie Fraser says that "certain jars called Martaban were manufactured in Oman."—Journey into Khorasan, 18.

MARTIL, MARTOL, s. A hammer. Hind mártol, from Port. martelo, but assisted by imaginary connection with Hind már-ná, 'to strike.'

MARTINGALE, s. This is no specially Anglo-Indian word; our excuse for introducing it is the belief that it is of Arabic origin. Popular assumption, we believe, derives the name from a mythical Colonel Martin- gale. But the word seems to come to us from the French, in which language, besides the English use, Litré gives chausées à la martingale as meaning “culottes dont le pont était placé par derrière,” and this he strangely declares to be the true and original meaning of the word. His etymology, after Méhage, is from Martigues in Provence, where, it is alleged, breeches of this kind were worn. Skeat seems to accept these explanations. [But see his Concise Dict., where he inclines to the view given in this article, and adds: “I find Arab. ratāka given by Richardson as a verbal root, whence ratak, going with a short quick step.”] But there is a Span. word al-martaga, for a kind of bridge, which Urrea quoted by Dozy derives from verb Arab. ratakī, “qui, à la IVe forme signifie ‘effect ut brevibus assibus incederet.’” This is precisely the effect of a martingale. And we venture to say that probably the word bore its English meaning originally also in French and Spanish, and came from Arabic direct into the latter tongue. Dozy himself, we should add, is inclined to derive the Span. word from al-mirta’d, ‘a halter.’

MASCABAR, s. This is given by C. P. Brown (MS. notes) as an Indo-Portuguese word for ‘the last day of the month,’ quoting Calcutta Review, viii. 345. He suggests as its etymon Hind. māsik-bandar, ‘after a month.’ [In N. Indian public offices the māskābar is well known as the monthly statement of cases decided during the month. It has been suggested that it represents the Port. mesa-nombre, ‘end of the month’; but according to Platts, it is more probably a corruption of Hind. māsik-va’d or māsik-va’dr.]

MASKEE. This is a term in Chinese “pigeon,” meaning ‘never mind,’ ‘n’importe,’ which is constantly in the mouths of Europeans in China. It is supposed that it may be the corruption or ellipsis of a Portuguese expression, but nothing satisfactory has been suggested. [Mr. Skeat writes: “Surely this is simply Port. mas que, probably imported direct through Macao, in the sense of ‘although, even, in spite of,’ like French malgré. And this seems to be its meaning in ‘pigeon’: ‘That nightey tim begin chop-chop, One young man walkie—no can stop. Maskee snow, maskee ice! He cally flag with chop so nice— Topside Galow! ’ ‘Excelsior,’ in ‘pigeon.’”]

MARYACAR, n.p. According to R. Drummond and a MS. note on the India Library copy of his book R. Catholics in Malabar were so called, Marya Karar, or Mary’s People. [The word appears to be really marakkar, of which two explanations are given. Login (Malabar, i. 332 note) says that Marakkar means ‘doer or follower of the Law’ (mar'yapram), and is applied to a foreign religion, like that of Christians and Mohammedans. The Madras Gloss. (iii. 474) derives it from Mal. marakkalam, ‘boat,’ and kar, a terminating showing possession, and defines it as a “tittular appellation of the Moplah Mahommedans on the S.W. coast.”]

MASULIPATAM. n.p. This coast town of the Madras Presidency is sometimes vulgarly called Machlipatan or Machhli-bandar, or simply Bandar (see BINDER, 2); and its name explained (Hind. machhī, ‘fish’) as Fish-town. [The Madras Gloss. says, from an old tradition of a whale being stranded on the shore.] The etymology may originally have had such a connection, but there can be no doubt that the name is a trace of the Mascali and Masūlun or σταυρός eκβολαι which we find in Ptolemy’s Tables; and of the masala producing muslins, in the Periplos. [In one of the old Logs the name is transformed into Mesopotamia (J.R. As. Soc., Jan. 1900, p. 158). In a letter of 1605-6 it appears as Masulipatanga (Birdwood, First Letter Book, 72).

Bull, i. 153].

1789.—"Masulipatam, which last word, by the bye, ought to be written Machilipatan (Fish-town), because of a Whale that happened to be stranded there 150 years ago."—Note on Seir Mutoapheria, iii. 370.

e. 1790.—"...cloths of great value...from the countries of Bengal, Bunaras, China, Kashmir, Boorhanpoor, Mutchiliputun, &c."—More Husein Ali, H. of Hydro Naik, 383.

MATOE, MATY. s. An assistant under a head servant; in which sense or something near it, but also sometimes in the sense of a 'head-man,' the word is in use almost all over India. In the Bengal Presidency we have a mate-bearer for the assistant body-servant (see BEARER); the mate attendant on an elephant under the mahout; a mate (head) of coolies or jomponnies (qq.v.) (see JOMPON), &c. And in Madras the maty is an under-servant, whose business it is to clean crockery, knives, &c., to attend to lamps, and so forth.

The origin of the word is obscure, if indeed it has not more than one origin. Some have supposed it to be taken from the English word in the sense of comrade, &c.; whilst Wilson gives metti as a distinct Malayalam word for an inferior domestic servant, [which the Madras Gloss, derives from Tamil ned, 'high']. The last word is of very doubtful genuineness. Neither derivation will explain the fact that the word occurs in the Ain, in which the three classes of attendants on an elephant in Akbar's establishment are styled respectively Mahudat, Bhoi, and Meth; two of which terms would, under other circumstances, probably be regarded as corruptions of English words. This use of the word we find in Skt. dictionaries as metha, meghtha, and mehna, 'an elephant-keeper' or feeder. But for the more general use we would query whether it may not be a genuine Prakrit form from Skt. mitra, 'associate, friend?' We have in Pali metta, 'friendship,' from Skt. maitra.

e. 1590.—"A meth fetches fodder and assists in equipping the elephant. Meths of all classes get on the march 4 dama daily, and at other times 3 ek."—Jain, ed. Blommann, i. 125.

1810.—"In some families mates or assistants are allowed, who do the drudgery."—Williamson, V. M. i. 241.

1837.—"One matee."—See Letters from Madras, 106.

1872.—"At last the morning of our departure came. A crowd of porters stood without the veranda, chattering and squabbling, and the mate distributed the boxes and bundles among them."—A True Reformer, ch. vi.

1873.—"To procure this latter supply (of green food) is the daily duty of one of the attendants, who in Indian phraseology is termed a mate, the title of Mahout being reserved for the head keeper (of an elephant).—Nat. Rec. Sept. 6, 302.

MATRANE. s. Properly Hind. from Pers. mihtaraini; a female sweper (see MEHTAR). [In the following extract the writer seems to mean Bhatiya or Bhatiya, the wife of a Bhatiyara or imu-keeper.

[1785.—"...a handsome serai...where a number of people, chiefly women, called metrahrees, take up their abode to attend strangers on their arrival in the city."—Diary, in Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 404.]

MATROSS. s. An inferior class of soldier in the Artillery. The word is quite obsolete, and is introduced here because it seems to have survived a good deal longer in India than in England, and occurs frequently in old Indian narratives. It is Germ.
matrose, Dutch *matroos, 'a sailor,' identical no doubt with Fr. *matelot. The origin is so obscure that it seems hardly worth while to quote the conjectures regarding it. In the establishment of a company of Royal Artillery in 1771, as given in Duncan's Hist. of that corps, we have besides sergeants and corporals, "4 Bombardiers, 8 Gunners, 34 Matrosses, and 2 Drummens." A definition of the Matross is given in our 3rd quotation. We have not ascertained when the term was disused in the R.A. It appears in the Establishment as given by Grose in 1801 (Military Antiq. i. 315). As far as Major Duncan's book informs us, it appears first in 1639, and has disappeared by 1793, when we find the men of an artillery force divided (excluding sergeants, corporals, and bombardiers) into First Gunners, Second Gunners, and Military Drivers.

1673. "There being in pay for the Honourable East India Company of English and Portuguese, 700, reckoning the Matrosses and Gunners."—Fryer, 35.

1745.—"... We were told with regard to the Fortifications, that no Expense should be grudged that was necessary for the Defence of the Settlement; and in 1741, a Person was sent out in the character of an Engineer for our Place; but... he lived not to come among us; and therefore, we could only judge of his Merit and Qualifications by the Value of his Stipend, Six Pagodas a Month, or about Eighteen Pence a Day; scarce the Pay of a common Matross."—Letter from Mr. Burnett to the Secret Committee, in Letter to a Proprietor of the E.I. Co., p. 45.

1757.—"I have with me one Gunner, one Matross, and two Lasers."—Letter in *Palmyrene, Or. Repert. i. 203.

1779.—"Matrosses are properly apprenices to the gunner, being soldiers in the royal regiment of artillery, and next to him; they assist in loading, firing, and punging the great guns. They carry fire-locks, and march along with the guns and tore-waggons, both as a guard, and to give their assistance in every emergency."—Capt. J. M. Smith's Universal Military Dictionary.

1792.—"Wednesday evening, the 26th inst., a Matross of Artillery deserted from the Mount, and took away with him his pack, and nine quarts of powder and salt."—Matross Courier, Feb. 2.

1800.—"A serjeant and two matrosses employed under a general committee on the upturned military stores in Seringapatam."—*Wellington Suppl. Desp. ii. 32 (Stans. Dict.).

MAUND.

MATT. s. Touch (of gold). Tamil mattu (pron. mattin), perhaps from Skt. *mātra, 'measure.' Very pure gold is said to be 9 mātra, inferior gold of 5 or 6 mātra.

1693.—"Gold, purified from all other metals... by us is reckoned as of four- and Twenty Carats, but by the blacks here divided and reckoned as of ten mat."—Hawart, 106.

1727.—At Mocha... "the Coffee Trade brings in a continual Supply of Silver and Gold... from Turkey, Ebrames and Mograbis, Gold of low Matt."—A. Hamilton, i. 43, [ed. 1744].

1752.—"... to find the Value of the Touch in Fanams, multiply the Matt by 10, and then by 8, which gives it in Fanams."—T. Brooks, 25.

The same word was used in Japan for a measure, sometimes called a fathom.

MAUMLET. s. Domestic Hind. mutulat, for 'omelet'; [M múlet is 'marmalade'].

MAUND. s. The authorised Anglo-Indian form of the name of a weight (Hind. man, Mahr. maun), which, with varying values, has been current over Western Asia from time immemorial. Professor Sayce traces it (mana) back to the Accadian language.* But in any case it was the Babylonian name for 1/3 of a talent, whence it passed, with the Babylonian weights and measures, almost all over the ancient world. Compare the men or maoa of Egyptian hieroglyphic inscriptions, preserved in the enma or amaa of the Copts, the Hebrew maw (maw), and the Roman mina. The introduction of the word into India may have occurred during the extensive commerce of the Arabs with that country during the 8th and 9th centuries; possibly at an earlier date. Through the Arabs also we find an old Spanish word almena, and in old French alme, for a weight of about 20 lbs. (Marcel Duc). The quotations will show how the Portuguese converted man into mão, of which the English made maune, and so (probably by the influence of the old English word maund)* our present form, which occurs as early as 1611. Some of the older travellers, like Linschoten, misled by the Portuguese wāna, identified it with the word for 'hand' in that language, and so rendered it.

The values of the man as weight, even in modern times, have varied immensely, i.e. from little more than 2 lbs. to upwards of 160. The 'Indian Maund,' which is the standard of weight in British India, is of 40 sers, each ser being divided into 16 chihifers; and this is the general scale of subdivision in the local weights of Bengal, and Upper and Central India, though the value of the ser varies. That of the standard ser is 80 tolas (q.v.) or rupee-weights, and thus the maund = 82 2/3 lbs. avoidipous. The Bombay maund (or man) of 48 sers = 28 lbs. the Madras one of 40 sers = 25 lbs. The Palloda man of Ahmadnagar contained 64 sers, and was 163 3/4 lbs. This is the largest man we find in the 'Useful Tables.' The smallest Indian man again is that of Colachy in Travancore, and that = 18 lbs. 12 oz., 13 dr. The Persian Tahab man is, however, a little less than 7 lbs.; the man shahi twice that; the smallest of all on the list named is the Jeddah man = 2 lbs. 3 oz. 9 1/2 dr.

b. c. 692.—In the 'Eponymy of Zazai,' a house in Nineveh, with its shrubbery and gates, is sold for one maun of silver according to the royal standard. Quoted by Siger, s.v.

b. c. 667.—We find Nergal-sarra-naor lending 'four mans of silver, according to the man of Carchemish.'—Ibid.

c. b. c. 524.—"Cambyse received the Libyan presents very graciously, but not so the gifts of the Cyrenaeans. They had sent no more than 500 minas of silver, which Cambyse, I imagine, thought too little. He therefore snatched the money from them, and with his own hand scuttered it among the soldiers."—Herodot. iii. 13 (E.T. by Rawlinson).

c. a. D. 70.—"Et quoniam in mensuris quaque ac ponderibus cerebro Graecus nominibus utendum est, interpretationem eorum semel in hoc loco ponamus: ... mna, quam nostri minam vocant pendet drachmus Atticæ c."—Pliny, xxii., at end.

c. 1029.—"The gold and silver ingots amounted to 700,400 mans in weight."—At Ubi, in Elliot, ii. 35.

1040.—"The Amir said:—'Let us keep fair measure, and fill the cups evenly.' ... Each goblet contained half a man."—Bailhaki, ibid. ii. 144.

c. 1345.—"The Mena of Sarai makes in Geneva weight ... ibid. 6 oz. 2

1568.—"The value of stones is only because people desire to have them, and because they are scarce, but as for virtues, those of the loadstone, which stanches blood, are very much greater and better attested than those of the emerald. And yet the former sells by maos, which are in Cambay ... equal to 26..."—Garcia, c. 158c.

1598.—"'They have another weight called Mao, which is a Hand, and is 12 pounds."—Linschoten, 69; [Hak. Soc. i. 245].

1610.—"He was found ... to have sixty maunes in Gold, and every maune is five and fiftine pound weight."—Cârduces, in Purchas, i. 218.

1611.—"Each maund being three and thirtine pound English weight."—Middleton, ibid. i. 270.

[1645.—"As for the weights, the ordinary maund is 69 livres, and the livre is of 16 ounces; but the maund, which is used to weigh indigo, is only 53 livres. At Surat you speak of a ser, which is 14 3/4 livres, and the livre is 16 ounces."—Tavernier,* ed. Ball, i. 38.]

c. 1665.—"Le man pese quarante livres par toutes les Indes, mais ces livres sur serres sont differentes selon les Pays."—Tavernot, v. 51.

1673.—"A Lombreiro (Sonce) of pure Gold, weighing about one Maund and a quarter, which is Forty-two pounds."—Fryer, 78.

"The Surat Maund . . . is 40 Seers, of 20 Pice the Seer, which is 37f.

The Pucka Maund at Agra is double as much, where is also the Ecbary Maund which is 40 Seers, of 30 Pice to the Seer. . . ."—Ibid. 205.

1683.—"Agreed with Chittur Mullsw and Muttramas, Merchants of this place (Hugly), for 1,700 Bales of ye best Tissinda Sugar, each bale to weigh 2 Maunds, 61 1/2 Seers, Factory weight."—Hedges, Diary, April 5; [Hak. Soc. i. 75].

1711.—"Sugar, Coffee, Tutanagum, all sorts of Drugs, &c., are sold by the Maund Tabrees; which in the Factory and Custom house is nearest 6/1. Avoirdupois. . . .
Eatables, and all sorts of Fruit . . . &c. are sold by the Maund Cooper at 71/4.
The Maund Shaw is two Maunds Taberes, used at Isphahan."—Lockyer, 220.

c. 1760.—Grose says, "the maund they weigh their indices with is only 58 lb." He states the maund of Upper India as 60lb.: at Bombay, 28 lb. at Goa, 14 lb.; at Surat, 37 1/4 lb.; at Coromandel, 25 lb.; in Bengal, 75 lb.

1854.—". . . You only consent to make play when you have packed a good maund of traps on your back."—Life of Lord Lawrence, i. 483.

MAYLA. s. Hind. mela, 'a fair,' almost always connected with some religious celebration, as were so many of the medieval fairs in Europe. The word is Skt. mela, melaka, 'meeting, concourse, assembly.'

[1852.—"A party of foreigners . . . wished to see what was going on at this far-famed maylaih. . . ."—Mrs. More O'Staen Abi, Observations, ii. 321.]

1869.—"Le Mela n'est pas précisément une foire telle que nous l'entendons; c'est le nom qu'on donne aux réunions de pèlerins et des marchands qui . . . se rendent dans les lieux considérés comme sacrés, aux fêtes de certaines dieux indiens et des personnages réputés saints parmi les musulmans."—

MAZAGON, MAZAGON. n.p.
A suburb of Bombay, containing a large Portuguese population. [The name is said to be originally Malach-grima, 'the village of the Great Lord,' Siva.]

1543.—
'Mazaguão. por 15,000 jéden.
Mombaym (Bombay), por 15,000.'—N. Botelho, Tombô, 149.

1644.—"Going up the stream from this town (Mombaym, i.e. Bombay) some 2 leagues, you come to the aldea of Maza-gam."—Bonarr, Ms. f. 227.

1673.—". . . for some miles together, till the Sea break in between them; over against which lies Massegoung, a great Fishing Town. . . . The Ground this and the Great Breach is well ploughed and bears good Battye. Here the Portugals have another Church and Religious House belonging to the Franciscans."—Fryer, p. 67.

[MEARBAR, s. Pers. mirbar, 'master of the bay,' a harbour-master. Mirbari, which appears in Botelho (Tombô, p. 56) as mirabary, means 'ferry dues.'

MECKLEY, n.p. One of the names of the State of Munneapore.

MEEANA. MYANNA. s. H.—P. miyana, 'middle-sized.' The name of a kind of palankin; that kind out of which the palankin used by Europeans has been developed, and which has been generally adopted in India for the last century. [Buchanan Hamilton writes: "The lowest kind of palanquins, which are small litters suspended under a straight bamboo, by which they are carried, and shaded by a frame covered with cloth, do not admit the passenger to lie at length, and are here called miyana, or Mahapa. In some places, these terms are conidered as synonymous, in others the Miyana is open at the sides, while the Mahapa, intended for women, is surrounded with curtains." (Eastern India, ii. 426.)] In Williamson's Vade Mecum (i. 319) the word is written Mohannah.

1754.—". . . an entire new myannah, painted and gilt, lined with orange silk, with curtains and bedding complete."—In Sam-Kor. i. 49.

. . . Patna common chairs, couches and tea-boys, two Mahana palanquins."— Ibid. 62.

1795.—"For Sale, an Elegant Fashionable New Meana from Calcutta."—Ibid. May 16.

MEERASS. s., MEERASSY. adj., MEERASSIDAR. s. 'Inheritance,' 'hereditary,' 'a holder of hereditary property.' Hind. from Arab. mirâs弯曲, mirdas弯曲, mirdâs弯曲; and these from varîs, 'to inherit.'

1806.—"Every meerassar in Tanjore has been furnished with a separate pottah in. . . for the land held by him."—Fifth Report (1812), 774.

1812.—"The term meerassee . . . was introduced by the Mahomedians."—Ibid. 136.

1877.—"All miras rights were reclaimable within a forty years' al-sence."—Meedowes Taylor, Story of My Life, ii. 211.

. . . I found a great proportion of the occupants of land to be mirasders.—that is, persons who held their portions of land in hereditary occupancy."—Ibid. 210.
MEHAUL. s. Hind. from Arab. mahall, being properly the pl. of Arab. mahall. The word is used with a considerable variety of application, the explanation of which would involve a greater amount of technical detail than is consistent with the purpose of this work. On this Wilson may be consulted. But the most usual Anglo-Indian application of mahall (used as a singular and generally written, incorrectly, mahal) is to 'an estate,' in the Revenue sense, i.e. 'a parcel or parcels of land separately assessed for revenue.' The sing. mahall (also written in the vernaculars mahal, and mahal) is often used for a palace or important edifice, e.g. (see SHISH-MUHULL, TAJ-MAHAL).

MEHTAR. s. A sweeper or scavenger. This name is usual in the Bengaé Presidency, especially for the domestic servant of this class. The word is Pers. comp. mibtir (Lat. major), 'a great personage,' 'a prince,' and has been applied to the class in question in irony, or rather in consolation, as the domestic tailor is called caleefa. But the name has so completely adhered in this application, that all sense of either irony or consolation has perished; mehtar is a sweeper and nought else. His wife is the Matranee. It is not unusual to hear two mehtars hailing each other as Maharrj! In Persia the menial application of the word seems to be different (see below). The same class of servant is usually called in W. India bhangi (see BUNGY), a name which in Upper India is applied to the caste generally and specially to those not in the service of Europeans. [Examples of the word used in the honorific sense will be found below.]

1828. "... besides many mehtars or stable-boys." — Haji Baba in England, i. 60.

In the honorific sense:

[1821. "In each of the towns of Central India, there is ... a mehtar, or head of every other class of the inhabitants down to the lowest." — Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. i. 555.

1880. "On the right bank is the fort in which the Mihter or Baidshah, for he is known by both titles, resides." — Biddulph, Tribes of the Hindoo Kush, 61.]

MELINDE, MELINDA, n.p. The name (Melinda or Malindi) of an Arab town and State on the east coast of Africa, in S. lat. 3° 9'; the only one at which the expedition of Vasco da Gama had amicable relations with the people, and that at which they obtained the pilot who guided the squadron to the coast of India.

c. 1150. "Melinde, a town of the Zendi, ... is situated on the sea-shore at the mouth of a river of fresh water. ... It is a large town, the people of which ... draw from the sea different kinds of fish, which they dry and trade in. They also possess and work mines of iron." — Edrisi (Joubert), i. 56.

c. 1820. See also Abludja, by Reinard, ii. 207.

1848. "And that same day at sun-downd went a ship and an large right opposite a place which is called Melinde, which is 30 leagues from Mombaça. ... On Easter Day those Moors whom we held prisoners, told us that in the said town of Milinde were stopping four ships of Christians who were Indians, and that if we desired to take them these would give us, instead of themselves, Christian Pilots." — Roteiro de Vasco da Gama, 42-3.

1554. "As the King of Melinde pays no tribute, nor is there any reason why he should, considering the many tokens of friendship we have received from him, both on the first discovery of these countries, and to this day, and which in my opinion we repay very badly, by the ill treatment which he has from the Captains who go on service to this Coast." — Simão Botelho, Tombo, 17.

1570. "Di Chialul si negoìa anco per la costa de' Melinde in Ethiopia." — Cesare de' Federici in Ramusio, iii. 396v.

1572. "Quando chegava a frota àquella parte Onde o reino Melinde já se via, De toldos adornada, e leda de arte: Que bem mostra estimar a saneta dia Treme a bandeira, voo o estandarte, A cor purpurea ao longe apaarecia, Scam os atumbarcs, e pandeiros: E assi entravam ledes e guerreiros." — Canções, ii. 73.

By Burton:

"At such a time the Squadron neared the part where first Melinde's godly shore unseen, in awnings drest and prankt with gallant art, to show that none the Holy Day misseen: Flutter the flags, the streaming Estandart gleams from afar with gorgeous purple sheen, tom-toms and timbrels mingle martial jar: thus past they forwards with the pomp of war."
MERGUI.

1610.—P. Teixeira tells us that among the "Moors" at Ormuz, Alboquerque was known only by the name of Malandy, and that with some difficulty he obtained the explanation that he was so called because he came thither from the direction of Melinde, which they call Maland.—Relación de los Reyes de Hormuz, 45.

1859.—"As regards the immigration of the Wagemu (Ajemi, or Persians), from whom the ruling tribe of the Wasawahlí derives its name, they relate that several Shaykhs, or elders, from Shiraz emigrated to Shangya, a district near the Ozi River, and founded the town of Malindi (Mélinda)."—Burton, in J.R.G.S. xxix. 51.

MELIQUE VERIDO, n.p. The Portuguese form of the style of the princes of the dynasty established at Bidar in the end of the 15th century, on the decay of the Bahmani kingdom. The name represents 'Malik Barid,' It was apparently only the third of the dynasty, 'Ali, who first took the title of ('Ali) Barid Shah.

1538.—"And as the falasomía (?) of Badur was very great, as well as his presumption, he sent word to Vazam Maluco (Nizamalaco) and to Verido (who were great Lords, as it were Kings, in the Decaniam, that lies between the Balgat and Cambaya)... that they must pay him homage, or he would hold them for enemies, and would direct war against them, and take away their dominions."—Correa, iii. 514.

1563.—"And these regents... concerted among themselves... that they should seize the King of Daquem in Bedar, which is the chief city and capital of the Decan: so they took him up, and committed him to one of their number, by name Verido; and then he and the rest, either in person or by their representatives, make him a salam (calme) at certain days of the year... The Verido who died in the year 1510 was a Hungarian by birth, and originally a Christian. As I have heard on sure authority."—García, f. 55 and 55r.

c. 1601.—"About this time a letter arrived from the Prince Sultán Dáuíyáld, reporting that (Malik) Anbar had collected his troops in Bidar, and had gained a victory over a party which had been sent to oppose him by Malik Barid."—Iáyáyá Ullah, in Elliot, vi. 104.

MEM-SAHI.B. s. This singular example of a hybrid term is the usual respectful designation of a European married lady in the Bengal Presidency; the first portion representing ma'am. Madam Sahib is used at Bombay; Doressani (see DORAY) in Madras. (See also BURRA BIBEE."

MENDY, s. Hind. mehdni, [mehdli, Skt. medhikaj]; the plant Lawsonia alba, Lam., of the N. O. Lythraceae, strongly resembling the English privet in appearance, and common in gardens. It is the plant whose leaves afford the henna, used so much in Mahommédan countries for dyeing the hands, &c., and also in the process of dyeing the hair. Mehdni is, according to Royle, the Cyprus of the ancients (see Pliny, xii. 24). It is also the campfire of the Cánticles 1. 14, where the margin of A.V. has erroneously cyipress for Cyprus.

[1813.—"After the girls are betrothed, the ends of the fingers and nails are dyed red, with a preparation from the Mendey, or hinna shrub."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 55; also see i. 22.]

c. 1817.—"... his house and garden might be known from a thousand others by their extraordinary neatness. His garden was full of trees, and was well fenced round with a ditch and mindey hedge."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, ed. 1873, p. 71.

MERCÁLL, MARCÁL. s. Tam. marakkai, a grain measure in use in the Madras Presidency, and formerly varying much in different localities, though the most usual was 12 sers of grain. [Also known as toorn.] Its standard is fixed since 1846 at 800 cubic inches, and is \( \frac{1}{2} \) of a garce (q.v.).

1554.—(Negapatam) "Of ghee (manteige) and oil, one mercar is=2\frac{1}{2} cañudos" (i.e. Portuguese measure of about 3 pints).—A. NUMÉR. 36.

1805.—"... take care to put on each bullock full six mercalls or 22 seers."—Willington Desp., ed. 1837, ii. 55.

Mergui, n.p. The name by which we know the most southern district of Lower Burma with its town; annexed with the rest of what used to be called the "Tenasserim Provinces" after the war of 1824-26. The name is probably of Siamese origin; the town is called by the Burmese Bet (Sir A. Phayre).

1805.—"Tenari: la quale è Città delle regioni del regno di Siam, posta infra terra due o tre maree sopra un gran fiume... ed onde il fiume entra in mare e vna villia chiamata Mergi, nel porto della quale ogn' anno si caricano alcune navi di virtu (see BRAZIL-wood and SAPPAN-wood), di nipa (q.v.), di geludun (see BENJAMIN), e qualche poco di garfalo, macis, noeti..."—Ces. Ed-ricc. in Romæsio, iii. 327v.

MILK-BUSH, MILK-HEDGE. s. Euphorbia Tirucalli, L., often used for hedges on the Coromandel coast. It abounds in acrid milky juices.

c. 1590.—"They enclose their fields and gardens with hedges of the zekoom (zakkum) tree, which is a strong defence against cattle, and makes the country almost impenetrable by an army."—Ajcen, ed. Gladwin, ii. 68; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 239].

[1773.—"Milky Hedge. This is rather a shrub, which they plant for hedges on the coast of Coromandel. . . ."—Ilos, 462.]

1570. — "Thorn hedges are sometimes placed in gardens, but in the fields the milk bush is most commonly used . . . when squeezed emitting a whitish juice like milk, that is deemed a deadly poison. . . . A horse will have his head and eyes prodigiously swelled from standing for some time under the shade of a milk hedge."—Manro's Narr. 80.

"So saying, Buddha
Silently laid aside sandals and stuff,
His sacred thread, turban, and cloth, and came Forth from behind the milk-bush on the sand. . . ."

Sir E. Arnold, Light of Asia, Bk. v.

c. 1886.—"The milk-hedge forms a very distinctive feature in the landscape of many parts of Guzerat. Twigs of the plant thrown into running water kill the fish, and are extensively used for that purpose. Also charred from the stems is considered the best for making gunpowder."—M. Gen. R. H. Kraitage.

MINCOPIE. n.p. This term is attributed in books to the Andaman islanders as their distinctive name for their own race. It originated with a vocabulary given by Lient. Colebrooke in vol. iv. of the Asiatic Researches, and was certainly founded on some misconception. Nor has the possible origin of the mistake been ascertained. [Mr. Man (Proc. Anthropol. Institute, xii. 71) suggests that it may have been a corruption of the words min kaikh! 'Come here!']

MINICOY, n.p. Minikai; [Logan (Malabar, i. 2) gives the name as Menakjat, which the Madras Gloss. derives from Mal. min, 'fish,' kayan, 'deep pool.' The natives call it Maliku (note by Mr. Gray on the passage from Pyrad quoted below).] An island intermediate between the Maldives and the Laccadive group. Politically it belongs to the latter, being the property of the Ali Raja of Cannanore, but the people and their language are Maldivian. The population in 1871 was 2800. One-sixth of the adults had perished in a cyclone in 1867. A lighthouse was in 1883 erected on the island. This is probably the island intended for Mulke in that ill-edited book the E.T. of Tahfat al-Majahidin. [Mr. Logan identifies it with the "female island" of Marco Polo. (Malabar, i. 287.)]

c. 1340.—"The prince, violently enraged, caused this officer to be put in prison, and confiscated his goods, which amounted to 437,000,000 mithkals of gold. This anecdote serves to attest at once the severity of the sovereign and the extreme wealth of the country."—Shihabuddin, in Not. et Est., xii. 192.

1502.—"Upon which the King (of Sofala) showed himself much pleased . . . and gave them as a present for the Captain-Major a mass of strings of small golden beads which they call pungo, weighing 1000 maticals, every matical being worth 500 reis, and gave for the King another that weighed 9000 maticals . . . ."—Correa, i. 274.

MISREE, Sugar candy. Misri, 'Egyptian,' from Misr, Egypt, the Mizraim of the Hebrews, showing the original source of supply. [We find the Misri or 'sugar of Egypt' in the Arabian Nights (Burton, xi. 396).] (See under SUGAR.)

1810.—"The sugar-candy made in India, where it is known by the name of miscrey, bears a price suited to its quality. . . . It is usually made in small conical pots, whence it concretes into masses, weighing from 3 to 6 lbs. each."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 131.

MISSAL, s. Hind. from Ar. misl, meaning 'similitude.' The body of documents in a particular case before a court. [The word is also used in its original sense of a 'clan.']

[1861.—"The martial spirit of the Sikhs thus aroused . . . formed itself into clans or confederacies called Missis."—Cass-Brown, Punjib and Delhi, i. 385.]
MOBED. s. P. mābid, a title of Parsee Priests. It is a corruption of the Pehlevi magā-pat, 'Lord Magus.'

1315.—"The rites ordained by the chief Mobuds are still observed."—Malcolm, II. of Persia, ed. 1826, i. 499.

MOCUDDUM. s. Hind. from Ar. muqaddām, 'praepositus,' a head-man. The technical applications are many; e.g. to the headman of a village, responsible for the realisation of the revenue (see LUMBERDAR); to the local head of a caste (see CHOWDRY); to the head man of a body of peas or of a gang of labourers (see MATE). &c. &c. (See further detail in Wilson.)

1585.—... a chief Botecos... which they call Mocadon."—Linschon, Hak. Soc. i. 267.

[c. 1610.—"They call these Lascars and their captain Mocadon."—Jnand de Lira]. Hak. Soc. ii. 117.

The passage is also referred to under NACODA. The French translation runs as follows:—"Cette personne invitée... le dit... on general des peison... et le šīkāhdin... on general des archers... In answer to a query our friend, Prof. Robertson Smith, writes: 'The word is riβūl, and this may be used either as the plural of riβūl, or as the pl. of riβūl, riβūl. But, forearm, or praepositus of the men (muqaddām is not well rendered "general"); is just as possible. And, if possible, much more reasonable. "Patulsiar (J. A. MOCUDDAMA. s. Hind. from Ar. muqaddāma, 'a piece of business,' but especially 'a suit at law.'

MODELLIAR. MODILLIAR. s. Used in the Tamil districts of Ceylon (and formerly on the Continent) for a native head-man. It is also a caste title, assumed by certain Tamil people who styled themselves nadir (an honourable assumption in the South). Tam. modillīar; makkhēlar, an honorific pl. from modali, mohali, 'a chief.'

C. 1359.—"When I was staying at Colombo (see QUILON) with those Christian chiefs who are called Modilliar, and are the owners of the pepper, one morning there came to me..."—John de Marignall, in Cathay, &c. ii. 381.

1522.—"And in opening this foundation they found about a cubit below a grave made of brickwork, white-washed within, as if newly made, in which they found part of the bones of the King who was converted by the holy Apostle, who the natives said they heard was called Tome (Tami) mudo-lyar, meaning in their tongue 'Thomas Servant of God.'"—Coyne, ii. 726.

1648.—"The 5 August followed from Candy the Modellar, or Great Captain...
MOFUSSIL, s., also used adjectively, "The provinces— the country stations and districts, as contra-distinguished from 'the Presidency'; or, relatively, the rural localities of a district as contra-distinguished from the sudder or chief station, which is the residence of the district authorities. Thus if, in Calcutta, one talks of the Mofussil, he means anywhere in Bengal out of Calcutta; if one at Benares talks of going into the Mofussil, he means going anywhere in the Benares division or district (as the case might be) out of the city and station of Benares. And so over India. The word (Hind. from Ar.) mofussal means properly 'separate, detailed, particular,' and hence 'provincial,' as mofussal 'adibat,' a 'provincial court of justice.' This indicates the way in which the word came to have the meaning attached to it.

About 1845 a clever, free-and-easy newspaper, under the name of The Mofussilite, was started at Meerut, by Mr. John Lang, author of Too Clever by Half, &c., and endured for many years.

MOGUL. THE GREAT. n.p.

Sometimes 'The Mogul' simply. The name by which the Kings of Delhi of the House of Timur were popularly styled, first by the Portuguese (o grande Mogor) and after them by Europeans generally. It was analogous to the Sophy (q.v.), as applied to the Kings of Persia, or to the 'Great Turk' applied to the Sultan of Turkey. Indeed the latter phrase was probably the model of the present one. As noticed under the preceding article, Mogul, Mogor, and also Mogolistan are applied among old writers to the dominions of the Great Mogul. We have found no native idiom precisely suggesting the latter title; but Moghal is thus used in the Arash-i-Mahfil below, and Mogolistan must have been in some native use, for it is a form that Europeans would not have invented. (See quotations from Thevenot here and under MOHWA.)

MOHUR, GOLD.

1786. — "That Shah Allum, the prince commonly called the Great Mogul, or, by eminence, the King, is or lately was in possession of the ancient capital of Hindostan. . . ." — Art. of Charge against Hastings, in Burke, vii. 189.

1807. — "L'Hindoustan depuis quelque temps dominé par une multitude de petits souverains, qui s'arrachent l'un l'autre leurs possessions. Aucun d'eux ne reconnait comme il faut l'autorité légitime du Mogol, si ce n'est cependant Messieurs les Anglais, lesquels n'ont pas cessé d'être soumis à son obéissance; on sort qu'actuellement, c'est à dire en 1222 (1807) ils reconnaissent l'autorité suprême d'Akbar Schah, fils de Shah Alam." — Afsis, Arvach-(Mogh), quoted by Garcin de Tassy, Rel. Mus. 90.

MOGUL BREECHES. s. Apparently an early name for what we call long-drawers or pyjamas (qq.v.).

1625. — "... let him have his shirt on and his Mogul breeches; here are women in the house." — Beaumont & Fletcher, The Fair Maid of the Inn, iv. 2.

In a picture by Vandyke of William 1st Earl of Denbigh, belonging to the Duke of Hamilton, and exhibited at Edinburgh in July 1853, the subject is represented as out shooting, in a red striped shirt and pyjamas, no doubt the "Mogul breeches" of the period.

MOHUR, GOLD, s. The official name of the chief gold coin of British India, Hind. from Pers. mohur, a (metallic) seal, and thence a gold coin. It seems possible that the word is taken from mihr, 'the sun,' as one of the secondary meanings of that word is 'a golden circlet on the top of an umbrella, or the like' (Fuller's). [Platts, on the contrary, identifies it with Skt. madhūra, 'a seal.']

The term mohur, as applied to a coin, appears to have been popular only and quasi-generic, not precise. But that to which it has been most usually applied, at least in recent centuries, is a coin which has always been in use since the foundation of the Mahommedan Empire in Hindustan by the Ghūri Kings of Ghazni and their freemen, circa A.D. 1200, tending to a standard weight of 100 ratis (see RUTTEE) of pure gold, or about 175 grains, thus equaling in weight, and probably intended then to equal ten times in value, the silver coin which has for more than three centuries been called Rupee.

There is good ground for regarding this as the theory of the system.* But the gold coins, especially, have deviated from the theory considerably; a deviation which seems to have commenced with the violent innovations of Sultan Mahommed Taghlibak (1325-1351), who raised the gold coin to 200 grains, and diminished the silver coin to 140 grains, a change which may have been connected with the enormous influx of gold into Upper India, from the plunder of the inmemorial accumulations of the Peninsula in the first quarter of the 14th century. After this the coin again settled down in approximation to the old weight, insomuch that, on taking the weight of 46 different mohurs from the lists given in Prinsep's Tables, the average of pure gold is 167.22 grains.†

The first gold mohur struck by the Company's Government was issued in 1769, and declared to be a legal tender for 14 seica rupees. The full weight of this coin was 179.66 grs., containing 149.72 grs. of gold. But it was impossible to render it current at the rate fixed; it was called in, and in 1769 a new mohur was issued to pass as legal tender for 16 seica rupees. The weight of this was 190.773 grs. (according to Regn. of 1793, 190.894), and it contained 190.086 grs. of gold.

Regulation xxxv. of 1793 declared these gold mohurs to be a legal tender in all public and private transactions. Regn. xiv. of 1818 declared, among other things, that "it has been thought advisable to make a slight deduction in the intrinsic value of the gold mohur to be coined at this Presidency (Fort William), in order to raise the value of fine gold to finesilver, from the present rates of 1 to 14.861 to that of 1 to 15. The gold mohur will still continue to pass current at the rate of 16 rupees." The new gold mohur was to weigh 204.710 grs., containing fine gold 157.651 grs. Once more Act xvii. of 1835 declared that the only gold coin to be coined at Indian mints should be (with proportionate subdivisions) a gold mohur or "15 rupee piece" of the weight of 180 grs. troy, containing 165 grs. of pure gold; and declared also that no gold coin should thenceforward be a legal tender of payment in any of the territories of the E.I. Company. There has been since then no substantive change.

A friend (W. Simpson, the accomplished artist) was told in India that gold mohur was a corruption of gol, (round?) moho, indicating a distinction from the square mohurs of some of the Delhi Kings. But this we take to be purely fanciful.

MOHURRE, MOHERR, &c., s.

A writer in a native language. Ar. moharrir, 'an elegant, correct writer.' The word occurs in Grose (c. 1760) as 'Mooreis, writers.'

MOHURREM, s. Ar. Mulharrum ('sacer'), properly the name of the 1st month of the Mahommedan lunar year. But in India the term is applied to the period of fasting and public mourning observed during that month in commemoration of the death of Hassan and of his brother Husain (A.D. 689 and 680) and which terminates in the ceremonies of the 'Ashurda-a, commonly however known in India as the Mohurrem.' MOHWA, MHOWA, MOWA, s.

Hind. &c, mahwa, mowá, Skt. madhúka, the large oak-like tree Bassia latifolia,* Roxb. (N. O. Sapotaceae), also the flower of this tree from which a spirit is distilled and the spirit itself. It is said that the Mahwa flower is now largely exported to France for the manufacture of liqueurs. The tree, in groups, or singly, is common all over Central India in the lower lands, and, more sparingly, in the Gangetic provinces. "It abounds in Guzerat. When the flowers are falling the Hill-

* Was this ignorance, or slang? Though slave-boys are occasionally mentioned, there is no indication that slaves were at all the usual substitute for domestic servants at this time in European families.

men camp under the trees to collect them. And it is a common practice to sit perched on one of the trees in order to shoot the large deer which come to feed on the fallen mhowa. The timber is strong and durable. (M.-Gen. R. H. Keatinge.)

1871.—"The flower... possesses considerable substance, and a sweet but sickly taste and smell. It is a favourite article of food with all the wild tribes, and the lower classes of Hindus; but its main use is in the distillation of ardent spirits, most of what is consumed being Mhowa. The spirit, when well made, and mellowed by age, is by no means despicable quality, resembling in some degree Irish whisky. The luscious flowers are no less a favourite food of the brute creation than of man..."—Forsyth, Highlands of C. India, 75.

MOLE-ISLAM. n.p. The title applied to a certain class of rustic Mahommadeans or quasi-Mahommadeans in Guzerat, said to have been forcibly converted in the time of the famous Sultan Mahmúd Bigarra. Butler's "Prince of Cambay." We are ignorant of the true orthography or meaning of the term. [In the E. Panjab the descendants of Jats forcibly converted to Islam are known as Maul, or 'unfortunate' (Ibbetson, Panjab Ethnography, p. 142). The word is derived from the 'nokdatta' or lunar asterism of Mál, to be born in which is considered specially unlucky.]

MOLEY. s. A kind of (so-called wet) curry used in the Madras Presidency, a large amount of coco-nut being one of the ingredients. The word is a corruption of 'Mály'; the dish being simply a bad imitation of one used by the Malays.

[1885.—"Regarding the Ceylon curry... It is known by some as the 'Malay curry,' and it is closely allied to the moli of the Tamils of Southern India." Then follows the recipe.—Hygeia, Culinary Jetings, 5th ed., 299.]

MOLLY, or (better) MALLEE, s. Hind. máli, Sikt. malika, 'a garland-maker,' or a member of the caste which furnishes gardeners. We sometimes have heard a lady from the Bengal Presidency speak of the daily homage of "the Molly with his dolly," viz. of the moli with his doli.

MOLUCCAS. n.p. The 'Spice Islands,' strictly speaking the five Clove Islands, lying to the west of Gilolo, and by name Ternate (Turnáti), Tidore (Tidóri), Mortir, Makian, and Bachian. [See Mr. Gray's note on Pyyard de Lauren, Hak. Soc. ii. 166.] But the application of the name has been extended to all the islands under Dutch rule, between Celebes and N. Guinea. There is a Dutch governor residing at Ambonaya, and the islands are divided into 4 residencies, viz. Ambonaya, Banda, Ternate and Manado. The origin of the name Molucca, or Maluco as the Portuguese called it, is not recorded; but it must have been that by which the islands were known to the native traders at the time of the Portuguese discoveries. The early accounts often dwell on the fact that each island (at least three of them) had a king of its own. Possibly they got the (Ar.) name of Jazirat-al-Mulák, 'The Isles of the Kings.'

Valentijn probably entertained the same view of the derivation. He begins his account of the islands by saying:

"There are many who have written of the Moluccos and of their Kings, but we have hitherto met with no writer who has given an exact view of the subject" (Ist. t. Mol. 3).

And on the next page he says:--

"For what reason they have been called Molukos we shall not here say; for we shall do this circumstantially when we shall speak of the Molukse Kings and their customs."

But we have been unable to find the fulfilment of this intention, though probably it exists in that continent of a work somewhere. We have also seen a paper by a writer who draws much from the quarry of Valentijn. This is an article by Dr. Van Muschenbroek in the Proceedings of the International Congress of Geog. at Venice in 1881 (ii. pp. 596, seqq.), in which he traces the name to the same origin. He appears to imply that the chiefs were known among themselves as Molokos, and that this term was substituted for the indigenous Kolau, or King. “Ce nom, ce titre restèrent, et furent même peu à peu employés, non seulement pour les chefs, mais aussi pour l'État même. A la longue les îles et les états des Molokos devinrent les îles et les états Molokos.” There is a good deal that is questionable, however, in this writer’s deductions and etymologies. [Mr. Skeat remarks:

“The islands appear to be mentioned in the Chinese history of the Tang dynasty (618-696) as Mi-li-ku, and if this be so the name is perhaps too old to be Arabic.”]

c. 1430.—Has (Java) ultra xv dierum curas duae repentur insulae, orientem versus. Altera Sandai appellatur, in qua mues museatae et mues; altera Randam nomine, in qua sola gariolfu producuntur.”—N. Conti, in Pagius.

1501.—The earliest mention of these islands by this name, that we know, is in a letter of Amerigo Vespucci (quoted under CANHAMEIRA), who in 1501, among the places heard of by Cabral’s fleet, mentions the Maluche Islands.

1510.—“We disembarked in the island of Monoch, which is much smaller than Bandan; but the people are worse. . . . Here the cloves grow, and in many other neighbouring islands, but they are small and uninhabited.”—Varthema, 246.

1514.—“Further on is Timor, whence comes sandalwood, both the white and the red; and further on still are the Malau, whence come the cloves. The bark of these trees I am sending you; an excellent thing it is; and so are the flowers.”—Letter of Giovanni da Empoli, in Archivio Stor. Ital., p. 81.

1515.—“From Malaca ships and junks are come with a great quantity of spice, cloves, mace, nutmeg, sandalwood, and other rich things. They have discovered the five Islands of Cloves; two Portuguese are lords of them, and rule the land with the red. ’Tis a land of much meat, oranges, lemons, and clove-trees, which grow there of their own accord, just as trees in the woods with us . . . God be praised for such favour, and such grand things!”—Another letter of do., ibid. pp. 85-86.

1516.—“Beyond these islands, 25 leagues towards the north-east, there are five islands, one before the other, which are called the islands of Maluo, in which all the cloves grow. . . . Their Kings are Moors, and the first of them is called Bachan, the second Maquina, the third is called Motil, the fourth Tidory, and the fifth Ternity . . . every year the people of Malaca and Java come to these islands to ship cloves.”—Barboso, 201-202.

1521.—“Wednesday the 6th of November . . . we discovered four other rather high islands at a distance of 14 leagues towards the east. The pilot who had remained with us told us these were the Maluco islands, for which we gave thanks to God, and to comfort ourselves we discharged all our artillery . . . since we had passed 27 months all but two days always in search of Maluco.”—Pigafetta, Voyage of Magellao, Ital. Sec. 124.

1553.—“We know by our voyages that this part is occupied by sea and by land cut up into many thousand islands, those together, sea and islands, embracing a great part of the circuit of the Earth . . . and in the midst of this great multitude of islands are those called Maluco. . . . (These) five islands called Maluco . . . stand all within sight of one another embracing a distance of 25 leagues . . . we do not call them Maluco because they have no other names; and we call them for because in that number the clove grows naturally. . . . Moreover we call them in combination Maluco, as here among us we speak of the Canaries, the Terceiras, the Cabo-Verde islands, including under these names many islands each of which has a name of its own.”—Barros, 111. v. 5.

MONE, n.p. MôN or Mân, the name by which the people who formerly occupied Pegu, and whom we call Taaling, called themselves. See TALING.

MONEGAR, s. The title of the headman of a village in the Tamil country; the same as pâtîl (see PATEL) in the Deccan, &c. The word is Tamil.
MONSOON, s. The name given to the periodical winds of the Indian seas, and of the seasons which they affect and characterize. The original word is the Ar. manasim, ‘season,’ which the Portuguese corrupted into monção, and our people into monsoon. Dictionaries (except Dr. Badger’s) do not apparently give the Arabic word manasim the technical sense of monsoon. But there can be no doubt that it had that sense among the Arab pilots from whom the Portuguese adopted the word. This is shown by the quotations from the Turkish Admiral Sidi 'Ali. "The rationale of the term is well put in the Beirat Mogh, which says: ‘Mansim is used of anything that comes round but once a year, like the festivals. In Lebanon the mansim is the season of working with the silk,’—which is the important season there, as the season of navigation is in Yemen." (W. R. S.)

The Spaniards in America would seem to have a word for season in analogous use for a recurring wind, as may be gathered from Tom Cringle.*

The Venetian, Leonardo Ca’ Masser (below) calls the monsoons ti tempí. And the quotation from García de Orta shows that in his time the Portuguese sometimes used the word for season without any apparent reference to the wind. Though monção is general with the Portuguese writers of the 16th century, the historian Diogo de Couto always writes mouchão, and it is possible that the n came in, as in some other cases, by a habitual misreading of the written n for m. Linchotzen in Dutch (1596) has monsooyn and monsson (p. 8; [Hak. Soc. i. 33]). It thus appears probable that we get our monsoon from the Dutch. The latter in modern times seem to have commonly adopted the French term monsou.

[Prof. Skeat traces our monsoon from Itál. monsone.] We see below (‘Es. Fedor’) that Monsoon was used as synonymous with the ‘half year,’ and so it is still in S. India.

MOONSOON.

1554.—"The principal winds are four, according to the Arabs, . . . but the pilots call them by names taken from the rising and setting of certain stars, and assign them certain limits within which they begin or attain their greatest strength, and cease. These winds, limited by space and time, are called Mausim."—The Moubi, by Sidi 'Ali Kapudan, in J. As. Soc. Beng., iii. p. 514.

"Be it known that the ancient masters of navigation have fixed the time of the monsoon (in orig. doubtless mausim), that is to say, the time of voyages at sea, according to the year of Yazadjird, and that the pilots of recent times follow their steps." MOOLYEE, s. One who works in leather, either as shoemaker or saddler. It is the name of a low caste, Hind, mooly. The name and caste are also found in S. India, Telug. moolie. These, too, are workers in leather, but also are employed in painting, gilding, and upholsterer's work, &c.

1596.—"I wish he had been under the scaffolding when the roof of that new Cutcherry he is building fell in, and killed two mookhtars."—The Buck Bungalow (by G. O. Trevelyan), in Fraser's Mag., xxix. p. 218.

1578.—"These were the mookhtars, or Criminal Court attorneys, teaching the witnesses what to say in their respective cases, and suggesting answers to all possible questions, the whole thing having been previously rehearsed at the mookhtyar's house."—Life in the Moghul, f. 90.

1855.—"The wily Bengali mukhtars, or attorneys, were the bane of the Hill Tracts, and I never relaxed in my efforts to banish them from the country."—Lt.-Col. T. Lecin, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 336.

MOOLAH, s. Hind. mulla, corr. from Ar. mauld, a der. from wild, 'popinquitity.' This is the legal bond which still connects a former owner with his manumitted slave; and in virtue of this bond the patron and client are both called maula. The idea of patronage is in the other senses; and the word comes to mean eventually 'a learned man, a teacher, a doctor of the Law.'

In India it is used in these senses, and for a man who reads the Koran in a house for 40 days after a death. When oaths were administered on the Koran, the servitor who held the book was called Mulli Koruni. Mulli is also in India the usual Mussulman term for 'a schoolmaster.'

1616.—"Their Moolas employ much of their time like Scriveners to do business for others."—Perry, in Purchas, ii. 1476.

1617.—"He had shewed it to his Mulaias."—See T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 417.

1638.—"While the Body is let down into the grave, the kindred mutter certain Prayers between their Teeth, and that done all the company returns to the house of the deceased, where the Moolas continue their Prayers for his Soul, for the space of two or three days."—Maddeley, E. T. 68.

1673.—"At funerals, the Moolahs or Priests make Orations or Sermons, after a Lesson read out of the Alcoran."—Fryer, 94.

1690.—"The old Mulla having been discharged for misconduct, another by name Cozee (see CAZEE) Mahmud entertained on a salary of 5 Pagodas per pension, his duties consisting of the business of writing letters, &c., in Persian, besides teaching the Persian language to such of the Company's servants as shall desire to learn it."—F. 1759.—"... struck down by a fanatical crowd impelled by a fierce Moola."—Sat. Rev. No. 1251, p. 454.

MOOLYEE, s. Popular Hind. mooli, Ar. moolay, from same root as mooli (see MOOLAH). A Judge, Doctor of the Law, &c. It is a usual prefix to the names of learned men and professors of law and literature. (See LAW-OFFICER.)

MOON AUL, s. Hind. munul or monul (it seems to be in no dictionary); [Platts gives “Munul (dialec.).] The Lophophorus impeius, most splendid perhaps of all game-birds, rivaling the brilliancy of hue, and the metallic lustre of the humming-birds on the scale of the turkey. “This splendid pheasant is found throughout the whole extent of the Himalayas from the hills bordering Afghanistan as far east as Sikkim, and probably also to Bootan” (Jerdon). “In the autumnal and winter months numbers are generally collected in the same quarter of the forest, though often so widely scattered that each bird appears to be alone” (Ibid.). Can this last circumstance point to the etymology of the name as connected with Skt. muni, ‘an eremite’?

It was pointed out in a note on Marco Polo (1st ed. i. 246, 2nd ed. i. 272), that the extract which is given below from Aelian undoubtably refers to the Munul. We have recently found that this indication had been anticipated by G. Cuvier, in a note on Pliny (tom. vii. p. 499 of ed. Ajasson de Grandegagne, Paris, 1830). It appears from Jerdon that Monaul is popularly applied by Europeans at Darjeeling to the Sikkim horned pheasant Cerionnis satyrus, otherwise sometimes called ‘Argus Pheasant’ (q.v.).

c. A.D. 350.—“Cocks too are produced there of a kind bigger than any others. These have a crest, but instead of being red like the crest of our cocks, this is variegated like a coronet of flowers. The tail-feathers moreover are not arched, or bent out into a curve (like a cock’s), but flattened out. And this tail they flatter after them as a peacock does, unless when they erect it, and set it up. And the plumage of these Indian cocks is golden, and dark blue, and of the hue of the emerald.” —De Nat. Animal. xvi. 2.

MOON BLINDNESS. This affection of the eyes is commonly believed to be produced by sleeping exposed to the full light of the moon. There is great difference of opinion as to the facts, some quoting experience as incontrovertible, others regarding the thing merely as a vulgar prejudice, without substantial foundation. Some remarks will be found in Collingwood’s Rambles of a Naturalist, pp. 308-10. The present writer has in the East twice suffered from a peculiar affection of the eyes and face, after being in sleep exposed to a bright moon, but he would hardly have used the term *moon-blindness*_.

MOONG, MOONGO, s. Or, ‘green-gram’; Hind. mung, [Skt. mundo]. A kind of vetch (Phaesolus Mungo, L.) in very common use over India; according to Garcia the mece (mish’) of Avicenna. Garcia also says that it was popularly recommended as a diet for fever in the Deccan; and is still recommended for this purpose by native physicians (Watt, Econ. Diet., vi. p. 191).

c. 1336.—“The munj again is a kind of mish, but its grains are oblong and the colour is light green. Munj is cooked along with rice, and eaten with butter. This is what they call Kicheri (see REDGEREE), and it is the diet on which one breakfasts daily.” —Ibn Batuta, ii. 131.

1557.—“The people were obliged to bring hay, and corn, and mungo, which is a certain species of seed that they feed horses with.” —Albignier, Hak. Soc. ii. 132.

1611.—“Orna. —Give it her since she wishes it; but bread and a boiled chicken would be better. For she comes from a country where they eat bread, and not rice.” —Garcia, f. 145.

[1557.—“Servant-maid. —That girl that you brought from the Deccan asks me for mungo, and says that in her country they give it them to eat, husked and boiled. Shall I give it her?’” —Garcia, f. 145.]

MOONGA, MOOGA, s. Beng. munga. A kind of wild silk, the produce of Antheraea assamia, collected and manufactured in Assam. [“Its Assamese name is said to be derived from the amber munga, ‘coral’ colour of the silk, and is frequently used to denote silk in general” (B. C. Allen, Mono. on the Silk Cloths of Assam, 1899, p. 10).] The quotations in elucidation of this word may claim some peculiar interest. That from Purchas is a modern illustration of the legends which reached the Roman Empire in classic times, of the growth of silk in the Seric jungles (“velleraque ut foliis depectant tentam Seres”); whilst that from Robert Lindsay may possibly throw light on the statements in the Periplus regarding an overland importation of silk from Thun into Gangetic India.

c. 1775.—...Silks of a coarse quality, called Moonga duties, are also brought from the frontiers of China for the Malay trade." — Hon. R. Lindsay, in Loss of the Lindsay's, iii. 174.

MOONSEE. s. Ar. munshi, but written in Hind. munshi. The verb instha, of which the Ar. word is the participle, means 'to educate' a youth, as well as 'to compose' a written document. Hence 'a secretary, a reader, an interpreter, a writer.' It is commonly applied by Europeans specifically to a native teacher of languages, especially of Arabic, Persian, and Urdu, though the application to a native amanuensis in those tongues, and to any respectable, well-educated native gentleman is also common. The word probably became tolerably familiar in Europe through a book of instruction in Persian bearing the name (viz. "The Persian Moonesse, by F. Gladhurn," 1st ed. s.a., but published in Calcutta about 1790-1800).

1782.—"...The young gentlemen exercise themselves in translating ... they reason and dispute with their munchees (tutors) in Persian and Moors. ..." — Price's Tracts, i. 89.

1785.—"...Your letter, requiring our authority for engaging in your service a Munshy, for the purpose of making out passports, and writing letters, has been received." — Tippoo's Letters, 67.

... A lasting friendship was formed between the pupil and his Moonesee. ... The Mooneshee, who had become wealthy, afforded him yet more sub-stitual evidence of his recollection, by earnestly requesting him, when on the point of leaving India, to accept a sum amounting to £1600, on the plea that the latter (i.e. Shore) had saved little." — Mem. of Lord Teignmouth, i. 32-33.

1814.—"...They presented me with an address they had just composed in the Hindoo language, translated into Persian by the Durbur munsee. — Forbes, On Mem., iii. 365; [2nd ed. ii. 314].

1817.—"...Its authenticity was fully proved by ... and a Persian Mooneshee who translated." — Mill. Hist. v. 127.

1827.—"...When the Mirza grew up, he fell among English, and ended by carrying his raptures as a Mooneshee, or a language master, to that idle people." — Short. Writings of Viscount Strangford, i. 255.

MOONSIFF. s. Hind. from Ar. musii, 'one who does justice' (insif), a judge. In British India it is the title of a native civil judge of the lowest grade. This office was first established in 1793.

1512.—"...munssifs, or native justices." — Fifth Report, p. 32.

[1852,—I wonder, Mr. Deputy, if Providence had made you a Moonsiff instead of a Deputy Collector, whether you would have been more lenient in your strictures upon our system of civil justice. ..." — Rix. N. W. Prov., 155.]

MOOR. MOORMAN. s. (and adj).

MOORISH. A Mahommedan; and so from the habitual use of the term (Moor), by the Portuguese in India, particularly a Mahommedan inhabitant of India.

In the Middle Ages, to Europe generally, the Mahommedans were known as the Saracens. This is the word always used by Joinville, and by Marco Polo. Ibn Battuta also mentions the fact in a curious passage (ii. 425-6). At a later day, when the fear of the Ottoman had made itself felt in Europe, the word Turk was that which identified itself with the Moslem, and thus we have in the Collect for Good Friday,—"Jews, Turks, Infidels, and Heretics." But to the Spaniards and Portuguese, whose contact was with the Musulmans of Mauritania who had passed over and conquered the Peninsula, all Mahommedans were Moors. So the Mahommedans whom the Portuguese met with on their voyages to India, on what coast soever, were alike styled Moors; and from the Portuguese the use of this term, as synonymous with Mahommedan, passed to Hollanders and Englishmen.

The word then, as used by the Portuguese discoverers, referred to religion, and implied no nationality. It is plain indeed from many passages that the Moors of Calicut and Cochin were in the beginning of the 16th century people of mixt race, just as the Moollahs (q.v.) are now. The Arab, or Arabo-African occupants of Mozambique and Melinda, the Sumalis of Magadoza, the Arabs and Persians of Kalkh and Ornum, the Baros of Guzerat, are all Moors to the Portuguese writers, though the more intelligent among these are quite conscious of the impropriety of the term. The Moors of the Malabar coast were middlemen, who had adopted a profession of Islam for their own convenience, and in order to minister for their own profit to the constant traffic of merchants from Ormuz and the Arabian ports. Similar influences still affect the boatmen of the same coast, among whom it has become a sort of custom in certain families, that different members should profess respectively Mahommedanism, Hindoosm, and Christianity.

The use of the word Moor for Mahommedan died out pretty well among educated Europeans in the Bengal Presidency in the beginning of the last century, or even earlier, but probably held its ground a good deal longer among the British soldiery, whilst the adjective Moorish will be found in our quotations nearly as late as 1840. In Ceylon, the Straits, and the Dutch Colonies, the term Moorman for a Muslim is still in common use, Indeed the word is still employed by the servants of Madras officers in speaking of Mahommedans, or of a certain class of these. Moro is still applied at Manilla to the Muslim Mindays.

1198.—"... the Moors never came to the knowledge when this trading went on, and we became aware that they wished us ill, inasmuch that when any of us went ashore, in order to annoy us they would spit on the ground, and say 'Portugal, Portugal.' "—R. de V. da Gama, p. 75.

"... For you must know, gentlemen, that from the moment you put into port here (Calecut) you caused disturbance of mind to the Moors of this city, who are numerous and very powerful in the country."—Correa, Hak. Soc. 166.

1199.—"We reached a very large island called Sumatra, where pepper grows in considerable quantities. ... The Chief is a Moor, but speaking a different language."—Sancho de Lobo, in India in the XVth Cent. [7].

1513.—"Hane (Maleeem) rex Maurus gubernabat."—Emanuelis Regis Epistole, f. 1.

1553.—"And for the hatred in which they hold them, and for their abhorrence of the name of Provine, they call in reproach the Christians of our part of the world Frangues (see FIRINGHEE), just as we improperly call them again Moors."—Barros, IV. iv. 16.

c. 1560.—"When we lay at Fuquien, we did see certain Moors, who knew so little of their secte that they could say nothing else but that Mahomet was a Moore, my father was a Moore, and I am a Moore."—Reports of the Province of China, done into English by R. Willes, in Hakl. ii. 557.

1563.—"And as to what you say of Ludovico Vartomano, I have spoken both here and in Portugal, with people who knew him here in India, and they told me that he went about here in the garb of a Moor, and that he came back among us doing penance for his sins; and that the man never went further than Calicut and Cochin, nor indeed did we at that time navigate those seas that we now navigate."—Garcia, f. 30.

1569.—"... always whereas I have spoken of Gentiles is to be understood Idolaters, and whereas I speak of Moores, I mean Mahometts secte."—Cassar Frederike, in Hakl. ii. 339.

1610.—"The King was fled for fear of the King of Makasar, who ... would force the King to turne Moor, for he is a Gentile."—Maldon, in Purchas, i. 293.

1611.—"Les Moors du pay faisoient courir le bruit, que les nortes avoient esté battus."—Wyatt, H. des Indes, iii. 9.

1648.—"King Jeungier (Jehangir) used to make use of a reproach: That one Portuguese was better than three Moors. and one Hollander or Englishman better than two Portugeezes."—Van Twiet, 59.

c. 1665.—"Il y en a de Mores et de Gentils Raspoutes (see RAJPOOT) parce que je saus qu'ils servent mieux que les Mores qui sont superbes, et ne veulent pas qu'on se plaigne d'eux, quelque sorte ou quelque tromperie qu'ils fassent."—Thomson, v. 217.

1673.—"Their Crew were all Moors (by which Word hereafter must be meant those of the Mahometan faith) apparel'd all in white."—Fryer, p. 24.

","They are a Shame to our Sailors, who can hardly ever work without horrid Oaths and hideous Cursing and Imprecations: and these Moors, on the contrary, never set their Hands to any Labour, but that they sing a Psalm or Prayer, and conclude at every joint Application of it. 'Allah, Allah,' invoking the Name of God."—Ibid. pp. 55-56.

1685.—"We putt out a peace of a Red Ancient to appear like a Moor's Vessel: not judging it safe to be known to be English: Our nation having lately got an ill Name by abusing ye Inhabitants of these Islands; but no boat would come near us . . ." (in the Maldives).—Hedges, Diary, March 9; [Hak. Soc. i. 190].

1685. —"Lascars, who are Moors of India."—Dampier, ii. 57.

1689.—"The place where they went ashore was a Town of the Moors: Which name our Seamen give to all the Subjects of the great Mogul, but especially his Mahometan Subjects; calling the Idolators, Gentous or Rockhottos (see RAJPOOT)."—Dampier, i. 507.

1747.—"We had the Misfortune to be reduced to almost inevitable Danger, for as our Success chiefly depended on the assistance of the Moors, we were soon brought to the utmost Extremity by being abandoned by them."—Letter from F. St. Geo. to the Court, May 2 (India Office MS. Records).

1752.—"His successor Mr. Godhene . . . even permitted him (Dupleix) to continue the exhibition of those marks of Moorish dignity, which both Murzaften-jing and Sallabad-jing had permitted him to display."—Orme, i. 367.

1757.—"In Ives, writing in this year, we constantly find the terms Moormen and Moorish, applied to the forces against which Clive and Watson were acting on the Hoogly.

1768.—"From these originals, time has formed in India a mighty nation of near ten millions of Mahometans, whom Europeans call Moors."—Orme, ed. 1808, i. 24.

1770.—"Before the Europeans doubled the Cape of Good Hope, the Moors, who were the only maritime people of India, sailed from Surat and Bengal to Malacca."—Raiwan (tr. 1777), i. 210.

1781.—"Mr. Hicky thinks it a Duty incumbent on him to inform his friends in particular, and the Public in General, that an attempt was made to Assassinate him last Thursday Morning between the Hours of One and two o'Clock, by two armed Europeans aided and assisted by a Moorman . . ."—Hick's Bengal Gazette, April 7.

1857.—"The Rest of the inhabitants, who are Moors, and the richer Gentoes, are dressed in various degrees and fashions."—Ed. Minto in India, p. 17.

1889.—"I told my Moorman, as they call the Mussulmans here, just now to ask the drum-major when the mail for the Pradwan (!) was to be made up."—Memo. of Col. Mountain, 2nd ed. p. 89.

1889.—"As I came out of the gate I met some young Moorish dandies on horseback; one of them was evidently a 'crack-rider,' and began to show off."—Letters from Madras, p. 290.

MOORAH. s. Sea Hind. *mūrā, from Port. mura, Ital. mura; a tack (Roebuck).

MOORA. s. A measure used in the sale of paddy at Bombay and in Guzerat. The true form of this word is doubtful. From Molesworth's Mahr. Dict., it would seem that mūgha and mūla are properly cases of rice-straw bound together to contain certain quantities of grain, the former larger and the latter smaller. Hence it would be a vague and varying measure. But there is a land measure of the same name. See Wilson, s.v. Māhā. [The Madras Gloss, gives mōoda, Mal. muṭṭa, from muṭṭa, to cover, "a fastening package; especially the packages in a circular form, like a Dutch cheese, fastened with wisps of straw, in which rice is made up in Malabar and Canara? The mōoda is said to be 1 cubic foot and 1.116 cubic inches, and equal to 3 Kulises (see CULSEY).]

1554.—"(At Baçaim) the Mora of batte (see BATTĀ) contains 3 candaies (see CANDY), which (batte) is rice in the husk, and after it is stript it amounts to a candy and a half, and something more."—I. Nores, p. 39.

1611.—"I send your worship by the bearer 10 moraes of rice."—Dampier, Letters, i. 116.

London:
Printed for T. Cadell in the Strand.
MDCCLXXII.

Captain Hadley's orthography is on a detestable system. He writes chokerau, chokeree, for chokrā, chokrī ('boy, girl'); dolyheeny for dal-chini ('cinnamon'), &c. His etymological ideas also are loose. Thus he gives shrumps = chinghra mutchee, 'fish with legs and claws,' as if the word was from cheng (Pers.), 'a hook or claw,' Bigstor, 'a halter,' or as he writes, bang-doore, he derives from dār, 'distance,' instead of dor, 'a rope.' He has no knowledge of the instrumental case with terminal ne, and he does not seem to be aware that ham and ten (hun and toon, as he writes) are in reality plurals ('we' and 'you'). The grammar is altogether of a very primitive and tentative character, and far behind that of the R. C. Missionaries, which is referred to s.v. Hindostanee. We have not seen that of Schulz (1745) mentioned under the same.

1752.—"The Centinel was sitting at the top of the gate, singing a Moorish song."—Orme, ed. 1793, i. 272.

1767.—"In order to transact Business of any kind in this Country, you must at least have a smattering of the Language for low of the inhabitants (except in great Towns) speak English. MOPLAH. s. Malayal. mappil. The usual application of this word is to the indigenous Maumoomiads of Malabar; but it is also applied to the indigenous (so-called) Syrian Christians of Cochin and Travancore. In Morton's Life of Leyden the word in the latter application is curiously misspelled as muddilla. The derivation of the word is very obscure. Wilson gives mappilla, 'mother's son,' as 'springing from the intercourse of foreign colonists, who were persons unknown, with Malabar women.' Nelson, as quoted below interprets the word as 'bridegroom' (it should however rather be 'son-in-law').* Dr. Badger suggests that it is from the Arabic verb falkar, and means 'a cultivator' (compare the falkal of Egypt), whilst Mr. C. P. Brown expresses his conviction that it was a Tamil mispronunciation of the Arabic ma'uddab, 'from over the water.' No one of these greatly commends itself. [Mr. Logan (Malabar, ii. cxxvii.) and the Madras Glossary derive it from Mal. ma, Skt. maha, 'great,' and Mal. pilla, 'a child.' Dr. Gundert's view is that Mappilla was an honorary title given to colonists from 1813.—"At one period the Moplehs created great commotion in Travancore, and towards the end of the 17th century massacred the chief of Anjengo, and all the English gentlemen belonging to the settlement, when on a public visit to the Queen of Attinga."—Forbes, Or. Mon. i. 402; [2nd ed. i. 259].

1858.—"I may add in concluding my notice that the Kalians alone of all the castes of Madura call the Mahometans 'mupilis' or bridgrooms (Moplas)."—Nelson's Madura, Pt. ii. 55.

MORA, s. Hind. morh. A stool (tabouret); a footstool. In common colloquial use.

1795.—"The old man, whose attention had been chiefly attracted by a Ramnaghur morah, of which he was desirous to know the construction... departed."—Capt. Blunt, in Asiatic. Res., vii. 92.

1813.—"Whilst seated on a round stool or monah, in the thanna... I entered into conversation with the thamadar..."—Javenson, Travels in Upper India, i. 127.

MORCHAL, s. A fan, or a fly-whisk, made of peacock's feathers. Hind. morchhal.

1673.—"All the heat of the Day they idle it under some shady Tree, at night they come in troops, armed with a great Pole, a Mirchol or Peacock's Tail, and a Wallet."—Fryer, 95.

1690.—(The heat) "makes us Employ our Poons in Fanning of us with Murchals made of Peacock's Feathers, four or five Foot long, in the time of our Entertainments, and when we take our Repose."—Ovington, 335.

1828.—"They (Gossins) are clothed in a ragged mantle, and carry a long pole, and a mirchol, or peacock's tail."—Panadurang Hort, ed. 1875, i. 76.

MORT-DE-CHIEN, s. A name for cholera, in use, more or less, up to the end of the 18th century, and the former prevalence of which has tended probably to the extraordinary and baseless notion that epidemic cholera never existed in India till the government of the Marquis of Hastings. The word in this form is really a corruption of the Portuguese mordeixim, shaped by a fanciful French etymology. The Portuguese word again represents the Konkani and Mahrattio modachi, modisk, or modvash, 'cholera,' from a Mahr. verb modilen, 'to break up, to sink' (as under infirmities, in fact 'to collapse'). The Guzaratim appears to be morchi or morachi.

[1504. — Writing of this year Correa mentions the prevalence of the disease in the Sumorim's army, but he gives it no name. "Besides other illness there was one almost sudden, which caused such a pain in the belly that a man hardly survived 8 hours of it."—Correa, i. 489.]

1543.—Correa's description is so striking that we give it almost at length: "This winter they had in Goa a mortal distemper which the natives call morxy, and attacking persons of every quality, from the smallest infant at the breast to the old man of fourscore, and also domestic animals and fowls, so that it affected every living thing, male and female. And this malady attacked people without any cause that could be assigned, falling upon sick and sound alike, on the fat and the lean; and nothing in the world was a safeguard against it. And this malady attacked the stomach, caused some experts affirmed by chill; though later it was maintained that no cause whatever could be discovered. The malady was so powerful and so evil that it immediately produced the symptoms of strong poison; e.g., vomiting, constant desire for water, with drying of the stomach; and cramps that contracted the hands and the soles of the feet, with such pains that the patient seemed dead; with the eyes broken and the nails of the fingers and toes black and crumpled. And for this malady our physicians never found any cure; and the patient was carried off in one day, or at the most in a day and night; insomuch that not ten in a hundred recovered, and those who did recover were such as were healed in haste with medicines of little importance known to the natives. So great was the mortality this season that the bells were tolling all day ... inasmuch that the governor forbade the tolling of the church bells, not to frighten the people ... and when a man died in the hospital of this malady of morexy the Governor ordered all the experts to come together and open the body. But they found nothing wrong except that the paunch was shrunk up like a ben's gizzard, and wrinkled like a piece of scorched leather. ... —Correa, iv. 288-289.

1563. — "Page. — Don Jeronymo sends to beg that you will go and visit his brother immediately, for though this is not the time of day for visits, delay would be dangerous, and he will be very thankful that you come at once.

"Orta. — What is the matter with the patient, and how long has he been ill?

"Page. — He has got morxi: and he has been ill two hours.

"Orta. — I will follow you.

"Rutano. — Is this the disease that kills so quickly, and that few recover from? Tell me how it is called by our people, and by the natives, and the symptoms of it, and the treatment you use in it.

"Orta. — Our name for the disease is Colterio passio; and the Indians call it mordzi; whereas again by corruption we call it mordexi ... It is sharper here than in our own part of the world. For usually it kills in four and twenty hours. And I have seen some cases where the patient did not live more than ten hours. The most that it lasts is four days; but as there is no rule without an exception. I once saw a man with great constancy of virtue who lived twenty days continually throwing up "cucurriti" and died at last. Let us go and see this sick man; and for the symptoms you will yourself see what a thing it is." —Garcia, ff. 74, 75.

1578. — "There is another thing which is useless called by them canterin, which the Janarin Brahman physicians usually employ for the collerio passio sickness, which they call morxi: which sickness is so sharp that it kills in fourteen hours or less." —Ardua. Tractatus. 27.

1585. — "There reigneth a sickness called Mordexijn which steals upon men, and sandleth them in such sorte, that it weaneth a man, and maketh him cast out all that he hath in his body, and many times it taketh with it —Linschoten, 67; [Hak. Soc. 285; Morzi in ii. 22.]

1599. — "The disease which in India is called Mordexin. This is a species of Colte, which comes on in those countries with such quick and vehement that it kills in a few hours; and there is no remedy discovered. Causes evacuations by stool or vomit, and takes one burst with pain. But there is herb proper for the cure, which bears the name of mordesin." —Carlett, 227.

1602. — "In those islets (off Arcanay) they find bad and brackish water, and certain ants like ours both green and dry, of which they ate some, and in the same moment this gave them a kind of dysentery, which in India they corruptly call mordexin, which ought to be morzio, and which the Arabs call morzula (Ar. morsiti), which is what Rasis calls subzula, a disease which kills in 24 hours. Its action is immediately to produce a sunken and slender pulse; with cold sweat, dry vomit, and oppressive thirst, the eyes sunken, great vomitings, and in fact it leaves the natural power so collapsed (deriblada) that the patient seems like a dead man." —Conto, Dec. iv. iv. cap. 10.

c. 1610. — "IIl regne entre eux une autre maladie qui vient a l'improviste, il la nomment Mordesin, et vient avec grande douleur des testes, et vomissement, et crient fort, et le plus souvent en meurtre." —Puyrap de Lival, ii. 19; [Hak. Soc. ii. 13.]

1655. — "... celles qui y regnent le plus, sont celles qu'ils appellent Mordexin, qui teu subitement." —Mandello, 265.

1674. — "The disease called Mordechi generally commences with a violent fever, accompanied by trembling, horrors and vomitings: these symptoms are generally followed by delirium and death." He prescribes a hot iron applied to the soles of the feet. He attributes the disease to indigestion, and remarks bitterly, that at least the prisoners of the Inquisition were safe from this disease. —Bella, Relation de l'Inquisition de Goa, ii. ch. 71.

c. 1690. — “Rumpthio, speaking of the Jack-fruit (q.v.): "Non nisi vacuo stomacho edendus est, alias enim ... plerunque oritur Passio Cholerica, Portugallis Mortesin dicata." —Herb. Amb., 1. 106.

1702. — "Cette grande indigestion qu'on appelle aux Indes Mordechine, et que quelques uns de nos Francais ont appelee Mort-de-Chien." —Lettres Edijus, xi. 130.

Bluteau (s.v.) says Mordexim is properly a failure of digestion which is very perilous in those parts, unless the native remedy be used. This is to apply a thin rod, like a spit, and heated, under the heel, till the patient screams with pain, and then to slap the same part with the sole of a shoe, &c.

1705.—"Ce mal s'appelle mort-de-chien." —Laultier, 113.

The following is an example of literal translation, as far as we know, unique.

1716.—"The extraordinary distempers of this country (I. of Bourbon) are the Cholick, and what they call the Iny's Disease, which is cured by burning the heel of the patient with a hot iron." —lIect. of the I. of Bourbon, in La Roque's Voyage to Arabia the Happy, &c., E. T. London, 1728, p. 156.

1727.—"... the Mordexim (which seizes one suddenly with such oppression and palpitation that he thinks he is going to die on the spot)." —Valentijn, v. (Malabar) 5.

c. 1760.—"There is likewise known, on the Mahabar coast chiefly, a most violent disorder they call the Mordechim; which seizes the patient with such fury of purging, vomiting, and torments of the intestines, that it will often carry him off in 30 hours." —Gros, i. 250.

1768.—"This (cholera morbus) in the East Indies, where it is very frequent and fatal, is called Mort-de-chien." —Ibid., Essay on Diseases incidental to Hot Climates, 248.

1778.—In the Vocabulary of the Portuguese Grammaria Indiastam, we find Mor-de-chien, as a Portuguese word, rendered in Hindi by the word hoцишвар, i.e. ho-cha-swar, "dyspepsia." (p. 90). The most common modern Hindi term for cholera is Ambh-kaizh. The latter word is given by Garcia de Orta in the form buchawia, and in the quotation from Cotto as sukaia (l). Jahangir speaks of one of his nobles as dying in the Dcreen, of haizh, in a.D. 1615 (see note to Elliot, vi. 346). It is, however, perhaps not to be assumed that haizh always means cholera. Thus Maepherson mentions a violent epidemic, which raged in the Camp of Aurangzub at Bijaipur in 1689, is called so. But in the history of Khâf Khan (Elliot, vi. 337) the general phrases wân and wabã are used in reference to this disease, whilst the description is that of bubonic plague.

1781.—"Early in the morning of the 21st June (1781) we had two men seized with the mort-de-chien." —Curtis, Diseases of India, 3rd ed., Edinb., 1807.

1782.—"Les indigences appelées dans l'Inde Mort-de-chien, sont fréquentes. Les Castes qui mangent de la viande, nourriture trop pesante pour un climat si chaud, en sont souvent atteintes." —Nouvelles, i. 155. This author writes just after having described two epidemics of cholera under the name of Ficz aigna. He did not apprehend that this was in fact the real Mort-de-chien.

1783.—"A disease generally called 'Mort-de-chien' at this time (during the defence of Onore) raged with great violence among the native inhabitants." —Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 122.

1796.—"Far more dreadful are the consequences of the above-mentioned intestinal colie, called by the Indians Shanâ, mordexim and also Nirكومben. It is occasioned, as I have said, by the winds blowing from the mountains... the consequence is that malignant and bilious slimy matter adheres to the bowels, and occasions violent pains, vomiting, fevers, and stupification; so that persons attacked with the disease die very often in a few hours. It sometimes happens that 30 or 40 persons die in this manner, in one place, in the course of the day... In the year 1782 this disease raged with so much fury that a great many persons died of it." —Fra Paolino, E.T. 409-410 (orig. see p. 353). As to the names used by Fra Paolino, for his Shani or Chian, we find nothing nearer than Tamil and Mal. mordexim, "convulsion, paralysis." (Winslow in his Tamil Diet. specified 13 kinds of such. Komben is explained as 'a kind of cholera or smallpox' (l); and nir-komben ('water-k.') as a kind of cholera or bilious diarrhoea.) Paolino adds: "La droga amara costa assai, c non si poteva amministrare a tanti miserabili che eravano. Adunque in mancanza di questa droga amara noi distillavamo in Tigor, o acqua vite di cocco, molto serco di cavalli (l), e l'amministravamo agli infermi. Tutti quelli che prendevano questa guarivano."

1808.—"Mörche or Mortsheis (Guz.) and Môdere (Mah.). A morbid affection in which the symptoms are convulsive action, followed by evacuations of the first passage, with intolerable tenesmus, or twisting-like sensation in the intestines, corresponding remarkably with the cholera-morbus of European synopsists, called by the country people in England (?) mortsheen, and by others mord-du-chien and Mana des chiennes, as if it had come from France." —R. Drummond, Illustrations, &c. A curious notice; and the author was, we presume, from his title of "Dr," a medical man. We suppose for England above should be read India.

The next quotation is the latest instance of the familiar use of the word that we have met with:

1812.—"General M— was taken very ill three or four days ago; a kind of fit—mort de chien—the doctor said, brought on by eating too many radishes." —Original Original Correspondence between Residents in India, &c., Edinburgh, 1816, p. 287.

1813.—"Mort de chien is nothing more, than the highest degree of Cholera Mortebus. —Johnson, Illus. of Tropical Climate, 405.

The second of the following quotations evidently refers to the outbreak of cholera mentioned, after Macpherson, in the next paragraph.

1750.—"I am once or twice a year (1) subject to violent attacks of cholera morbus, here called mort-de-chien..."—Imply to Downing, quoted by Sir James Stephen, ii. 339.

1751.—"The Plague is now broke out in Bengal, and rages with great violence; it has swept away already above 4000 persons, 200 or upwards have been buried in the different Portuguese churches within a few days."—Hickey's Bengal Gazette, April 21.

These quotations show that cholera, whether as an epidemic or as sporadic disease, is no new thing in India. Almost in the beginning of the Portuguese expeditions to the East we find apparent examples of the visitations of this terrible scourge, though no precise name is given in the narratives. Thus we read in the Life of Giovanni da Emboli, an adventurous young Florentine who served with the Portuguese, that, arriving in China in 1517, the ships' crews were attacked by a passion, malattia di frasso (virulent flux) of such kind that there died thereof about 70 men, and among these Giovanni himself, and two other Florentines (Vito, in Archiv. Sor. Ital. 33). Correa says that, in 1503, 20,000 men died of a like disease in the army of the Zamorin. We have given above Correa's description of the terrible Goa pest of 1543, which was most evidently cholera. Madras accounts, according to Macpherson, first mention the disease at Arcot in 1756, and there are frequent notices of it in that neighbourhood between 1763 and 1787. The Hon. R. Lindsay speaks of it as raging at Sylhet in 1781, after carrying off a number of the inhabitants of Calcutta (Macpherson, see the quotation of 1781 above). It also raged that year at Ganjam, and out of a division of 5000 Bengal troops under Col. Pearse, who were on the march through that district, 1143 were in a few days sent into hospital, whilst "death raged in the camp with a horror not to be described." The earliest account from the pen of an English physician is by Dr. Paisley, and is dated Madras, Feb. 1774. In 1783 it broke out at Hardwar Fair, and is said, in less than 8 days, to have carried off 20,000 pilgrims. The paucity of cases of cholera among European troops in the returns up to 1817, is ascribed by Dr. Macnamara to the way in which facts were disguised by the current nomenclature of disease. It need not perhaps be denied that the outbreak of 1817 marked a great recrudescence of the disease. But it is a fact that some of the more terrible features of the epidemic, which are then spoken of as quite new, had been prominently described at Goa nearly three centuries before.

See on this subject an article by Dr. J. Macpherson in Quarterly Review, for Jan. 1867, and a Treatise on Asiatic Cholera, by C. Macnamara, 1876. To these, and especially to the former, we owe several facts and references; though we had recorded quotations relating to mordexin and its identity with cholera some years before even the earlier of these publications.

MORDEXIM. MORDIXIM. Also the name of a sea-fish. Bluteau says: 'A fish found at the Isle of Quinchin on the Coast of Mozambique, very like hoqta (!) or river-pikes.'

1811.—"The stream of Rossnabad murmured near us; and within three or four hundred yards was the Mossella and the Tomb of Hafiz."—W. Ouseley's Travels, i. 318.

1513.—"Not a shrub now remains of the bower of Mossella, the situation of which is now only marked by the ruins of an ancient tower."—Macdonald Kinneir's Persia, 62.

MOSQUE, s. There is no room for doubt as to the original of this word being the Ar. masjid, 'a place of worship,' literally the place of subject, i.e. 'prostration.' And the probable course is this. Masjid becomes (1) in Span. mezquita, Port. mezquita:* (2)

* According to Pyrard mezquita is the word used in the Malvide Islands. It is difficult to suppose the people would adopt such a word from the Portuguese. And probably the form both in east and west is to be accounted for by a hard pronunciation of the Arabic j, as in Egypt now; the older and probably the most widely diffused. [See Mr. Gray's note in Hak. Soc. ii. 417.]

1553. — "... but destined yet to unfurl that divine and royal banner of the Soldiery of Christ ... in the Eastern regions of Asia, amidst the infernal moschitas of Arabia and Persia, and all the pagodes of the heathenism of India, on this side and beyond the Ganges." — Barros, l. I. 1.

elephant without tusks or with only rudimentary tusks. These latter are familiar in Bengal, and still more so in Ceylon, where according to Sir S. Baker, "not more than one in 300 has tusks; they are merely provided with short grinders, projecting generally about 3 inches from the upper jaw, and about 2 inches in diameter." (The Ryle and Horned in Ceylon, 11.) Sunderson (13 Years among the Wild Beasts of India, [3rd ed. 66]) says: "On the Continent of India muknas, or elephants born without tusks, are decidedly rare...Muknas breed in the herds, and the peculiarity is not hereditary or transmitted." This author also states that out of 51 male elephants captured by him in Mysore and Bengal only 5 were muknas. But the definition of a mukh in Bengal is that which we have given, including those animals which possess only feminine or rudimentary tusks, the 'short grinders' of Baker; and these latter can hardly be called rare among domesticated elephants. This may be partially due to a preference in purchasers.* The same author derives the term from mukha, 'face'; but the reason is obscure. Shakespear and Platts give the word as also applied to 'a cock without spurs.'

c. 1780.—"An elephant born with the left tooth only is reckoned sacred; with black spots in the mouth unclean and not saleable; the teeth of an elephant born without tooth is thought the best."—Hon. R. Lindsay in Lives of the Lindsay, iii. 191.

MUCA, MUKUVA. n.p. Malav, and Tamul, mukkavun (sing.), 'a diver,' and mukkavar (pl). [Logan (Malabar, ii. Gloss. s.v.) derives it from Drav. mukkaha, 'to dive'; the Mudras gloss gives Tam. muckanu, with the same meaning.] A name applied to the fishermen of the western coast of the Peninsula near C. Comorin. [But Mr. Pringle (Diary, Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 187) points out that formerly as now, the word was of much more general application. Orme in a passage quoted below employs it of boatmen at Karikal. The use of the word extended as far N. as Madras, and on the W. coast; it was not confined to the extreme S.] It was among these, and among the corresponding class of Paravars on the east coast, that F. Xavier's most noted labours in India occurred.

1525.—"And Dom Joao had secret speech with a married Christian whose wife and children were inside the fort, and a valiant man, with whom he arranged to give him 200 pardaos (and that he gave him on the spot) to set fire to huts that stood round the fort... So this Christian, called Duarte Fernandes... put on a lot of old rags and tags, and powdered himself with ashes after the fashion of jovas (see JOGEE) also distilling his hair with a mixture of oil and ashes, and disguising himself like a regular jovar, whilst he tied under his rags a parcel of gunpowder and pieces of slow-match, and so commending himself to God, in which all joined, slipped out of the fort by night, and as the day broke, he came to certain huts of macaus, which are fishermen, and began to beg alms in the usual paraver of the jovas, i.e. prayers for their long life and health, and the conquête of enemies, and easy deliveries for their womankind, and prosperity for their children, and other grand things."—Cortes, ii. 871.

1552.—Barros has mocuaria, 'a fisherman's village.'

1600.—"Those who gave the best reception to the Gospel were the Macoas; and, as they had no church in which to assemble, they did so in the fields and on the shores, and with such fervour that the Father found himself at times with 5000 or 6000 souls about him."—Luceau, Vida do P. F. Xavier, 117.

* Sir George Yule notes: "I can distinctly call to mind 6 muknas that I had (I may have had more) out of 30 or 40 elephants that passed through my hands." This would give 15 or 20 per cent. of muknas, but as the stud included females, the result would rather consist with Mr. Sanderson's 5 out of 51 males.

MUDDAR, s. Hind. mukhr, Skt. maddra; Cubotropis procera, R. Brown, N.O. Aselepiadaceae. One of the most common and widely diffused plants in uncultivated plains throughout India. In Sind the bark fibre is used for halters, &c., and experiment has shown it to be an excellent material worth £40 a ton in England, if it could be supplied at that rate; but the cost of collection has stood in the way of its utilisation. The seeds are imbedded in a silky floss, used to stuff pillows. This also has been the subject of experiment for textile use, but as yet without practical success. The plant abounds with an acrid milky juice which the Rajputs are said to employ for incendiary. (Punjab Plants.) The plant is called Ak in Sind and throughout N. India.

MUDDLE, s. (I) This word is only known to us from the clever—perhaps too clever—little book quoted below. The word does not seem to be known, and was probably a misapprehension of budlee. [Even Mr. Brandt and Mrs. Wyatt are unable to explain this word. The former does not remember hearing it. Both doubt its connection with budlee. Mrs. Wyatt suggests with hesitation Tamil mudder, "boiled rice," mude - palli, "the cook-house."] 1836-7. — "Besides all these acknowledged and ostensible attendants, each servant has a kind of muddle or double of his own, who does all the work that can be put off upon him without being found out by his master or mistress." — Letters from Muddras, 38.

a. Ar. Mufti, an expounder of the Mahomedan Law, the utterer of the fatwa (see FUTWAH). Properly the Mufti is above the Kazi who carries out the judgment. In the 18th century, and including Regulation IX. of 1793, which gave the Company's Courts in Bengal the reorganization which substantially endured till 1862, we have frequent mention of both Kaizis and Mufties as authorized expounders of the Mahomedan Law; but, though Kaizis were nominally maintained in the Provincial Courts down to their abolition (1829-31), practically the duty of those known as Kaizis became limited to quite different objects and the designation of the Law-officer who gave the fatwa in our District Courts was Mufti. The title Mufti has been long obsolete within the limits of British administration, and one might safely say that it is practically unknown to any surviving member of the Indian Civil Service, and never was heard in India as a living title by any Englishman now surviving. (See CAZEE, LAW-OF必须icial, MOOLVEE).

b. A slang phrase in the army, for 'plain clothes.' No doubt it is taken in some way from a, but the transition is a little obscure. [It was perhaps originally applied to the attire of dressing-gown, smoking-cap, and slippers, which was like the Oriental dress of the Mufti who was familiar in Europe from his appearance in Molière's Bourgeois Gentilhomme. Compare the French en Pekin.]

MUGG, n.p. Beng. Magh. It is impossible to deviate without deterioration from Wilson’s definition of this obscure name: “A name commonly applied to the natives of Arakan, particularly those bordering on Bengal, or residing near the sea; the people of Chittagong.” It is beside the question of its origin or proper application, to say, as Wilson goes on to say, on the authority of Lieut. (now Sir Arthur) Phayre, that the Arakanese disclaim the title, and restrict it to a class held in contempt, viz. the descendants of Arakanese settlers on the frontier of Bengal by Bengali mothers. The proper names of foreign nations in any language do not require the sanction of the nation to whom they are applied, and are often not recognised by the latter. German is not the German name for the Germans, nor Welsh the Welsh name for the Welsh, nor Hindu (originally) a Hindu word, nor China a Chinese word. The origin of the present word is very obscure. Sir A. Phayre kindly furnishes us with this note: “There is good reason to conclude that the name is derived from Maga, the name of the ruling race for many centuries in Magadha (modern Belar). The kings of Arakan were no doubt originally of this race. For though this is not distinctly expressed in the histories of Arakan, there are several legends of Kings from Benares reigning in that country, and one regarding a Brahman who marries a native princess, and whose descendants reign for a long period. I say this, although Buchanan appears to reject the theory (see Monty. Martin, ii. 18 seqq.)” The passage is quoted below.

On the other hand the Mahomedan writers sometimes confound Buddhists with fire-worshippers, and it seems possible that the word may have been Pers. magh = ‘magus.’ [See Risley, Tribes and Castes, ii. 28 seq.] The Chittagong Muggs long furnished the best class of native cooks in Calcutta; hence the meaning of the last quotation below.

1611.—“Aligators or Crocodiles there called Mugur match . . .”—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 496. The word is here intended for magar-mats or makkr, ‘crocodile-fish.’

1787.—“The muggur is a gross plebe, and his features stamp him as low-born. His manners are coarse.”—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 82-3.

1789.—“En route I killed two crocodiles; they are usually called alligators, but that is a misnomer. It is the mugger . . . these muggers kill a good many people, and have a playful way of getting under a boat, and knocking off the steersmen with their tails, and then swallowing him afterwards.”—Pollak, Sport, &c., i. 168.

1851.—“Alligator leather attains by use a beautiful gloss, and is very durable . . . and it is possible that our rivers contain a sufficient number of the two varieties of crocodile, the muggur and the gavial (see GAVIAL) for the tanners and leather-dressers of Cawnpoore to experiment upon.”—Pioneer Mail, April 26.

MUGGRABEE, n.p. Ar. maghrabti, ‘western.’ This word, applied to western Arabs, or Moors proper, is, as might be expected, not now common in India. It is the term that appears in the Harvey Mograbbin of Quen-tin Durward. From ghbar, the root of this word, the Spaniards have the province of Algarve, and both Spanish and Portuguese have garbin, a west wind. [The magician in the tale of Laedinn is a Maghrabi, and to this lay in Langedoc and Gascony Magg-aby is used as a term of cursing. Burton, Ar. Nights, x. 35, 379]. Muggerbee is used for a coin (see UBBER).

1563.—“The proper tongue in which Vicena wrote is that which is used in Syria and Mesopotamia and in Persia and in Tartary (from which latter Avicena came) and this tongue they call Araby; and that of our Moors they call Magaraby, as much as to say Moorish of the West . . . .”—Garcia, f. 19e.

MULL, s. A contraction of Mulli-gatawny, and applied as a distinctive sobriquet to members of the Service belonging to the Madras Presidency, as Bengal people are called Qui-his, and Bombay people Ducks or Be-nighted.

[1837.—“The Mulls have been excited also by another occurrence . . . affecting rather the trading than fashionable world.”—Asiatic Journal, December, p. 231.]

1852.—“. . . residents of Bengal, Bombay, and Madras are, in Eastern parlance, designated ‘Qui Hiss,’ ‘Ducks,’ and ‘Mulls.’”—Notes and Queries, 1st ser. v. 165.

1850.—“It ys ane darke Lende, and ther dwellen ye Cimmerians whereof speketh Homerus Poeta in his Odysea, and to thyis Daye thei clepen Trebros or ye Bengghted ffolke. Bot thei clepen hemselfys Mullys from Mulligatawnen whch ys ane of their goddys from wth thei ben ysprong.”—Ext. from a lately discovered MS. of Sir John Maunerville.

MULLIGATAWNY, s. The name of this well-known soup is simply a corruption of the Tamil mullo-gaun-tannir, ‘pepper-water’; showing the correctness of the popular belief which ascribes the origin of this excellent article to Madras, whence—and not merely from the complexion acquired there—the sobriquet of the preceding article.

In vain our hard fate we repine;
In vain on our fortune we rail;
On Mullagheee-tawny we dine.
Or Congee, in Bangalore Jail.

[1823.—“. . . in a brassen pot was mulugu tanni, a hot vegetable soup, made chiefly from pepper and capsicums.”—Hoole, Mis-sions in Madras, 2nd ed. 249.]

MULMULL, s. Hind. malmal; Muslin.

[c. 1590.—“Malmal, per piece . . . 4 R.”—Ain, ed. Blochmann, i. 94.]

1683.—“Ye said Ellis told your Petitioner that he would not take 500 Pieces of your Petitioner’s mulumuls unless your Petitioner gave him 200 Rups, which your Petitioner being poor could not do.”— MUNGOOSE. s.

This word is proper to the S.W. coast; Malayan, manjil, manchil, from Skt. manicha. It is the name of a kind of hammock-litter used on that coast as a substitute for palanquin or dooly. It is substantially the same as the dandy of the Himalaya, but more elaborate. Correa describes but does not name it.

1561.—"... He came to the factory in a litter which men carried on their shoulders. These are made with thick canes, bent upwards and arched, and from them are suspended some clothes half a fathom in width, and a fathom and a half in length; and at the extremities pieces of wood to sustain the cloth hanging from the pole; and upon this cloth a mattress of the same size as the cloth... the whole very splendid, and as rich as the gentlemen... may desire."—Correa, Three Voyages, &c., p. 199.

1810.—"... tangas, que elles chamano maxilas."—Annaes Maritimas, iii. 431.

1850.—"The Portuguese (in Quilliman) seldom even think of walking the length of their own street, and... go from house to house in a sort of palanquin, called here a macchia (pronounced manchila). This usually consists of a pole placed upon the shoulders of the natives, from which is suspended a long plank of wood, and upon that is fixed an old-fashioned-looking chair, or sometimes two. Then there is an awning over the top, hung all round with curtains. Each macchia requires about 6 to 8 bearers, who are all dressed alike in a kind of livery."—A Journey in E. Africa, by M. A. Pringle, p. 89.

This is the popular Anglo-Indian name of the Indian ichneumons, represented in the South by Mangusta Mungos (Elliot), or Herpestes griseus (Geoffroy) of naturalists, and in Bengal by Herpestes melancensis. [Blanford (Mammalia, 119 seqq.) recognizes eight species, the "Common Indian Mungoose" being described as Herpestes mungo.] The word is Telugu, minga, or mangisa. In Upper India the animal is called neneul, neolā, or nualā. Jerdon gives mangas however as a Deccani and Mahr. word; [Platts gives it as dialectic, and very doubtfully derives it from Skt. makša, 'moving quickly.' In Ar. it is buntārūs, 'daughter of the bridegroom,' in Egypt kiti or katt Furābūn, 'Pharaoh's cat' (Burton, Ar. Nights, ii. 369).

1673.—"... a Mungoose is akin to a Ferret. ..."—Fryer, 116.

1681.—"The knowledge of these antidotals herbs they have learned from the Mungoutia, a kind of Ferret."—Knox, 115.

1685.—"They have what they call a Mangus, creatures something different from ferrets; these hold snakes in great antipathy, and if they once discover them never give up till they have killed them."—Ribeyre, f. 56v.

Bluteau gives the following as a quotation from a History of Ceylon. tr. from Portuguese into French, published at Paris in 1701, p. 163. It is in fact the gist of an anecdote in Ribeyre.

"There are persons who cherish this animal and have it to sleep with them, although it is ill-tempered, for they prefer to be bitten by a mangus to being killed by a snake."

1774.—"He (the Dharma Raja of Bhutan) has got a little lap-dog and a Mungoo which he is very fond of."—Bogle's Diary in Markham's Tibet, 27.
1799. — "His (Mr. Glan’s) experiments have also established a very curious fact, that the ichneumon, or mongoose, which is very common in this country, and kills snakes without danger to itself, does not use antidotes... but that the poison of snakes is, to this animal, innocent." — Letter in Colbrook’s Life, p. 40.

1829. — "I Monguse animals simile ad una donna." — Papii, in de Gubernatis, St. dei Viaggi, Itali., p. 279.

MUNNEEPORE, n.p. Properly Manipur; a quasi-independent State lying between the British district of Cachar on the extreme east of Bengal, and the upper part of the late kingdom of Burmania, and in fact including a part of the watershed between the tributaries of the Brahmaputra and those of the Iravadi. The people are of genuinely Indo-Chinese and Mongolid aspect, and the State, small and seceded as it is, has had its turn in temporary conquest and domination, like almost all the States of Indo-China from the borders of Assam to the mouth of the Mekong. Like the other Indo-Chinese States, too, Manipur has its royal chronicle, but little seems to have been gathered from it. The Rajas and people have, for a period which seems uncertain, professed Hindu religion. A disastrous invasion of Manipur by Alompra, founder of the present Burmese dynasty, in 1755, led a few years afterwards to negotiations with the Bengal Government, and the conclusion of a treaty, in consequence of which a body of British sepoys was actually despatched in 1763, but eventually returned without reaching Manipur. After this, intercourse practically ceased till the period of our first Burmese War (1824-25), when the country was over-run by the Burmeses, who also entered Cachar; and British troops, joined with a Manipuri force, expelled them. Since then a British officer has always been resident at Manipur, and at one time (c. 1838-41) a great deal of labour was expended on opening a road between Cachar and Manipur. [The murder of Mr. Quinton, Chief-Commissioner of Assam, and other British officers at Manipur, in the close of 1890, led to the infliction of severe punishment on the leaders of the outbreak. The Mahärāja, whose abdication led to this tragedy, died in Calcutta in the following year, and the State is now under British management during the minority of his successor.]

This State has been called by a variety of names. Thus, in Rennell’s Memoir and maps of India it bears the name of Meckley. In Synes’s Narrative, and in maps of that period, it is Cassay; names, both of which have long disappeared from modern maps. Meckley represents the name (Mokli?) by which the country was known in Assam; Mejli (apparently a form of the same) was the name in Cachar; Kos-e or Kato (according to the Ava pronunciation) is the name by which it is known to the Shans or Burmese.

1735. — "I have carried my Arms to the confines of China... on the other quarter I have reduced to my subject the major part of the Kingdom of Cassay: whose Heir I have taken captive, see there he sits behind you... " — Speech of Alompra to Capt. Elliot at Monohar, Indiampl. Or. Rep., i. 174.

1759. — "Cassay, which... lies to the N. Westward of Ava, is a Country, so far as I can learn, hitherto unknown of in Europe... " — Letter, 22 June 1759, in ibid., 116.

[1762. — "... the President sent the Board a letter which he had received from Mr. Verelst at Chittagong, containing an invitation which had been made to him and his Council by the Rajah of Meckley to assist him in obtaining redress... from the Burmas... " — Letter, in Whish’s Early Records, 291.]

1763. — "Meckley is a Hilly Country, and is bounded on the North, South, and West by large tracts of Cookee Mountains, which prevent any intercourse with the countries beyond them; and on the East... by the Burampoota (see BURAMPOOTER); beyond the Hills, to the North by Assam and Posang: to the West Cashar; to the South and East the BURMAH Country, which lies between Meckley and China. The Burampoota is said to divide, somewhere to the north of Posang, into two large branches, one of which passes through Assam, and down by the valley of Basse, the other through Posang into the Burma Country. — Act. of Meckley, by Nober Josse Goesen, in Indiampl. Or. Rep., ii. 472-473."

seven days, Jungle and Hills, to the inhabited border of the Burmah country."—Ibid. 451.

1793.—"... The first ridge of mountains towards Thibet and Bootan, forms the limit of the survey to the north; to which I may now add, that the surveys extend no farther eastward, than the frontiers of Assam and Meckley. ... The space between Bengal and China, is occupied by the province of Meckley and other districts, subject to the King of Burmah, or Ava. ..."—Rennell's Memoir, 295.

1799.—(Referring to 1757). "Elated with success Alompra returned to Monchaboo, now the seat of imperial government. After some months he took up arms against the Cassayars. ... Having landed his troops, he was preparing to advance to Munnepora, the capital of Cassay, when information arrived that the Peguans had revolted. ..."—Smyth, Narrative, 41-42.

"... All the troops in the King's service are natives of Cassay, who are much better horsemen than the Burmans."—Ibid. 318.

1819.—"Beyond the point of Negraglia (see NEGRAIS), as far as Azan (see ASSAM), and even further, there is a small chain of mountains that divides Aranac and Cassé from the Burmese. ..."—Sangermano, p. 33.

1827.—"The extensive area of the Burman territory is inhabited by many distinct nations or tribes, of whom I have heard not less than eighteen enumerated. The most considerable of these are the proper Burmans, the Peguans or Talains, the Shans or people of Lao, the Cassay or more correctly Kathé. ..."—Crawford's Journal, 372.

1853.—"The weaving of these silks ... gives employment to a large body of the population in the suburbs and villages round the capital, especially to the Munniporians, or Kathé, as they are called by the Burmese.

"These people, the descendants of unfortunate who were carried off in droves from their country by the Burmans in the time of King Mentaragyi and his predecessors, form a very great proportion ... of the metropolitan population, and they are largely diffused in nearly all the districts of Central Burma. ... Whatever work is in hand for the King or for any of the chief men near the capital, these people supply the labouring hands; if beasts have to be maned they furnish the rovers; and whilst engaged on such tasks any remuneration they may receive is very scanty and uncertain."—Yule, Mission to Ava, 153-154.

MUNSUBDAR. Hind. from Pers. mansubdar, 'the holder of office or dignity' (Ar. mansab). The term was used to indicate quasi-feudal dependents of the Mogul Government who had territory assigned to them, on condition of their supplying a certain number of horse, 500, 1000 or more. In many cases the title was but nominal, and often it was assumed without warrant. [Mr. Irvine discusses the question at length and represents mansab by 'the word rank,' as its object was to settle precedence and fix gradation of pay; it did not necessarily imply the exercise of any particular office, and meant nothing beyond the fact that the holder was in the employ of the State, and bound in return to yield certain services when called upon." (J.R.A.S., July 1896, pp. 510 seqq.)]

1823.—"... certain Officers of the Militia, whom they call Munsubdars."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 97.

c. 1665.—Munsedbars are Cavaliers of Mansab, which is particular and honourable Pay; not so great indeed as that of the Omrahs. ... they being esteemed as little Omrahs, and of the rank of those, that are advanced to that dignity."—Bernier, E.T. p. 67; [ed. Constable, 215].

1673.—"Munsubdars or petty omrahs."—Fryer, 195.

MUNTRA, s. Skt. mantra, 'a text of the Vedas; a magical formula.'

1612.—"... Trata da causa primeira, segundo os livros que tem, chamados Terum Mandra mole' (mantra-máth, mantra 'text').—Conto, Dec. V. liv. vi. cap. 3.

1817.—"... he is said to have found the great mantra, spell or talisman."—Mill, Hist. ii. 149.

MUNTREE, s. Skt. Mantri. A minister or high official. The word is especially affected in old Hindu States, and in the Indo-Chinese and Malay States which derive their ancient civilisation from India. It is the word which the Portuguese made into mandarin (q.v.).

1810.—"... When the Court was full, and Ibrahim, the son of Candu the merchant, was near the throne, the Raja entered. ... But as soon as the Rajah seated himself, the muntries and high officers of state arrayed themselves according to their rank."—In a Malay's account of Government House at Calcutta, transl. by Dr. Leyden, in Maria Graham, p. 290.

MUNZIL. s. Ar, monzil, 'descending or alighting,' hence the halting place of a stage or march, a day's stage.

1685. — "We were not able to reach Obdeen-deen (ye usual Menzill) but lay at a sorry Caravan Sarai."—Hodges, Diary, July 30; [Hak. Soc. i. 203. In i. 214, manzill].

MUSCÁT, n.p., properly Máskát. A port and city of N.E. Arabia; for a long time the capital of 'Oman. (See IMAUM.)

1673.—"Muschat." See under IMAUM.

MUSIC. There is no matter in which the sentiments of the people of India differ more from those of Englishmen than on that of music, and curiously enough the one kind of Western music which they appreciate, and seem to enjoy, is that of the bagpipe. This is testified by Captain Munro in the passage quoted below; but it was also shown during Lord Canning's visit to Lahore in 1860, in a manner which dwells in the memory of one of the present writers. The escort consisted of part of a Highland regiment. A venerable Sikh chief who heard the pipes exclaimed: 'That is indeed music! It is like that which we hear of in ancient story, which was so exquisite that the hearers became insensible (behosh).'

1780.—"The bagpipe appears also to be a favourite instrument among the natives. They have no taste indeed for any other kind of music, and they would much rather listen to this instrument a whole day than to an organ for ten minutes."—Munro's Narrative, 33.

MUSK. s. We get this word from the Lat. muschus, Greek ὀξυς, and the latter must have been got, probably through Persian, from the Skt. muskha, the literal meaning of which is rendered in the old English phrase 'a cod of musk.' The oldest known European mention of the article is that which we give from St. Jerome; the oldest medical prescription is in a work of Aetius, of Amida (c. 540). In the quotation from Cosmas the word used is ὀξυς, and kastiri is a Skt. name, still, according to Royle, applied to the musk-deer in the Himalaya. The transfer of the name to (or from) the article called by the Greeks καστριον, which is an analogous product of the beaver, is curious. The Musk-deer (Moschus moschiferus, L.) is found throughout the Himalaya at elevations rarely (in summer) below 8000 feet, and extends east to the borders of Szechuen, and north to Siberia.

C. 545.—"This little animal is the Musk (μυς). The natives call it in their own tongue 'musrat.' They hunt it and shoot it, and binding tight the blood collected above the navel they cut this off, and this is the sweet smelling part of it, and what we call musk."—Cosmas Indicopleustes, Bk. xi.

["Muskc commeth from Tartaria. . . . There is a certaine beast in Tartaria. which is wilde and big as a wolfe, which beaet they take aline, and beat him to death with small stanes y: his blood may be spread through his whole body, then they cut it in pieces, and take out all the bones, and beat the flesh with the blood in a mortar very smal, and dry it, and make purses to put it in of the skin, and these be the Codc of Musk."—Cassar Frederick, in Hakl. ii. 372.]

1673.—"Musk. It is best to buy it in the Cod . . . that which openeth with a bright Musk colour is best."—Fryer, 212.

MUSK-RAT. s. The popular name of the Sorex caerulescens, Jerdon, [Crocidura caerulea, Blanford], an animal having much the figure of the common shrew, but nearly as large as a small brown rat. It diffuses a strong musky odour, so penetrative that it is commonly asserted to affect bottled beer by running over the bottles in a cellar. As Jerdon judiciously observes, it is much more probable that the corks have been affected before being used in bottling; [and Blanford (Mammalia, 237) writes that "the absurd story . . . is less credited in India than it formerly was, owing to the discovery that liquors bottled in Europe and exported to India are not liable to be tainted." When the female is in heat she is often seen to be followed by a string of males giving out the odour strongly. Can this be the mus peregrinus mentioned by St. Jerome (see MUSK), as P. Vincenzo supposes 1596.—"Here (in Tooman Bekhrad, n. of Kabul R.) are also mice that have a fine musky scent."—Aenar, by Claudius (1600), ii. 166; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 406].

1598.—"They are called sweet-smelling Rattes, for they have a smell as if they were full of Musk."—*Linchoth, Hak. Soc. i. 303.

1672.—P. Vincenzo Maria, speaking of his first acquaintance with this animal (il cotto del musco), which occurred in the Capuchin Convent at Sarat, says with simplicity (or malignity?): "I was astonished to perceive an odour so fragrant* in the vicinity of those most religious Fathers, with whom I was at the moment in conversation." —Viaggio, p. 385.

1681.—"This country has its vermin also. They have a sort of Rats they call Muscrats, because they smell strong of musk. These the inhabitants do not eat of, but of all other sorts of Rats they do."—Knoe, p. 31.

1789.—H. Munro in his Narrative (p. 31) absurdly enough identifies this animal with the Bandidoot. q.v.

1813.—See Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 42; [2nd ed. i. 26].

MUSLIN, s. There seems to be no doubt that this word is derived from Mosul (Mansul or Mansul) on the Tigris,† and it has been from an old date the name of a texture, but apparently not always that of the thin semi-transparent tissue to which we now apply it. Dozy (p. 323) says that the Arabs employ mansuli in the same

We have seen, however, somewhere an ingenious suggestion that the word really came from Masiqta (the country about Mashqatian, according to Ptolemy), which even in ancient times was famous for fine cotton textures.

sense as our word, quoting the Arabian Nights (Macnaghten's ed. i. 176, and i. 159), in both of which the word indicates the material of a fine turban, [Burton (i. 211) translates 'Mosul stuff,' and says it may mean either of 'Mosul fashion,' or muslin.] The quotation from Ives, as well as that from Marco Polo, seems to apply to a different texture from what we call muslin.

1298.—"All the cloths of gold and silk that are called Mosolins are made in this country (Mansul)."—Marco Polo, Blk. i. chap. 5.

c. 1541.—"Almusuless est regio in Mesopotamia, in qua texturam telae ex bombexy valde pulchrae, quae apud Syros et Aegyp- tios et apud mercatores Venetos appellant musulli, ex hoc regionis nomine. 1573.—"... you have all sorts of Cotton-works, Handkerchiefs, long Fillets, Girdles... and other sorts, by the Ar- abians called Mossellini (after the Country Mussoli, from whence they are brought, which is situated in Mesopotamia), by us Muslin."—Ravensfo, p. 84.

1580.—"For the rest the said Agiani (misprint for Bagnani, Banyans) wear clothes of white musollo or seros (?) having their garments very long and crossed over the breast."—Gasparo Balthi, f. 336.

1673.—"Le drap qu'on estend sur les mateus est d'une toile assy fine que de la mouseline."—App. to Journal d'Int. Galand, ii. 188.

1685.—"I have been told by several, that muscelin (so much in use here for cravats) and Calligo (s), and the most of the Indian linens, are made of nettles, and I see not the least improbability but that they may be made of the fibres of them."—Dr. Hans Sloane to Mr. Rey, in Ray Correspondence, 1818, p. 163.

c. 1760.—"This city (Mosul)is manufacturer Mussolin [read Mussolein (a cotton cloth) which they make very strong and pretty fine, and sell for the European and other markets]."—Ives, Voyage, p. 324.

MUSNUD, s. H.—Ar. mnud, from root snud, 'he leaned or rested upon it.' The large cushion, &c., used by native Princes in India, in place of a throne.

1752.—"Salabat-jing... went through the ceremony of sitting on the musud or throne."—Orms, ed. 1868, i. 250.

1757.—"On the 29th the Colonel went to the Soubah's Palace, and in the presence of all the Rajahs and great men of the court, 1509. — "In it was a musnud, with a carpet, and a little on one side were chairs on a white cloth." — Ld. Valentine, i. 346.

1524. — "They spread fresh carpets, and prepared the royal musnud, covering it with a magnificent shawl." — Hajji Baba, ed. 1835, p. 142.

1527. — "The Prince Tippoo had scarcely dismounted from his elephant, and occupied the musnud, or throne of cushions." — Sir W. Scott, Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiv.

MUSSALLA. s. P.-H. (with change of sense from Ar. mussalīḥ, pl. of mussala) 'materials, ingredients,' lit. 'things for the good of, or things or affairs conducive to good.' Though sometimes used for the ingredients of any mixture, e.g. to form a cement, the most usual application is to spices, curry-stuffs and the like. There is a tradition of a very gallant Governor-General that he had found it very tolerable, on a sharp but brief campaign, to "rough it on chupassies and mussaulchees" (p.p.v.), meaning chupatties and mussalbi.

1789. — 'A dose of musall or purgative spices.' — Moser, Narrative, 85.

1809. — "At the next hut the woman was grinding musala or curry-stuff on a flat smooth stone with another shaped like a rolling pin." — Maria Graham, 29.

MUSSAUL. s. Hind. from Ar. mash'ul, 'a torch.' It is usually made of rags wrap round a rod, and fed at intervals with oil from an earthen pot.

1675. — "The Duties * march like Furies with their lighted mussals in their hands, they are Pots filled with Oyl in an Iron Hoop like our Beacons, and set on fire by stinking rags." — Foger, 55.

1809. — "These Mussal or link-boys." — Ld. Valentine, i. 17.

1510. — "The Mosaic, or flambeau, consists of old rags, wrapped very closely round a small stick." — Williamson, V. M. ii. 219.

1813. — "These nocturnal processions illuminated by many hundred mussauls or torches, illustrate the peradventure of the ten virgins." — Forbes, V. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 274.

1857. — "Near him was another Hindoo ... he is called a Mussal: and the lamps and lights are his special department." — Lady Falkland, Chir-Chir, 2nd ed. i. 95.

MUSSAULCHEE. s. Hind. mash'-alḍī from mussalī (see MUSSAUL), with the Turkish termination chī, generally implying an agent. [In the Arabian Nights (Burton, i. 239) a mas'lalī is the executioner.] The word properly means a link-boy, and was formerly familiar in that sense as the epithet of the person who ran along-side of a palankin on a night journey, bearing a mussal. "In Central India it is the special duty of the barber (nū) to carry the torch; hence nū commonly = torch-bearer" (M. G. Kirti). The word [sometimes in the corrupt form mussaul] is however still more frequent as applied to a humble domestic, whose duty was formerly of a like kind, as may be seen in the quotation from Ld. Valencia, but who now looks after lamps and washes dishes, &c., in old English phrase 'a scullion.'

1810. — "He always had in service 500 Massalgees." — Finch, in Purchas, i. 482.

1852. — "(In Asam) they fix the head of the corpse rigidly with poles, and put a lamp with plenty of oil, and a mash alḍī [torch-bearer] alive into the vault, to look after the lamp." — Shikhandibba Tāvish, tr. by Brockman, in J. I. S. B. xi. Pt. ii. 52.

1865. — "(They [flambeaux] merely consist of a piece of iron hoasted in a stick, and surrounded at the extremity with linen rags steeped in oil, which are renewed ... by the Masalich, or link-boys, who carry the oil in long narrow-necked vessels of iron or brass." — Borri, ed. Conant, 391.

1886. — "After strict examination he chose 2 persons, the Cheir-Chiirs, an Armenian, who had charge of watching my tent that night, and my Massalagee, a person who carries the light before me in the night." — Hedges, Diary, July 2: Hak. Soc. i. 232.

MUSSENDOM, CAPE. 602 MUSSOOLA, MUSSOOLAH.

1791.—"... un masolchi, ou porte-fambeau, pour la nuit."—B. de St. Pierre, La Chausseure Indienne, 16.

1809.—"It is universally the custom to drive out between sunset and dinner. The Massalchees, when it grows dark, go out to meet their masters on their return, and run before them, at the full rate of eight miles an hour, and the numerous lights moving along the esplanade produce a singular and pleasing effect."—J. W. and J. B. de la Vallée, i. 240.

1813.—"The occupation of massalchees, or torch-bearer, although generally allotted to the village barber, in theourgannas under my charge, may vary in other districts."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 417; [2nd ed. ii. 49].

1826.—"After a short conversation, they went away, and quickly returned at the head of 200 men, accompanied by Mus-salchees or torch-bearers."—Pandurang Hatti, 557; [ed. 1873, ii. 69].

MUSSENDOM, CAPE, n.p. The extreme eastern point of Arabia, at the entrance of the Persian Gulf. Properly speaking, it is the extremity of a small precipitous island of the name, which protrudes beyond the N.E. horn of 'Omân. The name is written Masaudim in the map which Dr. Badger gives with his H. of 'Oman. But it is Rīs Masaudum (or possibly Masaudam) in the Mohit of Sidi 'Ali Kapudan (J. As. Soc. Ben., v. 459). Sprenger writes Masandum (Alt. Geog. Arabiens, p. 107). [Morier gives another explanation (see the quotation below).]

1553.—"... before you come to Cape Mosandam, which Tolemey calls Asabaro ('Aṣṣābā̄r) and which he puts in 2° 3', but which we put in 2°; and here terminates our first division" (of the Eastern Coasts).—Barros, I. ix. 1.

1572.—"Olha o cabo Asabaro que chamado Agora he Mosandão dos navegantes: Por aqui entra o lago, que he fechado De Arabia, e Persias terras abundantes."—Camões, x. 102.

By Burton:

"Behold of Asabon the Head, now hight Mosandam, by the men who plough the Main:
Here lies the Gulf whose long and lake-like Bight, Parts Araby from fertile Persia's plain."

The fact that the poet copies the misprint or mistake of Barros in Asaboro in Asabaro, shows how he made use of that historian.

1673.—"On the one side St. Jaques (see JASK) his Headland, on the other that of Mussendown appeared, and afore Sunset we entered the Straights Mouth."—Fryer, 221.

1727.—"The same Chain of rocky Mountains continue as high as Zear, above Cape Musenden, which Cape and Cape Jaques begin the Gulf of Persia."—A. Hamilton, i. 71; [ed. 1744, i. 73].

1777.—"At the mouth of the Strait of Mocand, which leads into the Persian gulf, lies the island of Gombroon" (I)—Raynal, tr. 1777, i. 86.

[1808.—"Musseldom is a still stronger instance of the perversion of words. The genuine name of this head-land is Mama Solemeh, who was a female saint of Arabia, and lived on the spot or in its neighbourhood."—Morier, Journey through Persia, p. 6.]

MUSSOOLA, MUSSOOLAH, BOAT, s. The surf boat used on the Coromandel Coast; of capacious size, and formed of planks sewn together with coir-twine; the open joints being made good with a canuking or wadding of twisted coir. The origin of the word is very obscure. Leyden thought it was derived from "mosula... the Mahrrata term for fish." (Morton's Life of Leyden, 64). As a matter of fact, the Marh. word for fish is masolii, Konk. masali. This etymology is substantially adopted by Bp. Heber (see below); and by the compiler of the Madras Gloss., who gives Tel. masala, Hind. masali. But it may be that the word is some Arabic sea-term not in the dictionaries. Indeed, if the term used by C. Federici (below) be not a clerical error, it suggests a possible etymology from the Ar. masal, "the fibrous bark of the palm-tree, a rope made of it." Another suggestion is from the Ar. masul, "joined," as opposed to 'dug-out,' or canoes; or possibly it may be from masal, "tax," if these boats were subject to a tax. Lastly it is possible that the name may be connected with Masulipatam (q.v.), where similar boats would seem to have been in use (see Fryer, 26). But these are conjectures. The quotation from Gasparo Balbi gives a good account of the handling of these boats, but applies no name to them.

certe barchette fatte aposta molto alte e larghe, ch'essi chiamano Masudi; e sono fatte con taule soffitli, e con corde soffitli eciste insieme vna taule con l'altre." &c. (there follows a very correct description of their use)—C. Federici, in Romeosia, iii. 391.

c. 1586.—"... where (Negapataam) they cannot land anything but in the Macules of the same country."—Primor e Honra, &c., f. 93.

c. 1582.—"... There is always a heavy sea there (San Thomâ', from swell or storm; so the merchandise and passengers are transported from shipboard to the town by certain boats which are sewn with fine cords, and when they approach the beach, where the sea breaks with great violence, they wait till the perilous wave has past, and then, in the interval between one wave and the next, those boats pull with great force, and run ashore; and being there overtaken by the waves they are carried still further up the beach. And the boats do not break, because they give to the wave, and because the boats stand upright on their bottoms."—C. Balbi, f. 89.

1673.—"I went ashore in a Mussoola, a Boat wherein ten Men paddle, the two aftermost of whom are Steerers, using their Paddles instead of a Rudder. The Boat is not strengthened with Knee-Timbers, as ours are: the bended Planks are sowed together with Rope-Yarn of the Coco, and talked with Dammur (see DAMMER) (a sort of Resin taken out of the Sea, so artificially that it yields to every ambitious Surf."—Fryer, 37.

1678.—"Three Englishmen drowned by upsetting of a Mussoola boat. The fourth on board saved with the help of the Muckwats" (see MUCOA.—P. St. Geo., Colonia, Aug. 18. Notes and Exts. No. 1, p. 78.

[1658.—"This Evening about seven a Clock a Mussoola coming ashore ... was oversett in the Surf and all four drowned."—Pringle, Diary, Fl. St. Geo, 1st ser. ii. 51.]

1655.—"This morning two Mussoolas and two Cutamorans came off to ye Shippes."—Hodges, Diary, Feb. 3; (Hak. Soc. i. 152).

1700.—"As soon as the yaws and pinches reached the surf they dropped their grappling, and cast off the masoolas, which immediately rowed ashore, and landed the troops."—Orme, iii. 617.

1762.—"No European boat can land, but the natives make use of a boat of a particular construction called a Mausolo," &c.—J.H. Letter of James Plowden, April 1.

[1773.—"... the governor ... sent also four Mosuulass, or country boats, to accommodate him ..."—Iet, 182.]

1788.—"The want of Massoola boats (built expressly for crossing the surf) will be severely felt."—In Life of Colvbrook, 9.

1826.—"The musli-boats (which first word is merely a corruption of 'muchit', fish) have been often described, and except that they are sewed together with coco-nut twine, in stead of being fastened with nails, they very much resemble the high, deep, charcoal boats ... on the Ganges."—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 174.

1879.—"Madras has no harbour: nothing but a long open beach, on which the surf dashes with tremendous violence. Unlucky passengers were not landed there in the ordinary sense of the term, but were thrown violently on the shore, from springy and elastic Masoolah boats, and were occasionally carried off by sharks, if the said boats chanced to be upset in the rollers."—Sely. Review, Sept. 29.

MUSSUCK. s. The leathern water-bag, consisting of the entire skin of a large goat, strip of the hair and dressed, which is carried by a bhikâti (see BHEESTY). Hind. moshul, Skt. mašaka.

1842.—"Might it not be worth while to try the experiment of having 'mussocks' made of waterproof cloth in England?"—Sir G. Arthur, in Ind. Anti. of Lord Ellenborough, 220.

MUSSULMAN, adj. and s. Mahomedan. Muslim, 'resigning' or 'submitting' (sc. oneself to God), is the name given by Mahomedans to the Faithful. The Persian plural of this is Musulâmân, which appears to have been adopted as a singular, and the word Musulâm or Musulman thus formed. [Others explain it as either from Ar. pl. Musulâm, or from Muslim-mân, 'like a Muslim,' the former of which is adopted by Platts as most probable.]

1653.—"... son infanterie d'Indiannessi Musulmans, on Indiens de la secte desSonnis."—Du la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, 233.

1673.—"Yet here are a sort of bold, lusty, and most an end, drunken Beggars of the Musslemen last, that if they see a Christian in good clothes, mounted on a stately horse ... are presently upon their Ponteillo's, with God Almighty, and interrogate him, Why he suffers him to go a Foot, and in Rags, and this Coffery (see Caffer) (Un-believer) to vaunt it thus?"—Fryer, 91.

1788.—"We escape an ambiguous termination by adopting Mestron instead of Musulman in the plural number."—Gibbon, pref. to vol. iv.

MUST. adj. Pers. mast, 'drunk.' It is applied in Persia also, and in India specially, to male animals, such as elephants and camels, in a state of periodical excitement.

[1852.—"Fits of Must differ in duration in different animals (elephants); in some they last for a few weeks, in others for even four or five months."—Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 3rd ed., 59.]

MUSTEES, MESTIZ, &c., s. A half-caste. A corruption of the Port. mestizo, having the same meaning; "a mixing; applied to human beings and animals born of a father and mother of different species, like a mule" (Bluteau); French, métis and métiff.

1516.—"The Governor in honour of this great action (the victory at Diu) ordered that all the mestíchos who were in Dio should be inscribed in the Book, and that pay and subsistence should be assigned to them,—subject to the King's confirmation. For a regulation had been sent to India that no mestíco of India should be given pay or subsistence: for, as it was laid down, it was their duty to serve for nothing, seeing that they had their houses and heritages in the country, and being on their native soil were bound to defend it."—Correa, iv. 580.

1552.—"... the sight of whom as soon as they came, caused immediately to gather about them a number of the natives, Moors in Brazil, and Negroes with curly hair an appearance, and some of them only swarthly, as being místicos."—Barros, i. 12.

1586.—"... che se sono nati qua di donne indiane, gli domandano mestizzi."—Sassetti, in De Civefaratit, 188.

1610.—"Le Capitaine et les Marchands estoient Mestifes, les autres Indiens Christianises."—Pyrrard de Laval, i. 165; [Hak. Soc. i. 75; also see i. 240. This author has also Mètis (ii. 10; [Hak. Soc. i. 373]), and again; "... qu'ils appellent Mètices, c'est à dire Mefits, meslez" (ii. 28; [Hak. Soc. ii. 38]).

... "Je vy vne monstre generalle de tous les Habitans portans armes, tant Portugalis que Metices et Indiens, et se tromnerent environ 4000."—Moquet, 592.

1615.—"A Mestizo came to demand passage in our junek."—Cocks's Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 216.

1673.—"(At Goa) "Les Mestissos sont de plusieurs sortes, mais fort maurevise des Reignois et Castissos (see CASTEE) parce qu'il y a eu de peu de sang noir dans la generation de leurs ancetres ... la tache d'auoir en pour anceste une Indienne leur demeure inusques a la centième generation: ils peuvent toutefois estré soldats et Capitaines de forREFERENCES, or de vaisseaux, s'ils font profession de suire les armes, et s'ils se leettent du costé de l'Eglise ils peuvent estre Lecteurs, mais non Fronleuxes."—Du la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 228.

c. 1665.—"... And, in a word, Bengal is a country abounding in all things; and 'tis for this very reason that so many Portuguese, Mesticks, and other Christians are fled thither."—Berrier, E.T. 140; [ed. Constable, 438].

1678.—"Beyond the Outworks live a few Portugalis Musteros or Misteredes."—Fryer, 57.

1678.—"Nec roman Catholic or Papist, whether English or of any other nation shall bear office in this Garrison, and shall have no more pay than 80 panams per mensem, as private centinals, and the pay of those of the Portuguese nation, as Europeans, Musteeses, and Topasses, is from 70 to 40 panams per mensem."—Articles and Orders ... of Ft. St. Goa, Madrecapatam. In Notes and Extracts, i. 85.

1699.—"Wives of Freeman, Mustees."—Census of Company's Servants on the Coast, in Wheeler, i. 355.

1727.—"A poor Seaman had got a pretty Mustice Wife."—J. Hamilton, ii. 10; [ed. 1741, ii. 8].
1781.—"Eloped from the service of his MISTRESS a Slave Boy aged 20 years, or thereabouts, pretty white or colour of MUSKY, tall and slender."—Hickey's Bengal Gazette, Feb. 24.

1799.—"August 13th... Visited by appointment... Mrs. Carey, the last survivor of those unfortunate persons who were imprisoned in the Black Hole of Calcutta... The... widow... fifty-days, now fifty-six years of age, as she herself told me, is... of a fair Mestizia colour... She confirmed all which Mr. Holwell has said..."—Note by Thomas Boileau (an attorney in Calcutta, the father of Major-General John Theophilus and A. H. E. Boileau, R.E. (Bengal)), quoted in Echoes of Old Calcutta, 34.

1834.—"You don't know these Baboos... Most of them now-a-days have their MISTEEA Beebes, and their Moosulmanees, and not a few their Goree Beebes likewise."—The Baboo, &c., 157-165.

1868.—"These Mestizas, as they are termed, are the native Indians of the Philippines, whose blood has to a great extent perhaps been mingled with that of their Spanish rulers. They are a very exclusive people... and have their own places of amusement, called and Mestiza balls, to which no one is admitted who does not don the costume of the country."—Collingwood, Rambles of a Naturalist, p. 296.

MUSTER, s. A pattern, or a sample. From Port. mostra (Span. muestra, Ital. mostra). The word is current in China, as well as India. See Wells Williams's Guide, 237.

c. 1441.—"Vierão as nossas Galês por commissão sua com algumas amostras de aquelas da Madeira, da Sáo de Dragão, e de outras cousas."—Cidade, Navegao primeira, 6.

1563.—"And they gave me a mostra of amomum, which I brought to Goa, and showed to the apothecaries here; and I compared it with the drawings of the simples of Dioscorides."—Garcia, f. 15.

1612.—"A Moore came aboard with a muster of Clowes."—Sars, in Purchas, i. 357.

1727.—"He advised me to send to the King... that I designed to trade with his Subjects... which I did, and in twelve Days received an Answer that I might... desired me to send some person up with Musters of all my Goods."—A. Hamilton, ii. 200; [ed. 1744.]

MUSTER. c. 1760.—"He (the tailor) never measures you; he only asks muster for muster, as he terms it, that is for a pattern."—Ives, 52.

1772.—"The Governor and Council of Bombay must be written to, to send round Musters of such kinds of silk, and silk piece-goods, of the manufacture of Bengal, as will serve the market of Surat and Bombay."—Price's Travels, i. 39.

[1846.—"The above muster was referred to a party who has lately arrived from England."—J. A. H. Soc., in Watt, Econ. Diet. vi. pt. ii. 601.]

MUTLUB, s. Hind. from Ar. matlah. The Ar. from talah, 'he asked,' properly means a question, hence intention, wish, object, &c. In Anglo-Indian use it always means 'purpose, gist,' and the like. Iliterate natives by a common form of corruption turn the word into matbal. In the Punjab this occurs in printed books; and an adjective is formed, matbali, 'opinionated,' and the like.

MUTT, MUTH, s. Skt. matha; a sort of convent where a celibate priest (or one making such profession) lives with disciples making the same profession, one of whom becomes his successor. Buildings of this kind are very common all over India, and some are endowed with large estates.

1874.—"The monastic Order is celibate, and in a great degree erratic and mendicant, but has anchorage places and head-quarters in the maths."—Calcut. Review, cxvii. 212.

MUTTONGOSHT, s. (i.e. 'Mutton-flesh') Anglo-Indian domestic Hind. for 'Mutton.'

MUTTONGYE, s. Sea-Hind. muttongar, a (nautical) martingale; a corruption of the Eng. word.

MUTTRA, n.p. A very ancient and holy Hindu city on the Jumna, 30 miles above Agra. The name is Mathura, and it appears in Ptolemy as Mēdana ἡ τῶν Θεών. The sanctity of the name has caused it to be applied in numerous new localities; see under MADURA. [Tavernier (ed. Ball, ii. 240) calls it Matura, and Bernier (ed. Constable, 66), Maturas.]

MUXADABAD, n.p. Ar.—P. Mašhadābād, a name that often occurs in books of the 18th century. It pertains to the same city that has latterly been called Murshidabad, the capital of the Nawabs of Bengal since the beginning of the 18th century. The town Maksidabad is stated by Tiefenthaler to have been founded by Akbar. The Governor of Bengal, Murshid Kuli Khan (also called in English histories Jaffer Khan), moved the seat of Government hither in 1704, and gave the place his own name. It is written Muxudabad in the early English records down to 1760 (Sir W. W. Hunter).

1684.—"Dec. 28.—In ye morning I went to give Bulchund a visit according to his invitation, who rose up and embraced me when I came near him, enquired of my health and bid me welcome to Muxoodavad...",—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 59.

1703.—"The 1st act of the Nawab, on his return to Bengal, was to change the name of the city of Maksosabad to Moorshudabad; and by establishing in it the mint, and by erecting a palace... to render it the capital of the Province."—Stewart, II. of Bengal, 309.

1726.—"Muxadabath."—Valentijn, Charon, &c., 147.

1727.—"Muxadabad is but 12 miles from it (Costimbazar), a Place of much greater Antiquity, and the Mogul has a Mint there; but the ancient name of Muxadabad has been changed for Rajshah, for above a Century."—A. Hamilton, ii. 20; [ed. 1741]. (There is great confusion in this.)

1751.—"I have heard that Ram Kissen Seet, who lives in Calcutta, has carried goods to that place without paying the Muxidavad Syre (see SAYER) Chowkey duties, I am greatly surprised, and send a Chudbar to bring him, and desire you will be speedy in delivering him over."—Letter from N. Ad. Amyerl. Com. to the Pres't of Councill, dated Muxidabad, May 20.

1758.—"En omettant quelques lieux de moindre considération, je m'arrête d'abord à Mocsidabad. Ce nom signifie ville de la monnaie. Et en effet c'est là où se frappe collet du pays; et un grand faubourg de cette ville, appelé Asingong, est la résidence du Nabab, qui gouverne le Bengale presque souverainement."—D'Anville, 63.

1756.—"The Nabob, irritated by the disappointment of his expectations of immense wealth, ordered Mr. Holwell and the two other prisoners to be sent to Muxadav."

Orme, iii. 78.

1782.—"You demand an account of the East Indies, the Moguls' dominions and Muxadabad... I imagine when you made the above requisition that you did it with a view rather to try my knowledge than to increase your own, for your great skill in geography would point out to you that Muxadabad is as far from Madras, as Constantinople is from Glasgow."—T. M'arovo to his brother William, in Life, &c. iii. 41.

1854.—"It is alleged in a passage introduced in Mrs. C. Mackenzie's interesting memoir of her husband, Storms and Sunshine of a Soldier's Life, that "Admiral Watson used to sail up in his ships to Mooreshabad." But there is no ground for this statement. So far as I can trace, it does not appear that the Admiral's flag-ship ever went above Chandernagore, and the largest of the vessels sent to Hoogly even was the Bridge-water of 20 guns. No vessel of the fleet appears to have gone higher.

MUZBEE, s. The name of a class of Sikhs originally of low caste, vulg. mazhab, apparently muzhab from Ar. mazhab, 'religious belief.' Cunningham indeed says that the name was applied to Sikh converts from Mahomedanism (History, p. 379). But this is not the usual application now. "[W]hen the sweepers have adopted the Sikh faith they are known as Mazhabis... When the Chudra is circumcised and becomes a Muslim, he is known as a Musalli or a Kotana" (Maclayan, Punjab Census Rep., 1891, p. 202.) The original corps of Muzbees, now represented by the 32nd Bengal N.I. (Pioneers) was raised among the men labouring on the Baree Doab Canal.

1858.—"On the 19th June (1857) I advocated, in the search for new Military classes, the raising of a corps of Muzbees... The idea was ultimately carried out, and improved by making them pioneers."—Letter from Col. H. B. Edwards to R. Montgomery, Esq., March 23.

"To the same destination (Delhi) was sent a strong corps of Muzhubee (low-caste) Sikhs, numbering 1200 men, to serve as pioneers."—Letter from R. Temple, Secretary to Punjab Govt., dd. Lahor, May 25, 1858.

MYDAN, MEIDAUN, s. Hind. from Pers. maidan. An open space, an esplanade, parade-ground or green, in or adjoining a town; a piazza (in the Italian sense); any open plain with grass on it; a chowgan (see CHICANE) ground; a battle-field. In Ar., usually, a hippodrome or race-course.

c. 1330.—"But the brethren were meanwhile brought out to the Medan, i.e., the piazza of the City, where an exceeding great fire had been kindled. And Friar Thomas went forward to cast himself into the fire, but as he did so a certain Saracen caught him by the hood..."—Friar Odoric, in Cutbey, 63.

1618.—"When it is the hour of complines, or a little later to speak exactly, it is the time for the promenade, and every one goes on horseback to the meidan, which is always kept clean, watered by a number of men whose business this is, who water it carrying the water in skins slung over the shoulder, and usually well shaded and very cool."—P. della Valle, i. 767.

c. 1655.—"Celui (Quervanser) des Étrangers est bien plus spaceux que l’autre et est quarré; et tous deux font face au Maidan..."—Th'evenot, v. 214.

1670.—"Before this house is a great square meidan or promenade, planted on all sides with great trees, standing in rows..."—Andriesz, 35.

1673.—"The Midan, or open Space before the Caun's Palace, is an Oblong and Stately Platioz, with real not belied Cloisters..."—Fryer, 219.

1825.—"All this was done with as much coolness and precision, as if he had been at exercise upon the maidan..."—The Kuzzil-bush, i. 228.

MYNA, MINA. &c. s. Hind. maind. A name applied to several birds of the family of starlings. The common myna is the Acridotheres tristis of Linn.; the southern Hill-Myna is the Gracula, also Enulas religiosa of Linn.; the Northern Hill-Myna, Enulas intermedia of Hay (see Jordan's Birds, ii. Pt. i. 325, 337, 339). Of both the first and last it may be said that they are among the most teachable of imitative birds, articulating words with great distinctness, and without Polly's nasal tone. We have heard a wild one (probably the first), on a tree in a field, spontaneously echoing the very peculiar call of the black partridge from an adjoining jungle, with unmistakable truth. There is a curious description in Aelian (De Nat. An. xvi. 2) of an Indian talking bird which we thought at one time to be the Myna; but it seems to be nearer the Shàmà, and under that head the quotation will be found. [Mr. M'Crinille (Invasion of India, 186) is in favour of the Myna.]

[1950].—"The Mynah is twice the size of the Shàrâk, with glossy black plumage, but with the bill, wattles and tail covets yellow. It imitates the human voice and speaks with great distinctness."—Ain, ed. Jarrett, iii. 121.]

1631.—Jac. Bontius describes a kind of Myna in Java, which he calls Pier, seu ptinus Sturnus, Indicus. "The tall owner, an old Mussulman woman, only lent it to the author to be drawn, after great persuasion, and on a stipulation that the beloved bird should get no swine's flesh to eat. And when he had promised accordingly, the avis pessima immediately began to chant: Orang Nàstrœnœ eætœræ macan bâth; i.e. 'Dog of a Christian, eater of swine!'"—Lib. v. cap. 14, p. 67.

[1864].—"In the Duke’s chamber there is a bird, given him by Mr. Pierce, the surgeon, comes from the East Indys, black the greatest part, with the finest collar of white about the neck; it talks many things and neyès like the horse, and other things to the best almost that ever I heard bird in my life..."—Pepys, Diary, April 25. Prof. Newton in Mr. Wheatley's ed. (iv. 118) is inclined to identify this with the Myna, and notes that one of the earliest figures of the bird is by Eleazar Albin (Nat. Hist. of Birds, ii. pl. 38) in 1738.

MYROBALAN. s. A name applied to certain dried fruits and kernels of astringent flavour, but of several species, and not even all belonging to the same Natural Order, which were from an early date exported from India, and had a high reputation in the medieval pharmacopoeia. This they appear (some of them) to retain in native Indian medicine; though they seem to have disappeared from English use and have no place in Hanbury and Flückiger's great work, the Pharmacographia. They are still, to some extent, imported into England, but for use in tanning and dyeing, not in pharmacy.

It is not quite clear how the term myrobalan, in this sense, came into use. For the people of India do not seem to have any single name denoting these fruits or drugs as a group; nor do the Arabic dictionaries afford one either (but see further on). Myrobalanes is spoken of by some ancient authors, e.g. Aristotle, Dioscorides and Pliny, but it was applied by them to one or more fruits* entirely unconnected with the subjects of this article. This name had probably been preserved in the laboratories, and was applied by some early translator of the Arabic writers on Materia Medica to these Indian products. Though we have said that (so far as we can discover) the dictionaries afford no word with the comprehensive sense of Myrobalan, it is probable that the physicians had such a word, and Garcia de Oria, who is trustworthy, says explicitly that the Arab practitioners whom he had consulted applied to the whole class the name delegi, a word which we cannot identify, unless it originated in a clerical error for deleqi, i.e. ihileij. The last word may perhaps be taken as covering all myrobalans; for according to the Glossary to Rhazes at Leyden (quoted by Dozy, Suppt. i. 43) it applies to the Kabuli, the yellow, and the black (or Indian), whilst the Emblie is also called ihileij ambaj.

In the Kashmir Customs Tariff (in Punjab Trade Report, cccxcvi.) we have entries of "Hulela (Myrobalan).

Bulda (Bellerick ditto).
Amla (Emblaica Phyllanthus)."

The kinds recognised in the Medieval pharmacopoeia were five, viz.:

1. The Emblie myrobalan; which is the dried astringent fruit of the Anwula, diwala of Hind., the Embliae officinalis of Gaertner (Phyllanthus Emblica, L., N. O. Euphorbiaceae). The Persian name of this is ambil; but, as the Arabic ambaj suggests, probably in older Persian ambil, and hence no doubt Embliea. Garcia says it was called by the Arab physicians ambelqi (which we should write ambilji).

2. The Belleric Myrobalan; the fruit of Terminalia Bellerica, Roxb. (N.O. Combretaceae), consisting of a small nut enclosed in a thin exterior rind. The Arabic name given in Ibn Baithar is balil; in the old Latin version of Avicenna, belilig; and in Persian it is called balil and balila. Garcia says the Arab physicians called it belereqi (balirej; and in old Persian probably belirig) which accounts for Bellerica.

3. The Chebulic Myrobalan; the fruit of Terminalia Chebula, Roxb. The derivation of this name which we have given under CHEBULI is confirmed by the Persian name, which is Halila-i-Kabuli. It can hardly have been a product of Kabul, but may have been imported into Persia by that route, whence the name, as calicos got their name from Calicut. Garcia says these myrobalans were called by his Arabs quebuli. Ibn Baithar calls them halilaj, and many of the authorities whom he quotes specify them as Kabuli.

4 and 5. The Black Myrobalan, otherwise called "Indian," and the Yellow or Citrine. These, according to Royle (Essay on Antig. of Hindoo Medicine, pp. 36-37), were both products of T. Chebula in different states; but this does not seem quite certain. Further varieties were sometimes recognised, and nine are said to be specified in a paper in an early vol. of the Philos. Transactions. One kind called Sim or Chinese, is mentioned by one of the authorities of Ibn Baithar, quoted below, and is referred to by Garcia.

The virtues of Myrobalans are said to be extolled by Charaka, the oldest of the Sanskrit writers on Medicine. Some of the Arabian and Medieval Greek authors, referred to by Boyle, also speak of a combination of different kinds of Myrobalan called Triphera or Triphala; a fact of great interest. For this is the triphala (‘Three-fruits’) of Hindu medicine, which appears in Amarakosha (c. A.D. 500), as well as in a prescription of Susruta, the disciple of Charaka, and which is still, it would seem, familiar to the native Indian practitioners. It is, according to Royce, a combination of the black, yellow and Chebulic; but Garcia, who calls it tine-pala (tin-phalin Hind. = ‘Three-fruits’), seems to imply that it consisted of three kinds known in Goa, viz. citrine (or yellow), the Indian (or black), and the Belleric. [Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. iv. 32 seqq.] The emble, he says, were not used in medicine there, only in tanning, like sumach. The Myrobalans imported in the Middle Ages seem often to have been preserved (in syrup?).

c. A.D. 60.—“φωινες ιν άλειπτω γκεται τριγκατα δε μεταπρωσις της κατα την όπωραν ακης, περιμετρων τη άραξις μυροβαλανων, ποια δε Νετζαια...” —* Dioscorides, de Medic. &cura, i. cxlviii.*

c. A.D. 70.—*Myrobalanum Trogloyditsis et Thebaidi et Arabiae quae Judeam ab Aegypto disterminat commune est, nascens unguento, ut ipsa nomine apparat, quo item indicatur et glandem esse. Arbor est heliotropo... similis folio, fructus magnitudine abellanes musis,” &c. —Pliny, xii. 21 (16).

c. 540.—A prescription of Acnius of Amida, which will be found transcribed under ZEDARI, includes myrobalan among a large number of ingredients, chiefly of Oriental origin: and one doubts whether the word may not here be used in the later sense.

c. 1343.—“Preserved Mirabolanus (mirabolan condicti) should be big and black, and the envelope over the nut tender to the tooth (like candied walnuts), the better they are. . . . Some people say that in India they are candied when unripe (acered), just as we candy the unripe tender walnuts, and that when they are candied in this way they have no nut within, but are all through tender like our walnut-comfits. But if this is really done, anyhow none reach us except those with a nut inside, and often very hard nuts too. They should be kept in brown earthen pots glazed, in a syrup made of casia fistula 4 and honey or sugar; and they should remain always in the syrup, for they form a moist preserve and are not fit to use dry.” —Poeulottii, p. 377.

c. 1343.—“(At Alexandria) *are sold by the ten mens (pene, see MAUND), . . . amomum, mirabolanos of every kind, camphor, castor.” —Ibid. 57.

c. 1357.—“... Vasi grandi di confecione, mirabolanos e engiguro.” —Letter on presents sent by the Sultan to L. de Medici, in Rosco’s Lorenzo, ed. 1825, ii. 372.

c. 1355.—In Calicut “il nasce mirabolanis, embicli e chelali, il quali valeno duciota o bel bar (see BAHAR).” —Lionardo Co. Masser, p. 27.

c. 1552.—“La campagna de lericho is entournee de moutaisses de tout costez: poignant laquelle, et du coste de midy est la mer morte... Les arbres qui portent le Licion, missent en cette plaine, et aussi les arbres qui portent les Myrobalans Citrins, du nom du nano qui dess plus les habitants font de l’huile.” —P. Belon, Observations, ed. 1594, f. 144.

c. 1500.—“Mais pource que le Ben, que les Grezch appellent Balans; Myraries, m’a fait souvenir des Myrobalanos des Arabes, dont y en eu et ceux du nord de l’orient, et callend non en eu ordinairement en Medecine, encorees que les anciens Grezch n’en ayent fait aucune mention: il m’a semble bon d’en toucher mot: car l’esuse fait grand tort a ces Commentaires de les primer d’un...” —Conspicuum, make comfits of; preserve, but the latter word is too vague.

*This is surely not what we now call Cassa Fistula, the long cylindrical pod of a leguminous tree, abounding a mild laxative? But Hamburgh and Fiuckvius (pp. 10, 42, 45) show that: some Cassa bark (of the cinnamon kind) was known in the early centuries of our era as kasia spir, γος και ossea fistularis; whilst the drac now called Cassa Fistula, L., is first noticed by a medical writer of Constantimople towards A.D. 1300. Poeulottii, at p. 336, gives a few lines of instruction for judging of Cassa fistula: “It ought to be black, and thick, and unbroken (salli), and heavy, and the thicker it is, and the blacker the outside rind is, the better it is, and it retains its virtue well for 2 years.” This is not very decisive, but on the whole we should suppose Poeulottii’s Cassa fistula to be either a spice-bark, or solid twigs of a like plant (IL. & F. Plant. 446).

*This is probably Bolivarianus exemptus, Delile, the 2° of the Arabs, which is not unlike myrobalan fruit and yields an oil much used medically. The negroes of the Niger make an intoxicating spirit of it.*
MYSORE. n.p. Tam. Māisār, Can. Maisārān. The city which was the capital of the Hindu kingdom, taking its name, and which last was founded in 1610 by a local chief on the decay of the Vijayanagar (see BISNAGAR, NARSINGA) dynasty. C. P. Brown gives the etym. as Māsi-ār, Māsi being the name of a local goddess like Pomonia or Flora; ār, 'town, village.' It is however usually said to be a corruption of Māhī daunting, the buffalo demon slain by the goddess Durga or Kali. [Rice (Mysore, i. 1) gives Can. Māisa, from Skt. Mahāsa, and āra, 'town.']

MYSORE THORN. The Causu-pinacis sepuriar, Roxb. It is armed with short, sharp, recurved prickles; and it is much used as a fence in the Deccan. Hyder Ali planted it round his strongholds in Mysore, and hence it is often called "Hyder's Thorn," Haidar kā jhār.

1857.—"What may be termed the underwood consisted of milk bushes, prickly pears, mysore thorn, intermingled in wild confusion."—Lady Fulljames, Choc-chow, 2nd ed. i. 300.

NABÓB. s. Port. Nabábo, and Fr. Nabáb, from Hind. Nabāb, which is the Ar. pl. of sing. Nabūb (see NAIB), 'a deputy,' and was applied in a singular sense to a delegate of the supreme chief, viz. to a Viceroy or chief Governor under the Great Mogul, e.g. the Nabáb of Surat, the Nabáb of Oudh, the Nabáb of Arcot, the Nabáb Nāzīn of Bengal. From this use it became a title of rank without necessarily having any office attached. It is now a title occasionally conferred, like a peerage, on Mahommedan gentlemen of distinction and good service, as Rādā and Rādiā are upon Hindus.

Nabob is used in two ways: (a) simply as a corruption and representative of Nabāb. We get it direct from the Port. nabábo, see quotation from Bluteau below. (b) It began to be applied in the 18th century, when the transactions of Clive made the epithet familiar in England, to Anglo-Indians who returned with fortunes from the East; and Foote's play of 'The Nabob' (1768) aided in giving general currency to the word in this sense.

It is purism quite erroneously applied when we find Nabob in this sense miswritten Naob; thus:

1878.—"These were days when India, little known still in the land that rules it, was less known than it had been in the previous generation, which had seen Warren Hastings impeached, and burghs* bought and sold by Anglo-Indian Nawabs."—Smith's Life of Dr John Wilson, 30.

But there is no question of purism in the following delicious passage:

1878.—"If... the spirited proprietor of the Daily Telegraph had been informed that our vid of their friends the Turk would have taken the form of a tax upon paper, and a concession of the Levi to act as Commanders of Regiments of Bashih-Bozonks, with a request to the Generalissimo to place them in as forward a position as Nabob was given in the host of King David, the harp in Peterborough Court would not have twanged long to the tune of a crusade in behalf of the Sultan of Turkey."—Truth, April 11, p. 470. In this passage in which the wit is equalled only by the scriptural knowledge, observe that Nabob=Naboth, and Nabob=Nebiah.

NACODA, NACODER, &c., s. Pers. na-khuda (navis dominus) 'a skipper'; the master of a native vessel. (Perhaps the original sense is rather the owner of the ship, going with it as his own supercargo.) It is hard to understand why Reinaud (Relation, ii. 42) calls this a "Malay word..."

* Qu. boroughs? The writer does injustice to his country when he speaks of burghs being bought and sold. The representation of Scotch burghs before 1832 was bad, but it never was purchasable. There are no burghs in England.

were rogues; but our Knockaty or pilot told us he knew them."—For. 248. This word looks like confusion, in the manner of the poet of the "Snark," between nakhuda and (Hind.) arkāti, "a pilot," (so called because many came from Arcot.)

NAGA. n.p. The name applied to an extensive group of uncivilized clans of warlike and vindictive character in the eastern part of the hill country which divides Assam Proper (or the valley of the Brahmaputra) from Kachar and the basin of the Sturna. A part of these hills was formed into a British district, now under Assam, in 1867, but a great body of the Naga clans is still independent. The etymology of the name is disputed; some identifying it with the Naga or Snake Aborigines, who are so prominent in the legends and sculptures of the Buddhists. But it is, perhaps, more probable that the word is used in the sense of 'naked' (Skt. naga, Hind. nāga, Beng. nāgā, &c.), which, curiously enough, is that which Ptolemy attributes to the name, and which the spelling of Shhābdādun also indicates. [The word is also used for a class of ascetics of the Dādūpānti sect, whose head-quarters are at Jaypur.]

c. 1682. — "The Rāiāsh had first intended to fly to the Nāgas Hills, but from fear of our army the Nāgās* would not afford him an asylum. 'The Nāgās live in the southern mountains of Assam, have a light brown complexion, are well built, but treacherous. In number they equal the helpers of Yagog and Magog, and resemble in hardiness and physical strength the 'Adis (an ancient Arabian tribe). They go about naked like beasts. . . . Some of their chiefs came to see the Nawab. They wore dark hill-clothes (lang), ornamented with cowries, and round about their heads they wore a belt of bear's hairs, allowing their black hair to hang down their neck.'" — Shhābdādun Tahāsh, tr. by Prof. Blochmann, in J. As. Soc. Beng., xi. Pt. i. p. 51. 'See Plate xvi. of Isbister's Descriptive Ethnology of Bengal; Journ. Anthrop. Inst. xxvi. 161 seq.

1883. — A correspondent of the "Indian Agriculturist" (Calcutta), of Sept. 1, dates from the Naga Hills, which he calls "Noga, from Voč, not Naga, . . ." an assertion which one is not bound to accept. "One on the Spot" is not bound to know the etymology of a name several thousand years old.

Soc. i. 335.]

* The word Nāgī is spelt with a nasal v, "Nīṅgī." (p. 76).
NAIK, NAIQUE, &c. s. Hind, naiq. A term which occurs in nearly all the vernacular languages; from Skt. nayaka, ‘a leader, chief, general.’ The word is used in several applications among older writers (Portuguese) referring to the south and west of India, as meaning a native captain or headman of some sort (a). It is also a title of honour among Hindus in the Deccan (b). It is again the name of a Telugu caste, whence the general name of the Kings of Vijayanagara (A.D. 1325-1674), and of the Lords of Madura (1559-1741) and other places (c). But its common Anglo-Indian application is to the non-commissioned officer of Sepoys who corresponds to a corporal, and wears the double chevron of that rank (d).

1757.—“A Troop of Native Cavalry on the present Establishment consists of 1 European subaltern, 1 European serjeant, 1 Subadar, 3 Jemidars, 4 Havildars, 4 Naiques, 1 Trumpeter, 1 Farrier, and 68 Privates.”—Regn. for H. Co.’s Troops on the Coast of Coromandel, &c., 6.

1834.—“... they went gallantly on till every one was shot down except one naik, who continued hacking at the gate with his axe ... at last a shot from above passed through his body. He fell, but in dying hurled his axe against the enemy.”—Mrs. Mackenzie, Storms and Sunshine of a Soldier’s Life, i, 37-38.
We may add as a special sense that in West India Naik is applied to the head-man of a hamlet (Kuri) or camp (Tundah) of Brinjaries (q.v.). [Bhangi and Jhangi Naiks, the famous Banjara leaders, are said to have had 180,000 bullocks in their camp. See Berur Gazetteer, 1906.]

NAIR. s. Malayal. naiyar; from the same Skt. origin as Naik. Name of the ruling caste in Malabar. [The Greek naupha as a tract stood for the country of the Nairs. For their customs, see Logan. Malabar, i. 131.]

1510.—"The first class of Pagans in Calicut are called Brahmins. The second are Naeri, who are the same as the gentlefolks amongst us; and these are obliged to bear sword and shield or bows and lances."—Varthema, pp. 141-142.

1516.—"These kings do not marry. . . only each has a mistress, a lady of great lineage and family, which is called Nayre."—Barbour, 165.

1533.—"And as. . . the Gentiles of the place are very superstitious in dealing with people foreign to their blood, and chiefly those called Bramanes and Naiers."—Barros, Dec. i. liv. iv. cap. 7.

1563.—". . . The Naiers who are the Knights."—Garcia.

1582.—"The Men of Warre which the King of Calicut and the other Kings have, are Nayres, which he all Gentlemen."—Castanheda (by N. L.), i. 355.

1644.—"We have much Christian people throughout his territory, not only the Christians of St. Thomas, who are the best soldiers that he (the King of Cochin) has, but also many other vassals who are converts to our Holy Catholic Faith, through the preaching of the Gospel, but none of these are Naiers, who are his fighting men, and his nobles or gentlemen."—Beccaro, M.S., f. 315.

1755.—"The king has disciplined a body of 10,000 Naiers; the people of this denomination are by birth the Military tribe of the Malabar coast."—Owen, i. 400.

1781.—"The soldiers preceded the Naers or nobles of Malabar."—Gibbon, ch. xlvii.

It may be added that Nayar was also the term used in Malabar for the mahout of an elephant; and the fact that Nayar and Namyke are of the same origin may be considered with the etymology which we have given of Cornac (see Garcia, 85c.).

NALKEE. s. Hind. nalki. A kind of litter formerly used by natives of rank; the word and thing are now obsolete. [It is still the name of the bride's litter in Behar (Grierson, Bihar Peasant Life, 45.) The name was perhaps a factitious imitation of palki? [Platts suggests Skt. nalinaka, 'a tube.]

1759.—"A maleky is a palkee, either opened or covered, but it bears upon two bamboos, like a sedan in Europe, with this difference only, that the poles are carried by four or eight men, and upon the shoulders."—Note by Tr. of Scr. Mokhberia, iii. 209.

1844.—"This litter is called a 'nalki,' It is one of the three great insignia which the Mogul emperors of Delhi conferred upon independent princes of the first class, and could never be used by any person upon whom, or upon whose ancestors, they had not been so conferred. These were the nalki, the order of the Fish, and the fan of peacock's feathers."—Sleeman, Rubbles, ed. V. A. Smith, i. 155.]

NAMBEADARIM. s. Malayal. nambidirin, nambipattiri; a general, a prince. [See Logan, Malabar, i. 121.]

1608.—"Afterwards we were presented to the King called Nambidora; who received us with no small gladness and kindness."—Civ. da Empoli, in Ramusio, i. f. 146.

1552.—"This advice of the Nambeaddarim was disapproved by the kings and lords."—Castanheda: see also Trans. by N. L., 1582, f. 147.

1557.—"The Nambeaddarim who is the principal governor."—D. Alpern, Hak. Soc. i. 9. The word is, by the translator, erroneously identified with Nambidiri (see NAMBOOREE), a Malabar Brahman.

1634.—"Entra em Cochim no talam no secreto Aonde Nambeoderia dorme quieta."—Malabar Conquest, i. 50.

NAMBOOREE. Malayal. nambo-deri, Tam. namburi; [Logan (Malabar, ii. Gloss, cxxi.) gives nambitteri, nam- buri, from Drav. nambuka, 'to trust,' tiri, Skt. sti, 'blessed.' The Madras Gloss, gives Mal. nambu, 'the Veda, óthu, 'to teach,' tiri, 'holy.'] A Brah- man of Malabar. (See Logan, i. 118 seqq.)

1604.—"No more than any of his Nam- bures (among Christian converts) who are his padres, for you would hardly see any one of them become converted and baptized because of the punishment that the king has attached to that."—Beccaro, M.S., f. 313.

1727.—"The Nambouries are the first in both Capacities of Church and State, and some of them are Popes, being sovereign Princes in both."—A. Hamilton, i. 312; [ed. 1744].

1800.—"The Namburis eat no kind of animal food, and drink no spirituous liquors."—Buchanan, Mysor, ii. 426.]
NANKEEN.

A cotton stuff of a brownish yellow tinge, which was originally imported from China, and derived its name from the city of Nanking. It was not dyed, but made from a cotton of that colour, the Gossypium religiosum of Roxb., a variety of G. herbaceum. It was, however, imitated with dyed cotton in England, and before long exports of this imitation were made to China. Nankeen appears to be known in the Central Asia markets under the modified name of Nanka (see below).

1793-4.—"The land in this neighbourhood produces the cloth usually called Nankeens in Europe... in that growing in the province of Kiangnan, of which the city of Nan-kin is the capital, the down is of the same yellow tinge which it possesses when spun and woven into cloth."—Stanton's Narr. of Ed. Macartney's Embassy, ii. 425.

1794-5.—"The colour of Nan-King is thus natural, and not subject to fade... The opinion (that it was dyed) that I combat was the cause of an order being sent from Europe a few years ago to dye the pieces of Nan-King of a deeper colour, because of late they had grown paler."—Vita Brown's Embassy, E.T. ii. 141.

1797.—"China Investment, per Upton Castle... Company's broad and narrow Nankeen, brown Nankeen."—In Schom-Kurr, ii. 695.

c. 1809.—"Cotton in this district (Paranji or Parcon) is but a trifling article. There are several kinds mentioned... The Kukri is the most remarkable, its wool having the colour of nankeen cloth, and it seems in fact to be the same material which the Chinese use in that manufacture."—E. Bauhman, in Eastern India, iii. 214. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. iv. 16, 29.]

1883.—"Nanka is imported in the greatest quantity (to Kabul) from Russia, and is used for making the outer garments for the people, who have a great liking to it. It is similar to nankeen cloth that comes to India from China, and is of a strong durable texture."—Report by Mr. Baines, in Punjab Trade Report, App. p. ix. See also p. clxvii.

1848.—"Don't be trying to depreciate the value of the lot, Mr. Moss," Mr. Hammonds said; 'let the company examine it as a work of art—the attitude of the gallant animal quite according to nature, the gentleman in a nankeen-jacket, his gun in hand, is going to the chase; in the distance a banyan tree (see BANYAN-TREE) and a pagoda."—Verity Fair, i. 178.

NANKING.

A great Chinese city on the lower course of the Yangtsse-kiang, which was adopted as capital of the Empire for a brief space (1368-1410) by the (native) Ming dynasty on the expulsion of the Mongol family of Chinghiz. The city, previously known as Kin-ling-fu, then got the style of Nan-king, or 'South Court.' Peking ('North Court') was however re-occupied as imperial residence by the Emperor Ching-su in 1410, and has remained such ever since. Nanking is mentioned as a great city called Chilenfu (Kin-ling), whose walls had a circuit of 40 miles, by Friar Odoric (c. 1323). And the province bears the same name (Chelign) in the old notices of China translated by R. Willes in Hakluyt (ii. 546).

It appears to be the city mentioned by Confi (c. 1430), as founded by the emperor: "Hinc prope XV. diem tuminet (i.e. from Cambalec or Peking), alia civitas Nencuat nomine, ab imperatore condita, cuius ambitus patet triginta milliaribus, auque est populosissima omnium." This is evidently the same name that is coupled with Cambalec, in Petis de la Croix's translation of the Life of Timour (iii. 218) under the form Nemnai. The form Lankin, &c., is common in old Portuguese narratives, probably, like Liampo (q.v.), a Fuhkien form.

c. 1520.—"After that follows Great China, the kingdom of which is the greatest sovereign in the world... The port of this kingdom is called Guuantan, and among the many cities of this empire two are the most important, namely Nankin and Combata (read Cambalec), where the king usually resides."—Peregrina Magella (Hak Soc.), p. 156.

c. 1540.—"Thereunto we answered that we were strangers-angers of the Kingdom of Siam, and that coming from the port of Liampo to go to the fishing of Nanquin, we were cast away at sea... that we were purposed to go to the city of Nanquin there to imbarque ourselves as rowers in the first Lanteas (see LANTEAS) that should put to sea, for to pass unto Canton..."—Pinto, E.T. p. 99 [orig. cap. xxxi.]

1553.—"Further, according to the Cosmographies of China... the maritime provinces of this kingdom, which run therefrom in a N.W. direction almost, are these three: Nanquij, Xanton (Shantung), and Quincij (Kiangze or capital, i.e. Pecheli).—Barros, l. i. 1.

1556.—"Ogni anno va di Persia alla China vna grossa Caravana, che camina se si vesta prima ch'arriva alla Città de Lanchin, Città nella quale risiede il Re con la sua Corte."—Os. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 394.

NARCONDAM, n.p. The name of a strange weird-looking volcanic cone, which rises, covered with forest, to a height of some 2,330 feet straight out of the deep sea, to the eastward of the Andamans. One of the present writers has observed (Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 13, note) that in the name of Narlandam one cannot but recognise Naraah, 'Hell'; perhaps Narabakam, 'a pit of hell'; adding: "Can it be that in old times, but still contemporary with Hindu navigation, this volcano was active, and that some Brahmin St. Brandon recognised in it the mouth of Hell, congenial to the Rakshasas of the adjacent group" of the Andamans? We have recently received an interesting letter from Mr. F. R. Mallet of the Geological Survey of India, who has lately been on a survey of Narcondam and Barren Island. Mr. Mallet states that Narcondam is "without any crater, and has certainly been extinct for many thousand years. Barren Island, on the other hand, forms a complete amphitheatre, with high precipitious encircling walls, and the volcano has been in violent eruption within the last century. The term 'pit of hell' therefore, while quite inapplicable to Narcondam, applies most aptly to Barren Island." Mr. Mallet suggests that there may have been some confusion between the two islands, and that the name Narcondam may have been really applicable to Barren Island. [See the account of both islands in Ball, Jemah Life. 307 seqq.] The name Barren Island is quite modern. We are told in Purdy's Or. Navigator (350) that Barren Island was called by the Portuguese Ilha alta, a name which again would be much more apt for Narcondam, Barren Island being only some 800 feet high. Mr. Mallet mentions that in one of the charts of the E. I. Pilot or Oriental Navigator (1781) he finds "Narcondam according to the Portuguese" in 13° 45' N. lat. and 110° 35' E. long. (from Ferro) and "Narcondam or High Island, according to the French," in 12° 50' N. lat. and 110° 55' E. long. This is valuable as showing both that there may have been some confusion between the islands, and that Ilha alta or High Island has been connected with the name of Narcondam. The real positions by our charts are of Narcondam, N. lat. 13° 24'. E. long. 94° 12'. Barren Island, N. lat. 12° 16', E. long. 93° 54'.

The difference of lat. (52 miles) agrees well with that between the Portuguese and French Narcondam, but the difference in long., though approximate in amount (13 or 20 miles), is in one case plus and in the other minus ; so that the discrepancies may be due merely to error in the French reckoning. In a chart in the E. I. Pilot (1778) "Monday or Barren Island, called also High Island" and "Ayconda or Narcondam," are marked approximately in the positions of the present Barren Island and Narcondam. Still, we believe that Mr. Mallet's suggestion is likely to be well founded. The form Ayconda is nearer that found in the following:

1588. "... as you put off from the isles of Antonia towards the Coast... there lyeth only in the middle way an isle which the inhabitants call Vicondad, which is a small land having faire ground round about it, but very little fresh water."—Linschoten, p. 328.

The discrepancy in the position of the islands is noticed in D'Anville:

1753. "Je n'oublierais pas Narcondam, et d'autant moins que ce que j'en trouve dans les Portugais ne répond point à la position que nos cartes l'ont donné. Le routier de Gaspar Pereira de los Reys indique l'île Narcondao ou Narcondam à 6 lieues des îles Coques, 12 de la tête de l'Andaman : et le rhumb de vent à l'égard de ce point il le determine, isle quarte du nordoste, mer quant a la côte vers la mer de l'est au nord. Selon les cartes Françaises Narcondam s'écarte environ 25 lieues marines de la tête d'Andaman : et au lieu de prendre plus du nord, cette île baisse vers le sud d'une fraction de degré plus ou moins considérable selon différentes cartes."—D'Anville, Éch. 141-142.

I may add that I find in a French map of 1701 (Carte Marine, depuis Savoie jusqu'au Detroit de Malacca, par le Père P. P. Tachard) we have, in the (approximately) true position of Narcondam. Île Haute, whilst an islet without name appears in the approximate position of Barren Island.

NARD. s. The rhizome of the plant Nardostachys Jatamansi, D.C., a native of the loftier Himalaya (allied to Valerian). This is apparently an Indian word originally, but, as we have it, it has come from the Skt. nālada through Semitic media, whence

From the River of Rogues, the Starboard Shore, with a reach of about two miles, is to be kept close aboard, down to the Channel Trees, for in the Oiling lies the Grand middle Ground . . ."—English Pilot, p. 57.

NARSINGA, n.p. This is the name most frequently applied in the 16th and 17th centuries to the kingdom in Southern India, otherwise termed Vijayanagara or Bisnagar (q.v.), the latest powerful Hindu kingdom in the Peninsula. This kingdom was founded on the ruins of the Belâ dynasty reigning at Dwara Samundra, about A.D. 1341 [see Rice, Mysore, i. 344 seqq.]. The original dynasty of Vijayanagara became extinct about 1487, and was replaced by Narasinha, a prince of Telugu origin, who reigned till 1508. He was therefore reigning at the time of the first arrival of the Portuguese, and the name of Narsinga, which they learned to apply to the kingdom from his name, continued to be applied to it for nearly two centuries.

1505.—"Hasse notizia deli maggiori Re che hanno nell'India, che è el Re de Narsin, indiano zentil; confina in Estremadura con el regno de Comoj (qu. regno Deconiji), el qual Re si è Moro. El qual Re de Narsin tien grande regno; sarà (harà!) ad ogni suo comando 10 mila elefanti, 30 mila cavallo, e infinito numero di genti."—Lionardo Ce' Masser, 35.

1510.—"The Governor... learning of the embassy which the King of Bisnaga was sending to Cananore to the Viceroy, to offer firm friendship, he was most desirous to make alliance and secure peace... principally because the kingdom of Narsinga extends in the interior from above Calicut and from this Balasgor as far as Cambaya, and thus if we had any wars in those countries by sea, we might by land have the most valuable aid from the King of Bisnaga."—Correa, ii. 30.

1513.—"Aderant tune apud nostrô praefecta a Narsingae regè legati."—Emanuel. Reg. Epist. f. 3r.

1516.—"45 leagues from these mountains inland, there is a very large city which is called Bijanagar, very populous. The King of Narsinga always resides there."—Barbosa, 85.

c. 1538.—"And she (the Queen of Onor) swore to him by the golden sandals of her pagod that she would rejoice as much should God give him the victory over them (the Turks) as if the King of Narsinga, whose slave she was, should place her at the table with his wife."—F. Mendes Pinto, ch. ix.; see also Cogan, p. 11.

1553.—"And they had learned besides from a friar who had come from Narsinga to stay at Cananor, how that the King of Narsinga, who was as it were an Emperor of the Gentiles of India in state and riches, was appointing ambassadors to send him..."—Barros, i. viii. 9.

1572.—"... O Reyno Narsinga poderoso Maia de ouro e de pedras, que de forte gente."—Camões, vii. 21.

By Burton:

"Narsinga's Kingdom, with her rich display Of gold and gems, but poor in martial vein..."

1580.—"In the Kingdom of Narsinga to this day, the wives of their priests are buried alive with the bodies of their husbands; all other wives are burnt at their husbands' funerals."—Montaigne, by Cotton, ch. xi. (What is here said about priests applies to Lingaits, q.v.).

1611.—"... the Dutch President on the coast of Charomandell, shewed us a Caul (see COWLE) from the King of Narsinga.

Wencapatru, Bain, wherein was granted that it should not be lawful for any one that came out of Europe to trade there, but such as brought Prince Maurice his Patent, and therefore desired our departure."—P. W. Floris, in Purchas, i. 320.

1681.—"Coromandel. Ciudad muy grande. sujega al Rey de Narsinga, el qual Reyno e llamado por olte nombre Binanga."—Martínez de la Puente, Compendio, 16.

NASSICK, n.p. Násik; Narsinga of Ptolemy (vii. i. 63); an ancient city of Hindu sanctity on the upper course of the Godavery R., and the headquarters of a district of the same name in the Bombay Presidency. A curious discussion took place at the R. Geog. Society in 1867, arising out of a paper by Mr. (afterwards Sir) George Campbell, in which the selection of a capital for British India was determined on logical principles in favour of Nassick. But logic does not decide the site of capitals, though government by logic is quite likely to lose India. Certain highly elaborated magic squares and magic cubes, investigated by the Rev. A. H. Frost (Cambridge Math. Journ., 1857) have been called by him Násik squares, and Nasik cubes, from his residence in that ancient place (see Encyc. Briton, 9th ed. xx. 215).

NAT.s. Burmese nett, [apparently from Skt. nātha, 'lord']; a term applied to all spiritual beings, angels, elfs, demons, or what not, including the gods of the Hindus.

1878.—"Indeed, with the country population of Pegu the worship, or it should rather be said the propitiation of the Nāts or spirits, enters into every act of their ordinary life, and Buddha's doctrine seems kept for sacred days and their visits to the kyoung (monastery) or to the pagoda."—Forbes, British Burma, 222.

NAUND, s. Hind, nánd. A coarse earthen vessel of large size, resembling in shape an inverted bee-hive, and useful for many economic and domestic purposes. The dictionary definition in Pallon, 'an earthen trough,' conveys an erroneous idea.

1892.—"The ghurī (see GHURURY), or copper cup, floats usually in a vessel of coarse red pottery filled with water, called a nān."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 250.

1899.—"To prevent the crickets from wandering away when left, I had a large earthen pan placed over them upside down. These pans are termed nands. They are NAUGHT, s. A kind of ballet-dance performed by women; also any kind of stage entertainment; an European ball. Hind. and Mahr. nàch, from Skt. nritya, dancing and stage-playing, through Prakrit nechha. The word is in European use all over India. [A poggles nautch (see POGGLE) is a fancy-dress ball. Also see POOTLY NAUGHT.] Browning seems fond of using this word, and persists in using it wrongly. In the first of the quotations below he calls Fifine the 'European nautch,' which is like calling some Hindu dancing-girl 'the Indian ballet.' He repeats the mistake in the second quotation.

[1809.—"You Europeans are apt to picture to yourselves a Nach as a most attractive spectacle, but once witnessed it generally dissolves the illusion."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 142.]

1828.—"I joined Lady Macnaghten and a large party this evening to go to a nàch given by a rich native, Ronpill Mulliah, on the opening of his new house."—Mrs. Heber, in Heber, ed. 1844, i. 37.

[1829.—"... a dance by black people which they call a Notch..."—Oriental Sport. Mag. ed. 1875, i. 129.]

c. 1831.—"Elle (Begum Sunnun) fit enterrer vivante une jeune esclave, dont elle était jalous, et donna à son mari un nautch (tall) sur cette horrible tombe."—Jacquemont. Correspondance, ii. 221.

1872.—"... let be there was no worst Of degradation spared Fifine; ordained from first To last, in body and soul, for one life-long debauch, The Parish of the North, the European Nautch!"—Fijine at the Fair, 31.

1876.—"... I looked in the swarth little lady—I swear, From the head to the foot of her,—well quite as bare! 'No Nautch shall cheat me,' said I, taking my stand At this bolt which I draw...."—Natural Magic, in Purchas, &c.

NAUGHT-CHILD, s. (See BAYADERE, DANCING-GIRL.) The last quotation is a glorious jumble, after the manner of the compiler.

NAVAIT, NAITEA, NEVOYAT, &c., n.p. A name given to Mahommedans of mixt race in the Konkan and S. Canara, corresponding more or less to Mophlais (q.v.) and Lubbies of Malabar and the Coromandel coast. [The head-quarters of the Navayats are in N. Canara, and their traditions state that their ancestors fled from the Persian Gulf about the close of the 7th century, to escape the cruelty of a Governor of Iran. See Starrock, Man. of S. Canara, i. 181.] It is apparently a Konkani word connected with Skt. nàrā, 'new,' and implying 'new convert.' [The Madras Gloss. derives the word from Pers. nàft, the name of an Arab clan.]

1553.—"Naitas que são mestesses: quantos padres de geração dos Arabis... e peryparte das madres das Gentias."—Barros, i. ix. 3.

"... And because of this fertility of soil and the scale of these ports, there was here a great number of Moors, natives of the country, whom they call Naitas, who were accustomed to buy the horses and sell them to the Moors of the Decan. ..."—Ibid. i. viii. 9.

c. 1612.—"From this period the Mahomedans extended their religion and their influence in Malabar, and many of the princes and inhabitants, becoming converts to the true faith, gave over the management of some of the seaports to the strangers, whom they called Nowayits (literally the New Race). ..."—Firiska, by Briggs, iv. 536.

1613.—"... et passim infiniti Mahometani repercipientur, tum indigene quis naitas vocabant, tum externi. ..."—Jarvis, i. 57.

1626.—"There are two sorts of Moors, one Modern of mixed seed of Moore-fathers and Ethnique-mothers, called Naitans, Mongrels, also in their religion, the other Ferrerians..."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 551.
NAZIR, s. Hind. from Ar. nāzīr, 'inspector' (nazir, 'sight'). The title of a native official in the Anglo-Indian Courts, sometimes improperly rendered 'sheriff,' because he serves processes, &c.

1879.—"The Khan . . . ordered his Nazir, or Master of the Court, to assign something to the servants. . . ."—Andries, 41.

[1705.—"He especially, who is called Nader, that is the chief of the Mahal . . ."—Catrou, H. of the Mogul Dynasty, E.T. 295.]

[1826.—"The Nazir is a perpetual sheriff, and executes writs and summons to all the parties required to attend in civil and criminal cases."—Panaduring Hari, ed. 1878, ii. 118.]

1879.—"The Nazir had charge of the treasury, stamps, &c., and also the issue of summonses and processes."—Life in the Mogulisl, i. 294.

1776.—"His Excellency (Nawab Meer Cossim) had not eaten for three days, nor allowed his Nazir to be beaten."—Diary of a Prisoner at Patna, in Wheeler, Early Records, 325.]

NEELAM. LEELAM. s. Hind. nilām, from Port. leilao. An auction or public outcry, as it used to be called in India (corresponding to Scotch rough; comp. Germ. rufin, and outroop of Linschoten's translator below). The word is, however, Oriental in origin, for Mr. C. P. Brown (MS. notes) points out that the Portuguese word is from Ar. ilām (al-Ilām), 'proclamation, advertisement.' It is omitted by Dozy and Engelmann. How old the custom in India of prompt disposal by auction of the effects of a deceased European is, may be seen in the quotation from Linschoten.

1515.—"Pero d'Alpoym came full of sorrow to Cochin with all the apparel and secondaries of Alonso d'Alboquerque, all of which Dom Gracia took charge of; but the Governor (Lopo Soares) gave orders that there should be a leilão (auction) of all the wardrobe, which indeed made a very poor show. Dom Gracia said to D. Aleixo in the church, where they met: The Governor your uncle orders a leilão of all the old wardrobe of Alonso d'Alboquerque. I can't praise his intention, but what he has done only adds to my uncle's honour; for all the people will see that he gathered no rich Indian stuffs, and that he despised everything but to be foremost in honour."—Correa, ii. 498.

Letter of Fernandes Nunes to the King. Sept. 7.

[1554.—"All the spoil of Mombasa that came into the general stock was sold by leilão."—Cautanhaia, Bk. ii. ch. 13.]

1581.—"In Goa there is holden a daylie assemble . . . which is like the meeting upo the burse in Andwarpe . . . and there are all kinds of Indian commodities to sell, so that in a manner it is like a Faire . . . it beginneth in ye morning at 7 of the clocke, and continueth till 9 . . . in the principal streete of the citie . . . and is called the Leylon, which is as much as to say, as an outroop . . . and when any man dieth, all his goods are brought thither and sold to the last pennesthrow, in the same outroop, whosoever they be, yea although they were the Viceroyes goodes."—Linschoten, ch. xxvii.: [Hak. Soc. i. 184; and compare Parard de Local, Hak. Soc. ii. 52, who spells the word Laylon].

c. 1610.—". . . the mary vint trapper a la porte, dont la femme faisait fort l'estonnee, prie le Portugais de se cacher dans une petite couue a pourcelaine, et l'ayant fait entrer la denou, et ferme tres bien a clef, ouvrit la porte a son mary, qui . . . le laisse tremper la iniqu'a lendemain matin. Il fit porter ceste couue au marche, ou laillan ainsi qu'ils appellation. . . ."—Moguer, 344.

Linschoten gives an engraving of the Rua Direita in Goa, with many of these auctions going on, and the superscription: "O Leilao que se faz cada dia pola menhā na Rua direita de Goa." The Portuguese word has taken root at Canton Chinese in the form yelang; but more distinctly betrays its origin in the Amoy form le-lang and Swatow lo-lang (see Giles; also Dennys's Notes and Queries, vol. i.).

NEELGYE, NILGHAU, &c. s. Hind. nilgain, nilgai, nilgāt, i.e. 'blue cow'; the popular name of the great antelope, called by Pallas Antilope trigocamelus (Portaz pictus, of Jerdon, [Boselaphus trigocamelus of Blanford, Mammalia, 517]), given from the slaty blue which is its predominant colour. The proper Hind. name of the animal is rjgh (Skt. rjyag, or rishya).

1693.—"After these Elephants are brought divers tame Gazelles, which are made to fight with one another; as also some Nil-gaux, or grey oxen, which in my opinion are a kind of Elephants, and Rhinoceros, and those great Buffalos at Bengal, to combat with a Lion or Tiger."—Bernier, E.T. p. 84; [ed. Constable, 282; in 215 nilgauas; in 364, 377, nil-ghau].

1773.—"Captain Hamilton has been so obliging as to take charge of two deer, a male and a female, of a species which is called neelgow, and is, I believe, unknown in Europe, which he will deliver to you in my name."—Warren Hastings to Sir C. Colebrooke, in Gleig, i. 288.

1824.—"There are not only neelghaus, and the common Indian deer, but some noble red-deer in the park" (at Lucknow).—Hbor, ed. 1841, i. 241.

1882.—"All officers, we believe, who have served, like the present writers, on the canals of Upper India, look back on their peripatetic life there as a happy time. . . . occasionally on a winding part of the bank one intruded on the solitude of a huge nilgai."—Mem. of General Sir W. E. Baker, p. 11.

NEEM, s. The tree (N.O. Meliaceae) Azadirachta indica, Jussien; Hind, nim (and nib, according to Playfair, Tuleef Shereef, 170), Mahr. nimbar, from Skt. nimbā. It grows in almost all parts of India, and has a repute for various remedial uses. Thus politices of the leaves are applied to boils, and their fresh juice given in various diseases; the bitter bark is given in fevers; the fruit is described as purgative and emollient, and as useful in worms, &c., whilst a medicinal oil is extracted from the seeds; and the gum also is reckoned medicinal. It is akin to the bakain (see BUCKYNE), on which it grafts readily.

1586.—"It, I beg you to recall the tree by help of which you cured that valuable horse of yours, of which you told me, for I wish to remember it."

"O. You are quite right, for in sooth it is a tree that has a great repute as valuable and medicinal among nations that I am acquainted with, and the name among them all is nimbo. I came to know its virtues in the Bulghat, because with it I there succeeded in curing sore backs of horses that were most difficult to clean and heal: and these sores were cleaned very quickly, and the horses very quickly cured. And this was done entirely with the leaves of this tree pounded and put over the sores, mixt with lemon-juice. . . ."—García, f. 153.

[1813.—". . . the principal square . . . regularly planted with beautiful nym or lym-trees."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 446.]

[1856.—"Once on a time Guj Singh . . . said to those around him, "Is there any one who would leap down from that limb tree in the garden?"—Forbes, Rds Malá, ed. 1878, p. 465.]

1877.—"The elders of the Clans sat every day on their platform, under the great neem tree in the town, and attended to all complaints."—Moulais Taylor, Story, &c., ii. 85.

NEGAPATAM, n.p. A seaport of Tanjore district in S. India, written Nāgā-īppattanam, which may mean 'Snake Town.' It is perhaps the Νίγαςα Μυγρόςοις of Ptolemy; and see under COROMANDEL.

1534.—"From this he (Cunhall Marcar, a Mahommedan corsair) went plundering the coast as far as Negapatao, where there were always a number of Portuguese trading, and Moorish merchants. These latter, dreading that this pirate would come to the place and plunder them, to curry favour with him, sent him word that if he came he would make a famous haul, because the Portuguese had there a quantity of goods on the river bank, where he could come up..."—Correa, iii. 554.

NEGOMBO, n.p. A pleasant town and old Dutch fort nearly 20 miles north of Colombo in Ceylon; formerly famous for the growth of the best cinnamon. The etymology is given in very different ways. We read recently that the name is properly (Tamil) Nira-Kalpam, i.e. 'Colombo in the water.' But, according to Emerson Tennent, the ordinary derivation is Mi-gamoa, the 'Village of bees;' whilst Burnouf says it is properly Náya-bhut, 'Land of Nagas,' or serpent worshippers (see Tennent, ii. 630).

NEGRAIS, CAPE, n.p. The name of the island and cape at the extreme south end of Arakan. In the charts the extreme south point of the mainland is called Pagoda Point, and the seaward promontory, N.W. of this, Cape Negrais. The name is a Portuguese corruption probably of the Arab or Malay form of the native name which... the Burmese express as Naq-rît, ‘Dragon’s whirlpool.’ The set of the tide here is very apt to carry vessels ashore, and thus the locality is famous for wrecks. It is possible, however, that the Burmese name is only an effort at interpretation, and that the locality was called in old times by some name like Nàgàrûdha. Ibn Batuta touched at a continental coast occupied by uncivilised people having elephants, between Bengal and Sumatra, which he calls Baranâyrî. From the intervals given, the place must have been near Negrais, and it is just possible that the term Barra de Negrais, which frequently occurs in the old writers (e.g. see Balbi, Fitch, and Bocarro below) is a misinterpretation of the old name used by Ibn Batuta (iv. 224-225).

1553.—Up to the Cape of Negrais, which stands in 16 degrees, and where the Kingdom of Pegu commences, the distance may be 100 leagues.—Barros, l. i. x. 1.

1583.—Then the wind came from the S.W., and we made sail with our stern to the N.E., and running our course till morning we found ourselves close to the Bar de Negrais, as in their language they call the port which runs up into Pegu.”—Spinola, Boll. f. 92.

—P. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 390.

1613.—“Philip de Brito having sure intelligence of this great armament . . . ordered the arming of seven ships and some sanguineus, and appointing as their commodore Paulo de Rego Pinheiro, gave him precise orders to engage the prince of Arracan at sea, before he should enter the Bora and rivers of Negrais, which form the mouth of all those of the kingdom of Pegu.”—De Brito, 137.

1757.—“The Sea Coast of Araucanian reaches from Xatizam (see CHITTAGONG) to Cape Negrais, about 400 Miles in length, but few places inhabited . . .” (after speaking of “the great Island of Negrais”) he goes on: “. . . The other Island of Negrais, which makes the Point called the Cape . . . is often called Diamond Island, because its Shape is a Rhombus . . . Three Leagues to the Southward of Diamond Island lies a Reef of Rocks a League long . . . conjointly at all Times by the Sea breaking over them; the Rocks are called Layarti; or in English, the Legand.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 29. This reef is the Alagada, on which a noble lighthouse was erected by Capt. (afterwards Lieut.-Gen.) Sir A. Fraser, C.B., of the Engineers, with great labour and skill. The statement of Hamilton suggests that the original name may have been Layarto. But Alagada, “overlooked,” is the real origin. It appears in the old French chart of d’Après as De Nouille. In Dunn it is Nòquie or X’ezjado, or Lejwado, or Sunken Island (N. Div. 1759, 325).

1759.—“The Dutch by an Inscription in Tandric Charactures, lately found at Negrais, on the Tomb of a Dutch Colonel, who died in 1607 (see if not 1627), appear then to have had Possession of that Island.”—Letter in Dejoleyme, Or. Rep. f. 98.

1763.—“It gives us pleasure to observe that the King of the Burmahs, who caused our people at Negrais to be so cruelly massacred, is since dead, and succeeded by his son, who seems to be of a more friendly and humane disposition.”—Fort William Cons., Feb. 19. In Long, 288.

[1819.—“Negraglia.” See under MUN.-NEEPORE.]

NELLY. NELE. s. Malavall. nel, ‘rice in the husk’; [Tel. and Tam. nelli, ‘rice-like’]. This is the Dravidian equivalent of paddy (q.v.), and is often used by the French and Portuguese in South India, where Englishmen use the latter word.

1696.—“. . . when they sell nele, after they have measured it out to the purchaser, for the seller to return and take out two grains for himself for luck (cum superstizione), things that are all heathen vanities, which the synod entirely prohibits, and orders that those who practise them shall be severely punished by the Bishop.”—Gowna, Synod, f. 529.

1651.—“Nili. that is ungrounded rice, which is still in the husk.”—Rogerius, p. 95.

[1798.—“75 parahs Nelly.”—List of Export Duties, in Logus. Malabar, iii. 265.]

NELLORE. n.p. A town and district north of Madras. The name may be Tamil, Nell-âr, ‘Good Town.’ But the local interpretation is from nel (see NELLY); and in the local records it is given in Skt. as Dhâñyaputram, meaning ‘rice-town’ (Sesakaviri Sêstri). [The Madras Mon., (ii. 214) gives Nell-âr, ‘Good-town;’ but the Gloss. (s.v.) has nello, ‘paddy,’ ñâru, ‘village.’] Mr. Boswell (Nellore, 687) suggests that it is derived from a nelli chett tree under which a famous lingam was placed.]

c. 1310.—“Malbar extends in length from Kulam to Nilawar, nearly 390 parasangs along the sea coast.”—Wassaj, in Elliot, ii. 32.

jectured etymology of Nahr-Budda, 'River of Budda,' is a caution against such guesses.

c. 1020.—"From Dhár southwards to the R. Nerbadda nine (parasangs); thence to Maharat-des... eighteen..."—Al-Bírání, in Elliot, i. 60. The reading of Nerbadda is however doubtful.

c. 1510.—'There were means of crossing all the rivers, but the Nerbadda was such that you might say it was a remnant of the universal deluge.'—Amir Khosrá, in Elliot, i. 79.

(1816.—"The King rode to the ruer of Darbadath."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc, ii. 413.
In his list (ii. 589) he has Nerbada.)

1727.—"The next Town of Note for Commerce is Barthach... on the Banks of the River Nerdaba."—J. Hamilton, ed. 1714, i. 145.]

NERCHA, s. MalayáI. nercha, a vow; from verb nerjpa, to agree or promise.

1696.—"They all assemble on certain days in the porches of the churches and dine together... and this they call nercha."—Gouven, Spagélo, f. 63. See also f. 11. This term also includes offerings to saints, or to temples, or particular forms of devotion. Among Hindus a common form is to feed a lamb before an idol with ghee instead of oil.

NERRICK, NERRUCK, NIKR, &c., s. Hind. from Pers. nirák, vulgarly nirik, nirikh. A tariff, rate, or price-current, especially one established by authority. The system of publishing such rates of prices and wages by local authority prevailed generally in India a generation or two back, and is probably not quite extinct even in our own territories. [The provincial Gazettes still publish periodical lists of current prices, but no attempt is made to fix such by authority.] It is still in force in the French settlements, and with no apparent ill effects.

1790.—"I have written to Campbell a long letter about the nerrick of exchange, in which I have endeavoured to explain the principles of the whole system of shroffing (see SHROFF)."—Wellingt. i. 56.

1800.—"While I was absent with the army, Col. Sherbrooke had altered the nerrick of artificers, and of all kinds of materials for building, at the instigation of Capt. Norris... and on the examination of the subject a system of engineering came out, well worthy of the example set at Madras."—Ibid. i. 67.

[... "Here is established a niruc, or regulation, by which all coins have a certain value affixed to them; and at this rate they are received in the payment of the revenue; but in dealings between private persons attention is not paid to this rule."—F. Buchanan, M'gore, ii. 279.]

1873.—'On expressing his surprise at this, the man assured him that it was really the case that the bazar nérich or market-rate, had so risen.'—Life in the Mogulai, i. p. 33.

NGAPEE, s. The Burmese name, ngapi, 'pressed fish,' of the odorous delicacy described under BALACHONG. [See Forbes, British Burma, 83.]

1855.—"Makertich, the Armenian, assured us that the jars of ngapec at Amara- poora exhibited a flux and reflux of tide with the changes of the moon. I see this is an old belief. De la Loubère mentions it in 1688 as held by the Siamese."—Yate, Mission to Ava, p. 190.

NICOBAR ISLANDS, n.p. The name for centuries applied to a group of islands north of Sumatra. They appear to be the βάρβαρασ of Ptolemy, and the Lankha bálus of the oldest Arab Relation. [Sir G. Birdwood identifies them with the Island of the Bell (Nálikó) to which Sindbad, the Seaman, is carried in his fifth voyage. (Report on Old Records, 108; Burton, Arabian Nights, iv. 368.)] The Danes attempted to colonize the islands in the middle of the 18th century, and since, unsuccessfully. An account of the various attempts will be found in the Voyage of the Novara. Since 1869 they have been partially occupied by the British Government, as an appendage of the Andaman settlement. Comparing the old forms Lankha and Nabkavāram, and the nakedness constantly attributed to the people, it seems possible that the name may have had reference to this (maṅgá). [Mr. Man (Journ. Anthrop. Institute, xviii. 359) writes: 'A possible derivation may be suggested by the following extract from a paper by A. de Candolle (1885) on 'The Origin of Cultivated Plants': 'The presence of the coconut in Asia three or four thousand years ago is proved by several Sanskrit names. . . . The Malays have a name widely diffused in the Archipelago, kalopa, klopa, blopa. At Sumatra and Nicobar we find the name njir, neor, in the Philippines níog, at Bali, niôk, njö. . . . While the Nicobars have long been famed for the excellence of their coconuts, the only words which bear any resemblance to the forms above given.
are ngot, 'a ripe nut,' and ni-nau, 'a half-ripe nut.'"

c. 1050.—The name appears as Nakka-vāram in the great Tanjore Inscription of the 11th century.

c. 1292.—"When you leave the island of Java (the Less) and the Kingdom of Lambri, you sail north about 150 miles, and then you come to two Islands, one of which is called Necoveran. In this island they have no king nor chief, but live like beasts. ..."—Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 12.

c. 1300.—"Opposite Lāmūrī is the island of Lōkāvāram (probably to read Nakāvāram), which produces plenty of red amber. Men and women go naked, except that the latter cover the pudenda with coconut leaves. They are all subject to the Kāṅ."

—Rashid-uldin, in Elliot, i. 71.

c. 1322.—"Departing from that country, and sailing towards the south over the Ocean Sea, I found many islands and countries, where among others was one called Nicoveran... both the men and women there have faces like dogs, etc...."—Friar Oñorio, in Cathay, &c., p. 57.

1510.—"In front of the before named island of Samatra, across the Gulf of the Ganges, are 5 or 6 small islands, which have very good water and ports for ships. They are inhabited by Gentiles, poor people, and are called Niconvar (Nicobar in Lisbon ed.), and they find in them very good amber, which they carry thence to Malaca and other parts."—Barbon, 195.

1514.—"Seeing the land, the pilot said it was the land of Nicobar... The pilot was at the top to look out, and coming down he said that this land was all cut up (i.e. in islands), and that it was possible to pass through the middle; and that now there was no help for it but to chance it or turn back to Cochin. ... The natives of the country had sight of us and suddenly came forth in great boats full of people. ... They were all Caffres, with fish-bones inserted in their lips and chin: big men and frightful to look on: having their boats full of bows and arrows poisoned with herbs."—Gouv. da Empoli, in Archiv. Stor. pp. 71-72.

NIGER. s. It is an old brutality of the Englishman in India to apply this title to the natives, as we may see from Ives quoted below. The use originated, however, doubtless in following the old Portuguese use of negros for "the blacks" (q.v.), with no malice prepense, without any intended confusion between Africans and Asians.

1548.—"Moreover three blacks (negros) in this territory occupy lands worth 3000 or 4000 pardaos of rent; they are related to one another, and are placed as guards in the outlying parts."—S. Botelho, Cartas, 111.

1582.—"A negro of John Cambrayes, Pilot to Paulo de la Gama, was that day run away to the Moores."—Costaeneda, by N. L., f. 19.

1608.—"The King and people niggers."—Dawers, Letters, i. 106.

1622.—Ed. Grant, pursuer of the Diamond, reports capture of vessels, including a junk "with some stoor of negroes, which was devided bytwick the Duch and the English."—Saintsbury, iii. p. 78.

1755.—"You cannot affront them (the natives) more than to call them by the name of negroe, as they conceive it implies an idea of slavery."—Ib., Voyage, p. 23.

1757.—"Gli Gesuiti sono missionari e parocchie de' negri detti Malabar."—Della Tomba, 3.

1790.—"The Dress of this Country is entirely linen, save Hats and Shoes; the latter are made of tanned Hides as in England only, that they are no thicker than coarse paper. These shoes are neatly made by Negroes, and sold for about 10l. a pr. each of which will last two months with care."—MS. Letter of James Rennell, Sept. 30.

1806.—"Now the political creed of the frequenter of dawk bungalows is too uniform... it consists in the following tenets... that Sir Mordaunt Wells is the greatest judge that ever sat on the English bench; and that when you hit a nigger he dies on purpose to spite you."—The Black Bungalow, p. 225.

NILGHERY, NEILGHERY. &c., n.p. The name of the Mountain Peninsula at the end of the Mysore table land (originally known as Malai-nādu, 'Hill country'), which is the chief site of hill sanatoria in the Madras Presidency. Skt. Nilagiri, 'Blue Mountain.' The name Nila or Nilādi (synonymous with Nilagiri) belongs to one of the mythical or semi-mythical ranges of the Puranic Cosmography (see Vīshnū Purāṇa, in Wilson’s Works, by Hall, ii. 102, 111, &c.), and has been applied to several ranges of more assured locality, e.g. in Orissa as well as in S. India. The name seems to have been fancifully applied to the Ootacamund range about 1820, by some European. [The name was undoubtedly applied by natives to the range before the appearance of Europeans, as in the Kōngu-dēla is Rajākal, quoted by Grigg (Nilaqiri Man. 363), and the name appears in a letter of Col. Mackenzie of about 1816 (Ibid. 278). Mr. T. M. Horsfall writes:
“The name is in common use among all classes of natives in S. India, but when it may have become specific I cannot say. Possibly the solution may be that the Nilgiris being the first large mountain range to become familiar to the English, that name was by them caught hold of, but not coined, and stuck to them by mere priority. It is on the face of it improbable that the Englishmen who early in the last century discovered these Hills, that is, explored and shot over them, would call them by a long Skt. name.”

Probably the following quotation from Dampier refers to Orissa, as does that from Hedges:

“... One of the English ships was called the Nelligree, the name taken from the Nelligree Hills in Bengal, as I have heard.”—Dampier, ii. 145.

1653.—“... in ye morning early I went up the Nilligree Hill, where I had a view of a most pleasant fruitfull valley.”—Hedges, Diary, March 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 67].

The following also refers to the Orissa Hills:

1752.—“... Weavers of Balasore complain of the great scarcity of rice and provisions of all kinds occasioned by the devastations of the Maharrattas, who, 600 in number, after plundering Balasore, had gone to the Nelligree Hills.”—In Long, i. 42.

NIPA. s. Malay nipab.

a. The name of a stemless palm (Nipa fruticans, Thunb.), which abounds in estuaries from the Ganges delta eastwards, through Tenasserim and the Malay countries, to N. Australia, and the leaves of which afford the chief material used for thatch in the Archipelago. “In the Philippines,” says Crawfurd, “but not that I am aware of anywhere else, the sap of the Nipa... is used as a beverage, and for the manufacture of vinegar, and the distillation of spirits. On this account it yields a considerable part of the revenue of the Spanish Government” (Desc. Dict. p. 301). But this fact is almost enough to show that the word is the same which is used in sense b; and the identity is placed beyond question by the quotations from Teixeira and Mason.

b. Arrack made from the sap of a palm tree, a manufacture by no means confined to the Philippines. The Portuguese, appropriating the word Nipa to this spirit, called the tree itself nipiera.

a.—1611.—“Other wine is of another kind of palm which is called Nipa (growing in watery places) and this is also extracted by distillation. It is very mild and sweet, and clear as pure water; and they say it is very wholesome. It is made in great quantities, with which ships are laden in Pegu and Tanasarim, Malaca, and the Philippines or Manilla; but that of Tanasarim exceeds in all goodness.”—Teixeira, Relaciones, i. 17.

1617.—“... And the wild palms called Nypheiras... from those flowers is drawn the liquor which is distilled into wine by an alambic, which is the best wine of India.”—Ibid. 16c.

1618.—“... is extracted, it is almost exclusively from the leaves of the nipia or bằnga.”—Raffles, H. of Java, 2nd ed. i. 185.

1818.—“... Steamimg amongst the low swampy islands of the Sunderbunds... the paddles of the steamer tossed up the large fruits of the Nipa fruticans, a low stemless palm that grows in the tidal waters of the Indian ocean, and bears a large head of nuts. It is a plant of no interest to the common observer, but of much to the geologist, from the nuts of a similar plant abounding in the tertiary formations at the mouth of the Thames, having floated about there in as great profusion as here, till buried deep in the silt and mud that now form the island of Sheppey.”—Hooker, Himalayan Journals, i. 1-2.

1890.—“... The Nipa is very extensively cultivated in the Province of Tavoy. From incisions in the stem of the fruit, toddy is extracted, which has very much the flavour of mead, and this extract, when boiled down, becomes sugar.”—Moson’s Borneo, p. 506.

1574.—“... It (sugar) is also got from Nipa fruticans, Thunb., a tree of the low coast-estudios, extensively cultivated in Tavoy.”—Hamburgh and Fluckiger, 655.

These last quotations confirm the old travellers who represent Tenasserim as the great source of the Nipa spirit.

c. 1567.—“Every yeere is there lade (at Tenasserim) some ships with Verzino, Nipa, and Benjamin.”—Ces. Federici (E.T. in Hakl.), ii. 359.

1568.—“Nipa, qual’ è vn Vino eccellen- tissimo che nasce nel fior d’vn arbor e chiamato Niper, il cui liquor si distilla, e se- ne fa vn bionda eccellentissima.”—Ces Federici, in Romanus, iii. 392c.

1583.—“I Portoghesi e noi altri di questi, bande di quà non mangiamo nel Regno d’ Pegh pane di grano... ne si beve vino... ma una certa acqua lambiccata da un albero detto Anippa, ch'è alla bocca assai gustevole; ma al corpo gioviva e nuoce, secondo le complessioni di gli uomini."—O. Babli, t. 127.

1591. "Those of Tanascari are chiefly freighted with Rice and Nipar wine, which is very strong."—Barber's Account of Lancaster's Voyage, in Hakl. ii. 592.

In the next two quotations nipe is confounded with coco-nut spirit.

1598. "Likewise there is much wine brought thether, which is made of Cocus or Indian Nutes, and is called Nyphe de Tanascaria, that is Aqva: Composita of Tanascaria."—Linekoten, 30; [Hak. Soc. i. 103].

... "The Sura, being distilled, is called Folin (see FOOL'S RACK) or Nipe, and is an excellent Aqva Vitae as any is made in Dort."—Ibid. 101; [Hak. Soc. ii. 49].

[1616. "One jar of Neepa."—Foster, Letters, iv. 162].

1623. "In the daytime they did nothing but talk a little with one another, and some of them get drunk upon a certain wine they have of raisins, or on a kind of aqua vitae with other things mixt in it, India called nippa, which had been given them."—P. della Valle, ii. 669; [Hak. Soc. ii. 272].

We think there can be little doubt that the slang word nip, for a small dram of spirits, is adopted from nipa. [But compare Dutch nippen, 'to take a dram.' The old word nipptawawa was used for 'strong drink'; see Stanf. Dict.]

Nirvāna. s. Skt. nirvina. The literal meaning of this word is simply 'blown out,' like a candle. It is the technical term in the philosophy of the Buddhists for the condition to which they aspire as the crown and goal of virtue, viz. the cessation of sentient existence. On the exact meaning of the term see Childers' Pali Dictionary, s.v. nibbana, an article from which we quote a few sentences below, but which covers ten double-column pages. The word has become common in Europe along with the growing interest in Buddhism, and partly from its use by Schopenhauer. But it is often employed very inaccurately, of which an instance occurs in the quotation below from Dr. Draper. The oldest European occurrence of which we are aware is in Purchas, who had met with it in the Pali form common in Burma, &c., nibban.

1629. "After death they (the Talapoys) believe three Places, one of Pleasure Scena, perishing by the wind into Paradis; another of Tornament Naore (read Nir- vae): the third of Annihilation which they call Niba."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 506.

c. 1515. "... the state of Niban, which is the most perfect of all states. This consists in an almost perpetual extacy, in which those who attain it are not only free from troubles and miseries of life, from death, illness and old age, but are abstracted from all sensation; they have no longer either a thought or a desire."—Sangamadavar. Baroast. Empire, p. 6.

1552. "... Transience, Pain, and Unreality... these are the characters of all existence, and the only true good is exemption from these in the attainment of nirvāna, whether that be, as in the view of the Brahmin or the theistic Buddhist, absorption into the supreme essence; or whether it be, as many have thought, absolute nothingness; or whether it be, as Mr. Hodgson quaintly phrases it, the ubi or the modus in which the infinitely attenuated elements of all things exist, in this last and highest state of abstraction from all particular modifications such as our senses and understandings are cognisant of."—Yale, Mission to Ava. 236.

"When from between the sâl trees at Kusinâra he passed into nirvâna, he (Buddha) ceased, as the extinguished fire ceases."—Ibid. 239.

1869. "What Bishop Zigandet and others represent as the popular view of the Nirvâna, in contradistinction to that of the Buddhist divines, was, in my opinion, the conception of Buddha and his disciples. It represented the entrance of the soul into rest, a subduing of all wishes and desires, indifference to joy and pain, to good and evil, to the sense of self, and a freedom from the circle of existences from birth to death, and from death to a new birth. This is still the meaning which educated people attach to it, whilst Nirvana suggests rather a kind of Mohammedan Paradise or of blissful Elysian fields to the minds of the larger masses."—Prof. Max Müller, Letters on Buddhistic Nihilism, in Tribhûna's Or. Record, Oct. 15.

... In Tribhûna's Record for July, 1870, I first propounded a theory which meets all the difficulties of the question, namely, that the word Nirvâna is used to designate two different things, the state of blissful sanctification called Arhatship, and the annihilation of existence in which Arhatship ends."—Childers, Pali Dictionary, pp. 265-268.

... "But at length reunion with the universal intellect takes place: Nirvâna is reached, oblivion is attained... the state in which we were before we were born."—Draper, Conflict, &c., 122.
NIZAM, THE.  628  NOKAR.

1879. — "And how—in fulness of the times—it fell
That Buddha died . . .
And how a thousand thousand crores since then Have trod the Path which leads whither he went Unto Nirvana where the Silence lives."
Sir E. Arnold, Light of Asia, 237.

NIZAM, THE, n.p. The hereditary style of the reigning prince of the Hyderabad Territories; 'His Highness the Nizam,' in English official phraseology. This in its full form, Nizam-ul-Mulk, was the title of Asaf Jah, the founder of the dynasty, a very able soldier and minister of the Court of Aurangzâb, who became Subadar (see SOUBADAR) of the Deccan in 1713. The title is therefore the same that had pertained to the founder of the Ahmednagar dynasty more than two centuries earlier, which the Portuguese called that of Nizamulco. And the circumstances originating the Hyderabad dynasty were parallel. At the death of Asaf Jah (in 1748) he was independent sovereign of a large territory in the Deccan, with his residence at Hyderabad, and with dominions in a general way corresponding to those still held by his descendant.

NIZAMALUCO. n.p. Izam Maluco is the form often found in Correa. One of the names which constantly occur in the early Portuguese writers on India. It represents Nizam-ul-Mulk (see NIZAM). This was the title of one of the chiefs at the court of the Bahmani king of the Deccan, who had been originally a Brahman and a slave. His son Ahmed set up a dynasty at Ahmednagar (A.D. 1490), which lasted for more than a century. The sovereigns of this dynasty were originally called by the Portuguese Nizamalucos. Their own title was Nizâm Shâh, and this also occurs as Nizâmoxa. [Linschoten's etymology given below is an incorrect guess.]

1521.—"Meanwhile (the Governor Diego Lopes de Soqueira) . . . sent Fernão Camello as ambassador to the Nizamulco, Lord of the lands of Chaul, with the object of making a fort at that place, and arranging for an expedition against the King of Cambaya, which the Governor thought the Nizamulco would gladly join in, because he was in a quarrel with that King. To this he made the reply that I shall relate hereafter."—Correa, ii. 622.

C. 1539.—"Trelado do Contrato que o Viso Rey Dom Garcia de Noronha fez com a Niz a Muxaa, que dântos se chamava Hu Nizâ Maluroo."—Tombo, in Subsidia, 115. 1543. — "Izam maluco." See under COTAMALUCO.

1553. — "This city of Chaul . . . is in population and greatness of trade one of the chief ports of that coast; it was subject to the Nizamulco, one of the twelve Captains of the Kingdom of Deccan (which we corruptly call Deccan). . . . The Nizamulco being a man of great estate, although he possessed this maritime city, and other ports of great revenue, generally in order to be closer to the Kingdom of the Deccan, held his residence in the interior in other cities of his dominion; instructing his governors in each to aid our fleets in all ways and content their captains, and this was not merely out of dread of them, but with a view to the great revenue that he had from the ships of Malabar. . . ."—Barros, H. ii. 7.

1563.—". . . This King of Dely conquered the Deccan (see DECCAN) and the Cunca (see CONCAM); and retained the dominion a while; but he could not rule territory at so great a distance, and so placed in it a nephew crowned as king. This king was a great favourer of foreign people, such as Turks, Arabs, Coromans of Armes, and he divided his kingdom into captaincies, bestowing upon Adelham (whom we call Dalcan—see IDALCAN) the coast from Angodiva to Cifardam . . . and to Nizamulco the coast from Cifardam to Negotana. . . ."—Garcia, f. 34r.

", . . R. Let us mount and ride in the country; and by the way you shall tell me who is meant by Nizamoxa, as you often use that term to me.

"O. At once I tell you he is a king in the Balaghat (see BALAGHAT, Bheugate for Balaghat), whose father I have often attended, and sometimes also the son. . . ."

—Ibid. f. 33r.

[1598. — "Maluco is a Kingdom, and Nisa a Lance or Spear, so that Nizâ Maluco is as much as to say as the Lance or Speare of the Kingdom."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 172. As if Nizâm-ul-mulk, 'spear of the kingdom."

NOKAR, s. A servant, either domestic, military, or civil, also pl. Nokar-logue, 'the servants,' Hind, naukar, from Pers. and naukar-lag. Also naukar-châkar, 'the servants,' one of those jingling double-barrelled phrases in which Orientals delight even more than Englishmen (see LOOTY). As regards Englishmen, compare hugger-mugger, hurdy-gurdy, tip-top, high-y tight, higgledy-piggledy, hocus-pocus, tir for tat, tospsy-turvy, harum-secarum, roly-poly, fiddle-faddle, rump and stumpy, slip-slop. In this case chakkar (see CHACKUR) is also Persian. Naukar would seem to be a Mongol word introduced into Persia by the hosts of Chinghiz. According to I. J. Schmidt, Forschungen im Gebiete der Volker Mittel Asiens, p. 96, nükur is in Mongol, a comrade, dependent, or friend.

c. 1407.—"L'Emir Khodaidad fit partir avec ce député son serviteur (naukar) et celui de Mirza Djihanghir. Ces trois personnalages joignent la cour auguste."—Abulurazîkh, in Notices et Extraits, XIV. i. 146.

c. 1660.—"Mahmûd Sultan ... understood accounts, and could reckon very well by memory the sums which he had to receive from his subjects, and those which he had to pay to his 'naukars' (apparently armed followers)."—Abûlghâzi, by Desmoussins, 271.

[1810.—"Noker." See under CHACKUR.

[1834.—"Its (Balkh) present population does not amount to 2000 souls; who are chiefly ... the remnant of the Kara Naukur, a description of the militia established here by the Afrags."—Burnes, Travels into Bokhara, i. 285.]

1840.—"Noker ... the servant;... this title was borne by Tuli the fourth son of Chinghiz Khan, because he was charged with the details of the army and the administration."—Hammer, Golden Horde, 403.

NOL-KOLE. s. This is the usual Anglo-Indian name of a vegetable a good deal grown in India, perhaps less valued in England than it deserves, and known here (though rarely seen) as Kol-rabi, kohl-rabi, 'cabbage-turnip.' It is the Brassica oleracea, var. caulorapa. The stalk at one point expands into a globular mass resembling a turnip, and this is the edible part. I see my friend Sir G. Birdwood in his Bombay Products spells it Knollkhol. It is apparently Dutch. 'Knollkool' 'Turnip-cabbage; Chouvre of the French.'

NON-REGULATION. adj. The style of certain Provinces of British India (administered for the most part under the more direct authority of the Central Government in its Foreign Department), in which the ordinary Laws (or Regulations, as they were formerly called) are not in force, or are in force only so far as they are specially declared by the Government of India to be applicable. The original theory of administration in such Provinces was the union of authority in all departments under one district chief, and a kind of paternal despotism in the bands of that chief. But by the gradual restriction of personal rule, and the multiplication of positive laws and rules of administration, and the division of duties, much the same might now be said of the difference between Regulation and Non-regulation Provinces that a witty Frenchman said of Intervention and Non-intervention:

"La Non-intervention est une phrase politique et technique qui veut dire enfin à petit-près la même chose que l'Intervention."

Our friend Gen. F. C. Cotton, R.E., tells us that on Lord Dalhousie's visit to the Neilgherry Hills, near the close of his government, he was riding with the Governor-General to visit some new building. Lord Dalhousie said to him: "It is not a thing that one must say in public, but I would give a great deal that the whole of India should be Non-regulation."

The Punjab was for many years the greatest example of a Non-regulation Province. The chief survival of that state of things is that there, as in Burma and a few other provinces, military men are still eligible to hold office in the civil administration.

1860.—"... Nowe what ye fistoke of Bengalia worschypyen Sir John doconsenstity. This moche wee gadeere. Some worsexypin ane Idle veloet Regulacions and some worschypyen Non-regulacions (veli: Cog et Nlogag)."—Ext. from a MS. of The Travels of Sir John Manderell in the E. Indies, lately discovered.

1867.—"... We believe we should indicate the sort of government that Sicily wants, tolerably well to Englishmen who know anything of India, by saying that it should be treated in great measure as a non-regulation province."—Quarterly Review, Jan. 1867, p. 135.

1883.—"The Delhi district, happily for all, was a non-regulation province."—Life of Ed. Lawrence, i. 44.

[1615.—"He kept himself close in a neronem."—Cock's Diary, i. 164.]

1618.—"As we were going out of the town, the street being full of hackneymen and horses, they would not make me way to passe, but fell a quarrelling with my neremoneers, and offered me great abuse. . . ."—Cocks's Diary, ii. 99; [neremonmears in i. 23].

1768-71.—"Sedan-chairs are not in use here (in Batavia). The ladies, however, sometimes employ a conveyance that is somewhat like them, and is called a norimon."—Stavorinus, E.T. i. 324.

NOR'WESTER, s. A sudden and violent storm, such as often occurs in the hot weather, bringing probably a 'dust-storm' at first, and culminating in hail or torrents of rain. (See TYPHOON.)

1810.—"... these violent squalls called 'north-westers,' in consequence of their usually either commencing in, or veering round to that quarter... The force of these north-westers is next to incredible."—Williamson, V. M. iv. 33.

[1827.—"A most frightful nor wester had come on in the night, every door had burst open, the peaks of thunder and torrents of rain were so awful. . . ."—Mrs. Ponton, Diary, 98.]

NOWBEHAR, n.p. This is a name which occurs in various places far apart, a monument of the former extension of Buddhism. Thus, in the early history of the Mahommedans in Sind, we find repeated mention of a temple called Naurihar (Nava-xihara, 'New Monastery'). And the same name occurs at Balkh, near the Oxus. (See VIHARA.)

NOWROZE, s. Pers. nau-röz, 'New (Year's) Day'; i.e. the first day of the Solar Year. In W. India this is observed by the Parsees. [For instances of such celebrations at the vernal equinox, see Fraser, Pausanius, iv. 75.]

C. 1590.—"... this was also the cause why the Naouriz ; Jalal was observed, on which day, since his Majesty's accession, a great feast was given. . . . The New Year's Day first... commences on the day when the Sun in his splendor moves to Aries, and lasts till the 19th day of the month (Farvardin)."—Im, ed. Blochmann, i. 183, 276.

[1615.—"The King and Prince went a hunting... that his house might be fitted against the Noroze, which began the first Newe Moon in March."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 138; also see 142.] 1638.—"There are two Festivals which are celebrated in this place with extraordinary ceremonies: one whereof is that of the first day of the year, which, with the Persians, they call Naurus, Nauroz, or Noroose, which signifies wine days, though now it lasts eighteen at least, and it falls at the moment that the Sun enters Aries."—Mandelslo, 41.

1673.—"On the day of the Vernal Equinox, we returned to Gombroon, when the Moors introduced their New-Year festival (see EED) or Noe Rose, with Banqueting and great Solemnity."—Pryor, 306.

1712.—"Restat Naurous, i.e. vertonis anni initial, incidents in diem aquinocii veni. Non legalis est, sed ab antiquis Persis haereditate accepta festivitas, omnium euentarum maxima et solennissima."—Kwengfer, Am. Exot. 162.

1815.—"Jemsheed also introduced the solar year: and ordered the first day of it, when the sun entered Aries, to be celebrated by a splendid festival. It is called Nauroze, or new year's day, and is still the great festival in Persia."—Malcolm, H. of Persia, i. 17.

1832.—"Now-roz (new year's day) is a festival or eed of no mean importance in the estimation of Musulman society. The trays of presents prepared by the ladies for their friends are tastefully set out, and the work of many days' previous arrangement. Eggs are boiled hard, some of these are stained in colours resembling our mottled papers; others are neatly painted in figures and devices; many are ornamented with gilding; every lady evincing her own peculiar taste in the prepared eggs for now-roz."—Mrs. Meer Hossan Ali, Obs. on the Musulmans of India, 283-4.

NOWSHADDER, s. Pers. nauvshadar (Skt. narasdra, but recent), Sal-ammoniac, i.e. chloride of ammonium.

C. 1390.—We find this word in a medi¬val list of articles of trade contained in Capmany’s Memorias de Barcelona (ii. App. 74) under the form noxadre.

1314.—"Salammoniaco, cioè lisciadro, e non si dà né sacco ne cassa con essa."—Pepoli, p. 17; also see 57, &c.

[1834.—"Sal ammoniac (nouchadur) is found in its native state among the hills near Juzjak."—Burnes, Travels into Bukhara, ii. 166.]

NUDEEPA RIVERS, n.p. See under BOGGY RIVER, of which these are branches, intersecting the Nadiya District. In order to keep open navigation by the directest course from the Gauges to Calcutta, much labour is, or was, annually expended, under a special officer, in endeavouring during the dry season to maintain sufficient depth in these channels.
NUGGURKOTE. n.p. Nagarkot.
This is the form used in olden times, and even now not obsolete, for the name of the ancient fortress in the Punjab Himalaya which we now usually know by the name of Kot-kāngra, both being substantially the same name, Nagarkot, ‘the fortress town,’ or Kot-kī-nagara, ‘the town of the fortress.’ [If it be implied that Kāngra is a corruption of Kot-kī-nagara, the idea may be dismissed as a piece of folk-tyranny. What the real derivation of Kāngra is is unknown. One explanation is that it represents the Hind. khāmkhāra, ‘dried up, shrivelled.’] In yet older times, and in the history of Mahmud of Ghazni, it is styled Bhim-nagar. The name Nagarkot is sometimes used by older European writers to designate the Himalayan mountains.

1608.—“The Sultan himself (Mahmūd) joined in the pursuit, and went after them as far as the fort called Bhim-nagar, which is very strong, situated on the promontory of a lofty hill, in the midst of impassable waters.”—Al-Uthi, in Eflot, ii. 34.

1337.—“When the sun was in Cancer, the King of the time (Mohammed Tughlakh) took the stone fort of Nagarkot in the year 738. . . . It is placed between rivers like the pupil of an eye . . . and is so impregnable that neither Skandar nor Dara were able to take it.”—Budr-i-chach, ibid. iii. 570.

c. 1570.—“Sultan Firoz . . . marched with his army towards Nagarkot, and passing by the valleys of Nākhch-i-naghar, he arrived with his army at Nagarkot, which found to be very strong and secure. The idol Jwālāmukhi (see Jowaullā Mookhe) much worshiped by the infidels, was situated in the road to Nagarkot.”—Shams-i-Sirāj, ibid. iii. 317-18.

1398.—“When I entered the valley on that side of the Siwālik, information was brought to me about the town of Nagarkot, which is a large and important town of Hindustān, and situated in these mountains. The distance was 30 kos, but the road lay through jungles, and over lofty and rugged hills.”—Autobiography of Timur, ibid. 165.

1585.—“But the sources of these rivers (Indus and Ganges) though they burst forth separately in the mountains which Polyen calls Imuus, and which the natives call Dālahamper and Nangracot, yet are these mountains so closely joined that it seems as if they sought to hide these springs.”—Barros, i. iv. 7.

c. 1590.—“Nagarkote is a city situated upon a mountain, with a fort called Kan-gerah. In the vicinity of this city, upon a lofty mountain, is a place called Mahamaey (Mahānāgod), which they consider as one of the works of the Divinity, and come in pilgrimage to it from great distances, thereby obtaining the accomplishment of their wishes. It is most wonderful that in order to effect this, they cut out their tongues, which grow again in the course of two or three days. . . .”—Avec, ed. Ghadarian, ii. 119; [ed. Jarrer, ii. 312].

1609.—“Bordering to him is another great Roman called Tutshch Chans, whose chief City is Nagercoot. 80 c. from Lahor, and as much from Sprinnes, in which City is a famous Pagod, called Is or Jonge, unto which worlds of People resort out of all parts of Indies . . . Diners Mores may resort to this Peer. . . .”—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 488.

1416.—“27. Nagra Cutt. the chiefie Ctie so called. . . .—Terry in Purchas, ii.; [ed. 1777, p. 82].

[c. 1617.—“Nakarkutt.”—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 534.]

1578.—“Kote Kangrah, the fortress belonging to the famous temple of Nagurcote, is given at 49 royal cosses, equal to 99 G. miles, from the hind (northward).”—Rossel, Memoir, ed. 1793, p. 107.

1809.—“At Patamcute, where the Padshah (so the Sikhs call Rumjeet) is at present engaged in preparations and negotiations for the purpose of obtaining possession of Cote Caungrah (or Nargar Cote), which place is besieged by the Raja of Nepaul. . . .”—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 217.

NUJEES. s. Hind. from Ar. najib, ‘noble’. A kind of half-disciplined infantry soldiers under some of the native Governments; also at one time a kind of militia under the British; receiving this honorary title as being gentlemen volunteers.

[c. 1790.—“There were 1600 men. nudjeves, sword men. . . .” Evidence of Sheikh Mohammed, quoted by Mr. Plumer, in Trial of W. Hastings, in Bond, iii. 383.]

1796.—“The Nezibs are Matchlock men.”—W. A. Tonn, A Letter on the Maharrata People, Bombay, 1798, p. 50.]

1813.—“There are some corps (Mahratta) styled Nujeeb or men of good family. . . . These are foot soldiers invariably armed with a sabre and matchlock, and having adopted some semblance of European discipline are much respected.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 46: [2nd ed. i. 313].

NULLAH, s. Hind. nalā. A watercourse; not necessarily a dry watercourse, though this is perhaps more frequently indicated in the Anglo-Indian use.

1776.—"When the water falls in all the nullahs..."—Halkett’s Code, 52.

e. 1755.—"Major Adams had sent on the 11th Captain Hebbert... to throw a bridge over Shinga nullah."—Coppiscott, Life of Cbarle, i. 39.

1789.—"The ground which the enemy had occupied was entirely composed of sandhills and deep nullahs..."—Carroccio, Narrative. 224.

1799.—"I think I can show you a situation where two embasures might be opened in the bank of the nullah with advantage."—Wellington, Despatches, i. 26.

1817.—"On the same evening, as soon as dark, the party which was destined to open the trenches marched to the chosen spot, and before daylight formed a nullah... into a large parallel."—Mill’s Hist. v. 577.

1843.—"Our march tardy because of the nullahs. Watercourses is the right name, but we get here a slip-slop way of writing quite contemptible."—Life of Sir C. Napier, ii. 310.

1860.—"The real obstacle to movement is the depth of the nullahs hollowed out by the numerous rivulet, when swolled by the rains."—Tennent’s Ceylon, ii. 574.

NUMDA, NUMNA, s. Hind. numda, namda, from Pers. namad, [Skt. namata]. Felt; sometimes a woolen saddle-cloth, properly made of felt. The word is perhaps the same as Ar. namat, ‘a coverlet,’ spread on the seat of a sovereign, &c.

Hume’s, Hist. Account of British Trade, i. 226.]

1818.—"That chief (Temogain or Chingis), we are informed, after addressing the Khans in an eloquent harangue, was seated upon a black felt or nummad, and reminded of the importance of the duties to which he was called."—Malcolm, H. of Persia, i. 410.

[1819.—"A Kattie throws a numda on his mare."—Trans. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 279.]

1828.—"In a two-poled tent of a great size, and lined with yellow woollen stuff of Europe, sat Nader Koolee Khan, upon a coarse numud..."—The Kozzilbash, i. 251.

1850.—"The natives use (for their tents) a sort of woolen stuff, about half an inch thick, called ‘numbda.’... By the bye, this word ‘numbda’ is said to be the origin of the word numbade, because the nomade tribes used the same material for their tents" (?)—Letter in Notes and Queries, 1st ser. i. 342.]

NUMERICAL AFFIXES, CO-EFFICIENTS, or DETERMINATIVES.* What is meant by these expressions can perhaps be best elucidated by an extract from the Malay Grammar of the late venerable John Crawford:

"In the enumeration of certain objects, the Malay has a peculiar idiom which, as far as I know, does not exist in any other language of the Archipelago. It is of the same nature as the word 'head,' as we use it in the tale of cattle, or 'sail' in the enumeration of ships; but in Malay it extends to many familiar objects. Abai, of which the original meaning has not been ascertained, is applied to such tenuous objects as leaves, grasses, &c.; Batang, meaning 'stem,' or 'trunk,' to trees, logs, spears, and javelins; Bandak, of which the meaning has not been ascertained, to such objects as rings; Bidang, which means 'spreading' or 'spacious,' to mats, carpets, thatch, sails, skins, and hides; Bijji, 'seeds,' to corn, seeds, stones, pebbles, gems, eggs, the eyes of animals, lamps, and candlesticks," and so on. Crawford names 8 or 9 other terms, one or other of which is always used in company with the numeral, in enumerating different classes of objects, as if, in English, idiom should compel us to say 'two stems of spears,' 'four spreads of carpets,' 'six corns of diamonds.' As a matter of fact we do speak of 20 head of cattle, 10 file of soldiers, 100 sail of ships, 20 pieces of cannon, a dozen stand of rifles. But still the practice is in none of these cases obligatory, it is technical and exceptional; insomuch that I remember, when a boy, in old Reform-Bill days, and when disturbances were expected in a provincial town, hearing it stated by a well-informed lady that a great proprietress in the neighbourhood was so alarmed that she had ordered from town a whole stand of muskets!

To some small extent the idiom occurs also in other European languages,

* Other terms applied have been Numeredia, Quantitative Auxiliaries, Numeral Auxiliaries, Segregatives, &c.

including French and German. Of French I don't remember any example now except tête (de bœuf), nor of German except Stück, which is, however, almost as universal as the Chinese piecey. A quaint example dwells in my memory of a German courier, who, when asked whether he had any employer at the moment, replied: 'Ja freilich! dreizehn Stück Amerikaner.'

The same peculiar idiom that has been described in the extract from Crawford as existing in Malay, is found also in Burmese. The Burmese affixes seem to be more numerous, and their classification to be somewhat more arbitrary and sophisticated. Thus oos, a root implying 'chief' or 'first,' is applied to kings, divinities, priests, &c.; Yaak, 'a male,' to rational beings not divine; Goang, 'a brute beast,' to irrational beings; Pya, implying superficial extent, to dollars, countries, dishes, blankets, &c.; Lon, implying roundness, to eggs, leaves, bottles, cups, toes, fingers, candles, bamboo, hands, feet, &c.; Tseng and Gyang, 'extension in a straight line,' to rods, lines, spears, roads, &c.

The same idiom exists in Siamese, and traces of it appear in some of the vocabularies that have been collected of tribes on the frontier of China and Tibet, indicated by the fact that the numerals in such vocabularies in various instances show identity of origin in the essential part of the numeral, whilst a different aspect is given to the whole word by a variation in what appears to be the numeral-affix* (or what Mr. Brian Hodgson calls the 'servile affix'). The idiom exists in the principal vernaculars of China itself, and it is a transfer of this idiom from Chinese dialects to Pigeon-English which has produced the piecey, which in that quaint jargon seems to be used as the universal numerical affix ("Two piecey cooly," "three piecey dollar," &c.).

This one pigeon phrase represents scores that are used in the vernaculars. For in some languages the system has taken what seems an extravagant development, which must form a great difficulty in the acquisition of colloquial use by foreigners. Some approximate statistics on this subject will be given below.

The idiom is found in Japanese and Corean, but it is in these cases possibly not indigenous, but an adoption from the Chinese.

It is found in several languages of C. America, i.e. the Quiché of Guatemala, the Nahualt of Mexico Proper; and in at least two other languages (Tep and Pirinda) of the same region. The following are given as the coefficients or determinatives chiefly used in the (Nahualt or) Mexican. Compare them with the examples of Malay and Burmese usage already given:

Tell (a stone) used for roundish or cylindrical objects; e.g. eggs, beans, cacao beans, cherries, prickly-pears, Spanish loaves, &c., also for books, and fowls:

Pantli (?) for long rows of persons and things: also for walls and furrows:

Tiamantli (from mana, to spread on the ground), for shoes, dishes, basins, paper, &c., also for speeches and sermons:

Oobli (maize-grains) for ears of maize, cacao-pods, bananas: also for flint arrow-heads (see W. v. Humboldt, Kawi-Sprache, ii. 265).

I have, by the kind aid of my friend Professor Terrien de la Conperie, compiled a list of nearly fifty languages in which this curious idiom exists. But it takes up too much space to be inserted here. I may, however, give his statistics of the number of such determinatives, as assigned in the grammars of some of these languages. In Chinese vernaculars, from 33 in the Shanghai vernacular to 110 in that of Fuchau. In Corean, 12; in Japanese, 16; in Annamite, 106; in Siamese, 24; in Shan, 42; in Burmese, 49; in Malay and Javanese, 19.

If I am not mistaken, the propensity to give certain technical and appropriated titles to couples of certain beasts and birds, which had such an extensive development in old English sporting phraseology, and still partly survives, had its root in the same state of mind, viz. difficulty in grasping the idea of abstract numbers, and a dislike to their use. Some light to me was, many years ago, thrown upon this feeling, and on the origin of the idiom of which we have been speaking, by a passage in a modern book, which is the more noteworthy as the author does not make any reference to the existence of this idiom in any language, and possibly was not aware of it:

"On entering into conversation with the (Red) Indian, it becomes speedily apparent that he is unable to comprehend the idea of abstract numbers. They exist in his mind only as associated ideas. He has a distinct conception of five dogs or five deer, but he is so unaccustomed to the idea of number as a thing apart from specific objects, that I have tried in vain to get an Indian to admit that the idea of the number five, as associated in his mind with five dogs, is identical, as far as number is concerned, with that of five fingers."—(Wilson’s Prehistoric Man, 1st ed. ii. 470.) [Also see Tylor, Primitive Culture, 2nd ed. i. 252 seqq.]

Thus it seems probable that the use of the numeral co-efficient, whether in the Malay idiom or in our old sporting phraseology, is a kind of survival of the effort to bridge the difficulty felt, in identifying abstract numbers as applied to different objects, by the introduction of a common concrete term.

Traces of a like tendency, though probably grown into a mere fashion and artificially developed, are common in Hindustani and Persian, especially in the official written style of măshti, who delighted in what seemed to me, before my attention was called to the Indo-Chinese idiom, the willful surplusage (e.g.) of two sheets’ (fard) of letters, also used with quilts, carpets, &c.; three ‘persons’ (maf tàn) of bar-kandazes; five ‘rope’ (pās) of buffaloes; ten ‘chains’ (maţār) of elephants; twenty ‘grips’ (kabga) of swords, &c. But I was not aware of the extent of the idiom in the măshti’s repertory till I found it displayed in Mr. Carnegie’s Kachahri Technicalities, under the head of Mahāvara (Idioms or Phrases). Besides those just quoted, we there find ʻadad (‘number’) used with coins, utensils, and sleeveless garments; dānta (‘grain’) with pearls and coral beads; dast (‘hand’) with falcons, &c., shields, and robes of honour; jīlā (volume, lit. ‘skin’) with books; nafar (‘nose-bit’) with camels; kīta (‘portion’, picee’) with precious stones, gardens, tanks, fields, letters; manzil (‘a stage on a journey, an alighting place’) with tents, boats, houses, carriages, beds, howdas, &c.; sīr (‘an instrument’) with guitars, &c.; silk (‘thread’) with necklaces of all sorts, &c. Several of these, with others purely Turkish, are used also in Osmo and Turkish.*

NUNCATIES. s. Rich cakes made by the Mahommades in W. India chiefly imported into Bombay from Surat. [There is a Pers. word, mānkhatāt, ‘bread of Cathay or China,’ with which this word has been connected. But Mr. Weir, Collector of Surat, writes that it is really mānkhatāt, Pers. mān, ‘bread,’ and Mahr. khat, khat, ‘six’; meaning a special kind of cake composed of six ingredients—wheat-flour, eggs, sugar, butter or ghee, leaven produced from toddy or grain, and almonds.]

1819.—“An old fashioned mah or nose-ring stuck full of precious or false stones.”
—Tracts, Lit. Soc. Bn. i. 284.

1832.—“The nut (nose-ring) of gold wire, on which is strung a ruby between two pearls, worn only by married women.”
—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Obs. i. 45.

NUT PROMOTION. s. From its supposed indigestible character, the kernel of the cashew-nut is so called in S. India, where, roasted and hot, it is a favourite dessert dish. [See Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 28.]

NUZZER. s. Hind. from Ar. ʻazr or azar (prop. raadhir), primarily ‘a vow or votive offering’; but, in ordinary use, a ceremonial present, properly an offering from an inferior to a superior, the converse of iżām. The root is the same as that of Nacarat (Numbers, vi. 2).

1765.—“The congratulatory nazirs, &c., shall be set opposite my ordinary expenses; and if ought remains, it shall go to Poplar, or some other hospital.”—Letter of Lt. Colv. Sept. 30, in Verdet, View of Bengal, 127.

* Some details on the subject of these determinatives, in reference to languages on the eastern border of India, will be found in Prof. Max Müller’s letter to Bunsen in the latter’s Outlines of the Phil. of Universal History, i. 256 seqq.; as well as in W. von Humboldt, quoted above. Prof. Max Müller refers to Humboldt’s Complete Works, vi. 402; but this I have not been able to find, nor, in either writer, any suggested rationale of the idiom.
[c. 1775.—"The Governor lays before the board two bags . . . which were presented to him in nizzers. . . ."—Progs. of Council, quoted by Fox in speech against W. Hastings, in Boul, iv. 291.]

1782.—"Col. Monson was a man of high and hospitable household expenses; and so determined against receiving of presents, that he would not only not touch a nizzier (a few silver rupees, or perhaps a gold mohor) always presented by country gentlemen, according to their rank . . ."—Price’s Tracts, ii. 61.

1785.—"Present s of ceremony, called nuzzers, were to many a great portion of their subsistence. . . ."—Letter in Life of Colborne, 16.

1786.—Tippoo, even in writing to the French Governor of Pondicherry, whom it was his interest to conciliate, and in acknowledging a present of 500 muskets, cannot restrain his insolence, but calls them "sent by way of nuzz."—Neat Letters of Tippoo, 377.

1809.—"The Annil himself offered the nazur of fruit."—Ed. Valentina, i. 453.

1822.—"I . . . looked to the Meer for explanation: he told me to accept Muckabeg’s ‘nuzza.’”—Mrs. More Husain Ali, Observes, i. 103.

1876.—"The Standard has the following curious piece of news in its Court Circular of a few days ago:—

Sir Salar Jung was presented to the Queen by the Marquis of Salisbury, and offered his Muggur as a token of allegiance, which her Majesty touched and returned."

—Punch, July 15.

For the true sense of the word so deliciously introduced instead of Nuzzzer, see MUGGUR.

O ART, s. A coco-nut garden. The word is peculiar to Western India, and is a corruption of Port. orta (now more usually horta). "Any man’s particular allotment of coco-nut trees in the groves at Mahim or Girgaum is spoken of as his oart." (Sir G. Birdwood).

1561.—". . . e me praz de fazer merce a dita cidade emfatia para sempre que a ortala das ortas dos moradores Portugalizos e christios que nesta cidade de Goa eilha tê . . . passão vender. . . ." &c.—Proclamation of Dom Sebastião, in Archie. Port. Orient. fase. 2, 157.

1610.—"Il y a un grand nombre de Palmes ou orta, comme vous diriez ici de nos vergers, pleins d’arbres de cocos, plantez bien pres à pres; mais ils ne viennent qu’es lieux aquatiques et bas."—Peyard de Lavall, ii. 17:1: [Hak. Soc. ii. 28.]

1613.—"E os naturaes habitação ao longo do rio de Malaca, em seus pomares e orthas."—Golinhio de Eraldo, 11.

1673.—"Old Goa . . . her Soil is luxurious and Campaign, and abounds with Rich Inhabitants, whose Rural Palaces areimmered with Groves and Hortas."—Prior, 154.

[1749.—". . . as well Vargmos (Port. ovogoo, a field) lands as Hortas."—Letter in Logos, Melolos, ii. 45.]

1760.—As to the Oarts, or Coco-nut groves, they make the most considerable part of the landed property."—Grose, i. 47.

1793.—"For sale. . . . That neat and commodious Dwelling House built by Mr. William Beal: it is situated in a most lovely Oart. . . ."—Bombay Courier, Jan. 12.

OBANG, s. Jap. Ochō-ban, lit. ‘greater division.’ The name of a large oblong Japanese gold piece, similar to the kobang (q.v.), but of 10 times the value; 5 to 6 inches in length and 3 to 4 inches in width, with an average weight of 2564 grams. First issued in 1580, and last in 1860. Tavernier has a representation of one.

1662.—"A thousand Oebans of gold, which amount to forty seven thousand Thonyis, or Crowns."—Mandésrois, E.T. Bk. ii. 147 [Staaf, Dict.].

[1559.—"The largest gold coin known is the Obang, a most inconvenient circulating medium, as it is nearly six inches in length, and three inches and a half in breadth."—Oliphant, Narrative of Mission. ii. 232.]

OLD STRAIT, n.p. This is an old name of the narrow strait between the island of Singapore and the mainland, which was the old passage followed by ships passing towards China, but has long been abandoned for the wider strait south of Singapore and north of Bintang. It is called by the Malays Salat Tamburan, from an edible fish called by the last name. It is the Strait of Singapura of some of the old navigators; whilst the wider southern strait was known as New Strait or Governor’s Straits (q.v.).

1727.—". . . Jhore Laun, which is sometimes the Place of that King’s Residence, and has the Benefit of a fine deep large River, which admits of two Entrances into it. The smallest is from the Westward, called by Europeans the straites of Singapo, but by the Natives Salita de Breve" (i.e. Salat Tamburan, as above).—A. Hamilton, ii. 92; [ed. 1744].
Ollah, s. Tam. ōla, Mal. ola. A palm-leaf; but especially the leaf of the Palmyra (Borassus flabelliformis) as prepared for writing on, often, but incorrectly, termed cadjan (q.v.). In older books the term ola generally means a native letter; often, as in some cases below, a written order. A very good account of the royal scribes at Calicut, and their mode of writing, is given by Barbosa as follows:—

1516.—"The King of Calicut keeps many clerks constantly in his palace; they are all in one room, separate and far from the king, sitting on benches, and there they write all the affairs of the king's revenue, and his arms, and the pay which is given to all, and the complaints which are presented to the king, and, at the same time, the accounts of the collectors of taxes. All this is on broad stiff leaves of the palm-tree, without ink, with pens of iron; they write their letters in lines drawn like ours, and write in the same direction as we do. Each of these clerks has great bundles of these written leaves, and wherever they go they carry them under their arms, and the iron pen in their hands, and amongst these are 7 or 8 who are great confidants of the king, and men held in great honour, who always stand before him with their pens in their hand and a bundle of paper under their arm; and each of them has always several of these leaves in blank but signed at the top by the king, and when he commands them to despatch any business they write it on these leaves."—Ibid. f. 112-113.

1518.—"Sayles which they make of the leaves, which leaves are called Olas."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 45.

1611.—"Two Ollahs, one to Gimpaya Raya...—Davers, Letters, l. 154.

1626.—"The writing was on leaves of Palme, which they call Ollah."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 554.

1673.—"The houses are low, and thatched with olas of the Cocoe-Trees."—Fryer, 66.

1718. — "... Damulian Leaves, commonly called Oles."—Prop. of the Gospel, &c., iii. 37.

1760.—"He (King Alompra) said he would give orders for Olios to be made out for delivering of what Englishmen were in his Kingdom to me...—Copt. Alces, in Delyramph, Or. Rep. l. 377.

1806.—"Many persons had their Olahs in their hands, writing the sermon in Tamil shorthand."—Burchanan, Christian Res. 2nd ed. 79.

1890. — "The books of the Sinhalese are formed to-day, as they have been for ages, of olas, or strips taken from the young leaves of the Talipot or the Palmyra palm."—Tenent, Ceylon, l. 512.

1870. — "... Un manuscrit sur olles...—Revue Critique, June 11, 374.

Omedwaor. s. Hind. from Pers. umedwar (ummed, wamed, hopec); literally, therefore, "a hopeful one"; i.e. "an expectant, a candidate for employment, one who awaits a favourable answer to some representation or request." (Wilson.)
OMLAH. s. This is properly the Ar. pl. 'amanlat, 'amalat, of 'atitl (see AUMIL). It is applied on the Bengal side of India to the native officers, clerks, and other staff of a civil court or cutcherry (q.v.) collectively.

1773.—"I was at this place met by the Omlah or officers belonging to the establishment, who hailed my arrival in a variety of boats dressed out for the occasion."—Hou. R. Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsayes, iii. 167.

1896.—"At the worst we will hint to the Omlahs to discover a fast which it is necessary they shall keep with great solemnity."—Trevelon, The Duke Bungalow, in Fraser, lxxxii. 390.

The use of an English plural, omlahs, here is incorrect and unusual; though omrah is used (see next word).

1878.—"... the subordinate managers, young, inexperienced, and altogether in the hands of the Omlah."—Life in the Moghul, ii. 6.

OMRAH. s. This is properly, like the last word, an Ar. pl. ('umrā, pl. of Amīr—see AMEER), and should be applied collectively to the highest officials at a Mahommedan Court, especially that of the Great Mogul. But in old European narratives it is used as a singular for a lord or grandee of that Court; and indeed in Hindustani the word was similarly used, for we have a Hind. plural umārāyān, 'omrahis.' From the remarks and quotations of Blochmann, it would seem that Mungaddirs (see MUNSUB-DAR), from the commandant of 1000 upwards, were styled umārā-i-kabir, or umart-i-zādān, 'Great Amir's;' and these would be the Omrahis properly. Certain very high officials were styled Amīr-ul-‘Umārā (Āin, i. 239-240), a title used first at the Court of the Caliphs.

1866.—"The king lately sent out two Vembras with horse to fetch him in."—Ibid. Hak. Soc. ii. 417; in the same page he writes Vmras, and in ii. 445, Vmrates.

1830.—"Howbeit, out of this prodigious rent, goes yearly many great payments: to his Leiftenants of Provinces, and Vmbrayes of Towns and Forts."—Sir T. Herbert, p. 55.

1553.—"Il y a quantité d'éléphants dans les Indes... les Omara sa s'en servent par grand usage."—Du Boulay-le-Touès, ed. 1657, p. 250.

c. 1681.—"It is not to be thought that the Omrahs, or Lords of the Mogul's Court, are sons of great Families, as in France... these Omrahs then are commonly but Adventurers and Strangers of all sorts of Nations, some of them slaves: most of them without instruction, which the Mogul thus raiseth to Dignities as he thinks good, and degrades them again, as he pleaseth."—Bernier, E.T. 66; ed. Constable, 211.

c. 1666.—"Les Omras sont les grand seigneurs du Rohan, qui sont pour la plupart Persans ou fils de Persans."—Thevet, v. 397.

1673.—"The President... has a Noise of Trumpets... an Horse of the State led before him, a Mirechal (see MORCHAL) a Fan of Oriental Feathers to keep off the Sun, as the Ombras or Great Men have."—Fryer, 86.

1676.—"Their standard, planted on the battlement, Despair and death among the soldiers sent: You the bold Omrah tumbled from the wall, And shouts of victory pursued the fall."—Dryden, Aurore, i. 1.

1710.—"Donna Juliana... let the Heer Ambassador know... that the Emperor had ordered the Ammaraus Enay Ullah Chan (&c.) to take care of our interests."—Valetijn, iv. Suratte, 2-4.

OJOYNE. n.p. Ujjayani; or, in the modern vernacular, Ujjain, one of the most ancient of Indian cities, and one of their seven sacred cities. It was the capital of King Vikramaditya, and was the first meridian of Hindu astronomers, from which they calculated their longitudes.
The name of Ujjain long led to a curious imbroglio in the interpretation of the Arabian geographers. Its meridian, as we have just mentioned, was the zero of longitude among the Hindus. The Arab writers borrowing from the Hindus wrote the name apparently Azīn, but this by the mere omission of a diacritical point became Arīn, and from the Arabs passed to medieval Christian geographers as the name of an imaginary point on the equator, the intersection of the central meridian with that circle. Further, this point, or transposed city, had probably been represented on maps, as we often see cities on medieval maps, by a cupola or the like. And hence the "Cupola of Arīn or Arīγa," or the "Cupola of the Earth" (Al-kūba al-arḍh), became an established commonplace for centuries in geographical tables or statements. The idea was that just 180° of the earth's circumference was habitable, or at any rate cognizable as such, and this meridian of Arīn bisected this habitable hemisphere. But as the western limit extended to the Fortunate Isles, it became manifest to the Arabs that the central meridian could not be so far east as the Hindu meridian of Arīn (or of Leuκa, i.e. Ceylon). (See quotation from the Argobhatia, under JAVA.) They therefore shifted it westward, but shifted the mystic Arīn along the equator westward also. We find also among medieval European students (as with Roger Bacon, below), a confusion between Arīn and Synece. This Reinaud supposes to have arisen from the Lescivā ἐμπρων of Ptolemy, a place which he locates on the Zanzibar coast, and approximating to the shifted position of Arīn. But it is perhaps more likely that the confusion arose from some survival of the real name Azīn. Many conjectures were vainly made as to the origin of Arīγa, and M. Sedillot was very positive that nothing more could be learned of it than he had been able to learn. But the late M. Reinaud completely solved the mystery by pointing out that Arīn was simply a corruption of Ujjain, even in Arabic the mistake had been thoroughly ingrained, insomuch that the word Arīn had been adopted as a generic name for a place of medium temperature or qualities (see Jorjānā, quoted below).

OOPLAH. s. Cow dung patted into cakes, and dried and stacked for fuel. Hind. upda. It is in S. India called bratty (q.v.).

1672. — "The allowance of cowdung and wood was—for every basket of cowdung—2 cakes for the Gentu Pagoda: for Peddnaprag, the watchman, of every basket of cowdung, 5 cakes."—Orders at Ft. St. Gore, Notes and Exts. i. 56.

[Another name for the fuel is kynd.] 1809. — "... small flat cakes of cow-dung, mixed with a little chopped straw and water, and dried in the sun, are used for fuel: they are called kundhas."—Bromwich, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, ed. 1902, p. 158.

This fuel which is also common in Egypt and Western Asia, appears to have been not unknown even in England a century ago, thus:—

1759. — "We rode about 20 miles that day (near Woburn), the country . . . is very open, with little or no wood. They have even less fuel than we (i.e. in Scotland), and the poor burn cow-dung, which they scrape off the ground, and set up to burn as we do divots (i.e. turf)."—Lord Minto, in Life, i. 301.

1838. — A passage in Mr. Marsh's Man and Nature, p. 242, contains a similar fact in reference to the practice, in consequence of the absence of wood, in France between Grenoble and Briançon.

[For the use of this fuel, in Tartary under the name of argols. see Huc. Travels, 2nd ed. i. 23. Numerous examples of its use are collected in Ser. Notes and Queries. iv. 226, 277, 377, 417.]

OORDO. s. The Hindustani language. The (Turki) word urd means properly the camp of a Tartar Khan, and is, in another direction, the original of our word hord (Russian ord), [which, according to Schuvel (Turkistan, i. 30, note), "is now commonly used by the Russian soldiers and Cossacks in a very amusing manner as a contemptuous term for an Asiatic"] The 'Golden Horde' upon the Volga was not properly (pace Littre) the name of a tribe of Tartars, as is often supposed, but was the style of the Royal Camp, eventually Palace, of the Khans of the House of Batu at Sarai. Horde is said by Pihan, quoted by Dozy (Oosterl. 43) to have been introduced into French by Voltaire in his Orphelin de la Chine. But Littré quotes it as used in the 16th century. Urda is now used in Turkistan, e.g. at Tashkend, Khokhand, &c., for a 'vitalde' (Schuyler, loc. cit. i. 30). The word urda, in the sense of a royal camp, came into India probably with Baber, and the royal residence at Delhi was styled urda-î-mutâlî, 'the Sublime Camp.' The mixt language which grew up in the court and camp was called zabul-î-urda, 'the Camp Language,' and hence we have elliptically Urda.

On the Peshawar frontier the word urda is still in frequent use as applied to the camp of a field-force.

OORIAL. Panj. irdal, Oris cycloeceros, Hutton, [Oris vignu, Blanford (Mammalia, 497), also called the Shat.] the wild sheep of the Salt Range and Sulimanti Mountains.

OORIYA. n.p. The adjective 'pertaining to Orissa' (native, language, what not); Hind. Urya. The proper name of the country is Odra-desa, and Or-desa, whence Or-ya and Ur-yo.

['The Ooryah bearers were an old institution in Calcutta, as in former days paluenees were chiefly used. From a computation made in 1776, it is stated that they were in the habit of carrying to their homes every year sums of money sometimes as much as three lakhs made by their business' (Carey, Good Old Days of Homble. John Company, ii. 148.)]

OOTACAMUND. n.p. The chief station in the Neilgherry Hills, and the summer residence of the Governor of Madras. The word is a corruption of the Badaga name of the site of 'Stone-house,' the first European house erected in those hills, properly Hotump-mund (see Metz, Tribes of the Neilgherries, 6). [Mr. Grigg (Man. of the Néliquiris, 6, 189), followed by the Madras Gloss., gives Tank, Ootagaimund, from Can. ota, 'dwarf bamboo,' Tank, lay, 'fruit,' mandu, 'a Toda village.]

OPAL. s. This word is certainly of Indian origin: Lat. opalus, Greek, ὀπάλος, Skt. udpa, 'a stone.' The European word seems first to occur in Pliny. We do not know how the Skt. word received this specific meaning, but there are many analogous cases.

OPIUM. s. This word is in origin Greek, not Oriental. [The etymology accepted by Platts, Skt. akhiphnta, 'snake venom' is not probable.] But from the Greek ὀφυία which has sometimes reacted on old spellings of the word. The collection of the ὁφίν, or juice of the poppy-capsules, is mentioned by Dioscorides (c. A.D. 77), and Pliny gives a pretty full account of the drug as opium (see Hanbury and Flückiger, 40). The Opium-poppy was introduced into China, from Arabia, at the beginning of the 9th century, and its earliest Chinese name is 阿芙蓉, a representation of the Arabic name. The Arab. ʻafyân is sometimes corruptly called ʻafin, of which ʻafin, 'imbecile,' is a popular etymology. Similarly the Bengalees derive it from ʻaf-heno, 'serpent-home.' [A number of early references to opium smoking have been collected by Burnell, Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 113.]

1563.—"I desire to know for certain about ʻafmāo, what it is, which is used by the people of this country: if it is what we call opium, and whence comes such a quantity as is expended, and how much may be eaten every day?"

"O. ... that which I call of Cambaya come for the most part from one territory which is called Malvi (Mālī), ... I knew a secretary of Nizamoxa (see NIZAMALUCO), a native of Coraçon, who every day eat three tobias (see TOLA), or a weight of 10½ cruzados ... though he was a well educated man, and a great scrible and notary, he was always dozing or sleeping; yet if you put him to business he would speak like a man of letters and discretion; from this you may see what habit will do."—Garcia, 1582 to 1585.

1568.—"I went then to Cambaya ... and there I bought 60 parcels of Opium, which cost me two thousand and a hundred ducats, every ducat at four shillings two pence."—Master C. Frederick, in Hakl. ii. 371. The original runs thus, showing the looseness of the translation: ... cumprim sesantam manem d’Amon, che mi costo 2100 ducati serianni (see XERAFINE), che a nostro conto possammo valore 5 lire l’uno."—In Ramusio, iii. 396e.

1588.—"Amon, so called by the Portingales, is by Arabians, Moros, and Indians called Affan, in latine Opio or Opium. ... The Indians use much to eat Affan. Hee that useth to eate it, must eate it daylie, otherwise he dieth and consumeth himselfe ... likewise hee that hath never eatt it, and will venture at the first to eate as much as those that dayly use it, it will surely kill him. ..."—Linschoten, 124: [Hak. ORANGE.

1726.—"It hardly be believed... that Java alone consumes monthly 350 packs of opium, each being of 136 cattis (see CATTY), though the E. I. Company make 145 cattis out of it..."—Valentijn, iv. 61.

1727.—"The Chiefs of Calecut, for many years had vended between 500 and 1000 chests of Bengal Opium yearly up in the inland Countries, where it is very much used."—A. Hamilton, i. 315; [ed. 1744, i. 317 seq.]

1770.—"Patna... is the most celebrated place in the world for the cultivation of opium. Besides what is carried into the inland parts, there are annually 3 or 4000 chests exported, each weighing 300 lbs... An excessive fondness for opium prevails in all the countries to the east of India. The Chinese emperors have suppressed it in their dominions, by condemning to the flames every vessel that imports this species of poison."—Royall (tr. 1777), i. 424.

ORANGE. s. A good example of plausible but entirely incorrect etymology is that of orange from Lat. aurantium. The latter word is in fact an ingenious medieval fabrication. The word doubtless came from the Arab. naранж, which is again a form of Pers. nārānq, or nārnānī, the latter being still a common term for the orange in Hindustan. The Persian indeed may be traced to Skt. nāṛgaṇā, and nārāṇa, but of these words no satisfactory etymological explanation has been given, and they have perhaps been Sanscritized from some southern term. Sir W. Jones, in his article on the Spokenard of the Ancients, quotes from Dr. Anderson of Madras, "a very curious philological remark, that in the Tamil dictionary, most words beginning with nār have some relation to fragrance; as nārakēndu, to yield an odour; nārāṃ pīḷēi, lemon-grass; nārīṭe, citron; nāṛṭa maṇna, (read nārēna), the wild orange-tree; nārēma pānēi, the Indian jasmine; nāṛēma alērī, a strong smelling flower; and nārūta, which is put for nārēd in the Tamil version of our scriptures." (See As. Res. vol. ii. 414). We have not been able to verify many of these Tamil terms. But it is true that in both Tamil and Malayalam nāru is 'fragrant.' See, also, on the subject of this article, A. E. Pott, in Lassen's Zeitschrift f. d. Kunde des Morgenlandes, vii. 114 seq.

The native country of the orange is believed to be somewhere on the northern border of India. A wild orange, the supposed parent of the cultivated species, both sweet and bitter, occurs in Garhwal and Sikkim, as well as in the Kāśi (see COSSYA) country, the valleys of which last are still abundantly productive of excellent oranges. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 336 seqq.] It is believed that the orange first known and cultivated in Europe was the bitter or Seville orange (see Hawthorne and Flückiger, 111-112).

From the Arabic, Byzantine Greek got νεφέρσιον, the Spaniards naranzo, old Italian narancia, the Portuguese burancia, from which last, or some similar form, by the easy detachment of the l (taken probably, as in many other instances, for an article), we have the Ital. arancia, L. Latin aurantium, French orange, the modification of these two being shaped by aurum and or. Indeed, the quotation from Jacques de Vitry possibly indicates that some form like al-arangi may have been current in Syria. Perhaps, however, his phrase ab indigenis nuncupantur may refer only to the Frank or quasi-Frank settlers, in which case we should have among them the birthplace of our word in its present form. The reference to this passage we derived in the first place from Helm, who gives a most interesting history of the introduction of the various species of Citrus into Europe. But we can hardly think he is right in supposing that the Portuguese first brought the sweet orange (Citrus aurantium dulce) into Europe from China, c. 1548. No doubt there may have been a re-introduction of some fine varieties at that time.* But as early as the beginning of the 14th century we find Al-Qādī extolling the fruit of Cintra. His words, as rendered by M. Reinaud, run: "Au nombre des dependances de Lissonne est la ville de Schintara; à Schintara on recueille des pommes admirables pour la grosseur et le gont." (244+). That these pommes were the famous Cintra oranges can hardly be*

* There seems to have been great oscillation of traffic in this matter. About 1873, one of the present writers, then resident at Palermo, sent, in compliance with a request from Lahore, a collection of plants of many (about forty) varieties of citrus cultivated in Sicily, for introduction into the Punjab. This despatch was much aided by the kindness of Prof. Todaro, in charge of the Royal Botanic Garden at Palermo.

The Editor designates only to say that the "MS. is in the Tower." [Prof. Skeat writes (9 ser. Notes and Queries, v. 321): "The only known allusion to oranges, previously to 1400, in any piece of English literature is that in the 'Alliterative Poems,' edited by Dr. Morris, ii. 1044. The next reference, soon after 1400, is in Lydgate's 'Minor Poems,' ed. Halliwell, p. 15. In 1410 we find orange in the 'Promptorium Parvulorum,' and in 1470 we find oranges in the 'Paston Letters,' ed. Gairdner, ii. 394."

1451. - "Item to the galeman (gallant man) brought the lampreis and oranges..."[i.e. dicit], - Household Book of John D. of Norfolk, Roxb. Club, 1841, p. 38.

1526. - "They have besides (in India) the naranj [or Seville orange, Tr.] and the various fruits of the orange species... It always struck me that the word naranj was accepted in the Arab fashion; and I found that it really was so: the men of Bajaur and Siawd call naranj naranj, "or perhaps rather naranj." - Baber, 328."

In this passage Baber means apparently to say that the right name was naranj, which had been changed by the usual influence of Arabic pronunciation into naranj.

1583. - "Sometimes the foreign products thus cast up (on Shetland) at their doors were a new revelation to the islanders, as when a cargo of oranges was washed ashore on the coast of Delting, the natives boiled them as a new kind of potatoes." - Sut. Rec. July 14, p. 37.

ORANG-OTANG, ORANG-OUTAN, &c. s. The great man-like ape of Sumatra and Borneo; Simia Saturnus, L. This name was first used by Bontius (see below). It is Malay, orang-utan, 'homo sylvaticus.' The proper name of the animal in Borneo is mita. Crawfurd says it is never called orang-utan by 'the natives. But that excellent writer is often too positive—especially in his negatives! Even if it be not (as is probable) anywhere a recognised specific name, it is hardly possible that the name should not be sometimes applied popularly. We remember a tume hooluck belonging to a gentleman in E. Bengal, which was habitually known to the natives as jangli
"nlur, literally = orang-utan. [There seems reason to believe that Crawfurd was right after all, Mr. Scott (Malayan Words in English, p. 87) writes: "But this particular application of orang utan to the ape does not appear to be, or ever to have been, familiar to the Malays generally; Crawford (1852) and Swettenham (1889) omit it, Pijnappel says it is 'Low Malay,' and Klinkert (1893) denies the use entirely. This uncertainty is explained by the limited area in which the animal exists within even native observation. Mr. Wallace could find no natives in Sumatra who 'had ever heard of such an animal,' and no 'Dutch officials who knew anything about it.' Then the name came to European knowledge more than 200 years ago; in which time probably more than one Malay name has faded out of general use or wholly disappeared, and many other things have happened." Mr. Skeat writes:
"I believe Crawford is absolutely right in saying that it is never called orangutan by the natives. It is much more likely to have been a sailor's mistake or joke than an error on the part of the Malays who know better. Throughout the Peninsula orang-utan is the name applied to the wild tribes, and though the mawas or mias is known to the Malays only by tradition, yet in tradition the two are never confused, and in those islands where the mawas does exist he is never called orang-utan, the word orang being reserved exclusively to describe the human species.'"

wild Animals in the Woods (of Java) there is one in particular called the Ouran-Outang;"
—J. Hamilton, ii. 131; [ed. 1744, ii. 135].

1783. — "Were we to be driven out of India this day, nothing would remain to tell that it had been possessed, during the inglorious period of our dominion, by any thing better than the ourang-outang or the tiger."—Burke, Sp. on Poe's E. India Bill, Works, ed. 1852, iii. 408.

1802. — "Man, therefore, in a state of from Animal Food, pp. 13-14.

1811. — "I have one slave more, who was given me in a present by the Sultan of Pontiana. ... This gentleman is Lord Monboddo's genuine ourang-outang, which in the Malay language signifies literally wild man. ... Some people think seriously that the ourang-outang was the original patriarch and progenitor of the whole Malay race."
—Lord Minto, Diary in India, 203-9.

wild aboriginal tribes ... they are often styled Orang Utan, or men of the forest."
—Cavenagh, Rem. of an Indian Official, 293.

ORANKAY, ARANGKAIO, &c.

s. Malay Orang kaya. In the Archipelago, a person of distinction, a chief or noble, corresponding to the Indian omrah; literally 'a rich man,' analogous therefore to the use of riche-homme by Joinville and other old French authors. [Mr. Skeat notes that the terminal o in arangkiaio represents a dialectical form used in Sumatra and Java. The Malay leader of the Pa-hang rising in 1891-2, who was supposed to bear a charmed life, was called by the title of Orang Kayo

1811.—“From amongst the orang kayas the Sultan appoints the officers of state, who as members of Council are called mantri (see Muntree, Mandarin).”—Marston, II. of Sumatra, 350.

[Organ. s. An Oriental form of mitrailleur. Steingass (Dict. 38) has Pers. argham, arghun, from the Greek ὀργανός, ‘an organ.’

1790.—“A weapon called an organ, which is composed of about thirty-six gun barrels so joined as to fire at once.”—Letter from De Boigne’s Camp at Mairatha, dated Sept. 13, in H. Compton, A particular Account of the European Military Adventures of Hindostan, from 1754 to 1803, p. 61.

Orissa. n.p. [Skt. Odrikshtra, ‘the land of the Odras’ (see Oordiya). The word is said to be the Prakrit form of uttara, ‘north,’ as applied to the N. part of Kalinga.] The name of the ancient kingdom and modern province which lies between Bengal and the Coromandel Coast.

1516.—“Kingdom of Orissa. Further on towards the interior there is another kingdom which is contiguous with that of Narsyngla, and on another side with Bengal, and on another with the great Kingdom of Dely...”—Barlois, in Lisbon ed. 300.

c. 1616.—“Vdeza, the Chief City called Iekanat (Juggurnaut).”—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 588.

Ormesine. s. A kind of silk texture, which we are unable to define. The name suggests derivation from Ormus. [The Draper’s Dict. defines “Armozeen, a stout silk, almost invariably black. It is used for hat-bands and scarfs at funerals by those not family mourners. Sometimes sold for making clergyman’s gowns.” The N.E.D. s.v. Armozeen, leaves the etymology doubtful. The Stanf. Dict. gives Ormuzine, a fabric exported from Ormus.”]

c. 1566.—“... a little Island called Tana, a place very populous with Portugal’s, Moors and Gentiles: these have nothing but Rice; they are makers of Armesie and weavers of girdles of wool and bumbast.”—Cas. Frederici, in Hakl. ii. 344.

Ormus, Ormuz. n.p. Properly Harumuz or Harumaz; a famous maritime city and minor kingdom near the mouth of the Persian Gulf. The original place of the city was on the northern shore of the Gulf, some 30 miles east of the site of Bandar Abbas or Gombroon (q.v.); but about A.D. 1300, apparently to escape from Tartar raids, it was transferred to the small island of Gerun or Jerin, which may be identified with the Ornum of Nearchus, about 12 m. westward, and five miles from the shore, and this was the seat of the kingdom when first visited and attacked by the Portuguese under Alboquerque in 1506. It was taken by them about 1515, and occupied permanently (though the nominal reign of the native kings was maintained), until wrested from them by Shih 'Abbis, with the assistance of an English squadron from Surat, in 1622. The place was destroyed by the Persians, and the island has since remained desolate, and all but uninhabited, though the Portuguese citadel and water-tanks remain. The islands of Hormuz, Kishm, &c., as well as Bandar 'Abbâs and other ports on the coast of Kerman, had been held by the Sultans of Omân as fiefs of Persia, for upwards of a century, when in 1554 the latter State asserted its dominion, and occupied those places in force (see Badger's Immans of Omân, &c., p. xcviv.).

B.C. c. 325.—"They weighed next day at dawn, and after a course of 100 stadia anchored at the mouth of the river Anamis, in a country called Harmesia."—Arria, History of the Persian Empire, ch. xxxiii., tr. by M'Crie, p. 292.

1289.—"When you have ridden these two days you come to the Ocean Sea, and on the shore you find a City with a harbour, which is called Hormos."—Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. xix.

c. 1330.—"I came to the Ocean Sea. And the first city on it that I reached is called Ormus, a city strongly fenced and abounding in costly wares. The city is on an island some five miles distant from the main; and on it there grows no tree, and there is no fresh water."—Vesp. Odozir, in Cathay, &c., 56.

c. 1331.—"I departed from Omân for the country of Hormuz. The city of Hormuz stands on the shore of the sea. The name is also called Moghistan. The new city of Hormuz rises in face of the first in the middle of the sea, separated from it only by a channel 3 farsangs in width. We arrived at New Hormuz, which forms an island of which the capital is called Jamum ... It is a mart for Hind and Sind."—Ibn Battuta, ii. 230.

"High on a throne of royal state, which far Outshone the wealth of Ormus and of Ind, Or where the gorgeous East with richest hand Showered on her kings barbaric pearl and gold."—Paradise Lost, ii. 1-4.

OROMBAROS, s. This odd word seems to have been used as griffin (q.v.) now is. It is evidently the Malay orang-balihar, or orang bharu, 'a new man, a novice.' This is interesting as showing an unquestionable instance of an expression imported from the Malay factories to Continental India. [Mr. Skeat remarks that the form of the word shows that it came from the Malay under Portuguese influence.]
1711.—At Madras..." refreshments for the Men, which they are presently supply’d with from Country Boats and Cattamarans, who make a good Penny at the first coming of Orombarros, as they call those who have not been there before."—Lockyer, 28.

ORTOLAN, s. This name is applied by Europeans in India to a small lark, Calandrella brachydactyla, Temm., in Hind. borgel and bageri, [Skt. cyepu, ’a troop’]. Also sometimes in S. India to the finch-lark, Pyrrhaluuda grisea, Scopoli.

OTTA, OTTER, s. Corruption of atta, ‘flour,’ a Hindi word having no Skt. original; [but Platts gives Skt. avira, ’soft’]. Popular rhyme:

"At tert Shekhawati Abha atta abha mati!’

’Confound this Shekhawati land,
My bread’s half wheat-meat and half sand.’

Boissau, Tour through Rajpura, 1837, p. 274.

[1583.—"After travelling three days, one of the prisoners bought some ottah. They prepared bread, some of which was given him; after eating it he became insensible.

OTTO, OTTER, s. Or usually ‘Otto of Roses,’ or by imperfect purists ‘Attar of Roses,’ an essential oil obtained in India from the petals of the flower, a manufacture of which the chief seat is at Ghazipur on the Ganges. The word is the Arab. ‘itr, ’perfume.’ From this word are derived ‘attar, a ‘perfumer or druggist,’ ‘attari, adj., ‘pertaining to a perfumer.’ And a relic of Saracen rule in Palermo is the Via Litterini, the street of the perfumers’ shops. We find the same in an old Spanish account of Fez:

1573.—’Issuing thence to the Cayzerie by a gate which faces the north there is a handsome street which is called the Atarim, which is the Spicery.’—Martmor, Affrica, ii. f. 88.

‘Itr of roses is said to have been discovered by the Empress Nur-jahân on her marriage with Jahângir. A canal in the palace garden was filled with rose-water in honour of the event, and the princess, observing a scum on the surface, caused it to be collected, and found it to be of admirable fragrance, whence it was called Atir-jahângirî.”

1824.—"The attar is obtained after the rose-water is made, by setting it out during the night and till sunrise in the morning in large open vessels exposed to the air, and then skimming off the essential oil which floats at the top.”—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 164.

OUDH, OUDE, n.p. Awadh; properly the ancient and holy city of Ayodhya (Skt. ‘not to be warred against’), the capital of Ráma, on the right bank of the river Saryu, now commonly called the Gogra. Also the province in which Ayodhya was situated, but of which Lucknow for about 170 years (from c. 1732) has been the capital, as that of the dynasty of the Nawabs, and from 1814 kings, of Oudh. Oudh was annexed to the British Empire in 1856 as a Chief Commissionership. This was re-established after the Mutiny was subdued and the country reconquered, in 1858. In 1877 the Chief Commissionership was united to the Lieut.-Governorship of the N.W. Provinces. (See JUDEA.)

B. c. ii.—"The noble city of Ayodhya crowned with a royal highway had already cleaned and besprinkled all its streets, and spread its broad banners. Women, children, and all the dwellers in the city eagerly looking for the consecration of Ráma, waited with impatience the rising of the morrow’s sun.”—Ráma-rayana, Bk. iii. (Ayodhya Kanda), ch. 3.

1636.—"Departing from this Kingdom (Kândahâr or Kanaúj) he (Hwen T’sang) travelled about 600 li to the S.E., crossed the Ganges, and then taking his course southerly he arrived at the Kingdom of Oyutó (Ayodhya).”—Peregrina Boudard, ii. 267.

c. 1686.—"Those Gentlemen's Friends in the Committee of the Company in England, acquainted them by Letters over Land, of the Danger they were in, and gave them Warning to be on their guard."—A. Hamilton, i. 196; [ed. 1744, i. 155].

1757.—"Though so far apart that we can only receive letters from Europe once a year, while it takes 18 months to get an answer, we Europeans get news almost every year over land by Constantinople, through Arabia or Persia... A few days ago we received the news of the Peace in Europe; of the death of Prince Eugene; of the marriage of the P. of Wales with the Princess of Saxe-Gotha. . . .—Letter of the Germ. Missionary Society, from Madras, Feb. 18. In Notices of Madras, and Cuddalore, &c. 1558, p. 159.

1763.—"We have received Overland the news of the taking of Havannah and the Spanish Fleet, as well as the defeat of the Spaniards in Portugal. We must surely make an advantageous Peace, however I'm no Politician."—MS. Letter of James Rennell, June 1, fr. Madras.

1774.—"Les Marchands à Bengale envoyèrent un Vaiseau à Suis en 1772, mais il fut endommagé dans le Golfe de Bengale, et obligé de retourner; en 1773 le Sr. Holford entreprit encore ce voyage, réussit cette fois, et fut ainsi le premier Anglais qui eut conduit un vaisseau à Suis. . . . On s'est déjà servis plusieurs fois de cette route comme d'un chemin de poste; car le Gouvernement des Indes envoie actuellement dans les cas d'importance soûs Courriers par Suis en Angleterre, et peut presque avoir plutôt reponse de Londres que leurs lettres ne peuvent venir en Europe par le Chemin ordinaire du tour du Cap de bonne espe- rance."—Nebeker, Voyage, ii. 10.

1776.—"We had advices long ago from England, as late as the end of May, by way of Suez. This is a new Route opened by Govr. Hastings, and the Letters which left Marseilles the 3rd June arrived here the 2oth August. This, you'll allow, is a ready communication with Europe, and may be kept open at all times, if we chuse to take a little pains."—MS. Letter from James Rennell, Oct. 19,—from Isfamabad, capital of Chittigong.

1781.—"On Monday last was Married Mr. George Greenley to Mrs. Anne Barrington, relict of the late Capt. William B—, who unfortunately perished on the Desart, in the attack that was made on the Caravan of Bengal Goods under his and the other Gentlemen's care between Suez and Grand Cairo."—India Gazette, March 7.

1782.—"When you left England with an intention to pass overland and by the route of the Red Sea into India, did you not know that no subject of these kingdoms can lawfully reside in India . . . without the permission of the United Company of Merchants? . . ."—Price, Travels, i. 130.

1783.—"Mr. Paul Benfield, a gentleman whose means of intelligence were known to be both extensive and expeditious, publicly declared, from motives the most benevolent, that he had just received overland from England certain information that Great Britain had finally concluded a peace with all the belligerent powers in Europe."—Munro's Narrative, 317.

1803.—"From the Governor General to the Secret Committee, dated 24th Decr. 1802. Read. Overland, 8th May 1803."—Makrath War Papers (Parliamentary).

OVIDORE. s. Port. Ouvidor, i.e. 'auditor,' an official constantly mentioned in the histories of Portuguese India. But the term is also applied in an English quotation below to certain Burmese officials, an application which must have been adopted from the Portuguese. It is in this case probably the translation of a Burmese designation, perhaps of Nēkhan-daw, 'Royal Ear,' which is the title of certain Court officers.

1509.—"The Captain-Major (at Melinde) sent on board all the ships to be at no one when ashore would in any way misbehave or produce a scandal: any such offence would be severely punished. And he ordered the mariners of the ships to land, and his own Provost of the force, with an Ouvidor that he had on board, that they might keep an eye on our people to prevent mischief."—Correa, i. 165.

1507.—"And the Viceroy ordered the Ouvidor General to hold an inquiry on this matter, on which the truth came out clearly that the Holy Apostle (Sanctiago) showed himself to the Moors when they were fighting with our people, and of this he sent word to the King, telling him that such martyrs were the men who were serving in these parts that our Lord took thought of them and sent them a Helper from Heaven."—Pred. i. 717.

1698.—(At Syriam) "Ovidores (Persons appointed to take notice of all passages in the Runday (office of administration) and advise them to Ava. . . . Three Ovidores that always attend the Runday, and are sent to the King, upon errands, as occasion obliges."—Fieldor's Diary, in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 396, 900.

1757.—"At the foot of the hills the country is called Terani (see TERAI) . . . and people in their passage catch a disorder, called in the language of that country aw/, which is a putrid fever, and of which the generality of persons who are attacked with it die in a few days. . . ."—Asiat. Res. ii. 957.

1816.—". . . rain brings along with it the local malady called the Owl, so much dreaded in the woods and valleys of Nepal."—Isotic Journal, ill. 405.
PADDY. 650

PADDY, s. Rice in the husk; but the word is also, at least in composition, applied to growing rice. The word appears to have in some measure, a double origin.

There is a word batty (see BATTA) used by some writers on the west coast of India, which has probably helped to propagate our uses of paddy. This seems to be the Canarese batta or bhatta, ‘rice in the husk,’ which is also found in Mahr. as bhut with the same sense, a word again which in Hind. is applied to ‘cooked rice.’ The last meaning is that of Skt. bhaktā, which is perhaps the original of all these forms.

But in Malay pādi [according to Mr. Skeat, usually pronounced pādī] Javan. pārī, is ‘rice in the straw.’ And the direct parentage of the word in India is thus apparently due to the Archipelago; arising probably out of the old importance of the export trade of rice from Java (see Raffles, Java, i. 239-240, and Crawfurd’s Hist. iii. 345, and Descript. Diet., 368). Crawfurd, (Journ. Ind. Arch., iv. 187) seems to think that the Malayo-Javanese word may have come from India with the Portuguese. But this is impossible, for as he himself has shown (Des. Diet., u.s.), the word pārī, more or less modified, exists in all the chief tongues of the Archipelago, and even in Madagascar, the connection of which last with the Malay regions certainly was long prior to the arrival of the Portuguese.

1585.—"I have known European officers, who were never conscious of having drunk either of the waters above describ’d, take the fever (owl) in the month of May in the Tame."—Sleeman, Journey in Oudh, ii. 163.

1748.—"The paddy which is the name given to the rice, whilst in the husk, does not grow ... in compact ears, but like oats, in loose spikes."—Maurin., tr. i. 231.

1787.—"Parrots brought 900,000 loads of hill-paddy daily, from the marshes of Chandata,—nice husking the hill-paddy, without breaking it, converted it into rice."—Turon’s Mahavamsa, 22.

1871.—"In Ireland Paddy makes riots, in Bengal raiyats make paddy; and in this lies the difference between the paddy of green Bengal, and the Paddy of the Emerald Isle."—Goudia Sundara, ii. 25.

1787.—"Il est établi un droit sur les riz et les paddys exportés de la Colonie, excepté pour le Cambodge par la voie du fleuve."—Convier de Saigon, Sept. 20.

PADDY-BIRD, s. The name commonly given by Europeans to certain baser species of the family Ardeidae or Herons, which are common in the rice-fields, close in the wake of grazing cattle. Jerdon gives it as the European’s name for the Ardea leucotera, Boddart, andhā baṭṭī (‘blind heron’) of the Hindus, a bird which is more or less coloured. But in Bengal, if we are not mistaken, it is more commonly applied to the pure white bird—Herodius alba, L., or Ardea Torna, Buch. Ham., and Herodius egretoides, Temminck, or Ardea peta, Buch. Ham.

1727.—"They have also Store of wild Fowl; but who have a Mind to eat them must shoot them. Flamingoes are large and good Meat. The Paddy-bird is also good in their season."—J. Hamilton, i. 161; [ed. 1744, i. 162-3].

1868.—"The most common bird (in Formosa) was undoubtedly the Padi bird, a species of heron (Ardea pratinoscheles), which was constantly flying across the padi, or rice-fields."—Collingwood, Rambles of a Naturalist, 44.

PADDY-FIELD, s. A rice-field, generally in its flooded state.

1759.—"They marched onward in the plain towards Preston’s force, who, seeing them coming, halted on the other side of a long morass formed by paddy-fields."—Orme, ed. 1803, iii. 439.

1800.—"There is not a single paddy-field in the whole county, but plenty of cotton PADRE. s. A priest, clergyman, or minister, of the Christian Religion; when applied by natives to their own priests, as it sometimes is when they speak to Europeans, this is only by way of accommodation, as 'church' is also sometimes so used by them.

The word has been taken up from the Portuguese, and was of course applied originally to Roman Catholic priests only. But even in that respect there was a peculiarity in its Indian use among the Portuguese. For P. della Valle (see below) notices it as a singularity of their practice at Goa that they gave the title of Padre to secular priests, whereas in Italy this was reserved to the religiosi or regulars.

In Portugal itself, as Bluteau's explanation shows, the use is, or was formerly, the same as in Italy; but, as the first ecclesiastics who went to India were monks, the name apparently became general among the Portuguese there for all priests.

It is a curious example of the vitality of words that this one which had thus already in the 16th century in India a kind of abnormally wide-application, has now in that country a still wider, embracing all Christian ministers. It is applied to the Protestant clergy at Madras early in the 18th century. A bishop is known as Lord (see LAT) padre. See LAT Sahib.

According to Leland the word is used in China in the form po-ti-lii.

1541.—"Chegando a Porta da Igreja, o sahirao a receber ots Padres."—Pinto, ch. XIX. (see Cotta, p. 85).

1584.—"It was the will of God that we found there two Padres, the one an Englishman, and the other a Fleming."—Péch, in Hakl. ii. 381.

... had it not pleased God to put it into the minds of the archbishop and other two Padres of Jesuits of S. Paul's Colledge to stand our friends, we might have rotted in prison."—Newbervie, ibid. ii. 380.

c. 1590.—"Learned monks also come from Europe, who go by the name of Pádre. They have an infallible head called Padá. He can change any religious ordinances as he may think advisable, and kings have to submit to his authority."—Budanot, in Blockman's. Fin. i. 152.

c. 1606.—"Et ut adsesae Patres comperient, minor exclamant Padrigi, Padrigi, id est Domine Pater, Christianus sum."—Iarric, iii. 155.

1614.—"The Padres make a church of one of their Chambers, where they say Masse twice a day."—W. Whittington, in Purchas, i. 456.

1616.—"So seeing Master Terry whom I brought with me, he (the King) called to him. Padre you are very welcome, and this house is yours."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 584; [Hak. Soc. ii. 355].

1623.—"I Portoghesis chiamano anche i preti secolari padri. come noi i religiosi..."—P. della Valle, ii. 555; [Hak. Soc. ii. 128].

1658.—"They (Hindu Jogis) are impertinent enough to compare themselves with our Religious Men they meet with in the Indies. I have often taken pleasure to catch them, using much ceremony with them, and giving them great respect; but I soon heard them say to one another, This Frangers knows who we are, he hath been a great while in the Indies, he knows that we are the Padres of the Indians. A fine comparison, said I, within myself, made by an impertinent and licentious rabble of Men!"—Berner, E. T. 104; [ed. Conduitt, 299].

1675.—"The Padre (or Minister) complains to me that he hath not that respect and place of preference at Table and elsewhere that is due unto him... At his request I promised to move it at ye next meeting of ye Connell. What this little Spark may enkindle, especially should it break out in ye Pulpit, I cannot foresee further than the inflaming of ye dyning Roome with sometimes is made almost intolerable hot upon other Aces."—Mr. Puckitt's Diary at Methistopotam, MS. in India Office.

1676.—"And whilst the French have no settlement near hand, the keeping French Padrys here instead of Portuguese, destroys the encroaching growth of the Portingall interest, who used to entail Portugalism as well as Christianity on all their converts."—Madras Conans, Feb. 29, in Notes and Ets. i. p. 46.

1680.—"... where as at the Dedication of a New Church by the French Padrys and Portaguez in 1675 guns had been fired from the Fort in honour thereof, neither Padry nor Portugall appeared at the Dedication of our Church, nor as much as gave the Governor what afterwards to give him joy of it."—Ibid. Oct. 28. No. III. p. 37.

c. 1692.—"But their greatest act of tyranny (at Goa) is this. If a subject of these misbelievers dies, leaving young children, and no grown-up son, the children are considered wards of the State. They take them to their places of worship, their churches... and the padris, that is to say the priests, instruct the children in the Christian religion, and bring them up in their own faith, whether the child be a Mussulman sarij or a Hindī brādīman."—Khāqān Khān, in Elliot, vi. 345.

1711.—"The Danish Padre Bartholomew Ziegenbalgh, requests leave to go to Europe in the first ship, and in consideration that he is head of a Protestant Mission, espoused by the Right Reverend the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury . . . we have presumed to grant him his passage."—In Wheeler, ii. 177.

1726.—"May 14. Mr. Lecke went with me to St. Thomas's Mount. . . . We conversed with an old Padre from Silesia, who had been 27 years in India, . . ."—Diary of the Missionary Schultz (in Notices of Madras, &c., 1858), p. 14.

May 17. The minister of the King of Pegu called on me. From him I learned, through an interpreter, that Christian of all nations and professions have perfect freedom at Pegu; that even in the Capital two French, two Armenian, and two Portuguese Patres, have their churches.

1809.—"Lord Lake was not a little pleased at the Begum's loyalty, and being a little elevated by the wine . . . he gallantly advanced, and to the utter dismay of her attendants, took her in his arms, and kissed her. . . . Receiving courteously the proffered attention, she turned calmly round to her astonished attendants—"It is," said she, "the custom of a padre, (priest) to his daughter."—Sindeurs Jnl. Mem. i. 293.

1859.—"The Padre who is a half East Portuguese, informed me that he had three districts under him."—Ld. Valentin, i. 329.

1859.—"Two fat nabbed Brahmins, bedaubed with paint, had been importing me for money . . . upon the ground that they were padres."—Mem. of Col. Mountin, iii.

1857.—"We can only call them Padres in India, you know,—makes a point of never going beyond ten minutes, at any rate during the hot weather."—The Dilemma, ch. xiii.

PADSHA, PODSHA, s. Pers. —Hind. pādisīlah (Pers. pād, pāl 'throner, shāh, 'prince'), an emperor; the Great Mogul (q.v.); a king.

1553.—"Patxiah." Secunder POORUB.

1612.—"He acknowledges no Padenshawe or King in Christendom but the Portugals' King."—Papers, Letters, i. 175.

1630.—". . . round all the roome were placed tacite Mirzoes, Channs, Sultans, and Beglerbegs, above three score; who like so many inanimate Statues sat cross-legged . . . their backs to the wall, their eyes to a constant object; not daring to speak to one another, scarce enough, not the least, it being held in the Potshaw's presence a sine of too great presumption."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, p. 169. At p. 171 of the same we have Potshaugh; and in the edition of 1677, in a vocabulary of the language spoken in Hindustan, we have "King, Patchaw." And again: "Is the King at Agra?"—Punshaw Agranmela? (Pādisīlah Agrā māhā?)—99-100.

1673.—"They took upon them without control the Regal Dignity and Title of Pedeshaw."—Fryer, 166.

1727.—"Aureng-zeb, who is now saluted Pautshaw, or Emperor, by the Army, notwithstanding his Father was then alive."—A. Hamilton, i. 175, [ed. 1744].

PAGAR, s.

a. This word, the Malay for a 'fence, enclosure,' occurs in the sense of 'factory' in the following passage:

1702.—"Some other out-pagars or Factories, depending upon the Factory of Bencoolen."—Charts of the E. I. Co. p. 324.

In some degree analogous to this use is the application, common among Hindustani-speaking natives, of the Hind.—Arab. word ʾišṭā, 'a fence, enclosure,' in the sense of Presidency: Bombay ʾišṭā, ʾišṭā, Bangal ʾišṭā, ʾišṭā, a sense not given in Shakespeare or Forbes; [it is given in Fallon and Platts. Mr. Skeat points out that the Malay word is pagar, 'a fence,' but that it is not used in the sense of a 'factory' in the Malay Peninsula. In the following passage it seems to mean 'factory stock':

[1615.—"The King says that at her arrival he will send them their house and pagarr upon rafts to them."—Foster, Letters, iii. 151.]

b. (pagir). This word is in general use in the Bombay domestic dialect for wages, Mrh. pagir. It is obviously the Port. verb pagar, 'to pay,' used as a substantive.

1875.—". . . the heavy-browed sultana of some Gangetic station, whose stern look palpably interrogates the amount of your monthly paggar."—Wilson, Aabele of South, 46.

PAGODA, s. This obscure and remarkable word is used in three different senses.

a. An idol temple; and also specifically, in China, a particular form of religious edifice, of which the famous "Porcelain tower" of Nanking, now destroyed, may be recalled as typical. In the 17th century we find the word sometimes misapplied to places of Mahomedan worship, as by Faria-y-Sousa, who speaks of the "Pagoda of Mecca."
b. An idol.

c. A coin long current in S. India. The coins so called were both gold and silver, but generally gold. The gold pagoda was the varada or hān of the natives (see HOON); the former name (fr. Skt. for ‘boar’) being taken from the Boar avatar of Vishnu, which was figured on a variety of ancient coins of the South; and the latter signifying ‘gold,’ no doubt identical with sōnd, and an instance of the exchange of b and s. (See also PARDAO.)

Accounts at Madras down to 1818 were kept in pagodas, fanams, and kils (see CASH); 8 kils = 1 fanam, 42 fanams = 1 pagoda. In the year named the rupee was made the standard coin.*

The pagoda was then reckoned as equivalent to 3½ rupees.

In the suggestions of etymologies for this word, the first and most prominent meaning alone has almost always been regarded, and doubtless justly; for the other uses are deducible from it. Such suggestions have been many.

Thus Chinese origins have been propounded in more than one form; e.g. Pao-t‘eh, ‘precious pile;’ and Pok-kich-t‘eh (‘white-bones-pile’).† Anything can be made out of Chinese monosyllables in the way of etymology; though no doubt it is curious that the first at least of these phrases is actually applied by the Chinese to the polygonal towers which in China foreigners specially call pagodas. Whether it be possible that this phrase may have been in any measure formed in imitation of pagoda, so constantly in the mouth of foreigners, we cannot say (though it would not be a solitary example of such borrowing—see NEELAM); but we can say with confidence that it is impossible pagoda should have been taken from the Chinese. The quotations from Corsali and Barbosa set that suggestion at rest.

Another derivation is given (and adopted by so learned an etymologist as H. Wedgwood) from the Portuguese pagoa, ‘a pagan.’ It is possible that this word may have helped to facilitate the Portuguese adoption of pagoda; it is not possible that it should have given rise to the word. A third theory makes pagoda a transposition of da-goba. The latter is a genuine word, used in Ceylon, but known in Continental India, since the extinction of Buddhism, only in the most rare and exceptional way.

A fourth suggestion connects it with the Skt. bhāgavat, ‘holy, divine,’ or Bhagavati, applied to Durgā and other goddesses; and a fifth makes it a corruption of the Pers. but-kadah, ‘idol-temple;’ a derivation given below by Ovington. There can be little doubt that the origin really lies between these two.

The two contributors to this book are somewhat divided on this subject:—

(1) Against the derivation from bhāgavat, ‘holy,’ or the Mahr. form bhagavant, is the objection that the word pagoda from the earliest date has the final e, which was necessarily pronounced. Nor is bhagavat a name for a temple in any language of India. On the other hand but-kadah is a phrase which the Portuguese would constantly hear from the Mahommedans with whom they chiefly had to deal on their first arrival in India. This is the view confidently asserted by Reinaud (Mémories sur l’Inde, 90), and is the etymology given by Littre.

As regards the coins, it has been supposed, naturally enough, that they were called pagoda, because of the figure of a temple which some of them bear; and which indeed was borne by the pagodas of the Madras Mint, as may be seen in Thomas’s Prinsep, pl. xlv. But in fact coins with this impress were first struck at Ikkeri at a date after the word pagoda was already in use among the Portuguese. However, nearly all bore on one side a rude representation of a Hindu deity (see e.g. Krishnaraja’s pagoda, c. 1520), and sometimes two such images. Some of these figures are specified by Prinsep (Useful Tables, p. 41), and Varthema speaks of them: “These pardat . . . have two devils stamped upon one side of them, and certain letters on the other” (115-116). Here the name may have been appropriately taken from bhagavat (A. B.).

On the other hand, it may be urged that the resemblance between but-kadah and pagoda is hardly close enough, and that the derivation from but-kadah does not easily account for all the uses of the word. Indeed, it seems admitted in the preceding paragraph that bhagavati may have had to do with the origin of the word in one of its meanings.

Now it is not possible that the word in all its applications may have had its origin from bhagavat, or some current modification of that word? We see from Marco Polo that such a term was currently known to foreign visitors of S. India in his day—a term almost identical in sound with pagoda, and bearing in his statement a religious application, though not to a temple.* We thus have four separate applications of the word pacaatu, or pagoda, picked up by foreigners on the shores of India from the 13th century downwards, viz. to a Hindu ejaculatory formula, to a place of Hindu worship, to a Hindu idol, to a Hindu coin with idols represented on it. Is it not possible that all are to be traced to bhagavat, ‘sacred,’ or to Bhagavat and Bhagavati, used as names of deities—of Buddha in Buddhist times or places, of Krishna and Durgā in Brahminical times and places? (uses which are fact). How common was the use of Bhagavati as the name of an object of worship in Malabar, may be seen from an example. Turning to Wilson’s work on the Mackenzie MSS., we find in the list of local MS. tracts belonging to Malabar, the repeated occurrence of Bhagavati in this way. Thus in this section of the book we have at p. xvi. (vol. ii.) note of an account “of a temple of Bhagavati”; at p. cii. “Temple of Mannadi Bhagavati goddess...” at p. civ. “Temple of Mangombo Bhagavati...”; Temple of Paddeparkave Bhagavati...”; “Temple of the goddess Panmiyunar Kave Bhagavati...”; “Temple of the goddess Patali Bhagavati...”; “Temple of Bhagavati...”; p. civii, “Account of the goddess Bhagavati at, &c. ...” p. civiii, “Acc. of the goddess Yalanga Bhagavati,” Acc. of the goddess Vallur Bhagavati.” The term Bhagavati seems thus to have been very commonly attached to objects of worship in Malabar temples (see also Fra Paolino, p. 79 and p. 57, quoted under c. below). And it is very interesting to observe that, in a paper on “Coorg Superstitions,” Mr. Kittel notices parenthetically that Bhadra Kāli (i.e. Durgā) is “also called Pogodi, Pavodi, a tadbhava of Bagavati” (Ind. Antig. ii. 170)—an incidental remark that seems to bring us very near the possible origin of pagoda. It is most probable that some form like pogodi or pagode was current in the months of foreign visitors before the arrival of the Portuguese; but if the word was of Portuguese origin there may easily have been some confusion in their ears between Bhagavati and but-kadāh which shaped the new word. It is no sufficient objection to say that bhagavati is not a term applied by the natives to a temple; the question is rather what misunderstanding and mispronunciation by foreigners of a native term may probably have given rise to the term?—(H. Y.)

Since the above was written, Sir Walter Elliot has kindly furnished a note, of which the following is an extract:—

“I took some pains to get at the origin of the word when at Madras, and the conclusion I came to was that it arose from the term used generally for the object of their worship, viz., Bhagavat, ‘god;’ bhagavati, ‘goddess.’

“Thus, the Hindu temple with its lofty gopura or propylon at once attracts attention, and a stranger enquiring what it was, would be told, ‘the house or place of Bhagavat.’ The village divinity throughout the south is always a form of Durga, or, as she is commonly called, simply ‘Devi’ (or Bhagavati, ‘the goddess’). ... In like manner a figure of Durga is found on most of the gold Huns (i.e. pagoda) coins current in the Dakhan, and a foreigner inquiring what such a coin was, or rather what was the form stamped upon it, would be told it was ‘the goddess, i.e., it was ‘Bhagavati.’” of his on the subject that I can find. They are in a letter from Tanjore, dated March 10, 1880:

"I think I overlooked a remark of yours regarding my observation that the e in Pagode was pronounced, and that this was a difficulty in deriving it from Bhagavat. In modern Portuguese e is not sounded, but verses show that it was in the 16th century. Now, if there is a final vowel in Pagoda, it must come from Bhagavati; but though the goddess is and was worshipped to a certain extent in S. India, it is by other names (Jumma, &c.). Gundert and Kittel give 'Pogodi' as a name of a Durga temple, but assuredly this is no corruption of Bhagavati, but Pagoda! Malayalam and Tamil are full of such adopted words. Bhagavati is little used, and the goddess is too insignificant to give rise to pagoda as a general name for a temple.

'Bhagavat can only appear in the S. Indian languages in its (Skt.) nominative form bhagavān (Tamil pugrāvān). As such, in Tamil and Malayalam it equals Vishnu or Siva, which would suit. But pagoda can't be got out of bhagavān; and if we look to the N. Indian forms, bhagavant, &c., there is the difficulty about the e, to say nothing about the nt."

The use of the word by Barbosa at so early a date as 1516, and its application to a particular class of temples must not be overlooked.

1516. — "There is another sect of people among the Indians of Malabar, which is called Cojavern (Kashmir, Lagos, Malabar, i. 115). . . . Their business is to work at baked clay, and tile for covering houses, with which the temples and Royal buildings are roofed . . . . Their idolatry and their idols are different from those of the others; and in their houses of prayer they perform a thousand acts of witchcraft and necromancy; they call their temples pagodes, and they are separate from the others." — Barbosa, 156. This is from Lord Stanley of Alderley's translation from a Spanish MS. The Italian of Ramusio reads: "nelle loro orationi fanno molte strigherie e necromantia, le quali chiamano Pagodes, differenti assai dall' altro" (Ramusio, i. f. 308f.). In the Portuguese MS, published by the Lisbon Academy in 1512, the words are altogether absent; and in interpolating them from Ramusio the editor has given the same sense as in Lord Stanley's English.

1516.—"In this city of Goa, and all over India, there are an infinity of ancient buildings of the Gentiles, and in a small island near this, called Dinari, the Portuguese, in order to build the city, have destroyed an ancient temple called Pagode, which was built with marvellous art, and with ancient figures wrought to the greatest perfection in a certain black stone, some of which remain standing, ruined and shattered, because these Portuguese care nothing about them. If I can come by one of these shattered images I will send it to your Lordship, that you may perceive how much in old times sculpture was esteemed in every part of the world." — Letter of Andrea Cavalli to Giuliano de'Medici, in Ramusio, i. f. 177.

1543. — "And with this fleet he anchored at Coulão (see QUILON) and landed there with all his people. And the Governor (Martim Afonso de Sousa) went thither because of information he had of a pagode which was quite near the houses, and which, they said, contained much treasure. . . . And the people of the country seeing that the Governor was going to the pagode, they sent to offer him 50,000 pardaös not to go." — Correa, iv. 325-326.

1554. — "And for the monastery of Santa Fee $15,000 reis yearly, besides the revenue of the Pagodes which His Highness bestowed upon the said House, which gives 600,000 reis a year. . . ." — Botello, Tombo, in Subsidios, 70.

1563. — "They have (at Baçaim) in one part a certain island called Salsete, where there are two pagodes or houses of idolatry." — Correa, f. 211.

1582. — "... Pagode, which is the house of prayers to their Idols." — Castejada (by N. L.), f. 34.

1594. — "And as to what you have written to me, viz., that although you understand how necessary it was for the increase of the Christianity of these parts to destroy all the pagodes and mosques (pagode e mesquidas), which the Gentiles and the Moors possess in the fortified places of this State. . . . (The King goes on to enjoin the Viceroy to treat this matter carefully with some theologians and canonists of those parts, but not to act till he shall have reported to the King). — Letter from the K. of Portugal to the Viceroy, in Arch. Port. Orient., Fasc. 3, p. 417.

1598. — "... houses of Divels [Divels] which they call Pagodes." — Linshott, 22: [Hak. Soc. i. 70].

1600. — "Gouvea uses pagode both for a temple and for an Idol, e.g., see f. 46. f. 47.

1630. — "That he should erect pagoda for God's worship, and adore images under green trees." — Lord, Display, &c.

1635. — "There did meet us at a great Pagodo or Pagod, which is a famous and sumptuous Temple or Church." — W. Briton, i. ibid., v. 49.

c. 1756.—"Nell'viseor poi li caualli Arabi di Goa, si paga di dato guaranta due pagoidi per caualli, et ogni pagodo val otto lire alla nostra moneta; e sono monetate d'oro; de modo che li caualli Arabi sono in gran prezzo in que' paesi, come sarrebbe trecento quattro cento, cinque cento, e fine mila ducati l'uno."—C. Patrici, in Raminus, iii. 388.
1597. — "I think well to order and decree that the pagodes which come from without shall not be current unless they be of forty and three points (essay) conformable to the first issue, which is called of Agro, and which is of the same value as that of the Son Tones, which were issued in its likeness."—edict of the King, in Arch. Port. Orient. iii. 752.

1598. — "There are yet other sorts of money called Pagodes. . . . Those are in India, and Heathenish money with the picture of a Diuell upon them, and therefore are called Pagodes."—Blanchetot, 54 and 69; [Hak. Soc. i. 157, 242.

1602. — "And he caused to be sent out for the Kings of the Decan and Canara two thousand horses from those that were in Goa, and this brought the King 80,000 pagodes, for every one had to pay forty as duty. These were imported by the Moors and other merchants from the ports of Arabia and Persia: in entering Goa they are free and uncharged, but on leaving that place they have to pay these duties."—Couto, IV. vi. 6.

1676. — "For in regard these Pagods are very thick, and cannot be clipt, those that are Masters of the trade, take a Piercer, and pierce the Pagod through the side, halfway or more, taking out of one piece as much Gold as comes to two or three Sous."—Tasmiel, E.T. 1683, ii. 4; [Ball, ii. 92.

1803. — "It frequently happens that in the bazar, the star pagoda exchanges for 4 rupees, and at other times for not more than 3."—Wellington, Desp., ed. 1837, ii. 375.

PAGODA-TREE. A slang phrase once current, rather in England than in India, to express the openings to rapid fortune which at one time existed in India. [For the original meaning, see the quotation from Ryklof Van Goens under BO TREE. Mr. Sket writes: "It seems possible that the idea of a coin tree may have arisen from the practice, among some Oriental nations at least, of making cash in moulds, the design of which is based on the plan of a tree. On the E. coast of the Malay Peninsula the name cask-tree (pokol pittis) is applied to cash cast in this form. Gold and silver tributary trees are sent to Siam by the tributary States: in these the leaves are in the shape of ordinary tree leaves."] 1577. — "India has been transferred from the regions of romance to the realms of fact . . . the mines of Golconda no longer pay the cost of working, and the pagoda-tree has been stripped of all its golden fruit."—Blackwood's Magazine, 575.

1851. — "It might be mistaken . . . for the work of some modern architect, built for the Nabob of a couple of generations back, who had enriched himself when the pagoda-tree was worth the shaking."—Sit. Rev., Sept. 3, p. 307.

PAHLAVI, PEHLVI. The name applied to the ancient Persian language in that phase which prevailed from the beginning of the Sassanian monarchy to the time when it became corrupted by the influence of Arabic, and the adoption of numerous Arabic words and phrases. The name Pahlavi was adopted by Europeans from the Parthian. The language of Western Persia in the time of the Achaemenian kings, as preserved in the cuneiform inscriptions of Persepolis, Behistun, and elsewhere, is nearly akin to the dialects of the Zend-Avesta, and is characterised by a number of inflections agreeing with those of the Avesta and of Sanskrit. The dissolubility of inflectional terminations is already indicated as beginning in the later Achaemenian inscriptions, and in many parts of the Zend-Avesta; but its course cannot be traced, as there are no inscriptions in Persian language during the time of the Arsacidae; and it is in the inscriptions on rocks and coins of Ardakshir-i-Papakân (A.D. 226-240)—the Ardashir Babagan of later Persian—that the language emerges in a form of that which is known as Pahlavi. "But, strictly speaking, the medieval Persian language is called Pahlavi when it is written in one of the characters used before the invention of the modern Persian alphabet, and in the peculiarly enigmatical mode adopted in Pahlavi writings. . . . Like the Assyrians of old, the Persians of Parthian times appear to have borrowed their writing from a foreign race. But, whereas the Semitic Assyrians adopted a Turanian syllabary, these later Aryan Persians accepted a Semitic alphabet. Besides the alphabet, however, which they could use for spelling their own words, they transferred a certain number of complete Semitic words to their writings as representatives of the corresponding words in their own language. . . . The use of such Semitic words, scattered about in Persian sentences, gives Pahlavi the motley appearance of a compound language. . . . But there are good reasons for supposing that the language was never spoken as it was written. The spoken language appears to have been pure Persian; the Semitic words being merely used as written representatives, or locutum, of the Persian words which were spoken. Thus, the Persians would write willam mulka, 'King of Kings'; but they would read shahin shah. . . . As the Semitic words were merely a Pahlavi mode of writing their Persian equivalents (just as 'viz.' is a mode of writing 'namely' in English*), they disappeared with the Pahlavi writing, and the Persians began at once to write all their words with their new alphabet, just as they pronounced them." (E. W. West, Introduction to Pahlavi Texts, p. xiii.; Sacred Books of the East, vol. v.)

Extant Pahlavi writings are confined to those of the Parsis, translations from the Avesta, and others almost entirely of a religious character. Where the language is transcribed, either in the Avesta characters, or in those of the modern Persian alphabet, and freed from the singular system indicated above, it is called Pazand (see PAZEND); a term supposed to be derived from the language of the Avesta, pazaitzanti, with the meaning 're-explanation.'

Various explanations of the term Pahlavi have been suggested. It seems now generally accepted as a changed form of the Parthian of the cuneiform inscriptions, the Parthia of Greek and Roman writers. The Parthians, though not a Persian race, were rulers of Persia for five centuries, and it is probable that everything ancient, and connected with the period of their rule, came to be called by this name. It is apparently the same word that in the form pahlæ and pahlavan, &c., has become the appellation of a warrior or champion in both Persian and Armenian, originally derived from that most warlike people the Parthians. (See PULWAUN.) Whether there was any identity between the name thus used, and that of Pahlava, which is applied to a people mentioned often in Sanskrit books, is a point still unsettled.

The meaning attached to the term Pahlavi by Orientals themselves, writing in Arabic or Persian (exclusive of Parsis), appears to have been 'Old Persian' in general, without restriction to any particular period or dialect. It is thus found applied to the cuneiform inscriptions at Persepolis. (Derived from West as quoted above, and from Hang's Essays, ed. London, 1878.)

PAILOO. s. The so-called 'triumphal arches,' or gateways, which form so prominent a feature in Chinese landscape, really monumental erections in honour of deceased persons of eminent virtue. Chin, pāt, 'a tablet,' and to, 'a stage or erection.' Mr. Ferguson has shown the construction to have been derived from India with Buddhism (see Indian and Eastern Architecture, pp. 700-702). [So the Torii of Japan seem to represent Skt. torana, ‘an archway’ (see Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 407 seq.).]

PÁLAGILÁSS. s. This is domestic Hind. for ‘Asparagus’ (Panjab N. & Q. ii. 180).

PALANEKEN, PALANQUIN, s. A box-litter for travelling in, with a pole projecting before and behind, which is borne on the shoulders of 4 or 6 men—4 always in Bengal, 6 sometimes in the Telugu country.

The origin of the word is not doubtful, though it is by no means clear how the Portuguese got the exact form which they have handed over to us. The nasal termination may be dismissed as a usual Portuguese addition, such as occurs in mandarin, Bacalha (Wasaí), and many other words and names as used by them. The basis of all the forms is Skt. pardanka, or paldanka, ‘a bed,’ from which we have Hind. and Mahr. palam, ‘a bed,’ Hind. pālki, ‘a palankin,’ [Telugu palakki, which is perhaps the origin of the Port. word], Pali pallanksa, ‘a couch, bed, litter, or palankin’ (Childers), and in Javanese and Malay paryanki, ‘a litter or sedan’ (Crawford).*

It is curious that there is a Spanish word palanca (L. Lat. phalangis) for a pole used to carry loads on the shoulders of two bearers (called in Sp. palanquinos); a method of transport more common in the south than in England, though even in old English the thing has a name, viz. ‘a cowlestaff’ (see N.E.D.). It is just possible that this word (though we do not find it in the Portuguese dictionaries) may have influenced the form in which the early Portuguese visitors to India took up the word.

The thing appears already in the Rāmāyaṇa. It is spoken of by Ibn Batuta and John Marignolli (both c. 1350), but neither uses this Indian name; and we have not found evidence of pālki older than Akbar (see Elliot, iv. 515, and Jam. i. 254).

As drawn by Lin-choten (1557), and as described by Grose at Bombay (c. 1760), the palankin was hung from a bamboo which bent in an arch over the vehicle; a form perhaps not yet entirely obsolete in native use. William- son (1°. M. i. 316 seqq.) gives an account of the different changes in the fashion of palankins, from which it would appear that the present form must have come into use about the end of the 18th century. Up to 1840-50 most people in Calcutta kept a palankin and a set of bearers (usually natives of Orissa—see OORIYA), but the practice and the vehicle are now almost, if not entirely, obsolete among the better class of Europeans. Till the same period the palankin, carried by relays of bearers, laid out by the post-office, or by private chowdries (q.v.), formed the chief means of accomplishing extensive journeys in India, and the elder of the present writers has undergone hardly less than 6000 or 9000 miles of travelling in going considerable distances (excluding minor distances) after this fashion. But in the decade named, the palankin began, on certain great roads, to be superseded by the dawk-garry (a Pakke-garry or palankin-carryage, horded by ponies posted along the road, under the post-office), and in the next decade to a large extent by railway, supplemented by other wheel-carriage, so that the palankin is now used rarely, and only in out-of-the-way localities.

* In Canticles, ill. i, the ‘permium quad fecit salto per Salomonem de Nessoa Lux’ is in the Hebrew copy (where he has been supposed to be a Greek copist); highly improbable, as the litter came to Greece from the East. Is it possible that the word can be in some way taken from per- mākt? The R.V. has palanches. [See the discussion in Encyclopaedia Biblica, iii. 290 seq.].

c. 1310.—‘Some time afterwards the pages of the Mistress of the Universe came to me with a dīna. . . . It is like a bed of state . . . with a pole of wood above . . . this is curved, and made of the Indian cane, solid and compact. Eight men, divided into two relays, are employed in turn to carry one of these; four carry the palankin whilst four rest. These vehicles serve in India the same purpose as donkeys in Egypt: most people use them habitually in going and coming. If a man has his own slaves, he is carried by them; if not he hires men to carry him. There are also a few found for hire in the city, which stand in the bazaars, at the Sultan’s gate, and also at the gates of private citizens.’—The Bûrûse, iii. 346.

1609—"... If comming forth of his Palace, hee (Jahangir) get vp on a Horse, it is a signe that he goeth for the Warres; but if he be vp vpon an Elephant or Palankan, it will be a signe of his hunting Voylage."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 219.

1616.—"Abul Chars, great governor of Ahmadabad, being sent for to Court in disgrace, comming in Pilgrims Clothes with fortie servants on foote, about sixtie miles in counterfeitt humiliation, finished the rest in his Pallankee."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 552; [Hakl. Soc. ii. 27], which reads Palankee, with other minor variances.

In Terry's account, in Purchas, ii. 1475, we have a Pallankee, and (p. 1483) Palanka; in a letter of Tom Coryate's (1615) Palankan.

1623.—"In the territories of the Portuguese in India it is forbidden to men to travel in palakine (Palanchina) as in good south too effeminate a proceeding; nevertheless as the Portuguese pay very little attention to their laws, as soon as the rain begin to fall they commence getting permission to use the palakine, either by favour or by bribery and so, gradually, the thing is relaxed, until at last nearly everybody travels in that way, and at all seasons."—P. della Valle, i. 611; [comp. Hakl. Soc. i. 31).

1659.—"The designing rascal (Sivaji)... conciliated Azal Khan, who fell into the snare... Without arms he mounted the palki, and proceeded to the place appointed under the same... He left all his attendants at a distance of a few arrow-shots... Sivaji had a weapon, called in the language of the Dakhin bikhak (i.e., 'scorpion') on the fingers of his hand, hidden under his sleeve..."—Kāhī Khan, in Elliot, vii. 259. See also p. 509.

1660.—"... From Golconda to Muslipot there is no travelling by waggons... But instead of Coaches they have the convenience of Pallekies, wherein you are carried with more speed and more ease than in any part of India."—Tavernier, E.F. ii. 70; [ed. Hall, i. 175]. This was quite true up to our own time. In 1840 the present writer was carried on that road, a stage of 25 miles in little more than 5 hours, by 12 bearers, relieving each other by sixes.

1672. The word occurs several times in Baldaeus as Pallinkijn. Tavernier writes Palleki and sometimes Pallanquin [Hall, i. 43, 175, 309, 382]; Bernier has Paleky [ed. Constable, 214, 283, 372].

1673.—"... ambling after these a great pace, the Palankee-Boys support them four of them, two at each end of a Bambo.

1750-52. — "The greater nobility are carried in a palekee, which looks very like a hammock fastened to a pole."—Torrey's Voyage to Surat. China, &c., ii. 201.

1754-58. — In the former year the Court of Directors ordered that Writers in their Service should "lay aside the expense of either horse, chair, or Palankin, during their Writings."—The Writers of Fort William (4th Nov. 1756) remonstrated, begging to be indulged in keeping a Palankeen for such months of the year as the excessive heat and violent rains make it impossible to go on foot without the utmost hazard of their health." The Court, however, replied (11 Feb. 1756): "We very well know that the indulging Writers with Palankens has not a little contributed to the neglect of business we complain of, by affording them opportunities of rambling; and again, with an obduracy and fervour too great for grammar (March 3, 1758): "We do not order you to buy or, and direct (and will admit of no representation for postponing the execution of) that no Writer whatsoever be permitted to keep either Palankeen, horse, or chair, during his Writingship, on pain of being immediately dismissed from our service."—In Long, pp. 54, 71, 130.

Palaquin, a ballad by Sir W. Jones; in Life and Works, ed. 1807, ii. 503.

1804.—"Give orders that a palanquin may be made for me; let it be very light, with the panells made of canvas instead of wood, and the poles fixed as for a dooley. Your Bengally palanquins are so heavy that they cannot be used out of Calcutta."—Wellington (to Major Shaw), June 20.

The following measures a change in ideas. A palankin is now hardly ever used by a European, even of humble position, much less by the opulent:

1508.—"Palkee. A litter well known in India, called by the English Palankee. A Guzerat punister (aware of no other) hazards the Etymology Pal-lankee (pal-lakhi) a thing requiring an annual income of a quarter Lank to support it and corresponding luxuries."—R. Dreammond, Illustrations, &c.

"...The conveyances of the island (Madeira) are of three kinds, viz.: horses, mules, and a litter, yeloped a palanquin, being a chair in the shape of a battching-tub, with a pole across, carried by two men, as dooleys are in the east."—W. Lab., Reminiscences, i. 252.

1809. —"Woo! Woo! around their palankee, As on a bridal day With symphony and dance and song. Their kindred and their friends come on The dance of sacrifice! The funeral song!"—Kehama, i. 6.

c. 1830.—"Un curieux indiscret reçut un galet dans la tête : on l'emporta baigné de sang, couché dans un palanquin."—V. Jacquesmont, Corr. i. 67.

1850.—"It will amaze readers in these days to learn that the Governor-General sometimes condescended to be carried in a Palanquin—a mode of conveyance which, except for long journeys away from railroads, has long been abandoned to porty Baboons, and Eurasian clerks.—St. B., Feb 14.

1851.—"In the great procession on Corpus Christi Day, when the Pope is carried in a palanquin round the Piazza of St. Peter, it is generally believed that the cushions and furniture of the palanquin are so arranged as to enable him to bear the fatigue of the ceremony by sitting whilst to the spectator he appears to be kneeling."—Dean Stanley, Christian Institutions, 291.

PALEMPORE. s. A kind of chintz bed-cover, sometimes made of beautiful patterns, formerly made at various places in India, especially at Sadras and Masulipatam, the importation of which into Europe has become quite obsolete, but under the greater appreciation of Indian manufactures has recently shown some tendency to revive. The etymology is not quite certain,—we know no place of the name likely to have been the eponymite,—and possibly it is a corruption of a hybrid (Hind. and Pers.) palang-posh, 'a bed-cover,' which occurs below, and which may have been perverted through the existence of Salem-pore as a kind of stuff. The probability that the word originated in a perversion of palang-posh, is strengthened by the following entry in Bluteau’s Diet.
(Supp. 1727.)

"Chaudus or Chaudeus são huns panos grandes, que servem para cobrir canas e outras cousas. São pintados de cores muy vistosas, e alguns mais finos, a que chamão palangapuzes. Fabricão-se de algadoão em Bengala e Choromandel,"—i.e. "Chaudus ou Chaudens" (this I cannot identify, perhaps the latter among Piece-goods)
"are a kind of large cloths serving to cover beds and other things. They are painted with gay colours, and there are some of a finer description which are called palangposhes," &c.

1st ser. ii. 173) has questioned this derivation. The word may have been taken from the State and town of Paldupur in Guzerat, which seems to have been an emporium for the manufactures of N. India, which was long noted for chintz of this kind.]

PALL. s. The name of the sacred language of the Southern Buddhists, in fact, according to their apparently
A well-founded tradition Magadhi, the dialect of what we now call South Bahr, in which Sakyamuni discoursed. It is one of the Prakrits (see PRACRIT) or Aryan vernaculars of India, and has probably been a dead language for nearly 2000 years. Pali in Skt. means 'a line, row, series,' and by the Buddhists is used for the series of their Sacred Texts. Pali-bhasha is then 'the language of the Sacred Texts,' i.e. Magadhi; and this was called elliptically by the Singhalese Pali, which we have adopted in like use. It has been carried, as the sacred language, to all the Indo-Chinese countries which have derived their religion from India through Ceylon. Pali is 'a sort of Tuscan among the Prakrits' from its inherent grace and strength (Childe). But the analogy to Tuscan is closer still in the parallelism of the modification of Sanskrit words, used in Pali, to that of Latin words used in Italian.

Robert Knox does not apparently know by that name the Pali language in Ceylon. He only speaks of the Books of Religion as 'being in an elegant style which the Vulpian people do not understand' (p. 75); and in another passage says: 'They have a language something differing from the vulgar tongue (like Latin to us) which their books are writ in' (p. 109).

1690.—'... this Doubt proceeds from the Sanszer understanding two Languages, viz., the Vulgar, which is a simple Tongue, consisting almost wholly of Monosyllables, without Conjugation or Declension; and another Language, which I have already spoken of, which to them is a dead Tongue, known only by the Learned, which is called the Balie Tongue, and which is enrich'd with the inventions of words, like the Languages we have in Europe. The terms of Religion and Justice, the names of Offices, and all the Ornaments of the Vulgar Tongue are borow'd from the Balie.'—De la Lumière's Siam, E.T. 1693, p. 9.

1795.—'Of the ancient Pâlî, whose language constitutes at the present day the sacred text of Ava, Pegue, and Siam, as well as of several other countries eastward of the Ganges: and of their migration from India to the banks of the Cali, the Nile of Ethiopia, we have but very imperfect information. ... it has been the opinion of some of the most enlightened writers on the languages of the East, that the Pali, the sacred language of the priests of Boodh, is nearly allied to the Sanscrit of the Brahmans: and there certainly is much of that holy idiom engraven on the vulgar language of Ava, by the introduction of the Hindoo religion.'—Syme, 337-8.

1815.—"The Talapoinis ... do apply themselves in some degree to study, since according to their rules they are obliged to learn the Sackhi, which is the grammar of the Pali language or Magadhi, to read the Vini, the Padimot ... and the sermons of Godana. ... All these books are written in the Pali tongue, but the text is accompanied by a Burmese translation. They were all brought into the kingdom by a certain Brahmin from the island of Ceylon."

1857.—'Buddhists are impressed with the conviction that their sacred and classical language the Magadhi or Palli is of greater antiquity than the Sanscrit; and that it had attained also a higher state of refinement than its rival tongue had acquired. In support of this belief they adduce various arguments, which, in their judgment, are quite conclusive. They observe that the very word Pali signifies original, text, regularity; and there is scarcely a Buddhist scholar in Ceylon, who, in the discussion of this question, will not quote, with an air of triumph, their favourite verse.

Si Magadhi; sahâ bhasâ (bc.).

'There is a language which is the root; ... men and brâhmans at the commencement of the creation, who never before heard nor uttered a human accent, and even the Supreme Buddhas, spoke it; it is Magadhi.'

'This verse is a quotation from Kachchâvâ's grammar, the oldest referred to in the Pali literature of Ceylon. ... Let me, at once avow, that, exclusive of all philological considerations, I am inclined, on prima facie evidence—external as well as internal—to entertain an opinion adverse to the claims of the Buddhists on this particular point.'—George Turner, Intro. to Mahâvamsa, p. xxii.

1784.—"The spoken language of Italy was first found in a number of provincial dialects, each with its own characteristics, the Piedmontese harsh, the Neapolitan nasal, the Tuscan soft and flowing. These dialects had been rising in importance as Latin declined; the birth-time of a new literary language was imminent. Then came Dante, and choosing for his immortal Commedia the finest and most cultivated of the various variants raised it at once to the position of dignity which it still retains. Read Sanskrit for Latin, Maghadse for Tuscan, and the Three Books for the Divina Commedia, and the parallel is complete. ... Like Italian Pali is at once flowing and sonorous; it is a characteristic of both languages that nearly every word ends in a vowel, and that all harsh conjunctions are softened down by assimilation, elision, or crisis, while on the other hand both lend themselves easily to the expression of sublime and vigorous thought."—Childers, Preface to Pali Dict. pp. xiii-xiv.

PALKEE-GARRY, s. A 'palamkin-coach,' as it is termed in India; i.e. a carriage shaped somewhat like a palamkin on wheels; Hind. pālī-gārī. The word is however one formed under European influences. ["The system of conveying passengers by palkee carriages and trucks was first established between Cawnpore and Allahabad in May 1843, and extended to Allyghur in November of the same year; Delhi was included in June 1845, Agra and Meerut about the same time; the now-going line not being, however, ready till January 1846" (Carey, Good Old Days, ii. 91.).]

1878.—"The Governor-General's carriage . . . may be jostled by the hired 'palikharrass, with its two wretched ponies, rope harness, nearly naked driver, and wheels whose sinuous motions impress one with the idea that they must come off at the next revolution."—Life in the Mogul, i. 33.

This description applies rather to the cranechee (q.v.) than to the palkee-garry, which is (or used to be) seldom so sorrowfully equip'd. [Mr. Kipling's account of the Calcutta pālī gārī (Beast and Man, 192) is equally uncomplimentary.]

PALMYRA, s. The fan-palm (Borassus flabelliformis), which is very commonly cultivated in S. India and Ceylon (as it is also indeed in the Ganges valley from Farrukhabad down to the head of the Delta), and hence was called by the Portuguese por exellence, palmeira or 'the palm-tree.' Sir J. Hooker writes: "I believe this palm is nowhere wild in India; and have always suspected that it, like the tamarind, was introduced from Africa." [So Watt, Econ. Dict. i. 504.] It is an important tree in the economy of S. India, Ceylon, and parts of the Archipelago as producing jaggery (q.v.) or 'palm-sugar'; whilst the wood affords rafters and laths, and the leaf gives a material for thatch, mats, umbrellas, fans, and a substitute for paper. Its minor uses are many: indeed it is supposed to supply nearly all the wants of man, and a Tamil proverb ascribes to it 801 uses (see Ferguson's Palmyra-Palm of Ceylon, and Tennent's Ceylon, i. 111, ii. 519 seqq.; also see BRAB).

1563.—". . . A ilha de Coliño . . . ha muitas palmameras."—Garcia, ff. 65r-66.

1673.—"Their Buildings suit with the Country and State of the inhabitants, being mostly contrived for Conveniencie: the Poorer are made of Boughs and ollas of the Palmameras."—Fryer, 109.

1718.—". . . Leaves of a Tree called Palmeira."—Prop. of the Gospel in the East, iii. 55.

1756.—"The interval was planted with rows of palmira, and coco-nut trees."—Orme, ii. 90, ed. 1803.

PALMYRA POINT, n.p. Otherwise called Pt. Pedro, a corruption of the Port. Panta das Pedras, 'the rocky cape,' a name descriptive of the natural features of the coast (Tennent, ii. 555). This is the N.E. point of Ceylon, the high palmyra trees on which are conspicuous.

PALMYRAS, POINT, n.p. This is a headland on the Orissa coast, quite low, but from its prominence at the most projecting part of the combined Mahanadi and Brâhmanâ delta an important landmark, especially in former days, for ships bound from the south for the mouth of the Hoogly, all the more for the dangerous shoals off it. A point of the Mahanadi delta, 24 miles to the south-west, is called False Point, from its liability to be mistaken for P. Palmyras.

1553.—". . . a Cabo Seg'gora, a que os nossos chamam das Palmeiras por nomas que ali estarn, as quase os navegantes notam por lhes dar conhecimento da terra. E deste cabo . . . fazemos fim do Reyno Orixe."—Barros, L. ix. 1.

1598.—". . . 2 miles (Dutch) before you come to the point of Palmeiras, you shall see certaine blacke houles standing ypper a land that is higher than all the land thereabouts, and from thence to the Point it beginneth againe to be low ground and . . . you shall see some small (but not other white) sandie Downes . . . you shall finde being right against the point de Palmeiras . . . that ypper the point there is nochtree nor bush, and although it hath the name of the Point of Palm-trees, it hath notwithstanding right forth, butone Palm tree."—Linschoten, 3d Book, ch. 12.

PANCHANGAM. s. Skt. = "quinque-partite." A native almanac in S. India is called so, because it contains information on five subjects, viz. Solar Days, Lunar Days, Asterisms, Yogas, and karunas (certain astrological divisions of the days of a month). Panchanga is used also, at least by Buchanan below, for the Brahman who keeps and interprets the almanac for the villagers. [This should be Skt. panchadnya.]

1612.—"Every year they make new almanacs for the eclipses of the Sun and of the Moon, and they have a perpetual one which serves to pronounce their auguries, and this they call Panchagao."—Boto, V. vi. 4.

1651.—"The Brahmins, in order to know the good and bad days, have made certain writings after the fashion of our Almanacks, and these they call Panjangam."—Rodriges, 55. This author gives a specimen (pp. 68-69).

1580.—"No one without consulting the Panchanga, or almanac-keeper, knows when he is to perform the ceremonies of religion."—Buchanan's Memoirs, &c., i. 234.

PANDAL PENDAUL. s. A shed. Tamil. pandal, [Skt. bandh, to bind].

1651.—... it is the custom in this country when there is a Bride in the house to set up before the door certain stakes somewhat taller than a man, and these are covered with lighter sticks, on which foliage is put to make a shade. ... This arrangement is called a Pandael in the country speech."—Rodriges, 12.

1717.—"Water-Bandels, which are little sheds for the Convenience of drinking Water."—Philippe's Account, 19.

1745.—"Je suis la procession d'un pere de famille, et arrive aux sepultures, j'y vis un pandel ou tente dressee sur la fosse ou defunt; elle etait oree de branches de figier, de toiles pointees, &c. L'interieur etait garni de petites lampes allumees."—Robert's Memoires, iii. 32.

1751.—"Les gens riches font construire devant leur porte un autre pendal."—Sennert, ed. 1782, i. 134.

1590.—"I told the farmer that, as I meant to make him pay his full rent, I could not take his fowl and milk without paying for them, and that I would not enter his pandaul, because he had not paid the labourers who made it."—Letter of Sir T. Masam, in Lives, i. 283.

1714.—"There I beheld, assembled in the same pandaul, or reposing under the friendly banana-tree, the Gisoni (see PANDARÂM, s. A Hindu ascetic mendicant of the (so-called) Sudra, or even of a lower caste. A priest of the lower Hindu castes of S. India and Ceylon. Tamil, pandâram. C. P. Brown says the Pandaram is properly a Vaishnava, but, other authors apply the name to Saiva priests. [The Madras Gloss, derives the word from Skt. pându-ranga, 'white-coloured.'] Messrs. Cox and Stuart (Memoir of N. Arcot, i. 199) derive it from Skt. bhândagâra, 'a temple-treasury,' wherein were employed those who had renounced the world. "The Pandarams seem to receive numerous recruits from the Saivite Sudra castes, who choose to make a profession of piety and wander about begging. They are, in reality, very lax in their modes of life, often drinking liquor and eating animal food furnished by any respectable Sudra. They often serve in Siva temples, where they make up garlands of flowers to decorate the lingam, and blow brass trumpets when offerings are made or processions take place." (ibid.)

1711.—"... But the destruction of 50 or 60,000 pagodas worth of grain... and killing the Pandaram; these are things which make his demands really carry too much justice with them."—Letter in Wheeler, ii. 163.

1717.—"... Bramans, Pantarongal, and other holy men."—Phillips's Account, 13. The word is here in the Tamil plural.

1718.—"Abundance of Bramanes, Pantares, and Poets... flocked together."—Propyl. of the Gospel, ii. 18.

1745.—"On voit ici quelquefois les Pandarams ou Pantars qui ont été à pêcher à Bengale; quand ils retournent ils apportent avec un grand soin de l'eau de Gange dans des pots ou vases bien formés."—Norbert, Memoir, iii. 28.

c. 1760.—"The Pandarams, the Mahometan priests, and the Bramins themselves yield to the force of truth."—Grose, i. 252.

1781.—"Les Pandarons ne sont pas moins révérés que les Saintes. Ils sont de la secte de Chien, se barbouillent toute la figure, la poitrine, et les bras avec des cendres de Bronze de Vache," &c.—Souv. de 8vo., ii. 113-114.

1798.—"The other figure is of a Pandaram or Senasses, of the class of pilgrims to the various pagodas."—Perrault's View of Hindoostan, preface.

1800.—"In Chera the Pâjâris (see POOJÅREE) or priests in these temples are all Pandarams, who are the Sudras dedicated to the service of Siva's temples, &c.,&c."—Buchanan's Mysore, &c., ii. 338.

1809.—"The chief of the pagoda (Ramavaram), or Pandaram, waiting on the beach."—Lett. Valentia, i. 338.

1860.—"In the island of Nainativo, to the south-west of Jaffna, there was till recently a little temple, dedicated to the goddess Naga Tambiran, in which consecrated serpents were tenderly reared by the Pandarams, and daily fed at the expense of the worshippers."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 373.

PANDARÂNI, n. p. The name of a port of Malabar of great reputation in the Middle Ages, a name which has gone through many curious corruptions. Its position is clear enough from Varthema's statement that an uninhabited island stood opposite at three leagues distance, which must be the "Sacrifice Rock" of our charts. [The Madras Gloss, identifies it with Colam.] The name appears upon no modern map, but it still attaches to a miserable fishing village on the site, in the form Pantalâni (approx. Lat. 11° 26'), a little way north of Koilandi. It is seen below in Ibn Batuta's notice that Pandarani afforded an exceptional shelter to shipping during the S.W. monsoon. This is referred to in an interesting letter to one of the present writers from his friend Col. (now Lt.-Gen.) R. H. Sinkey, C.B., R.E., dated Madras, 13th Feb., 1881: "One very extraordinary feature on the coast is the occurrence of mud-banks in from 1 to 6 fathoms of water, which have the effect of breaking both surf and swell to such an extent that ships can run into the patches of water so sheltered at the very height of the monsoon, when the elements are raging, and not only find a perfectly still sea, but are able to land their cargoes. ... Possibly the snugness of some of the harbours frequented by the Chinese junks, such as Pandarani, may have been mostly due to banks of this kind? By the way, I suspect your 'Pandarani' was nothing but the roadstead of Coulote (Coulandi or..." Quelande of our Atlas). The Master Attendant who accompanied me, appears to have a good opinion of it as an anchorage, and as well sheltered."

[See Logan, Malabar, i. 72.]

c. 1150.—"Fandarana is a town built at the mouth of a river which comes from Manilâr (see MALABAR), where vessels from India and Sind cast anchor. The inhabitants are rich, the markets well supplied, and trade flourishing." — Edrisi, in Elliot, i. 90.

c. 1296.—"In the year (1296) it was prohibited to merchants who traded in fine or costly products with Maparâh (Malâr or Coromandel), Pêlan (i) and Pantalâma, three foreign kingdom, to export any one of them more than the value of 50,000 tog in paper money." — Chiuse Annals of the Mongol Dynasty, quoted by Pauthier, More Pol, 582.

c. 1300.—"Of the cities on the shore the first is Sindilóir, then Fâkmîr, then the country of Manjarûr, then the country of Hilli, then the country of (Fandarana)." — Rashiduddîn, in Elliot, i. 65.

c. 1321.—"And the forest in which the pepper growth extendeth for a good 18 days' journey, and in that forest there be two cities, the one whereof is called Flandrina, and the other Cingilla" (see SHINKALI). — Friar Odorè, in Cathay, etc., 15.

c. 1433.—"From Bodifatán we proceeded to Fandarana, a great and fine town with gardens and bazaars. The Musalmans there occupy three quarters, each having its mosque. ... It is at this town that the ships of China pass the winter" (i.e. the S.W. monsoon). — Ibn Batuta, iv. 55. (Compare Rotere below.)

c. 1442.—"The humble author of this narrative having received his order of dismissal departed from Calicut by sea, after having passed the port of Bendinanneh (read Bandarâm, and see MANGALORE, a) situated on the coast of Malabar, (he) reached the port of Mangalore." — Abdurrazâk, in India in Xith Cent., 20.

1503. — "Da poi feceu velo et in vn porto de dicto Re chiamato Fundarane amazormo molta gête ço artelaria et delibera-orno andare verso il regno de Cuchin. ... " — Letter of King Emanuel, p. 5.

c. 1506. — "Questo capitano si trovò nave 17 de mercadanti Mori in uno porto se chima Pandarami, e combatte con queste le quali se messino in terra; per modo che questo capitano mandò tutti li sot copani ben armadì con un tarîl de polvere per cadaun copano, e mise fuoco dentro dette navi de Mori; e tutte quelle brasilne, con tutte quelle spezierie che erano carbge per la Mecha, e s'intende ch' erano molto ricche. ... " — Leonardo Co Maser, 20-21.

1510.—"Here we remained two days, and then departed, and went to a place which is called Pandarani, distant from this one day's journey, and which is subject to the King of Calicut. This place is a wretched affair, and has no port." — Fathbura, 153.

1516.—"Further on, south south-east, is another Moorish place which is called Pandarani, in which also there are many ships." — Barbosa, 152.

In Rowlandson's Translation of the Tekint-ul-Majâhidin (Or, Transl. Fund., 1833), the name is habitually misread Fundarain for Fundaraina.

1536. — "Martim Afonso ... ran along the coast in search of the paroas, the galleys and caravels keeping the sea, and the foists hugging the shore. And one morning they came suddenly on Cunhalenmarecar with 25 paroas, which the others had sent to collect rice: and on catching sight of them as they came along the coast towards the Isles of Pandarana, Diogo de Reynoso, who was in advance of our foists, he and his brother ... and Diogo Corro ... set off to engage the Moors, who were numerous and well armed. And Cunha, when he knew it was Martin Afonso, laid all pressure on his ears to double the Point of Tinocol. ... " — Corro, iii. 775.

PANDY. s. The most current colloquial name for the Sepoy mutineer during 1857-58. The surname Pandê [Skt. Pamâ] was a very common one among the high-caste Sepoys of the Bengal army, being the title of a Jot [got, gotre] or subdivisional branch of the Brahmins of the Upper Provinces, which furnished many men to the ranks. "The first two men hung" (for mutiny) "at Barrackpore were Pandies by caste, hence all sepoys were Pandies, and ever will be so called" (Bourquier, as below).

"In the Bengal army before the Mutiny, there was a person employed in the quarter-guard to strike the gong, who was known as the gytha Pandy (M.-G. Ketting). Ghanâ, 'a gong or bell.'

1857. — "As long as I feel the entire confidence I do, that we shall triumph over this infamous combination, I cannot feel gloom. I leave this feeling to the Pandies, who have sacrificed honour and existence to the ghost of a delusion." — H. Greathed, Letters during the Siege of Delhi, 99.

... "We had not long to wait before the line of guns, howitzers, and mortar carts, chiefly drawn by elephants, soon hove in sight. . . Poor Pandy, what a pounding was in store for you! . . ."—Bourchier, Eight Months' Campaign against the Bengal Sepoy Army, 47.

PANGARĀ. PANGAIÁ, s. From the quotations, a kind of boat used on the E. coast of Africa. [Pyrrard de Laval (i. 53, Hak. Soc.) speaks of a "kind of raft called a panguaye," on which Mr. Gray comments: "As Rivara points out, Pyrrard mistakes the use of the word panguaye, or, as the Portuguese write it, pangarā, which was a small sailing canoe. . . Rivara says the word is still used in Portuguese India and Africa for a two-masted barge with lateen sails. It is mentioned in Lancaster's Voyages (Hak. Soc. pp. 5, 6, and 26), where it is described as being like a barge with one mast of coco-nut leaves. 'The barge is sowed together with the rinds of trees and pinned with wooden pinnes.' See also Alb. Comm. Hak. Soc. iii. p. 60, note; and Dr. Burnell's note to Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. p. 32, where it appears that the word is used as early as 1505, in Dom Manoel's letter."

PANGOLIN, s. This book-name for the Manis is Malay Panqaling, 'the creature that rolls itself up.' [Scott says: "The Malay word is peng-galing, transcribed also peng-galing; Katingan penggiling. It means 'roller,' or, more literally, 'roll up.' The word is formed from galing, 'roll, wrap,' with the denominative prefix pe-, which takes before g the form pens." Mr. Skeat remarks that the modern Malay form is teng-giling or songgiling, but the latter seems to be used, not for the Manis, but for a kind of centipede which rolls itself up. "The word pangolin, to judge by its form, should be derived from galing, which means to 'roll over and over.' The word penggiling or peng-galing in the required sense of Manis, does not exist in standard Malay. The word was either derived from some out-of-the-way dialect, or was due to some misunderstanding on the part of the Europeans who first adopted it." Its use in English begins with Pennant (Synopsis of Quadrupeds, 1771, p. 329). Adam Burt gives a dissection of the animal in Asiat. Res. ii. 353 seqq.] It is the Manis pentadactyla of Linn.; called in Hind. bajjikot (i. e. Skt. vajra-kivita 'adamant reptile').

We have sometimes thought that the Manis might have been the creature which was shown as a gold-digging ant (see Busbeck below); was not this also the creature that Bertrand de la Brosquiére met with in the desert of Gaza? When pursued, "it began to cry like a cat at the approach of a dog. Pierre de la Vaudri struck it on the back with the point of his sword, but it did no harm, from being covered with scales like a sturgeon," A.D.1432. (T. Wright's Early Travels in Palestine, p. 290) (Bohn). It is remarkable to find the statement that these ants were found in the possession of the King of Persia recurring in Herodotus and in Busbeck, with an interval of nearly 2000 years! We see that the suggestion of the Manis being the gold-digging ant has been anticipated by Mr. Blakesley in his Herodotus. ["It is now understood that the gold-digging ants were neither, as anciently supposed, an extraordinary kind of real ants, nor, as many learned men have since supposed, large animals, mistaken for ants, but Tibetan miners, who, like their descendants of the..."
PANICALE. s. This is mentioned by Bluteau (vi. 223) as an Indian disease, a swelling of the feet. Cidi is here probably the Tamil kili, 'leg.' {Anaikkl is the Tamil name for what is commonly called Cochin Leg.}

PANIKAR. PANYCA. &c., s. Malayal. payikan, 'a fencing-master, a teacher'; [Mal. payi, 'work, karam, 'doer';] but at present it more usually means 'an astrologer.'

1518. "And there are very skilful men who teach this art (fencing), and they are called Panicars."—Barbois, 128.

1533. "And when (the Naire) comes to the age of 7 years he is obliged to go to the fencing-school, the master of which (whom they call Panical) they regard as a father, on account of the instruction he gives them."—Barros, l. i. x. 3.

PANTHAY. PANTHE. s. This is the name of applied late years in Burma, and in intelligence coming from the side of Burma, to the Mahommedans of Yunnan, who established a brief independence at Talith, between 1867 and 1873. The origin of the name is exceedingly obscure. It is not, as Mr. Baber assures us, used or known in Yunnan itself (i.e. by the Chinese). It must be remarked that the usual Burmese name for a Mahommedan is Pathi, and one would have been inclined to suppose Panthie to be a form of the same; as indeed we see that Gen. Frythe has stated it to be (Burma, Past and Present, ii. 297-8). But Sir Arthur Phayre, a high authority, in a note with which he has favoured us, observes: 'Panthé. I believe, comes from a Chinese word signifying 'native or indigenous.' It is quite a modern name in Burma, and is applied exclusively to the Chinese Mahommedans who come with caravans from Yunnan. I am not aware that they can be distinguished from other Chinese caravan traders, except that they do not bring hams for salt as the others do. In dress and appearance, as well as in drinking samshin (see SAMSHOO) and gambling, they are like the others. The word Pathí again is the old Burmese word for 'Mahommedan.' It is applied to all Mahommedans other than the Chinese Pantie. It is in no way connected with the latter word, but is, I believe, a corruption of Parsi or Parsi, i.e. Persian." He adds:—"The Burmese call their own indigenous Mahommedans 'Pathí-Kulá,' and Hindus 'Hindu-Kulá,' when they wish to distinguish between the two" (see KULA). The last suggestion is highly probable, and greatly to be preferred to that of M. Jacquet, who supposed that the word might be taken from Paséi in Sumatra, which was during part of the later Middle Ages a kind of metropolis of Islam, in the Eastern Seas.*

We may mention two possible origins for Panthie, as indicating lines for enquiry:—

* See Journal As., Ser. II., tom. viii. 352.
a. The title Pathi (or Passi, for the former is only the Burmese lisping utterance) is very old. In the remarkable Chinese Account of Camboja, dating from the year 1296, which has been translated by Abel-Rémusat, there is a notice of a sect in Camboja called Pa-see. The author identifies them in a passing way, with the Tuo-see, but that is a term which Far-hian also in India uses in a vague way, apparently quite inapplicable to the Chinese sect properly so called. These Pa-see, the Chinese writer says, "wear a red or white cloth on their heads, like the head-dress of Tartar women, but not so high. They have edifices or towers, monasteries, and temples, but not to be compared for magnitude with those of the Buddhists. . . . In their temples there are no images . . . they are allowed to cover their towers and their buildings with tiles. The Pa-see never eat with a stranger to their sect, and do not allow themselves to be seen eating; they drink no wine." &c. (Rémusat, Nouv. Méd. As., i. 112). We cannot be quite sure that this applies to Mahommedans, but it is on the whole probable that the name is the same as the Pathi of the Burmese, and has the same application. Now the people from whom the Burmese were likely to adopt a name for the Yunnan Mahommedans are the Shans, belonging to the great Siamese race, who occupy the intermediate country. The question occurs:—Is Pante a Shan term for Mahommedan? If so, is it not probably only a dialectic variation of the Pa-soe of Camboja, the Pathi of Burma, but entering Burma from a new quarter, and with its identity thus disguised? (Cushing, in his Shan Dict. gives Passi for Mahommedan. We do not find Pante). There would be many analogies to such a course of things.

["The name Panthay is a purely Burmese word, and has been adopted by us from them. The Shan word Fang-hse is identical, and gives us no help to the origin of the term. Among themselves and to the Chinese they are known as Hui-hoi or Hui-tzu (Mahommedans)."—J. G. Scott, Geogr. Upper Burma, p. 1. 609.]

b. We find it stated in Lieut. Garnier's narrative of his great expedition to Yunnan that there is a hybrid Chinese race occupying part of the plain of Tali-fu, who are called Pen-ti (see Garnier, Voy. d'Expk. i. 518). This name again, it has been suggested, may possibly have to do with Panthay. But we find that Pen-ši ("root-soil") is a generic expression used in various parts of S. China for "aborigines"; it could hardly then have been applied to the Mahommedans.

PANWELL, n.p. This town on the mainland opposite Bombay was in pre-railway times a usual landing-place on the way to Poona, and the English form of the name must have struck many besides ourselves. [Hamilton (Desc. ii. 151) says it stands on the river Pen, whence perhaps the name]. We do not know the correct form; but this one has substantially come down to us from the Portuguese: e.g.

1644.—"This island of Caranja is quite near, almost frontier-place, to six cities of the Moors of the Kingdom of the Moligne, viz. Carnell, Drego, Pene, Sabago, Abita, and Panwel."—Bowen, MS. f. 227.

1804.—"P.S. Tell Mrs. Waring that notwithstanding the debate at dinner, and her recommendation, we propose to go to Bombay, by Panwell, and in the balloon!"—Willington, from "Candolla," March 8.

PAPAYA, PAPAW, s. This word seems to be from America like the insidp, not to say nasty, fruit which it denotes (Curica papaya, L.). A quotation below indicates that it came by way of the Philippines and Malagasy. [The Malay name, according to Mr. Skeat, is betit, which comes from the same Ar. form as pateca, though the papa and kapeya have been introduced by Europeans.] Though of little esteem, and though the tree's peculiar quality of rendering fresh meat tender which is familiar in the W. Indies, is little known or taken advantage of, the tree is found in gardens and compounds all over India, as far north as Delhi. In the N.W. Provinces it is called by the native gardeners gruniand-keheriji, 'castor-oil-tree-melon,' no doubt from the superficial resemblance of its foliage to that of the Palma Christi. According to Moodeen Sheriff it has a Perso-Arabic name 'aabah-i-Hindi; in Canareese it is called 'Parangi-haqqu or -mara ("Frank or Portuguese fruit, tree"). The name papa according to Oviedo as quoted by Littré ("Oriole, t. 1, p. 333, Madrid, 1851").—we cannot find it in Ramusio) was that used in Cuba, whilst the Carib name was abahai.* [Mr. J. Platt, referring to his article in 9th Ser. Notes & Queries, iv. 515, writes: "Malay papaya, like the Accra term epalpaj, is a European loan word. The evidence for Carib origin is, firstly, Oviedo's Historia, 1535 (in the ed. of 1851, vol. i. 323): 'Del arbol que en esta isla Española llaman pipayga, y en la tierra firme los españoles los españoles los higos del maestrazgo, y en la provincia de Nicaragua llaman a tal arbol olcoton.' Secondly, Breton, Dictionnaire Caribe, has: 'Abahai, papayer.' Gili, Saggio, 1752, iii. 146 (quoted in N. & Q. a. s.), says the Otamic word is pappati.] Strange liberties are taken with the spelling. Mr. Robinson (below) calls it pappai; Sir L. Pelly (J.R.G.S. xxxv. 232), pappoi (♂ πάπποι). Papaya is applied in the Philippines to Europeans who, by long residence, have fallen into native ways and ideas.

PAPUA, n.p. This name, which is now applied generically to the chief race of the island of New Guinea and resembling tribes, and sometimes (improperly) to the great island itself, is a Malay word pawpawed, or sometimes pawak-pawak, meaning 'trizzle-haired,' and was applied by the Malays to the people in question.

1523.—"And as the wind fell at night the vessel was carried in among the islands, where there are strong currents, and got into the Sea of the Strait of Macalhae, where he encountered a great storm, so that but for God's mercy they had all been lost, and so they were driven on till they made the land of the Papuas, and then the east winds began to blow so that they could not sail to the Moluccas till May 1527. And with their stay in these lands much people got ill and many died, so that they came to Molucca much shattered."—Cervin. iii. 173-174.

PARABYKE. s. Burmese pâra-beik; the name given to a species of writing book which is commonly used in Burma. It consists of paper made from the bark of a spec. of diaphane, which is agglutinated into a kind of paste-board and blackened with a paste of charcoal. It is then folded, screen-fashion, into a note-book and written on with a stout pencils. The same mode of writing has long been used in Canara: and from La Loubere we see ..."—E fay dois ao pâlâm de extremo de Magú-llas. I cannot explain the use of this name. It must be applied here to the Sea between Banda and Timor.
that it is or was used also in Siam. The Canara books are called kudattum, and are described by Col. Wilks under the name of cuddattum, currattum, or currut (Hist. Sketches, Pref. 1. xii.). They appear exactly to resemble the Burmese para-beik, except that the substance blackened is cotton cloth instead of paper. "The writing is similar to that on a slate, and may be in like manner rubbed out and renewed. It is performed by a pencil of the balapum [Can. balapa] or lapis olbaris; and this mode of writing was not only in ancient use for records and public documents, but is still universally employed in Mysoor by merchants and shopkeepers, I have even seen a bond, regularly witnessed, entered in the cuddattum of a merchant, produced and received in evidence.

"This is the word kirret, translated 'palm-leaf' (of course conjecturally) in Mr. Crisp's translation of Tippoo's regulations. The Sultan prohibited its use in recording the public accounts; but although liable to be expunged, and affording facility to permanent entries, it is much more durable material and record than the best writing on the best paper. . . . It is probable that this is the linen or cotton cloth described by Arrian, from Nearchus, on which the Indians wrote." (Strabo, XV. i. 67.)

1688.—"The Siamese make Paper of old Cotton rags, and likewise of the bark of a Tree named Pan crui . . . but these Papers have a great deal less Equality, Body and Whiteness than ours. The Siamese cease not to write thereon with China Ink. Yet most frequently they black them, which renders them smoother, and gives them a greater body: and then they write thereon with a kind of Crayon, which is made only of a clayish earth dry'd in the Sun. Their Books are not bound, and consist only in a very long Leaf . . . which they fold in and out like a Pan, and the way which the Lines are wrote is according to the length of the Folio. . . ."—De la Lande, Siam, E.T. p. 12.

1855.—"Booths for similar goods are arrayed against the corner of the palace palisades, and at the very gate of the Palace is the principal mart for the stationers who deal in the para-beiks (or black books) and stentive pencils, which form the only ordinary writing materials of the Burmese in their transactions."—Yule, Mission to Ava, 139.

PARANGHEE, s. An obstinate chronic disease endemic in Ceylon. It has a superficial resemblance to syphilis; the whole body being covered with ulcers, while the sufferer rapidly declines in strength. It seems to arise from insufficient diet, and to be analogous to the pellagra which causes havoc among the peasants of S. Europe. The word is apparently firinghee, 'European', or (in S. India) 'Portuguese'; and this would point perhaps to association with syphilis.

PARBUTTY, s. This is a name in parts of the Madras Presidency for a subordinate village officer, a writer under the patel, sometimes the village-crier, &c., also in some places a superintendent or manager. It is a corruption of Teling and Canarese parpuratty, pāpuratti, Mahr. and Konkani, pāpurpāta, from Skt. prāpptī, 'employment.' The term frequently occurs in old Port. documents in such forms as perpati, &c. We presume that the Great Duke (andax omnia perperi) has used it in the Anglicised form at the head of this article; for though we cannot find it in his Despatches, Gurwood's Explanation of Indian Terms gives "Parbutty, writer to the Patell." [See below.]

1597.—". . . That no unbeliever shall serve as scrivener. shroff (accomptant), mooldtum, naique (see NAIK), peon, parpatrim, collector (scrivador), constable (i. e. writer), interpreter, procurator, or solicitor in court, nor in any other office or charge by which they may in any way whatever exercise authority over Christians."—Decree 27 of the Sacred Council of Goa, in Arch. Port. Orient. fasc. 4.

1800.—"In case of failure in the payment of these instalments, the crops are seized, and sold by the Parbutty or accompani of the division."—Buchanan's Mysore, i. 151-2. The word is elsewhere explained by Buchanan, as "the head person of a Hobly in Mysore." A Hobly [Canarese and Malayal, hobbli] is a sub-division of a talook (i. e. 270)." (1803.—"Neither has any one a right to compel any of the inhabitants, much less the particular servants of the government, to attend him about the country, as the Soubadar (see SOUBADAR) obliged the parbutty and pated (see PATEL) to do, running before his horse."—Wellington, Desp. i. 323. (Staif. Dict.)."

PARDAO, s. This was the popular name among the Portuguese of a gold coin from the native mints of Western India, which entered largely into the early currency of Goa, and the name of which afterwards attached to a silver money of their own coinage, of constantly degenerating value.

There could hardly be a better word with which to associate some connected account of the coinage of Portuguese India, as the pardao runs through its whole history, and I give some space to the subject, not with any idea of weaving such a history, but in order to furnish a few connected notes on the subject, and to correct some flagrant errors of writers to whose works I naturally turned for help in such a special matter, with little result except that of being puzzled and misled, and having time occupied in satisfying myself regarding the errors alluded to. The subject is in itself a very difficult one, perplexed as it is by the rarity or inaccessibility of books dealing with it, by the excessive rarity (it would seem) of specimens, by the large use in the Portuguese settlements of a variety of native coins in addition to those from the Goa mint,* by the frequent shifting of nomenclature in the higher coins and constant degeneration of value in the coins that retained old names. I welcomed as a hopeful aid the appearance of Dr. Gerson D'Acunha's Contributions to the Study of Indo-Chinese Numismatics. But though these contributions afford some useful facts and references, on the whole, from the rarity with which they give data for the intrinsic value of the gold and silver coins, and from other defects, they seem to me to leave the subject in utter chaos. Nor are the notes which Mr. W. de G. Birch appends, in regard to monetary values, to his translation of Albuquerque, more to be commended. Indeed Dr. D'Acunha, when he goes astray, seems sometimes to have followed Mr. Birch.

The word pardao is a Portuguese (or perhaps an indigenous) corruption of Skt. pratāpa, 'splendour, majesty,' &c., and was no doubt taken, as Dr. D'Acunha says, from the legend on some of the coins to which the name was applied, e.g. that of the Raja of Ikkeri in Canara: Sri Pratāpa kṛishṇa-rāya.

A little doubt arises at first in determining to what coin the name pardao was originally attached. For in the two earliest occurrences of the word that we can quote—on the one hand Abdurrazzak, the Envoy of Shāh Rukh, makes the pardah (or pardao) half of the Varāha ('boar,' so called from the Boar of Vishnu figured on some issues), hān, or what we call pagoda;—whilst on the other hand, Ludovico Varthema's account seems to identify the pardao with the pagoda itself. And there can be no doubt that it was to the pagoda that the Portuguese, from the beginning of the 16th century, applied the name of pardao d'ouro. The money-tables which can be directly formed from the statements of Abdurrazzak and Varthema respectively are as follows: *

ABDURRAZZAK (A.D. 1443).

| 3 Jitala (copper) | = 1 Tar (silver) |
| 6 Tars | = 1 Fanam (gold) |
| 10 Fanams | = 1 Partāb. |
| 2 Partābs | = 1 Varāha. |

And the Varāha weighed about 1 Mithkāl (see MISCALL), equivalent to 2 dinārs Kupki.

VARTHENA (A.D. 1504-5).

| 16 Cas (see CASH) | = 1 Tare (silver) |
| 16 Tare | = 1 Fanam (gold) |
| 20 Fanams | = 1 Pardao. |

And the Pardao was a gold ducat, smaller than the seraphim (see XERAFINE) of Cairo (gold dinár), but thicker.

The question arises whether the varāha of Abdurrazzak was the double pagoda, of which there are some examples in the S. Indian coinage, and his pardah therefore the same as Varthema's, i.e. the pagoda itself; or whether his varāha was the pagoda, and his pardah a half-pagoda. The weight which he assigns to the varāha, "about one mithkāl," a weight which may be taken at 73 grs., does not well suit either one or the other. I find the mean weight of 27 different issues of the (single) hān or pagoda, given in Prinsep's Table, to be 43 grs.,

* Antonio Nunez, "Comitador da Casa del Rey dos Seiros," who in 1534 compiled the Libro dos Precios de Venda e asay Medidas e Moedas, says of Goa in particular:

> "The moneys here exhibit such variations and such differences, that it is impossible to write any thing certain about them: for every month, every 3 days indeed, they rise and fall in value, according to the money that enters the place." (p. 25).

* I invert the similar table given by Dr. Badger in his notes to Varthema.
maximum being 45 grs. And the fact that both the Envoy's varaha and the Italian traveller's pardao contain 20 fanams is a strong argument for their identity.*

In further illustration that the pardao was recognised as a half hán or pagoda, we quote in a foot-note the old arithmetical tables in which accounts are still kept, in the south, which Sir Walter Elliot contributed to Mr. E. Thomas's excellent Chronicles of the Pathan Kings of Delhi, illustrated, &c.

Moreover, Dr. D'Acunha states that in the "New Conquests," or provinces annexed to Goa only about 100 years ago, the accounts were kept until lately in savoy and nizane pagodas, each of them being divided into 2 pratâps... &c. (p. 46, note).

As regards the value of the pardao d'ouro, when adopted into the Goa currency by Alboquerque, Dr. D'Acunha tells us that it was equivalent to 370 reis, or 1s. 6d. English. Yet he accepts the identity of this pardao d'ouro with the hán current in Western India, of which the Madras pagoda was till 1818 a living and unchanged representative, a coin which was, at the time of its abolition, the recognised equivalent of 3½ rupees, or 7 shillings. And doubtless this, or a few pence more, was the intrinsic value of the pardao. Dr. D'Acunha in fact has made his calculation from the present value of the rei. Seeing that a milrô is now reckoned equal to a dollar, or 50d, we have a single rei = 3½d, and 370 reis = 1s. 6d. It seems not to have occurred to the author that the rei might have degenerated in value as well as every other denomination of money with which he has to do, every other in fact of which we can at this moment remember anything, except the pagoda, the Venetian sequin, and the dollar. Yet the fact of this degeneration everywhere strikes him in the face. Corrêa tells us that the cruzado which Alboquerque struck in 1510 was the just equivalent of 420 reis. It was indubitably the same as the cruzado of the mother country, and indeed A. Nunez (1554) gives the same 420 reis as the equivalent of the cruzado d'ouro of Portugal, and that amount also for the Venetian sequin, and for the sultan or Egyptian gold dinár. Nunez adds that a gold coin of Cambay, which he calls Madrâfaxâo (q.v.), was worth 1280 to 1440 reis, according to variations in weight and purity. We have seen that this must have been the gold-mohr of Muzaffar-Shâh II. of Gzerat (1511-1526), the weight of which we learn from E. Thomas's book.

From the Venetian sequin (content of pure gold 52:27 grs. value 11d.), the value of the rei at \(1\frac{3}{4}\) d. will be...

From the Muzaffar-Shâh mohr (weight 185 grs. value, if pure gold, 392:52d.) the value of rei at 140...

Mean value of rei in 1533... 0:273d. - i.e. more than five times its present value.

Dr. D'Acunha himself informs us (p. 56) that at the beginning of the 17th century the Venetian was worth 690 to 720 reis (mean 705 reis), whilst

* Even the pound sterling, since it represented a pound of silver sterlings, has come down to one third of that value; but if the value of silver goes on dwindling as it has done lately, our pound might yet justify its name again!

I have remarked elsewhere:

"Everybody seems to be tickled at the notion that the Scotch Pound or Livre was only 20 pence. Nobody finds it funny that the French or Italian Livre or Pound is only 20 halfpence or less!" I have not been able to trace how high the rei began, but the monedâl entered life as a gold piece equivalent to the Sucem with 7½%, and ends with...

† I calculate all gold values in this paper as those of the present English coinage.

Besides the gradual depreciation of the Portuguese rei, so prominently noticed in this paper, there was introduced in Goa a coin of the value of 1½ cruzados. This coin is reckoned to the east in Portugal in the ratio of 15 to 8, do not know the history or understand the object of such a change, nor do I see that it affects the argument in this article. By a table of values of coins current in Portuguese India, given in the Anuara Marítimas of 1844, each coin is valued both in Reis of Goa and in Reis of Portugal, bearing the above ratio. My kind correspondent, Dr. J. Fonseca, author of the capital History of Goa, tells me that this was introduced in the beginning of the 17th century, but that he has not found a document throwing light upon it. It is a quite apart from the secular depreciation of the rei.

These statements, as we know the intrinsic value of the sequin, and the approximate value of the pardao, enable us to calculate the value of the rei of about 1600 at ... 0.16d. Values of the milreis given in Millburn's Oriental Commerce, and in Kelly's Comبات, enable us to estimate it for the early years of the last century. We have then the progressive deterioration as follows:

Value of rei in the beginning of the 16th century ... 0.208d.
Value of rei in the beginning of the 17th century ... 0.16d.
Value of rei in the beginning of the 19th century ... 0.90 to 0.96d.
Value of rei at present ... 0.06d.

Yet Dr. D'Acunha has valued the coins of 1510, estimated in reis, at the rate of 1880. And Mr. Birch has done the same.*

The Portuguese themselves do not seem ever to have struck gold pardaos or pagodas. The gold coin of Alboquerque's coinage (1510) was, we have seen, a cruzado (or monte1), and the next coinage in gold was by Garcia de She in 1548-9, who issued coins called Sen Thome, worth 1000 reis, say about £1, 2s. 4d.; with halves and quarters of the same. Neither, according to D'Acunha, was there silver money of any importance coined at Goa from 1510 to 1550, and the coins then issued were silver San Thomeus, called also

* This Alboquerque, returning to Europe in 1504, gave a 'Moorsish' pilot, who carried him by a new course straight from Camanage to Mozambique, a part of these coins; this is explained as £3—a mild mifudcurrence for such a feat. In truth it was nearly £24, the cruzado being about the same as the sequin (see I. p. 17).

The mint at Goa was carried on by the same great man, after the conquest, for 60,000 reis. Amounting, we are told, to £125. It was really £207 (Ih. 41).

Alboquerque demands as ransom to spare Muscat '10,000 sequins of gold.' And we are told by the translator that this ransom of a wealthy trading city like Muscat amounted to £25. The coin in question is the sequin or gold dhur, as much as 600,000 of these in value, and the sum more than £600,000 per cent.

In the note to the first of these cases it is said that the cruzado is a silver coin (formerly gold), and known as a faz. It is questionable how much money, but probably worth much more relatively in the time of Alboquerque— "Much more relatively means of course that the coin had much more purchases generally applied. It is a very common way of speaking, but it is often very fallaciously applied. The character in purchasing power in India generally till the present time has been probably not very great. There is a curious note by Prof. Briggs in his translation of Firishta, comparing the amount patavinae (see PATACA)." Nunez in his Tables (1554) does not mention these by either name, but mentions repeatedly pardaus, which represented 5 silver tanguis, or 300 reis, and these D'Acunha speaks of as silver coins. Nunez, as far as I can make out, does not speak of them as coins, but rather implies that in account so many tanguis of silver were reckoned as a pardao. Later in the century, however, we learn from Balli (1580), Barrett (1584), and Linschoten (1583-9), the principal currency of Goa consisted of a silver coin called xeratifin (see XERAFINE) and pardao-xeratifin, which was worth 5 tanguis, each of 60 reis. So these had been from the beginning, and so they continued, as is usual in such cases. The scale of sub-multiples remains the same, whilst the value of the divisible coin diminishes. Eventually the lower denominations become infinitesimal, like the maravedis and the rei, and either vanish from memory, or survive only as denominations of account). The data, such as they are, allow us to calculate the pardao or xeratifin at this time as worth 4. 2d. to 4s. 6d.

A century later, Fryer's statement of equivalents (1676) enables us to use the stability of the Venetian sequin as a gauge: we then find the tanga gone down to 6d. and the pardao or xeratifin to 2s. 6d. Thirty years later Lockyer (1711) tells us that one rupee was reckoned equal to 1/12 pardao. Calculated by Firishta to have been paid by the Bahmani Khans, about c. 1470, as the annual cost of a body of 500 horse, with the cost of a British corps of irregular horse of the same strength in bridges —own time (say about 1510) the Bahmani charge was 250,000 Rs. the British charge 21,000 Rs. A corps of the same strength would now cost the British Government, as near as I can calculate, 257,500 Rs.

The price of an Arab horse imported into India (then a great traffic) was in Marco Polo's time about three times what it was in our own, up to 1850.

The salary of the Governor at Goa, c. 1570, was 3000 rupees, or nearly £800 a year; and the salaries of the commandants of the fortresses of Goa, of Malacca, of Pergo, and of Algiers, 50,000 reis, or about £250.

The salary of the Baillie, when judge of Delhi, about 1840, was 20,000 rupees, or about 800 Rs. as he calls it practically for six months, which was in addition to an assessment of 1600 rupees being, in the years after, frequently increased. His duties in a very few years to the time of 50,000 tankas was £6,000.

* Dr. D'Acunha has set this English traveller down to 18th, and introduces a quotation from him in illustration of the change of the latter period, in his quasibiographical notes, a new element in the confusion of his readers.
ing the Surat Rupee, which may have been probably his standard, still by help of the Venetian (p. 262) at about 2s. 3d., the pardao would at this time be worth 1s. 6d. It must have depre-ciated still further by 1728, when the Goa mint began to strike rupees, with the effigy of Dom João V., and the half-rupee appropriated the deno-mination of pardao. And the half-rupee, till our own time, has continued to be so styled. I have found no later valua-tion of the Goa Rupee than that in Princep's Tables (Thomas's ed. p. 55), the indications of which, taking the Company's Rupee at 2s., would make it 21d. The pardao therefore would represent a value of 10½d., and there we leave it.

[On this Mr. Whiteway writes: "Should it be intended to add a note to this, I would suggest that the remarks on coinage commencing at page 67 of my Rise of the Portuguese Power in India be examined, as although I have gone to Sir H. Yule for much, some papers are now accessible which he does not appear to have seen. There were two pardais, the pardão d'ouro and the pardão de tanga, the former of 360 reis, the latter of 300. This is clear from the Ford of Goa of Dec. 18, 1758 (India Office MSS. Conselho Ultramarinico), which passage is again quoted in a note to Fasc. 5 of the Archiv. Port. Orient. p. 326. Apparently patecoons were originally coined in value equal to the pardão d'ouro, though I say (p. 71) their value is not recorded. The patecoon was a silver coin, and when it was tampered with, it still remained of the nominal value of the pardão d'ouro, and this was the cause of the outcry and of the injury the people of Goa suffered. There were monies in Goa which I have not shown on p. 69. There was the tanga branca used in revenue accounts (see Nunez, p. 31), nearly but not quite double the ordinary tanga. This money of account was of 4 bazarinos (see Bargany) each of 24 bazarinos (see Budgrook), that is rather over 111 reals. The whole question of coinage is difficult, because the coins were continually being tampered with. Every ruler, and they were numerous in those days, stamped a piece of metal at his pleasure, and the trader had to calculate its value, unless as a subject of the ruler he was under compulsion."

144. — "In this country (Vijayanagar) they have three kinds of money, made of gold, silver, and copper: one coin called sahabah weighs about one milhão, equivalent to two dinars koppik; the second, which is called pertab, is the half of the first; the third, called fajom, is equivalent in value to the tenth part of the last-mentioned coin. Of these different coins the fajom is the most useful. . . ."—Abdallrazzãd, in India in the Xvth Cent. p. 26.

c. 1504-5; pubd. 1510. — "I departed from the city of Dabulii aforesaid, and went to another island, which . . . is called Goa (India) and which pays annually to the King of Decan 19,000 gold ducats, called by them pardai. These pardai are smaller than the seraphim of Cairo, but thicker, and have two devils stamped on one side, and certain letters on the other."—Varthema, pp. 115-116.

". . . his money consists of a pardão, as I have said. He also coins a silver money called tare (see TARA), and others of gold, twenty of which go to a pardão, and are called fajom. And of these small ones of silver, there go sixteen to a fajom. . . ."—Ibid. p. 139.

1510. — "Meanwhile the Governor (Albo-querque) talked with certain of our people about his affairs, and promised him all alla-gation of gold and silver, and also with goldsmiths and money-changers of the country who were well acquainted with that business. There were in the country pardais of gold, worth in gold 360 reis, and also a money of silver which they call bargaun (see BARGANY) of the value of 2 vintens, and a money of copper which they call bazaures (see BUDGROOK), of the value of 2 reis. Now all these the Governor sent to have weighed and assayed. And he cauused to be made cruzados of their proper weight of 420 reis, on which he figured on one side the cross of Christ, and on the other a sphere, which was the device of the King Dom Manuel; and he ordered that this cruzado should pass in the place (Goa) for 480 reis, to prevent their being exported . . . and he ordered silver money to be struck which was of the value of a bargaun; on this money he caused to be figured on one side a Greek A, and on the other side a sphere, and gave the coin the name of Espera; it was worth 2 vintens, also there were half esperas worth one vinten; and he made bazaures of copper of the weight belonging to that coin, with the A and the sphere; and each bazaun he divided into 4 coins which they called especúns (see SAPECA), and gave the bazaures the name of half especúns. And in chang-ing the cruzado into these smaller coins I was reckoned at 480 reis."—Costa, ii. 76-77.

1516. — "There are current here in Batia-cala—see BATCUL, the pardao, which ar a gold coin of the kingdom, and it is worth here 360 reis, and there is another coin of silver, called doama, which is worth 20 reis . . . ."—Bartolom, Lisbon ed. p. 283.
1536.—"There is used in this city (Bisnagar) and throughout the rest of the Kingdom much pepper, which is carried both from Malabar on oxen and asses; and it is all bought and sold for pardaos, which are made in some places of this Kingdom, and especially in a city called Hora (4), whence they are called horbos. —Barbont, Lisbon ed. p. 297.

R. Let us mount our horses and take a ride in the country, and as we ride you shall tell me what is the meaning of Nizamulu (see NIZAMALUCO), as you have frequently mentioned such a person.

1554.—"For the money of Goa there is a kind of money made of lead and tin mingled, being thick and round, and stamped on the one side with the sphere or globe of the world, and on the other side two arrows and five round (read of silver), and this kind of money is called Basarucchi; and 15 of them make a vintor of naughty money, and 5 viobus make a tanga, and 4 richly of the same kind of money make a tanga of base money; and 5 tangas make a seraphine of good (read of silver), which in merchandise is worth 5 tangas good money: but if one would change them into basarucchis, he may have 5 tangas, and 16 basaruchies, which matter they call ceripigyn, and when the bargain of the pardaw is gold, each pardaw is meant to be 5 tangas good money, but in merchandise, the use is not to demand pardaves of good money, except it be for jewels and horses, for all the rest they take of seraphines of silver, per aduso. . . The ducat of gold is worth 9 tangas and a half good money, and yet not stable in price, for that when the ships depart from Goa to Cochín, they pay them at 9 tangas and 3 fourth parties, and 10 tangas, and that is the most that they are worth. . ."—W. Barret, in Hakl. ii. 410. I retain this for the old English, but I am sorry to say that I find it is a mere translation of the notes of Gaspar Balbi, who was at Goa in 1580. We learn from Balbi that there were at Goa tangas not only of good money worth 75 basaruchies, and of bad money worth 90 basaruchies, but also of another kind of bad money used in buying wood, worth only 50 basaruchies.

1585.—"The principall and commonest money is called Pardaus Xeraphins, and is silver, but very brasse (read base), and is coined in Goa. They have Saint Sebastian on the one side, and three or four arrows in a bundle on the other side, which is as much as three Tostor, of ethyriunnoit, or Reis Portingall money, and riseth or falleth little lesse or more, according to the exchange. There is also a kind of money which is called Tangas, not that there is any such coined, but are so named only in telling, five Tangas is one Pardaw or Xeraphin, badde money, for you must understand that in telling they have two kinds of money, good and badde. . . Therefore when they buy and sell, they bargain for bad money, and such, Linschoten, ch. 35; [Hak. Soc. i. 241, and for another version see XERAPHINE].

. . . They have a kind of money called Pagodes which is of Gold, of two or three sorts, and are above 8 tangas in value. They are Indian and Heathenish money, with the feature of a Devil upon them, and therefore they are called Pagodes. There is another kind of gold money, which is called Cenestandere; some of Venice, and some of Turkish coinage, and are commonly worth (2) Pardawes Xeraphins. There is yet another kind of gold called S. Thomas, because Saint Thomas is figured thereon, and is worth about 7 and 8 Tangas. These are likewise RaiJles of 8 which are bought from Portingall, and are called Pardawe de Rales, . . . They are worth at their first coming out 436 Reyes of Portingall; and after are rated by exchange, as they are sought for when men travel for China. . . They use in Goa in their buying and selling a certain kind of money, called Pardawes Xeraphins. These are likewise RaiJles of 8 which are bought from Portingall, and are called Pardawe de Rales, . . . They are worth at their first coming out 436 Reyes of Portingall; and after are rated by exchange, as they are sought for when men travel for China. . . worth 50d.* The rintens and bangas that were nominally interposed were mere names for certain quantities of basaruccos, or rather of reis represented by basaruccos. And our interpretation of the statement about pariaos of gold in a note above is here expressly confirmed.

[1599.—"Perdaw." See under TEL.] c. 1620. —"The gold coin, struck by the raison of Bijanagar and Tiling, is called hau and parthab."—Freibata, quoted by Quatrocente, in Notices et Essais, xiv. 509.

1643.—"... estant convenu de prix avec luy a sept perdos et deny par mois tant pour miure que pour le logis. ..."—Moguet, 284.

PARELL. n.p. The name of a northern suburb of Bombay where stands the residence of the Governor. The statement in the Imperial Gazetteer that Mr. W. Hornby (1776) was the first Governor who took up his residence at Parel requires examination, as it appears to have been so occupied in Grose's time. The 2nd edition of Grose, which we use, is dated 1772, but he appears to have left India about 1760. It seems probable that in the following passage Niebuhr speaks of 1763-4, the date of his stay at Bombay, but as the book was not published until 1774, this is not absolutely certain. Evidently Parel was occupied by the Governor long before 1776.

"Les Jesuites avoient autrefois un beau convent aupres du Village de Parel au milieu de l'ile, mais il y a deja plusieurs annees, qu'elle est devenue la maison de campagne du Gouverneur, et l'Eglise est actuellement une magnifique salle a manger et de danse, qu'on n'en trouve point de pareille en toutes les Indes."—Niebuhr, Voyage, ii. 12.

Mr. Douglas (Bombay and W. India, ii. 7, note) writes: "High up and outside the dining-room, and which was the chapel when Parel belonged to the Jesuits, is a plaque on which is printed:—'Built by Honourable Hornby, 1771.'" 1554.—Parel is mentioned as one of 4 aldeas, "Parel, Varella, Varel, and Siva, attached to the Kashah (Carabu—see CUS-BAH) of Maim."—Botelho, Tombo, 157, in Saladia.

c. 1750-60. —"A place called Parel, where the Governor has a very agreeable country-house, which was originally a Romish chapel belonging to the Jesuits, but confiscated about the year 1719, for some foul practices against the English interest."—Grose, i. 46; [1st ed. 1757, p. 72].

PARIAH, PARRIAR, &c., s.

a. The name of a low caste of Hindus in Southern India, constituting one of the most numerous castes, if not the most numerous, in the Tamil country. The word in its present shape means properly 'a drummer.' Tamil parai is the large drum, beaten at certain festivals, and the hereditary beaters of it are called (sing.) pauriyam, (pl.) pauriyar. [Dr. Oppert's theory (Orig. Inhabitants, 32 seq.) that the word is a form of Pohariya, 'a mountaineer,' is not probable.] In the city of Madras this caste forms one fifth of the whole population, and from it come (unfortunately) most of the domestic service in European service in that part of India. As with other castes low in caste-rank they are also low in habits, frequently eating carrion and other objectionable food, and addicted to drink. From their coming into contact with and under observation of Europeans, more habitually than any similar caste, the name Pariah has come to be regarded as applicable to the whole body of the lowest castes, or even to denote outcastes or people without any caste. But this is hardly a correct use. There are several castes in the Tamil country considered to be lower than the Pariahs, e.g. the caste of shoe-makers, and the lowest caste of washermen. And the Pariah deals out the same disparaging treatment to those that he himself receives from higher castes. The Pariahs 'constitute a well-defined, distinct, ancient caste, which has 'subdivisions' of its own, its own peculiar usages, its own traditions, and its own jealousy of the encroachments of the castes which are above it and below it. They constitute, perhaps, the most numerous caste in the Tamil country. In the city of Madras they number 21 per cent. of the Hindu people."—By. Caldwell, n. i., p. 545. Sir Walter Elliot, however, in the paper referred to further on includes under the term Pauriyam all the servile class not recognised by Hindus of caste as belonging to their community.

A very interesting, though not conclusive, discussion of the ethnological position of this class will be found in Bp. Caldwell's Dravidian Grammar (pp. 540-554). That scholar's deduction is, on the whole, that they are probably Dravidians, but he states, and recognizes force in, arguments for believing that they may have descended from a race older in the country than the proper Dravidian, and reduced to slavery by the first Dravidians. This last is the view of Sir Walter Elliot, who adduces a variety of interesting facts in its favour, in his paper on the Characteristics of the Population of South India.

Thus, in the celebration of the Festival of the Village Goddess, prevalent all over Southern India, and of which a remarkable account is given in that paper, there occurs a sort of Saturm alia in which the Pariahs are the officiating priests, and there are several other customs which are most easily intelligible on the supposition that the Pariahs are the representatives of the earliest inhabitants and original masters of the soil. In a recent communication from this venerable man he writes: "My brother (Col. C. Elliot, C.B.) found them at Raipur, to be an important and respectable class of cultivators. The Pariahs have a sacerdotal order amongst themselves. [The view taken in the Madras Gloss, is that "they are distinctly Dravidian without fusion, as the Hinduized castes are Dravidian with fusion."]

The mistaken use of periah, as synonymous with out-caste, has spread in English parlance over all India. Thus the lamented Prof. Blochmann, in his School Geography of India: "Outcasts are called pariahs." The name first became generally known in Europe through Somner's Travels

*Sir W. Elliot refers to the Akka inscription (Elliot II.) as bearing Pamda or Parrea, named with Chola (or Chola), Kemla, &c., as a country or people "in the very centre of the Dravidian group... a reading which, if it holds good, supplies a satisfactory explanation of the origin of the Paria race and nation" (in J. Ethnol. Soc. N.S., 1880, p. 106). But apparently the reading has not held good, for M. S. Salet reads the name Paria (see Lod. Lit., x. 228). Mrs. V. A. Smith writes: "The Girma text is very defective in this important passage, which is not in the Dhami text; that text gives only 11 out of the 14 etheil. The capital of the Paria Kingdom was Madura. The history of the kingdom is very imperfectly known. For a discussion of it see Sroto, Lists of Antiquities, Madra, vol. ii. Of course it has nothing to do with Parias."

(pub. in 1782, and soon after translated into English). In this work the Pariahs figure as the lowest of castes. The common use of the term is however probably due, in both France and England, to the appearance in the Abbé Raynal's famous Hist. Philosophique des Etablissements dans les Indes, formerly read very widely in both countries, and yet more perhaps to its use in Bernardin de St. Pierre's preposterous though once popular tale, La Chauvière Indienne, whence too the misplaced halo of sentiment which reached its acme in the drama of Casimir Delavigne, and which still in some degree adheres to the name. It should be added that Mr. C. P. Brown says expressly: "The word Paria is unknown" (in *our sense") "to all natives, unless as learned from us."

b. See PARIAH-DOG.

*1516.—"There is another low sort of Gentiles, who live in desert places, called Pareyaes. These likewise have no dealings with anybody, and are reckoned worse than the devil, and avoided by everybody; a man becomes contaminated by only looking at them, and is excommunicated. They live on the *base (base, i.e. yams) which are like the root of roca or lattate found in the West Indies, and on other roots and wild fruits."—Bartholin, in Rerum, i. f. 310. The word in the Spanish version transl. by Lord Stanley of Alderley is Pareni, in the Portuguese of the Lisbon Academy, Parens. So we are not quite sure that Pareyaes is the proper reading, though this is probable.*

*1626.—"... The Pareyaes are of worse estate."—(W. Methew, in Purcas, Pilgrimage, 535.)

*... the worst whereof are the abhorred Pariaes... they are in publick Justice the hateful executioners, and are the basest, most stinking, ill-favored people that I have seen."—Ibid., 968-9.

1618. —"... the servants of the factory even will not touch it (beef) when they put it on the table, nevertheless there is a caste called Pareyae. (They are the most contempted of all, so that if another Gentoo touches them, he is compelled to be dipped in the water) who eat it freely."—Van de Broecke, 82.

1672.—"The Pareyaes are the basest and vilest race (accustomed to remove dung and all uncleanness, and to eat mice and rats), in a word a contempted and stinking vile people..."—Baldaeus (Germ. ed.), 410.

1711. —"The Company allow two or three Poons to attend the Gate, and a Parrear Fellow to keep all clean."—Lockyer, 20.

*... and there... is such a resort of basket-makers, Souvers, people that look after the buffaloes, and other Parriars,* to drink Toddy, that all the Punch-houses in Madras have not half the noise in them."—Wheeler, ii. 125.

1717.—"... Barrier, or a sort of poor people that eat all sorts of Flesh and other things, which others deem unclean."—Phillips, Account, &c., 127.

1726.—"As for the separate generations and sorts of people who embrace this religion, there are, according to what some folks say, only 4; but in our opinion they are 5 in number, viz.:

a. The Bramins.
b. The Settreams.
c. The Weynys or Weynysas.
d. The Sudras.
e. The Perras, whom the High-Dutch and Danes call Barriars."—Valentijn, Chro- n. 73.

1745.—"Les Parrees... are regarded comme gens de la plus vile condition, exclus de tous les honneurs et prérogatives. Jusques là qu'on ne saurait les souffrir, ni dans les Pagodes des Gentils, ni dans les Eglises des Jesuites."—Norbert, i. 71.

1750.—"K. Es est de mist von einer Kuh, denselben nehmen die Parreyer-Weiber, machen runde Kuchen daraus, und wenn sie in der Sonne genug getrocknet sind, so verkauften sie dieselben (see OOPLAH).

1770.—"The fate of these unhappy wretches who are known on the coast of Coromandel by the name of Parias, is the same even in those countries where a foreign dominion has contributed to produce some little change in the ideas of the people."—Rajoual, Hist. &c., see ed. 1783, i. 80.

1777.—"The idol is placed in the centre of the building; so that the Parias who are not admitted into the temple may have a sight of it through the gates."—Rajoual (tr. 1777), i. p. 57.

1780.—"If you should ask a common cooly, or porter, what caste he is of, he will answer, 'the same as master, pariar-cast.'"—Minor's Narrative, 28-9.

1787.—"... I cannot persuade myself that it is judicious to admit Parias into battalions with men of respectable casts. ..."—Col. Fullarton's View of English Interests in India, 222.

1791.—"Le masdaki y courut pour allumer un flambeau; mais il revient un peu après, pris d'haleine, criant: 'N'approchez pas d'ici; il y a un Paria!' Aussitôt la troupë effrayée cria: 'Un Paria! Un Paria! Le docteur, croyant que c'était quelque animal féroce, mit la main sur ses pistolets. 'Qu'est ce que qu'un Paria? demanda-t-il à son porte-flambeau.'"—Le de St. Pierre, La Chaudière Indienne, 48.

1800.—"The Pariar, and other impure tribes, comprising what are called the Puchhom Bravan, would be beaten, were they to attempt joining in a Procession of any of the gods of the Brahmins, or entering any of their temples."—Buchanan's Mysore, i. 20.

c. 1805-6.—"The Dabushes, then all powerful at Madras, threatened loss of cast and absolute destruction to any Brahmin who should dare to unveil the mysteries of their language to a Pariar Frengi. This reproach of Pariar is what we have tamely and strangely submitted to for a long time, when we thought with a great facility have assumed the respectable character of Chatriqua."—Letter of Legden, in Morton's Memoir, ed. 1819, p. lvii.

1809.—"Another great obstacle to the reception of Christianity by the Hindoos, is the admission of the Parias in our Churches...."—Ed. Valentia, i. 246.

1821.—"Il est sur ce rivage une race flétrie, Une race étrangère au sein de sa patrie. Sans abri protecteur, sans temple hospitalier, Abominable, impie, horrible au peuple entier.
Les Parias: le jour à regret les éclaire, La terre sur son sein les porte avec colère. * * * * Eh bien! mais je frémis; tu vas me faire peut-être:
Je suis un Paria...."—Casimir Delavigne, Le Paria, Acte 1. Sc. 1.

1843.—"The Christian Pariar, whom both sects curse, Does all the good he can and loves his brother."—Forster's Life of Dickens, ii. 91.

1873.—"The Tamils hire a Pariya (i.e. drummer) to perform the decapitation at their Badra Kali sacrifices."—Kittell, in Ind. Hist. ii. 170.

1875.—"L'hypothèse la plus vraisemblable, en tout cas la plus heureuse, est celle qui suppose non pas un prophète spécial de cette race (i.e. of the original race inhabiting the Deccan before contact with northern invaders) était le mot 'paria'; ce mot dont l'orthographe correcte est pariey, dérivé de pariey, 'bruit, tambour,' et à trois-bein, paur avoir le sens de 'parleur, doux de la parole'; (?)—Hocquegn and Vignon, Études de Linguistique, &c., Paris, 67.

1872.—"Fine, ordained from first to last, In body and in soul For one life-long debauch, The Pariah of the north, The European mounter."—Browning, Fine at the Fair.

Very good rhyme, but no reason. See under NAUCH.

The word seems also to have been adopted in Java, e.g.:

1890.—"We Europeans... often... stand far behind compared with the poor pariahs."—Max Havelaar, ch. vii.
PARIAH-ARRACK. s. In the 17th and 18th centuries this was a name commonly given to the poisonous native spirit commonly sold to European soldiers and sailors. [See FOOL'S RACK.]

1671-72.—"The unwholesome liquor called Parrier-arrack..."—Sir W. Langhorne, in Wheeler, iii. 422.

1711.—"The Tobacco, Beetie, and Pariar Arrack, on which such great profit arises, are all expended by the inhabitants."—Lockyer, 18.

1754.—"I should be very glad to have your order to bring the ship up to Calcutta... as... the people cannot here have the opportunity of intoxicating and killing themselves with Pariar Arrack."—In Long, 51.

PARIAH-DOG. s. The common ownerless yellow dog, that frequents all inhabited places in the East, is universally so called by Europeans, no doubt from being a low-bred casteless animal; often elliptically 'pariah' only.

1793.—"... A species of the common cur, called a pariah-dog."—Murray, Nov., p. 36.

1810.—"The nuisance may be kept circling for days, until forcibly removed, or until the pariah dogs swim in, and draw the carcass to the shore."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 261.

1824.—"The other beggar was a Pariah dog, who sneaked down in much bodily fear to our bivouque."—Ibber, ed. 1844, 1. 79.

[1883.—"Paraya Dogs are found in every street."—T. V. Rowe, Man. of Trav. Ind., 104.]

PARIAH-KITE. s. The commonest Indian kite, Milvus Gurnida, Sykes, notable for its great numbers, and its impudence. "They are excessively bold and fearless, often snatching morsels off a dish en route from kitchen to hall, and even, according to Adams, seizing a fragment from a man's very mouth" (Jerdon). Compare quotation under BRAHMINY KITE.

[1850.—"I had often supposed that the scavenger or Pariah Kites (Milvus gurnida), which though generally to be seen about the tents, are not common in the jungles, must follow the camp for long distances, and today I had evidence that such was the case."

—Bail, Jungle Life, 655.]

PARSEE. n.p. This name, which distinguishes the descendants of those emigrants of the old Persian stock, who left their native country, and retaining their Zoroastrian religion, settled in India to avoid Mahomedan persecution, is only the old form of the word for a Persian, viz., Parsi, which Arabic influences have in more modern times converted into Farsi. The Portuguese have used both Parseo and Perso. From the latter some of our old travellers have taken the form Persee; from the former doubtless we get Parsee. It is a curious example of the way in which different accidental mouldings of the same word come to denote entirely different ideas, that Persian, in this form, in Western India, means a Zoroastrian fire-worshipper, whilst Pathi (see PANTHAY), a Burmese corruption of the same word, in Burma means a Mahomedan.

c. 1328.—"There be also other pagan-folk in this India who worship fire; they bury not their dead, neither do they burn them, but cast them into the midst of a certain roofless tower, and there expose them totally uncovered to the fowls of heaven. These believe in two First Principles, to wit, of Evil and of Good, of Darkness and of Light."—Fourier Jordanas, 21.

1552.—"In any case he dismissed them with favour and hospitality, showing himself glad of the coming of such personages, and granting them protection for their ships as being (Parseos) Persians of the Kingdom of Ormuz."—Buns, i. viii. 9.

... especially after these were induced by the Persian and Guzerati Moors (Mures, Parseos e Gujarates) to be converted from heathenism (Hetôs) to the sect of Mahamed."—Ibid. ii. vi. i.

1563.—"There are other herb-sellers (farandores de hortas) called Coaris, and in the Kingdom of Cambay they call them Esparcis, and we Portuguese call them Jews, but they are not, only Hindus who come from Persia and have their own writing."—Garcia, p. 213.

1616.—"There is one sect among the Gentiles, which neither burns nor interre their dead (they are called Parseos) who incircle pieces of ground with high stone walls, remote from houses or Road-ways, and therein lay their Carcasses, wrapped in Sheets, thus having no other Tombs but the gorges of ravenous Fowles."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1479.

1630.—"Whilst my observation was bestowed on such inquiry, I observed in the town of Suratt, the place where I resided, another Sect called the Persees..."—Lord, Two Foreigne Journeys.
1633.—"Outre les Benjamins il y a encore une autre sorte de Payens dans le royaume de Gujarat, qu'ils appellent Parsois. Ce sont des Perses de Fars, et de Chorasan."—D'Anville (Paris, 1659), 213.

PASEI, PACEM. n.p. The name of a Malay State near the N.E. point of Sumatra, at one time predominant in those regions, and reckoned, with Malacca and Majapahit (the capital of the Empire of Java), the three greatest cities of the Archipelago. It is apparently the Batma of Marco Polo, who visited the coast before Islam had gained a footing.

PÁT, s. A can or pot. Sea-Hind, from English.—Roebeck.

PATACA, PATACOON. s, Ital.
patacco: Provence, pata: Port, pataca and patage; also used in Malayalam.
A term, formerly much diffused for a dollar or piece of eight. Littre connects it with an old French word pattard, a kind of coin, "du reste, origine incomme." But he appears to have overlooked the explanation indicated by Volney (Voyage en Egypte, &c., ch. ix. note) that the name abtakka (or corruptly baptika, see also Doy & Eng. s.v.) was given by the Arabs to certain coins of this kind with a sentcheon on the reverse, the term meaning 'father of the window, or nich'; the sentcheon being taken for such an object. Similarly, the pillin-dollars are called in modern Egypt abt medfou, 'father of a cannon'; and the Maria Theresa dollar abt fer, 'father of the bird.' But on the Red Sea, where only the coinage of one particular year (or the modern imitation thereof; still struck at Trieste from the old die), is accepted, it is abt medfet, 'father of dots,' from certain little points which mark the right issue.
1728.—"Each of the men engaged in the attack on Parakkat received no less than 800 gold Pattaks (duzats) as his share."— PATCH, s. "Thin pieces of cloth

PATCHAREE, PATCHERRY. s.
In the Bengal Presidency, before the general construction of 'married quarters' by Government, patcharee was the name applied in European corps to the cottages which used to term the quarters of married soldiers. The origin of the word is obscure, and it has been suggested that it was a corruption of Hind. pachch'hdari, 'the rear,' because these cottages were in rear of the barracks. But we think it most likely that the word was brought, with many other terms peculiar to the British soldier in India, from Madras, and is identical with a term in use there, patcherry or patchery, which represents the Tum. pachch'hdari, pachchery, 'a Pariah village, or rather the quarter or outskirts of a town or village where the Pariahs reside.
Mr. Whitworth (s.v. Pachchery) says that 'in some native regiments the term denotes the married sepoys' quarters, possibly because Pariah sepoys had their families with them, while the higher castes left them at home.' He does not say whether Bombay or Madras sepoys are in question. But in any case what he states confirms the origin ascribed to the Bengal Presidency term Patcharee.

PATCHOULLI, PATCH-LEAF, s.
Putch and Putch-leaf, also Putch and Putch-leaf. s.
In Beng. puchhopy; Daccau Hind.
The latter are trade names of the dried leaves of a labiate plant allied to mint (Pogostemon patchouly, Pelletier). It is supposed to be a cultivated variety of Pogostemon Hegenianus, Bentham, a native of the Deccan. It is grown in native gardens throughout India, Ceylon, and the Malay Islands, and the dried flowering spikes and leaves of the plant, which are used, are sold in every bazaar in Hindostan. The pachh-pit is used as an ingredient in tobacco for smoking, as hair-scent by women, and especially for stuffing mattresses and laying among clothes as we use lavender. In a fluid form patchouli was introduced into England in 1844, and soon became very fashionable as a perfume.

The origin of the word is a difficulty. The name is alleged in Drury, and in Forbes Watson’s Nomenclature to be Bengali. Littre says the word patchouli is patchouli-lly, ‘feuille de patchouli’; in what language we know not; perhaps it is from Tamil pacheha, ‘green,’ and ēlili, ēlai, an aromatic perfume for the hair. [The Madras Gloss. gives Tamil pachēli, pachy, ‘green,’ eli, ‘leaf.’] Patch Leaf. 1 Bahar Manusa 7 29 sar.”—Fryer, 299.

PATECA.

This word is used by the Portuguese in India for a water-melon (Citrullus vulgaris, Schrader; Cucurbita Citrullus, L.). It is from the Arabic al-battikh or al-bittikh. F. Johnson gives this a melon, musk-melon. A pumpkin; a cucubitaceous plant? We presume that this is not merely the too common dictionary looseness, for the chaos of cucubitaceous nomenclature, both vulgar and scientific, is universal (see A. De Candolle, Origin des Plantes cultivatees). In Lane’s Modern Egyptians (ed. 1837, i. 200) the word battrehk is rendered explicitly ‘water-melon.’ We have also in Spanish almudena, which is given by Dozy and Eng. as ‘espécie de melon’; and we have French pastèque, which we believe always means a water-melon. De Candolle seems to have no doubt that the water-melon was cultivated in ancient Egypt, and believes it to have been introduced into the Graeco-Roman world about the beginning of our era; whilst Hahn carries it to Persia from India, ‘whether at the time of the Arabian or of the Mongol domination, (and then) to Greece, through the medium of the Turks, and to Russia, through that of the Tartar States of Astrakan and Kazan.’

The name pateca, looking to the existence of the same word in Spanish, we should have supposed to have been Portuguese long before the Portuguese establishment in India; yet the whole of what is said by Garcia de Orta is inconsistent with this. In his Colloquio XXXVI. the gist of the dialogue is that his visitor from Europe, Ruano, tells how he had seen what seemed a most beautiful melon, and how Garcia’s housekeeper recommended it, but on trying it, it tasted only of mud instead of melon! Garcia then tells him that at Din, and in the Bālayāt, &c., he would find excellent melons with the flavour of the melons of Portugal but those others which the Portuguese here in India call patecas are quite another thing—huge round or oval fruits, with black seeds—not sweet (douce) like the Portuguese melons, but bland (suave), most juicy and cooling, excellent in bilious fevers, and congestion of the liver and kidneys, &c.” Both name and thing are represented as novelties to Ruano. Garcia tells him also that the Arabs and Persians call it batīc indi, i.e. melon of India (F. Johnson gives bittikhi-i-hindi, the citrul'; whilst in Persian hindavina is also a word for water-melon) but that the real Indian country name was (kalānghā Mahr, kālinghā; [perhaps that known in the N.W.P. as kālimā, ‘a water-melon’]). Ruano then refers to the Indicos of Castille of which he had heard, and queries if these were not the same as these Indian patecas, but Garcia says they are quite different. All this is curious as implying that the water-melon was strange to the Portuguese at that time (1563; see Colloquios, f. 141v, seqq.).

A friend who has Burnell’s copy of Garcia De Orta tells me that he finds a note in the writing of the former on batéca: ‘i.e. the Arabic term. As this is used all over India, water-melons must have been imported by the Mahommedans.’ I believe it to be a mistake that the word is in use.
all over India. I do not think the word is ever used in Upper India, nor is it (in that sense) in either Shakespeare or Falcon. [Platts gives: A. bentik, s.m. The melon (kharbaţ), the water-melon, Cucurbita citrullus.] The most common word in the N.W.P. for a water-melon is Pers. turbaţ, whilst the musk-melon is Pers. kharbāţ. And these words are so rendered from the Ain respectively by Blochmann (see his E.T. i. 66, "melons, . . . water-melons," and the original i. 67, "kharboţa. . . turbaţ"). But with the usual chaos already alluded to, we find both these words interpreted in F. Johnson as "water-melon." And according to Helm the latter is called in the Slav tongues arbaţ and in Mod. Greek καρποτσία, the first as well as the last probably from the Turkish کرپاچ, which has the same meaning, for this hard k is constantly dropped in modern pronunciation.—H. Y.]

We append a valuable note on this from Prof. Robertson-Smith:

"(1) The classical form of the Ar. word is bentikh. Bentikh is a widely-spread vulgarism, indeed now, I fancy, universal, for I don't think I ever heard the first syllable pronounced with an i.

"(2) The term, according to the law-books, includes all kinds of melons (Latae); but practically it is applied (certainly at least in Syria and Egypt) almost exclusively to the water-melon, unless it has a limiting adjective. Thus "the wild bentikh" is the colo-cynth, and with other adjectives it may be used of very various cavarbitaceous fruits (see examples in Dozy's Supplement.)

"(6) The biblical form is ḫibewtikh (e.g. Numbers xi. 5, where the E.V. has 'melons'). But this is only the 'water-melon'; for in the Mishna it is distinguished from the sweet melon, the latter being named by a mere transcription in Hebrew letters of the Greek μῦλοπέτων. Low justly concludes that the Palestinians (and the Syrians, for their name only differs slightly) got the sweet melon from the Greeks, whilst for the water-melon they have an old and probably true Semitic word. For ḫibewtikh Syriac has Ḫibewtik, indicating that in literary Arabic the a has been changed to i, only to agree with rules of grammar. Thus popular pronunciation seems always to have kept the old form, as popular usage seems always to have used the word mainly in its old specific meaning. The Bible and the Mishna suffice to refute Helm's view (of the introduction of the water-melon from India). Old Kimhi, in his Mikol, illustrates the Hebrew word by the Spanish budínov."

1563.—". . . ther is an other sort like Melons, called Patекes or Angurias, or Melons of India, which are outwardlie of a darke greene colour; inwarde white with blakke kernels: they are verie waterish and hard to byte, and so moyst, that as a man eateth them his mouth is full of water, but yet verie sweet and verie cold and fresh meat. wherefore manie of them are eaten after dinner to coole men."—Lexicoten, 67; [Hak. Soc. i. 309, and see i. 33].

.. A few pages later the word is written Pastkees.—Ibid. 361; [Hak. Soc. i. 417].

[1663.—"Patекes, or water-melons, are in great abundance nearly the whole year round: but those of Indi are soft, without colour or sweetness. If this fruit be ever found good, it is among the wealthy people, who import the seed and cultivate it with much care and expense."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 255.]

1673.—"From hence (Elephanta) we sailed to the Patacheos, a Garden of Melons, Patacho being a Melon, where there are Wild Rats that hinder their growth, and so to Bombaim."—Fryer, 76.

PATEL, POTAIL. s. The headman of a village, having general control of village affairs, and forming the medium of communication with the officers of Government. In Mahr. patil, Hind. patel. The most probable etym. seems to be from pat, Mahr. 'a roll or register,' Skt.—Hind. patra. The title is more particularly current in territories that are or have been subject to the Mahrattas, "and appears to be an essentially Marathi word, being used as a respectful title in addressing one of that nation, or a Sūdra in general" (Wilson). The office is hereditary, and is often held under a Government grant. The title is not used in the Gangetic Provinces, but besides its use in Central and W. India it has been commonly employed in S. India, probably as a Hindustani word, though Monigar (see MONEGAR).
(Maniporte, in Adigar, &c., are appropriate synonyms in Tamil and Malabar districts.

PATTELM. PATTELE.
PAULIST. n.p. The Jesuits were commonly so called in India because their houses in that country were formerly always dedicated to St. Paul, the great Missionary to the Heathen. They have given up this practice since their modern re-establishment in India. They are still called Paolotti in Italy, especially by those who don't like them.

e. 1587.—"... e vi sono secoli Chiese dei padri di San Paolo, i quali fanno in quivi mogli gran profitto in convertire quasi popoli."—Fedeli, in Retrospect, iii. 390.

1623.—"I then went to the College of the Jesuit Fathers, the Church of which, like that at Damman, at Bassaim, and at almost all the other cities of the Portuguese in India, is called San Paolo; whence it happens that in India the said Fathers are known more commonly by the name of Paulisti than by that of Jesuits."—P. della Valle, April 27; [iii. 135].

c. 1650.—"The Jesuits at Goa are known by the name of Paulists; by reason that their great Church is dedicated to St. Paul. Nor do they wear Hats, or Corner-Caps, as in Europe, but only a certain Bonnet, resembling the Skull of a Hat without the Brims."—Tavernier, E.T. 77; [ed. Ball. i. 197].

1672.—"There was found in the fortress of Cranganor a handyson convent, and Church of the Paulists, or disciples and followers of Ignatius Loyola, ..."—Baldives, Goa, p. 110. In another passage this author says they were called Paulists because they were first sent to India by Pope Paul III. But this is not the correct reason.

1673.—"St. Paul's was the first Monastery of the Jesuits in Goa, from whence they receive the name Paulistins."—Fryer, 170.

PAUNCHWAY, s. A light kind of boat used on the rivers of Bengal; like a large dingy (p.v.), with a tilted roof of matting or thatch, a mast and four oars. Bengal, paunso, and panso. [Mr. Grierson (Peasant Life, 43) describes the paunso as a boat with a round bottom, but which goes in shallow water, and gives an illustration.]

c. 1760.—"Ponsways, Guard-boats."—Grose (Glossary).

1760.—"The Paunchways are nearly of the same general construction (as budge-rows), with this difference, that the greatest breadth is somewhat further aft, and the stern lower."—Hedges, 39-40.

1770.—"Mr. Bridgewater was driven out to sea in a common paunchway, and when every hope forsook him the boat floated into the harbour of Madraspatam."—Calcutta Monthly Review, i. 40.

1823.—"... A paunchway, or passage-boat, ... was a very characteristic and interesting vessel, large and broad, shaped like a saucer-dish; a deck fore-and-aft, and the middle covered with a roof of palm-branches. ..."—Heber, ed. 1841, i. 21.

1860.—"... You may suppose that I engage neither pineaus nor khoij (see BUDGEROW), but that comfort and economy are sufficiently obtained by hiring a small bhooliya (see BOLIAH) ... what is more likely at a fine weather season like this, a small native punsoos, which, with a double set of hands, or four oars, is a lighter and much quicker boat."—C. Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 10 [with an illustration].

PAWL, s. Hind. pāl, [Skt. pūlau, 'a roof']. A small tent with two light poles, and steep sloping sides; no walls, or ridge-pole. I believe the statement 'no ridge-pole,' is erroneous. It is difficult to derive from memory an exact definition of tents, and especially of the difference between pawl and shooldarry. A reference to India failed in getting a reply. The shooldarry is not essentially different from the pawl, but is trimmer, taller, better closed, and sometimes has two flies. [The names of tents are used in various senses in different parts. The Madras Gloss. defines a paul as 'a small tent with two light poles, a ridge bar, and steep sloping sides; the walls, if any, are very short, often not more than 6 inches high. Sometimes a second ridge above carries a second roof over the first; this makes a common shooting tent." Mr. G. R. Dampier writes: "These terms are, I think, used rather loosely in the N.W.P. Sholdari generally means a servant's tent, a sort of tende d'abri, with very low sides; the sides are generally not more than a foot high; there are no doors only flaps at one end. Pāl is generally used to denote a sleeping tent for Europeans; the roof slopes on both sides from a longitudinal ridge-pole; the sides are much higher than in the sholdāris, and there is a door at one end. The fly is almost invariably single. The Raoti (see ROWTEE) is incorrectly used in some places to denote a sleeping pāl; it is, properly speaking, I believe, a larger tent, of the same kind, but with doors in the side, not at the end. In some parts I have found they use the word pāl as equivalent to sholdāris and bilītan (bell-tent)."

1755.—"Where is the great quantity of baggage belonging to you, seeing that you have nothing besides tents, pawls, and other such necessary articles?"—Tippee's Letters, p. 49.

1785.—"They are not, I believe, more than two small Pauls or tents, among the whole of the delegation that escorted us from Pama."—Kirpatrick's Nepaul, p. 118.

1823.—"The shops which compose the Bazars, are mostly formed of blankets or coarse cloth stretched over a bamboo, or some other stick for a ridge-pole, supported at either end by a forked stick fixed in the ground. These habitations are called pails."—Broughton, Letters, ed. 1802, p. 20.

1827.—"It would perhaps be worth while to record . . . the material and personnel of my camp equipment; an humble captain and single man travelling on the most economical principles. One double-poled tent, one rouette (see ROWTEE), or small tent, a pāl or servants' tent. 2 elephants, 6 camels, 4 horses, a pony, a buggy, and 24 servants, besides mahouts, servants or camel drivers, and tent pitchers."—Mundy, Journal of a Tour in India, 3rd ed. p. 5. We may note that this is an absurd exaggeration of any equipment that, even seventy-five years since, would have characterized the march of a "humble captain travelling on economical principles," or any one under the position of a highly-placed civilian. Captain Mundy must have been enormously extravagant.

1849.—". . . we breakfasted merrily under a paul (a tent without walls, just like two cards leaning against each other)."—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, p. 114.

PAWN. s. The betel-leaf (q.v.) found pān, from Skt. partha, 'a leaf.'

It is a North Indian term, and is generally used for the combination of betel, areca-nut, lime, &c., which is politely offered (along with otto of roses) to visitors, and which intimates the termination of the visit. This is more fully termed pawn-soopari (supari, [Skt. supari, 'pleasant,'] is Hind. for areca). "These leaves are not used to be eaten alone, but because of their bitternes they are eaten with a certain kind of fruit, which the Malabars and Portuguese call Areva, the Gouras and Decanijns Suparijs. . . ." (In Purchas, ii. 1781.)

1816.—"The King giving me many good words, and two pieces of his Pawne out of his Dish, to eat of the same he was eating. . . ."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 576: [Hakl. Soc. ii. 453].

1863.—". . . it is the only Indian entertainment, commonly called Pawn."—Fryer, p. 119.

1889.—"On our departure pawn and roses were presented, but we were spared the other, which is very watertable."—Ld. Valentia, i. 101.

PAWNEE. s. Hind. pāni, 'water.' The word is used extensively in Anglo-Indian compound names, such as bilayutee pawnee, 'soda-water,' brandy-pawnee, Khush-lo pawnee (for European scents), &c., &c. An old friend, Gen. J. T. Boileau, R.E. (Bengal), contributes from memory the following Hindi ode to Water, on the Pindaric theme ἀρπαστὸν μὲν ἤδωρ, or the Thaletic one ἀρχὴ δὲ τῶν πάντων ἤδωρ:

"Pāni kāi, pāni tāl :
Pāni ātā, pāni dāl :
Pāni bāgh, pāni rannā :
Pāni Gangā, pāni Jumna :
Pāni hāntā, pāni rotā :
Pāni jāgū, pāni sōtā :
Pāni bāp, pāni mā :
Bārā nam Pāni ka !"

Thus rudely done into English:

"Thou, Water, stor'st our Wells and Tanks, Thou fill'st Gunga's, Jimna's banks; Thou Water, send'st daily food. And fruit and flowers and needful wood; Thou, Water, laugh'st, thou, Water, weep'st: Thou, Water, wak'st, thou, Water, sleepest:

—Father, Mother, in thee bient,— Half, O glorious element!"
PAYNEE, KALLA.  s. Hind. kāḷā pāṇi, i.e. 'Black Water'; the name of dread by which natives of the interior of India designate the Sea, with especial reference to a voyage across it, and to transportation to penal settlements beyond it. "Hindu servants and sepoys used to object to cross the Indus, and called that the kāḷā pāṇi. I think they used to assert that they lost caste by crossing it, which might have induced them to call it by the same name as the ocean,—or possibly they believed it to be part of the river that flows round the world, or the country beyond it to be outside the limits of Aryavarta." (Note by J. J. M. Trotter).

1829.—"An agent of mine, who was for some days with Chactoo" (a famous Pindari leader), "told me he raved continually about Kala Panee, and that one of his followers assured him when the Pindari chief slept, he used in his dreams to repeat these dreaded words about."—Sir J. Malcolm, Central India (2nd ed.), i. 446.

1833.—"Kala Pany, dark water, in allusion to the Ocean, is the term used by the Natives to express transportation. Those in the interior picture the place to be an island of a very dreadful description, and full of malevolent beings, and covered with snakes and other vile and dangerous nondescript animals."—Macquart, "A History of the Tribes of Rajmosses," 41.

PAYEN-GHAUT, n.p. The country on the coast below the Ghauts or passes leading up to the table-land of the Deccan. It was applied usually on the west coast, but the expression Carnatic Payen-ghaut is also pretty frequent, as applied to the low country of Madras on the east side of the Peninsula, from Hind. and Mahr. ghāṭ, combined with Pers. pā'nī, 'below.' [It is generally used as equivalent to Talaghāṭ, 'but some Musulmans seem to draw the distinction that the Pāyin-ghāṭ is nearer to the foot of the Ghāṭs than the Talaghāṭ""] (Le Flore, Mon. of Salim, ii. 338.)

1629-30.—"But (Azam Khan) found that the enemy having placed their elephants and baggage in the fort of Dabhātūr, had the design of descending the Payin-ghāṭ."—Abdul Hamid Lahori, in Eliot, viii. 17.

1754.—"Peace and friendship... between the said Company and the Nabob Tippo Sultan Bahaudier, and their friends and allies, particularly including therein the Rajahs of Tanjore and Travancore, who are friends and allies to the English and the Carnatic Payen Ghaṭ. — Treaty of Mangalore, in Munro's Narr., 252.

1785.—"You write that the European taken prisoner in the Payen-ghaut... being skilled in the mortar practice, you propose converting him to the faith... it is known (or understood)."—Letters of Tipper, p. 12.

PAZEND, s. See for meaning of this term s.v. Pahlavi, in connection with Zend. (See also quotation from Mo'ghi on under latter.)

PECUL, PIKOL, s. Malay and Javanese pikol, 'a man's load.' It is used as the Malay name of the Chinese weight of 100 katis (see CATTY), called by the Chinese themselves shīh, and =133½ lb. avoird. Another authority states that the shīh is = 120 kīn or katis, whilst the 100 kīn weight is called in Chinese ton.

1541.—"In China 1 tael weighs 7½ tanga of silver, and 16 taels = 1 cäté (see CATTY); 100 cätés = 1 pico = 45 tangas of silver weigh 1 mark, and therefore 1 pico = 133¼ arratels (see ROTTLE)."—J. Nares, 41.

..."And in China anything is sold and bought by cätés and picos and taels, provisions as well as all other things."—Ibid. 42.

[1616.—"The wood we have sold at divers prices from 24 to 28 mas per Picoll."—Foster, Letters, iv. 259.]

PEDIR, n.p. The name of a port and State of the north coast of Sumatra. Barros says that, before the establishment of Malacca, Pedir was the greatest and most famous of the States on that island. It is now a place of no consequence.

1495.—It is named as Pater in the Roteiro of Vasco da Gama, but with very incorrect information. See p. 113.

1510.—"We took a junk and went towards Sumatra, to a city called Pider... In this country there grows a great quantity of pepper, and of long pepper which is called Molyga... in this port there are laden with it every year 18 or 20 ships, all of which go to Cathai."—Varthema, 238.

1511.—"And having anchored before the said Pedir, the Captain General (Alboquerque) sent for me, and told me that I should go ashore to learn the disposition of the people... and so I went ashore in the evening, the General thus sending me into a country of enemies,—people too poor whose vessels and goods we had seized, whose fathers, sons, and brothers we had killed;—into a country where even among themselves there is little justice, and treachery in plenty, still more as regards strangers; truly he acted as caring little what became of me! The answer given me was this: that I should tell the Captain Major General that the city of Pedir had been for a longtime noble and great in trade; that its port was always free for every man to come and go in security; that they were rich and not women, and that they could hold for no friend one who seized the ships visiting their harbours; and that if the General desired the King's friendship let him give back what he had seized, and then his people might come ashore to buy and sell.—Letter of Gior. da Empoli, in Arch. Stor. Ital. 54.

1516.—The Moors live in the seaports, and the Gentiles in the interior (of Sumatra). The principal kingdom of the Moors is called Pedir. Much very good pepper grows in it, which is not so strong or so fine as that of Malabar. Much silk is also grown there, but not so good as the silk of China.—Barbosa, 196.

1538. — "Furthermore I told him what course was usually held for the fishing of seed-pearl between Pello Tiquos and Pello Quenim, which in time past were carried by the Pedro to Pessaro, and Suli, and Pedir, and exchanged with the Turks of the Strait of Mequa, and the Ships of Judea (see Judea) for such Merchandise as they brought from Grand Cairo."—Pinto (in Copan), 25.

1558. — "After the foundation of Malaca, and especially after our entrance to the Indies, the Kingdom of Pacem began to increase, and that of Pedir to wane. And its neighbour of Achem, which was then insignificant, is now the greatest of all, so vast are the vicissitudes in States of which men make so great account."—Barros, iii. v. 1.

1615.—"Articles exhibited against John Oxwicke. That since his being in Peedere 'he did not entertain' anything for Priaman and Ticoce, but only an answer to King James's letter ..."—Sainz de Sanz, i. 411.

"Pededere."—Ibid. p. 415.

PEEÁDA. See under PEON.

PEENUS. s. Hind. pínás; a corruption of Eng. píner. A name applied to a class of budgerow rigged like a brig or brigantine, on the rivers of Bengal, for European use. Boelback gives as the marine Hind. for pínera, phínera. [The word has been adopted by natives in N. India as the name for a sort of palankin, such as that used by a bride.]

1784.—For sale ... a very handsome Pinnace Budgerow.—In Stow-Harr, i. 45.

[1860.—"The Pinnace, the largest and handsomest, is perhaps more frequently a private than a hired boat—the property of the planter or merchant."—C. Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, i (with an illustration).]

PEEPUL. s. Hind. pipála, Skt. pippala, Ficus religiosa, L.; one of the great fig-trees of India, which often occupies a prominent place in a village, or near a temple. The Pipal has a strong resemblance, in wood and foliage, to some common species of poplar, especially the aspen, and its leaves with their long footstalks quaver like those of that tree. This trembling is popularly attributed to spirits agitating each leaf. And hence probably the name of 'Devil's tree' given to it, according to Rheede (Hort. Mal. i. 48), by Christians in Malabar. It is possible therefore that the name is identical with that of the poplar. Nothing would be more natural than that the Aryan immigrants, on first seeing this Indian tree, should give it the name of the poplar which they had known in more northerly latitudes (populus, pappel, &c.). Indeed, in Kumanó, a true sp. of poplar (Populus ciliata) is called by the people gípípal (qu. ghar, or 'house'-peepal? [or rather perhaps as another name for it is pahírī, from gīr, gírī, 'a mountain']). Dr. Stewart also says of this Populus: "This tree grows to a large size, occasionally reaching 10 feet in girth, and from its leaves resembling those of the pipal ... is frequently called by that name by plain-men" (Punjab Plants, p. 204). A young pípal was shown to one of the present writers in a garden at Palermo as populo delle Indie. And the recognised name of the peepul in French books appears to be peuplier d'Inde. Col. Tod notices the resemblance (Research, i. 80), and it appears that Vahl called it Ficus populi florula. (See also Geographic, Magazine, ii. 50.) In Ballfour's Indian Cyclopaedia it is called by the same name in translation, 'the poplar-leaved Fig-tree.' We adduce these facts the more copiously perhaps because the suggestion of the identity of the names pippala and populus was somewhat scornfully rejected by a very learned scholar. The tree is peculiarly destructive to buildings, as birds drop the seeds in the joints of the masonry, which becomes thus penetrated by the spreading roots of the tree. This is alluded to in a quotation below. "I remember noticing among many Hindus, and especially among Hinduized Sikhs, that they often say Pipal ko jāta hānī (‘I am going to the Peepul Tree’), to express ‘I am going to say my prayers.” (Lt.-Col. John Trotter.) (See BO-TREE.)

c. 1550.—"His soul quivered like a pipal leaf."—Rāmāyana of Tulsī Dīs, by Grove (1878), ii. 25.

[8. 1500.—"In this place an arrow struck Sri Krishna and buried itself in a pipal tree on the banks of the Sarsuli."—Ivin, ed. Jowett, ii. 219.]

1896.—"Au sortir du village un pipal clôve sa tète majestueuse. . . . Sa nombrune posterité l'entoure au loin sur la plaine, telle qu'une armée de géants qui entrecroisent fraternellement leurs bras formés."—Huguenot, i. 149. This writer seems to mean a banyan. The peepul does not drop roots in that fashion.

1817.—"In the second ordal, an excavation in the ground . . . is filled with a fire of pippal wood, into which the party must walk barefoot, proving his guilt if he is burned; his innocence, if he escapes unhurt."—M'Il (quoting from Halhed), ed. 1830, i. 280.

1825.—"A little while after this he arose, and went to a Peepul-tree, a short way off, where he appeared busy about something, I could not well make out what."—Pandurang Hari, 26; ed. 1873, i. 36, reading Peepal].

1836.—"It is not proper to allow the English, after they have made made war, and peace has been settled, to remain in the city. They are accustomed to act like the Peepul tree. Let not Younger Brother therefore allow the English to remain in his country.”—Letter from Court of China to Court of Ava. See Yule, Mission to Ava, p. 265.

1861.—

... Yonder crown of umbrage hoar Shall shield her well; the Peepul whisper a dirge
And Caryota drop her tearlike store
Of beads; whilst over all slim Casuarina Points upwards, with her branchlets ever green,
To that remaining Rest where Night and Tears are o'er.

1864.—"We rode on for three farsaks, or fourteen miles, more to another Imamzadah, called Keysh-girli. . . ."—Eastwick, Three Years' Residence in Persia, ii. 46.

1883.—"The few villages . . . have numerous walled gardens, with rows of poplar and willow-trees and stunted mulberries, and the inevitable Imamzadehs.”—Col. Beresford Lovett's Itinerary Notes of Route Surveys in N. Persia in 1851 and 1882, Proc. R.G.S. (N.S.) v. 78.
Shaikh:

1817.—"Near the ford (on Jordan), half a mile to the south, is a tomb called 'Sheikh Daoud,' standing on an apparent round hill like a barrow."—Irby and Mangles, Travels in Egypt, &c., p. 304.

Nabi:

1856. —"Of all the points of interest about Jerusalem, none perhaps gains so much from an actual visit to Palestine as the lofty-peaked eminence which tills up the north-west corner of the table-land. . . . At present it bears the name of Nebi-Samuel—which is derived from the Mussulman tradition—now perpetuated by a mosque and tomb—that here lies buried the prophet Samuel."—Stanley's Palestine, 165.

PEGU. n.p. The name which we give to the Kingdom which formerly existed in the Delta of the Irawadi, to the city which was its capital, and to the British province which occupies its place. The Burmese name is Bogo. This name belongs to the Ta-lang language, and is popularly alleged to mean 'conquered by stratagem,' to explain which a legend is given; but no doubt this is mere fancy. The form Pegu, as in many other cases of our geographical nomenclature, appears to come through the Malays, who call it Paigu. The first European mention that we know of is in Conti's narrative (c. 1440) where Peguo has Latinized it as Pavo-ria; but Fra Mauro, who probably derived this name, with much other new knowledge, from Conti, has in his great map (c. 1439) the exact Malay form Paigu. Nikitin (c. 1475) has, if we may depend on his translator into English, Pegu, as has Hieronymino di S. Stefano (1499). The Roberto von Vasco da Gama (1498) has Pegao, and describes the land as Christian, a mistake arising no doubt from the use of the ambiguous term Kajiir by his Mahommedan informants (see under CAFFER). Varthema (1510) has Pegu, and Gis. de Empolii (1514) Pegu; Barroso (1516) again Paigu; but Pegu is the usual Portuguese form, as in Barros, and so passed to us.

1498.—"Pegu is a land of Christians, and the King is a Christian; and they are all white like us. This King can assemble 20,000 fighting men, i.e. 10,000 horsemen, as many footmen, and 100 war elephants; here is all the musk in the world . . . and on the main land he has many rubies and much gold, so that for 10 cruzados you can buy as much gold as will fetch 25 in Calicut, and there is much lac (laccr) and benzoin. . . ."—Koteira, 112.

1506.—"Two merchants of Cochin took on them to save two of the ships; one from Pegu with a rich cargo of lac (laccr), benzoin, and musk, and another with a cargo of drugs from Banda, nutmeg, mace, clove, and sandalwood: and they embarked on the ships with their people, leaving to chance their own vessels, which had carrosses of rice, for the value of which the owners of the ships bound themselves."—Ces. Fideic., in Rawas, iii. 324.

1568.—"Concluded that non è in terra Re di possazza maggiore del Re di Pegu, per cibè che ha sotto di se venti Re di corona."—Ces. Fideic., in Rawas, iii. 324.

1572.—"Olha o reino Arracão, olha o assento De Pegu, que já monstros povoaram, Monstros filhos do feo ajuntamento D'huma mulher e hum cão, que sos-s-s acharan."—Camões, x. 122.

By Burton:

"Arracin-realm behold, behold the seat of Pegu peopled by a monster-breed: monsters that gendered meeting most unmeet of help and woman in the lonely wood . . ."

1597.—". . . I recommend you to be very watchful not to allow the Turks to export any timber from the Kingdom of Pegu nor yet from that of Achin (do Dacham); and with this view you should give orders that this be the subject of treatment with the King of Dacham since he shows so great a desire for our friendship, and is treating in that sense."—Despatch from the King to Gove, 5th Feb. in Archiv. Port. Orient. Fasc. iii.

PEGU PONIES. These are in Madras sometimes termed elliptically Pegus, as Arab horses are universally termed Arabs. The ponies were much valued, and before the annexation of Pegu commonly imported into India; less commonly since, for the local demand absorbs them.
1889.—"For sale . . . also Bubble and Squawk, bay Pegues."—Madras Mail, Feb. 19.

[1890.—"Ponies, sometimes very good ones, were reared in a few districts in Upper Burma, but, even in Burmese times, the supply was from the Shan States. The so-called Pegu Pony, of which a good deal is heard, is, in fact, not a Pegu pony at all, for the justly celebrated animals called by that name were imported from the Shan States."—Report of Capt. Evans, in Times, Oct. 17.]

PEKING, n.p. This name means 'North-Court,' and in its present application dates from the early reigns of the Ming Dynasty in China. When they dethroned the Mongol descendants of Chinghiz and Kublai (1368) they removed the capital from Taitu or Khãubiligh (Cambalu of Polo) to the great city on the Yangtze which has since been known as Naou-King or 'South-Court.' But before many years the Mongol capital was rehabilitated as the imperial residence, and became Pe-King accordingly. Its preparation for reoccupation began in 1409. The first English mention that we have met with is that quoted by Sainsbury, in which we have the subjects of more than one allusion in Milton.

1520.—"Thomé Pires, quitting this pass, arrived at the Province of Nanking, at its chief city called by the same name, where the King dwelt, and spent in coming thither always travelling north, four months; by which you may take note how vast a matter is the empire of this gentle prince. He sent word to Thomé Pires that he was to wait for him at Pequij, where he would dispatch his affair. This city is in another province so called, much farther north, in which the King used to dwell for the most part, because it was on the frontier of the Tartars. . . ."—Barros, III. vi. 1.

1541.—"This City of Pequijn . . . is so prodigious, and the things therein so remarkable, as I do almost repent me for undertaking to discourse of it . . . For one must not imagine it to be, either as the City of Rome, or Constantiopolis, or Venice, or Paris, or London, or Scoll, or Lisbon. . . . Nay I will say further, that one must not think it to be like Grand Cairo in Egypt, Tenes in Persia, Avaolde (Avabad, Ayadavat) in Cambalu, Kamburg in Nanking, Gouve (Gourou) in Bengala, Ava in Chalén, Timpang in Cathuiahem, Martuden (Martaváio) and Bagou in Pequij, Guempel and Tchou in Sioumm, Odia in the Kingdom of Soruan, Passowen and Léma in the Island of Joss, Pangou in the Country of the Lépirou (no Legiro) Usagou (Uazige) in the Grand Curchi, Laosuma (Laçum) in Tartinj, and Mecou (Mico) in Jappou . . .

I dare well affirm that all those same are not to be compared to the least part of the wonderful City of Pequijn. . . ."—Pélot (in Coguin), p. 136 (orig. cap. evii.).

1614.—"Richard Cocks writing from Ferando understands there are great cities in the country of Corea, and between that and the sea mighty bogs, so that no man can travel there; but great waggons have been invented to go upon broad flat wheels, under sail as ships do, in which they transport their goods . . . the deceased Emperor of Japan did pretend to have conveyed a great army in these sailing waggons, to assail the Emperor of China in his City of Paquin."—In Sainsbury, i. 343.

Paradis Lost, xi. 387-390.

PELICAN. s. This word, in its proper application to the Pelicanus onocrotalus, L., is in no respect peculiar to Anglo-India, though we may here observe that the bird is called in Hindi by the poetical name gyanu-bhery, i.e. 'Sheep of the Sky,' which we have heard natives with their strong propensity to metathesis convert into the equally appropriate Gyanu-bheri or 'Sheep of the Ganges.' The name may be illustrated by the old term 'Cape-sheep' applied to the albatross.* But Pelican is habitually misspelled by the British soldier in India to the bird usually called Adjutant (q.v.).

We may remember how Prof. Max Müller, in his Lectures on Language, tells us that the Tahitians show respect to their sovereign by ceasing to employ in common language those words which form part or the whole of his name, and invent new terms to supply their place. "The object was clearly to guard against the name of the sovereign being ever used, even by accident, in ordinary conversation," 2nd ser. 1864, p. 35. [Frazer, Golden Bough, 2nd ed. i. 421 seqq.]

* " . . . great diversion is found . . . in firing balls at birds, particularly the albatross, a large sea-bird, commonly seen within two or three hundred miles round the Cape of Good Hope, and which the French call Montons (Montons) du Cap."—Bougainville's Narrative, 13. The confusion of genera here equals that mentioned in our article above.

some martinet, holding the office of adjutant, at an early date in the Anglo-Indian history, may have resented the ludicrously appropriate employment of the usual name of the bird, and so may have introduced the entirely inappropriate name of pelican in its place. It is in the recollection of one of the present writers that a worthy northern matron, who with her husband had risen from the ranks in the —th Light Dragoons, on being challenged for speaking of "the pelicans in the barrack-yard," maintained her correctness, conceding only "some cud' them paylicans, some cud' them adjuants."

1829.—"This officer ... on going round the yard (of the military prison)
... discovered a large beef-bone recently dropped. The sergeant was called to account for this ominous appearance. This sergeant was a shrewd fellow, and he immediately said:—
"Oh Sir, the pelicans have dropped it.
This was very plausible, for these birds will carry enormous bones; and frequently when fighting for them they drop them, so that this might very probably have been the case.
The moment the dinner-trumpet sounds, whole flocks of these birds are in attendance at the barrack-doors, waiting for bones, or anything that the soldiers may be pleased to throw to them."—Mem. of John Sipp, ii. 25.

PENANG. n.p. This is the proper name of the Island adjoining the Peninsula of Malacca (Pulo, properly Pulau, Pinaou), which on its cession to the English (1756) was named 'Prince of Wales's Island.' But this official style has again given way to the old name. Pinaou in Malay signifies an areca-unt or areca-tree, and, according to Crawford, the name was given on account of the island's resemblance in form to the fruit of the tree (calyp, 'the betel-nut').

1592.—"Now the winter coming upon us with much contagious weather, we directed our course from hence with the Islands of Pulo Pinaou (where by the way is to be noted that Pulo in the Malayon tongue signifieth an Island) ... where we came to an anker in a very good harbour between the three Hands. This place is in 6 degrees and a half to the northward and some fine leagues from the maine betweene Malacca and Pego."—Barker, in Hakl. ii. 589-590.

PENANG LAWYER. s. The popular name of a handsome and hard (but sometimes brittle) walking-stick, exported from Penang and Singapore.

It is the stem of a miniature palm (Licuala actitudina, Griffith). The sticks are prepared by scraping the young stem with glass, so as to remove the epidermis and no more. The sticks are then straightened by fire and polished (Balfour). The name is popularly thought to have originated in a jocular supposition that law-suits in Penang were decided by the lex bau-lina. But there can be little doubt that it is a corruption of some native term, and pinang ligar, 'wild area' (or pinang ligar, 'dried area'), which is suggested in N.E.D., may almost be assumed to be the real name. [Dennys (Deser. Dict. s.v.) says from 'Lygar, a species of cane furnishing the sticks so named.' But this is almost certainly wrong.]

1883.—(But the book—an excellent one—is without date—most shame to the Religious Tract Society which publishes it). "Next morning, taking my 'Penang lawyer' to defend myself from dogs. . . ." The following note is added: "A Penang lawyer is a heavy walking-stick, supposed to be so called from its usefulness in settling disputes in Penang."—Gilmore, Among the Mongols, 14.

PENGUIN, s. Popular name of several species of birds belonging to the genera Aptenodytes and Spheniscus.
We have not been able to ascertain the etymology of this name. It may be from the Port. pingue, 'fat.' See Littré. He quotes Clausius as picturing it, who says they were called a pinguiline. It is surely not that given by Sir Thomas Herbert in proof of the truth of the legend of Madoc's settlement in America; and which is indeed implied 60 years before by the narrator of Drake's voyage; though probably borrowed by Herbert directly from Selden.

1578.—"In these islands we found great relief and plenty of good victuals, for

c. 1610.—"... the reste is tout couvert ... d'une quantité d'Oysseaux nommé pinguy, qui font là leurs œufs et leurs petits, et il y en a une quantité si prodigieuse qu'on ne saurait mettre ... le pied en quel temps endroit que ce soit sans toucher."—Pygmal de Laval, i. 79; [Hak. Soc. i. 97, also see i. 16].

1612.—"About the year CII. C. LXX. Massoe brother's David ap Owen, prince of Wales, made this new voyage (to Florida); and by probability these names of Cayo de Brton in Norwadeg, and Pengwin in part of the Northern America, for a white rock, and a white-headed bird, according to the British, were relics of this discovery."—Selden, Notes on Drayton's Polytopha, in Works (ed. 1726), ii. col. 1802.

1616.—"The Island called Penquin Island, probably so named by some Welshman, in whose Language Penquin signifies a white head; and there are many great lazy fowls upon, and about, this Island, with great cole-black bodies, and very white heads, called Penguins."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 394.

1638.—"... that this people (of the Mexican traditions) were Welsh rather than Spaniards or others. The Records of this Voyage writ by many Bardus and Genealogists conforme it ... made more orthodoxall by Welsh names given there to birds, rivers, rocks, beasts, &c., as ... Pengwyn, refer'd by them to a bird that has a white head. ..."—Herbert, Some Years Travels, &c., p. 390.

Unfortunately for this etymology the head is precisely that part which seems in all species of the bird to be black! But M. Roulin, quoted by Littre, maintains the Welsh (or Breton) etymology, thinking the name was first given to some short-winged sea-bird with a white head, and then transferred to the penguin. And Terry, if to be depended on, supports this view. "[So Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict., s.v.):] "In that case, it must first have been given to another bird, such as the auk (the penguin is common in Anglesey), since the penguin's head is black."

PEON, s. This is a Portuguese word peão (Span. peón); from pê, 'foot,' and meaning a 'footman' (also a pawn at chess), and is not therefore a corruption, as has been alleged, of Hind. pīyada, meaning the same; though the words are, of course ultimately akin in root. It was originally used in the sense of 'a foot-soldier'; thence as ' orderly' or messenger. The word Sepoy was used within our recollection, and perhaps is still, in the same sense in the city of Bombay. The transition of meaning comes out plainly in the quotation from Ives. In the sense of ' orderly,' peon is the word usual in S. India, whilst chuprassy (q.v.) is more common in N. India, though peon is also used there. The word is likewise very generally employed for men on police service (see BURKUNDUAZE). [Mr. Skeat notes that Piyun is used in the Malay States, and Tmbi or Tway at Singapore]. The word had probably become unusual in Portugal by 1600; for Manol Carrea, an early commentator on the Lusiads (d. 1613), thinks it necessary to explain pões by ' gente de pé.'

1563.—"The Camorim ordered the soldier (pão) to take the letter away, and strictly forbade him to say anything about his having seen it."—Correa, Letras, i. i. 421.

1575.—"O Rey de Badajos era alto Mourau Con quatro mil cavalos furiosos, Innumeros pões, dumaras e de ouro. Guarneceudos, guerreiros, e lustrosos."—Camões, ii. 69.

By Burton:

The King of Badajos was a Moslem bold, With horse four thousand, fierce and furious knights, and endless Peons, armed and dight With gold, whose polisht surface glanceth lustrous light.

1609.—"The first of February the Capitaine departed with fiftie Peons ...."

1687.—"Ordered that ten peons be sent along the coast to Pulicat ... and enquire all the way for goods driven ashore."—In Wheeler, i. 173.

1689. "... at this Moors Town, they got a Peon to be their guide to the Mogul's nearest Camp. ... These Peons are some of the Gentons or Rashbots (see RAJPOOT), who in all places along the Coast, especially in Seaport Towns, make their business to hire themselves to wait upon Strangers."—Dampier, i. 508.

"... A Peon of mine, named Gomul, walking abroad in the Grass after the Rain, was unfortunately bit on a sudden by one of them" (a snake).—Ovington, 290.

1705. "... pions qui sont ce que nous appelpons ici des Gardes."—Ludlair, 218.

1745.—"Dès le lendemain je fis assembler dans la Forteresse où je demeurois en qualité d'Aumonier, le Chef des Pions, chez qui s'étaient fait les deux marines."—Norbert, Mem. iii. 120.

1746.—"As the Nabob's behaviour when Madras was attacked by De la Bourdonnais, had caused the English to suspect his assurances of assistance, they had 2,000 peons of this town, all discharged."—Owne, i. 81.

c. 1760.—"Peon. One who waits about the house to run on messages; and he commonly carries under his arm a sword, or in his sash a khow, and in his hand a ratoon, to keep the rest of the servants in subjection. He also walks before your palanquin, carries chitas (q.v.) or notes, and is your bodyguard."—Ies, 50.

1783.—"Europeans distinguish these undisciplined troops by the general name of Peons."—Owne, ed. 1693, i. 50.

1772.—Hadley, writing in Bengal, spells the word pune; but this is evidently phonetic.

c. 1755.—"... Peons, a name for the infantry of the Deccan."—Cavendish's Life of Clive, iv. 583.

1758-90.—"I sent off annually from Sylhet from 150 to 200 (elephants) divided into 4 distinct flocks. ... They were put under charge of the common peons. These people were often absent 12 months. On one occasion my servant Manoo ... after a twelve-months' absence returned ... in appearance most miserable; he unfolded his girdle, and produced a scrap of paper of small dimensions, which proved to be a banker's bill amounting to 3 or 4,600 pounds;—his own pay was 90 shillings a month. ... When I left India Manoo was still absent on one of these excursions, but he delivered to my agents as faithful an account of the produce as he would have done to myself. ..."—Hon. R. Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 71.

1812.—"... he was put under arrest for striking, and throwing into the Indus, an inoffensive Peon who gave him no provocation, but who was obeying the orders he received from Captain ... The Major General has heard it said that the supremacy of the British over the native must be maintained in India, and he entirely concurs in that opinion, but it must be maintained by justice."—G. W. Orders, &c., of Sir J. N. W. p. 72.

1811.—"Pandurang is by turns a servant to a shopkeeper, a peon, or orderly, a groom to an English officer ... and eventually a pleader before an English Judge in a populous city."—Saturday Review, May 31. p. 728.

PEPPER. s. The original of this word, Skt. pippali, means not the ordinary pepper of commerce (black pepper) but long pepper, and the Sanskrit name is still so applied in Bengal, where one of the long-pepper plants, which have been classed sometimes in a different genus (Charico) from the black pepper, was at one time much cultivated. There is still indeed a considerable export of long pepper from Calcutta; and a kindred species grows in the Archipelago. Long pepper is mentioned by Pliny, as well as white and black pepper; the three varieties still known in trade, though with the kind of error that has persisted on such subjects till quite recently, he misapprehends their relation. The proportion of their ancient prices will be found in a quotation below.

The name must have been transferred by foreign traders to black pepper, the staple of export, at an early date, as will be seen from the quotations. Pippalimula, the root of long pepper, still a stimulant medicine in the native pharmacopeia, is probably the πεππος μύα of the ancients (Royle, p. 56).

We may say here that Black pepper is the fruit of a perennial climbing shrub, Piper nigrum, L., indigenous in the forests of Malabar and Travancore, and thence introduced into the Malay countries, particularly Sumatra.

White pepper is prepared from the black by removing the dark outer layer of pericarp, thereby depriving it of a part of its pungency. It comes chiefly via Singapore from the Dutch settlement of Rio, but a small quantity of fine quality comes from Telli-cherry in Malabar.

Long pepper is derived from two shrubby plants, Piper officinarum, C.D.C., a native of the Archipelago, and Piper longum, L., indigenous in Malabar, Ceylon, E. Bengal, Timor, and the Philippines. Long pepper is the fruit-spike gathered and dried when not quite ripe (Hanbury and Flückiger, Pharmacographia). All these kinds of pepper were, as has been said, known to the ancients.

c. 70 A.D.—"The cornes or graines... lie in certaine little husks or cods... If that be plucked from the tree before they are ripe and many of themselves, they make that spice which is called Long pepper; but if as they do ripen, they cleave and chawne by little and little, they shew within the white pepper: which afterwards being parched in the Sunne, changeth colour and waxeth blacke, and therewith rived also. Long pepper is some sophisticated, with the servie or mustard seed of Alexandria: and a pound of it is worth fifteen Roman deniers. The white costeth seven deniers a pound, and the black is sold after forty deniers by the pound."—Pieg, tr. by Phil. Holland, Bk. xii. ch. 7.

c. a.d. 100."The Pepper-tree (πιπερ δέντρον) is related to grow in India; it is short and the fruit it first puts forth is long, resembling pods: and this long pepper has within (grains) like small nipple, which are what grow to be the perfect (black) pepper. At the proper season it opens and puts forth a cluster bearing the berries such as we know them. But those that are like unripe grapes, which constitute the white pepper, serve the best for eye-remedies, and for antidotes, and for thermal potencies."—Diocles, Mat. Med. ii. 188.

c. 515.—"This is the pepper-tree (there is a drawing). Every plant of it is twined round some lofty forest tree, for it is weak and slim like the slender stems of the vine. And every bunch of fruit has a double leaf as a shield; and it is very green, like the green of me."—Cosmos, Book xi.

c. 870.—"The mariners say every bunch of pepper has over it a leaf that shelters it from the rain. When the rain ceases the leaf turns aside; if rain recommences the leaf again covers the fruit."—Bon Kheradzi, in Journ. As. 6th ser. tom. v. 284.

1166.—"The trees which bear this fruit are planted in the fields which surround the towns, and every one knows his plantation. The trees are small, and the pepper is originally white, but when they collect it they put it into basons and pour hot water upon it; it is then exposed to the heat of the sun, and dried... in the course of which process it becomes of a black colour."—Bibliotheca, in Wright, p. 114.

c. 1390.—"L'abore che fa il pepe è fatto con l'era che nase su per gli muri. Questo pepe sale su per gli arbori che l'umini plantano a modo de l'era, e sale sopra tutti li arbori più alti. Questo pepe fa rami a modo dell'uve... e maturo si lo vende in modo de l'uva e poi pongono il pepe al sole a seccare come uve passe, e nulla altra cosa si fa del pepe."—Odoric, in Cathay, App. xiv.

PERGUNNAH, s. Hind. pergana [Skt. pragana, 'to reckon up'], a subdivision of a 'District' (see ZILLAH).

c. 1500.—"The divisions into sāhas (see SOUEA) and perganas, which are maintained to the present day in the province of Tatta, were made by these people" (the Summa Dynasty).—Tārikh-i-Takhirī, in Elliot, i. 273.

1535.—"Hem, from the three praganas, viz., Anzor, Cairena, Punjabica 133,200 falcas."—S. Badella, Tomba, 139.

[1614.—"I wrote him to stay in the Pregonas near Agra."—Foster, Letters, ii. 106.]

[1617.—"For that Mackshad had also newly answered he had mist his prigany."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 115.]

1812.—"A certain number of villages with a society thus organised, formed a pergunnah."—Fifth Report, 16.

PERGUNNAHS. THE TWENTY-FOUR, n.p. The official name of the District immediately adjoining and including, though not administratively including, Calcutta. The name is one of a character very ancient in India and the East. It was the original Zemindary of Calcutta granted to the English Company by a 'Subadar's Perwana' in 1757-58. This grant was subsequently confirmed by the Great Mogul as an unconditional and rent-free jagheer (q.v.). The quotation from Sir Richard Phillips' Millions of Fruits, illustrates the development of 'facts' out of the moral conscious ness. The book contains many of equal value. An approximate parallel to this statement would be that London is divided into Seven Dials.

1765.—"The lands of the twenty-four Purgunahs, ceded to the Company by the treaty of 1757, which subsequently became Colonel J.G."s jaggery, were rated on the King's books at 2 lac and 22,000 rupees."

1812. — "The number of convicts confined at the six stations of this division (independent of Zillah Twenty-four pergunnahs, is about 4,000. Of them probably ninetenths are dacoits." — Fifth Report, 559.

c. 1831. — "Bengal is divided in 24 Pergunnahs, each with its judge and magistrate, registrar, &c." — Sir R. Phillips, Million of Facts, stereot. ed. 1843, 927.

PERI, s. This Persian word for a class of imaginary sprites, rendered familiar in the verses of Moore and Southey, has no blood-relationship with the English Fairy, notwithstanding the exact compliance with Grimm's Law in the change of initial consonant. The Persian word is pari, from 'par, 'a feather, or wing'; therefore 'the winged one'; [so F. Johnson, Pers. Dict.; but the derivation is very doubtful] whilst the glossary of fairy is apparently Italic, fata; French féé, whence fée ("fay-dom") and thence fairy.

[e. 1504] — "I am the only daughter of a Jain chief of noblest strain and my name is Peri-Banu." — Arab. Nights, Burton, x. 264.

1809. — "From cluster'd henna, and from orange groves, That with such perfumes fill the breeze As Peris to their Sister bear, When from the summit of some lofty tree She hangs encaged, the captive of the Dives." — Thalaba, xi. 24.

1817. — "But nought can charm the luckless Peri; Her soul is sad—her wings are weary." — Moore, Paradise and the Peri.

PERPET, PERPETUANO, s. The name of a cloth often mentioned in the 17th and first part of the 18th centuries, as an export from England to the East. It appears to have been a light and glossy twilled stuff of wool, which like another stuff of the same kind called 'Lasting,' took its name from its durability. (See Draper's Dict. e.v.) In France it was called perpetuane or semperite, in Italy perpetuana.

[1617. — "Perpetuano, 1 bale." — Cock's Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 293.

[1963. — "Perpetuano." — Ibid. ii. 491.]

1711. — "Goods usually imported (to China) from Europe are Bulfin Cloths, Clothreno Perpetuanos, and Camblets of Scarlet, black, blue, gold, green and violet colours, which are of late so lightly set by; that to bear the Duties, and bring the prime Cost, is as much as can reasonably be hoped for." — Lockyer, 147.

[1717. — "... a Pavilion lined with Jumbo'd Perpetas." — In Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cclxxi.]

1754. — "Being requested by the Trustees of the Charity Stock of this place to make an humble application to you for an order that the children upon the Foundation to the number of 12 or 14 may be supplied at the expense of the Honorable Company with a coat of blue Perpet, or some other ordinary cloth." — Petition of Real. R. Maplestort, in Long. p. 29.

1757. — "Among the presents sent to the King of Ava with the mission of Ensign Robert Lester, we find:

"2 Pieces of ordinary Red Broad Cloth.
3 Do. of Perpetuanos Popingay." — In Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 263.

PERSAIM. n.p. This is an old form of the name of Bassein (q.v.) in Pegu. It occurs (e.g.) in Milburn, ii. 281.

1759. — "The Country for 20 miles round Persam is represented as capable of producing Rice, sufficient to supply the Coast of Choroman del'm from Pondicherry to Musulipatam." — Letter in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 110. Also in a Chart by Capt. G. Baker, 1754.

1795. — "Having ordered presents of a trivial nature to be presented, in return for those brought from Negrais, he referred the deputy ... to the Birman Governor of Persam for a more accurate and final adjustment of the treaty." — Wharton, p. 49, But this author also uses Bassein (e.g. 32), and Persam or Bassein (39), which alternatives are also in the chart by Ensign Wood.

PERSIMMON, s. This American name is applied to a fruit common in China and Japan, which in a dried state is imported largely from China into Tibet. The tree is the Diospyros kaki, L. fil., a species of the same genus which produces ebony. The word is properly the name of an American fruit and tree of the same genus (D. virginiana), also called date-plum, and, according to the Dictionary of Worcester, belonged to the Indian language of Virginia. [The word became familiar in 1896 as the name of the winner of the Derby.]

1878. — "The finest fruit of Japan is the Kaki or persimmon (Diospyros Kaki), a large golden fruit on a beautiful tree."—Miss Bird's Japan, i. 234.

PERUMBAUCUM, n.p. A town 14 m. N.W. of Conjevaram, in the district of Madras [Chingleput]. The name is perhaps perum-pakkam, Tam., 'big village.'

PESCARIA, n.p. The coast of Timevelly was so called by the Portuguese, from the great pearl 'fishery' there.

[6, 1546.—See under BAZAAR.]

1600.—"There are in the Seas of the East three principal nursies where they fish pearls. ... The third is between the Isle of Ceilon and Cape Comony, and on this account the coast which runs from the said Cape to the shoals of Ramanancor and Manur is called, in part, Pescaria. ..."—Lavina, 50.

[1616.—"Pescueria." See under CHILAW.]

1615.—"Iam nonnulli de oras Piscarien dicamus quae iam inde a prontoriori Comorino in Orientem ad aequum breviam Mananacordis extenditur, quod haud prorsis inde celeberrimus, maximus, et copiosissimus toto Orientali Margaritarno piscatus instituitur. ..."—Jurie, Thes. i. 445.

1710.—"The Coast of the Pescaria of the mother of pearl which runs from the Cape of Comorina to the Isle of Manar, for the space of seventy leagues, with a breadth of six inland, was the first debarkation of this second conquest."—Sonn, Orient, Conquest, i. 122.

PESHAWUR, n.p. Pashawur. This name of what is now the frontier city and garrison of India towards Kabul, is sometimes alleged to have been given by Akbar. But in substance the name is of great antiquity, and all that can be alleged as to Akbar is that he is said to have modified the old name, and that since his time the present form has been in use. A notice of the change is quoted below from Gen. Cunningham; we cannot give the authority on which the statement rests. Peshawar could hardly be called a frontier town in the time of Akbar, standing as it did according to the administrative division of the Ain, about the middle of the Sula of Kabul, which included Kashmir and all west of it. We do not find that the modern form occurs in the text of the Ain as published by Prof. Blochmann. In the translation of the Tabakat-i-Akbari of Nizamu-d-din Ahmad (died 1584-95), in Elliot, we find the name transliterated variously as Pashawar (v. 448), Pashawer (293), Parskor (423), Pershor (424). We cannot doubt that the Chinese form Falasha in Fah-hian already expresses the name Parshavor, or Parshawar.

c. 400.—"From Gandhara, going south 4 days' journey, we arrive at the country of Fo-lau-sha. In old times Buddh, in company with all his disciples, travelled through this country."—Fah-hian, by Beal, p. 34.

c. 630.—"The Kingdom of Kien-to-lo (Gandhara) extends about 1000 li from E. to W. and 800 li from S. to N. On the East it adjoins the river Sin (Indus). The capital of this country is called Pu-lu-sha-pu-lo (Purshapura). ... The towns and villages are almost deserted. ... There are about a thousand convents, ruined and abandoned, full of wild plants, and presenting only a melancholy solitude. ..."—Hsuen T'ang (P.L. Bond, ii. 104-105.

c. 1001.—"On his (Mahmoud's) reaching Peshawur, he pitched his tent outside the city. There he received intelligence of the bold resolve of Jaipal, the enemy of God and the King of Hind, to offer opposition."—Al-I'fil, in Elliot, ii. 23.

c. 1020.—"The aggregate of these waters forms a large river opposite the city of Pershawar."—Al-Biruni, in Elliot, i. 47. See also 63.

1059.—"The Amir ordered a letter to be despatched to the minister, telling him he had determined to go to Hindustan, and pass the winter in Wahind, and Marmarana and Brashur. ..."—Bakhti, in Elliot, i. 150.

c. 1220.—"Parsbhor. The vulgar pronunciation is Barshawor. A large tract between Ghazna and Lahor, famous in the history of the Mussulman conquest."—Yafah in Barbier de Meynard, Dict. de la Perse, 418.

1519.—"We held a consultation, in which it was resolved to plunder the country of the Aferdi Afghans, as had been proposed by Sultan Bayzid, to fit up the fort of Pershawor for the reception of their effect and corn, and to leave a garrison in it."—Baber, 276.

c. 1555.—"We came to the city of Parswar, and having thus fortunately passed the Kotiel we reached the town of Joshayi; on the Kotiel we saw rhinoceroses, the sin of a small elephant."—Sidi 'Ali, in J. A. Ser. i. tom. ix. 201.

c. 1590.—"Tumun Bagram, which is the call of Parswar; the spring here is a source of delight. There is in this place a great place of worship which they call Gorkhata to which people, especially Jogiis, reso from great distances."—Tio (orig.), i. 58; ed. Joveret, ii. 101. In iii. 69, Parshawor.

1754.—"On the news that Peishor was taken, and that Nadir Shah was prepared to pass the Indus, the Moghul court already in great disorder, was struck with terror."—H. of Nadir Shah, in Howrey, 363.
1783.— "The heat of Peshour seemed to me more intense, than that of any country I have visited, in the upper parts of India. Other places may be warm; but hot winds blowing over tracts of sand may drive us under the shelter of a wetted skreen; but at Peshour, the atmosphere, in the summer solstice, becomes almost insupportable." — T. Forster, ed. 1805, ii. 57.

1657.— "... in. ... hath breathed, designate a complete establishment, PESH-KHANA. ... the. ... probably Pers. Wilson 1863. ... but I. ... an. " — Cunningham, Arch. Reports, ii. 57. Gladwin does in his translation give both names; but see above.

PESH-CUBEZ. s. A form of dagger, the blade of which has a straight thick back, while the edge curves inwardly from a broad base to a very sharp point. Pers. pesh-lov, 'fore-grip.' The handle is usually made of shir-mahdi, 'the white bone (tooth?) of a large cetacean'; probably mouse-tooth, which is repeatedly mentioned in the early English trade with Persia as an article much in demand (e.g. see Stanbury, ii. 63, 159, 204, 305 ; iii. 89, 162, 268, 287, &c.). [The peshkuzh appears several times in Mr. Egerton's Catalogue of Indian Arms, and one is illustrated, Pl. xv. No. 760.]

1767.— "Received for sundry jewels, &c. ... Ditto for knife, or peshchub (misprinted peshkod). ... Lord Clive's Accounts, in Long, 497.

PESH-CUZ. s. Pers. pesh-kash. Wilson interprets this as literally first-fruits. It is used as an offering or tribute, but with many specific and technical senses which will be found in Wilson, e.g. a fine on appointment, renewal, or investiture; a quit-rent; a payment exacted on lands formerly rent-free, or in substitution for service no longer exacted; sometimes a present to a great man, or (loosely) for the ordinary Government demand on land. Peshchush, in the old English records, is most generally used in the sense of a present to a great man.

1657.— "As to the Piscash for the King of Golcundah, if it be not already done, we hope with it you may obtain our liberty to coynse silver Rupees and copper Pice at the Fort, which would be a great accomodation to our Trade. But in this and all other Piscashes he be as sparing as you can." — Letter of Court to Ft. St. Geo., in Notes and Docs, No. 1. p. 7.

1673.— "Sometimes sending Piscashes of considerable value." — Ferg., 166.

1675.— "Being informed that Mr. Mohun had sent a Piscash of Persian Wine. Cases of Stronge Water, &c. to ye Great Gouvernor of this Countrey, that is 2d. or 3d. pin on ye kingdome, I went to his house to speake abt. it, when he kept me to dine with him." — Puckell's Diary, MS. in India Office.

1863.— "Piscash." (See under FIR-MAUN.)

1869.— "But the Pischushes or Presents expected by the Nabobs and Onkals retarded our Inlandage for some time notwithstanding." — Grington, 415.

1754.— "After I have refreshed my army at DELHIE and received the subsidy (Vld). — This is called a Pischcush, or present from an inferior to a superior. The sum agreed for was 20 crores') which must be paid. I will leave you in possession of his dominion." — Hist. of Nadir Shah, in Har-vey, ii. 371.

1791.— "I have obtained a promise from his Majesty of his royal confirmation of all your possessions and privileges, provided you pay him a proper pischchush. ..." — Major Carnac to the Governor and Council, in Van Stiart, i. 119.

1851.— "By the fixed or regulated sum. ... the Sultan ... means the Peischush, or tribute, which he was bound by former treaties to pay to the Government of Poonaah: but which he does not think proper to. ... designate by any term denotive of inferiority, which the word Pischcush certainly is." — Kirkpatrick, note on Tipper's Letters, p. 9.

PESH-KHANA. PESH-KHID-MAT. ss. Pers. 'Fore-service.' The tents and accompanying retinue sent on over-night, during a march, to the new camping ground, to receive the master on his arrival. A great personage among the natives, or among ourselves, has a complete double establishment, one portion of which goes thus every night in advance. [Another term used is peshkhaima Pers. 'advance tents,' as below.]

1665.— "When the King is in the field, he hath usually two Camps ... to the end that when he breaketh up and leaveth one, the other may have passed before by a day and be found ready when he arriveth at the place design'd to encamp at ... and tis therefore that they are called Peiche-kanes, as if you should say, Houses going before. ..." — Bever. E.T. 115; [ed. Compass, 559].

1785.— "Peish-khanna is the term given to the royal tents and their appendages in India." — Harvey, iv. 155.
PESHWÁ. s. from Pers. 'a leader, a guide.' The chief minister of the Maharatta power, who afterwards, supplanting his master, the descendant of Sivaji, became practically the prince of an independent State and chief of the Maharattas. The Peshwa's power expired with the surrender to Sir John Malcolm of the last Peshwa, Baji Rao, in 1817. He lived in wealthy exile, and with a jígír under his own jurisdiction, at Bhígír, near Cawnpooor, till January 1851. His adopted son, and the claimant of his honours and allowances, was the infamous Náma Sálibh. Mr C. P. Brown gives a feminine peshwín: ‘The princess Gángá Báí was Peshwín of Purandarh.' (MS. notes.)

1673.—'He answered, it is well, and referred our Business to Móro Pénádhis Peshwá, or Chancellor, to examine our Articles, and give an account of what they were.'—Péreys, 70.

1863.—'But how is it with the Peshwáh? He has no minister; no person has influence over him, and he is only guided by his own caprices.'—Wellington Desp., ed. 1837, ii, 177.

In the following passage (quandoquidem dormíntes) the Great Duke had forgotten that things were changed since he left India, whilst the editor perhaps did not know:

1811.—'If you should draw more troops from the Establishment of Fort St. George, you will have to place under arms the subsidiary force of the Nizam, the Peishwáh, and the force in Mysore, and the districts ceded by the Nizam in 1800-1801.'—Letter from the D. of Wellington, in Hist. Asia of Lord Ellenborough, 1871, (Dec. 29). The Duke was oblivious when he spoke of the Peshwa's Subsidiary Force in 1841.

PETERSILLY. s. This is the name by which 'parsley' is generally called in N. India. We have heard it quoted there as an instance of the absurd corruption of English words in the mouths of natives. But this case at least might more justly be quoted as an example of accurate transfer. The word is simply the Dutch term for 'parsley,' viz. petersilie, from the Lat., petúsilínum, of which parsley is itself a double corruption through the French persil. In the Arabic of Avicenna the name is given as fatruslíun.

PETTAH. s. Tam. pêtta. The extramural suburb of a fortress, or the town attached and adjacent to a fortress. The pettah is itself often separately fortified; the fortress is then its citadel. The Mahratti peth is used in like manner; [it is Skt. petáka, and the word possibly came to the Tamil through the Mahr.]. The word constantly occurs in the histories of war in Southern India.

1630.—'Azam Khán, having ascended the Pass of Anjan-durg, encompassed 3 kos from Dhárrír. He then directed Mahátatt Khán . . . to make an attack upon . . . Dhárrír and its petta, where once a week people from all parts, far and near, were accustomed to meet for buying and selling.'—Abdul Hamíd, in Elliot, vii, 20.

1763.—'The pagoda served as a citadel to a large pettah, by which name the people on the Coast of Coromandel call every town contiguous to a fortress.'—Orme, ed. 1803, i, 147.

1791.—' . . . The petta or town (at Bangalore of great extent to the north of the fort, was surrounded by an indifferdent rampart and excellent ditches, with an intermediate berm . . . planted with impendrable and well-grown thorns. . . Neither the fort nor the petta had drawbridges.'—Wilks, Hist. Sketches, iii, 123.

1803.—'The pettal wall was very lofty, and defended by towers, and had no rampart.'—Wellington, ed. 1837, ii, 193.

1809.—'I passed through a country little cultivated . . . to Kingeri, which has a small mud-fort in good repair, and a pettah apparently well filled with inhabitants.'—Ed. Valérie, i, 112.

1839.—'The English ladies told me this Pettah was 'a horrid place—quite native!' and advised me never to go into it; so I went next day, of course, and found it most curious—really quite native.'—Letters from Madras, 289.

PHANSEEGAR. s. See under THUG.

[PHOOLKAREE, s. Hind. phálāírī, 'flowered embroidery.' The term applied in N. India to the cotton sheets embroidered in silk by village women, particularly Jats. Each girl is supposed to embroider one of these for her marriage. In recent years a considerable demand has arisen for specimens of this kind of needlework among English ladies, who use them for screens and other decorative purposes. Hence a considerable manufacture has sprung up of which an account will be found in a note by Mrs. F. A. Steel, appended to Mr.
H. C. Cookson's Monograph on the Silk Industry of the Punjab (1886-7), and in the Journal of Indian Art, ii. 71 seqq.

[1887. — "They (native school girls) were collected in a small inner court, which was hung with the pretty phularees they make here (Rawal Pindi), and which looked very Oriental and gay." — Lady Dufferin, Victorian Life, 336.]

[1791. — The East India Calendar (p. 131) has "John Church, Phoorza-Master, Surat."]

[1742. — "But as they still insisted on their people sitting at the gates on the Phoorzer Cosky . . . Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 386, and see 392. "Phoorze Master." Cosky, and see 18. — Mahr. Khaskhi, "inland transit-duties."]

[1813. — " . . . idols . . . were annually imported to a considerable number at the Baroche Phoorza, when I was custom-master at that settlement." — Forbes, or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 334.]

PIAL, s. A raised platform on which people sit, usually under the verandah, or on either side of the door of the house. It is a purely S. Indian word, and partially corresponds to the N. Indian chabutra (see CHABOOTRA). Wilson conjectures the word to be Telugu, but it is in fact a form of the Portuguese povo and poyel (Span. poyo), 'a seat or bench.' This is again, according to Diez (i. 326), from the Lat. podium, 'a projecting base, a balcony.' Bluteau explains poyel as 'steps for mounting on horseback' (Scotti, 'a lounging-on stone') [see Dalboquerpa, Hak. Soc. ii. 65]. The quotation from Mr. Gover describes the S. Indian thing in full.

1553. — " . . . paying him his courtesy in Moorish fashion, which was seating himself along with him on a poyal." — Castlereagh, ii. 3.

1578. — "In the public square at Goa, as it was running furiously along, an infant man came in its way, and could not escape; but the elephant took him up in his trunk, and without doing him any hurt deposited him on a poyo." — Acosta, Tractado, 332.

1602. — "The natives of this region who are called Iaos, are men so arrogant that they think no others their superiors . . . so much that if a lasso in passing along the street becomes aware that any one of another nation is on a poyal, or any place above him, if the person does not immediately come down . . . until he is gone by, he will kill him." — Croft, IV. iii. 1. [For numerous instances of this superstition, see Fraser, Goldin Bough, 2nd ed. i. 399 seqq.]

1873. — "Built against the front wall of every Hindoo house in southern India . . . is a bench 9 feet high and as many broad. It extends along the whole frontage, except where the house-door stands. The posts of the veranda or pandal are fixed in the ground a few feet in front of the bench, enclosing a sort of platform: for the base-ment of the house is generally 2 or 3 feet above the street level. The raised bench is called the Pyal, and is the lounging-place by day. It also serves in the hot months as a couch for the night. . . . There the visitor is received: there the bargaining is done; there the bargainer places his trade, and the Yog (see JOGEE) sounds his conch: there also the members of the household clean their teeth, amusing themselves the while with belches and other frightful noises. . . . — Pyal Schools in Modern, by E. C. Goea, in Ind. Antiq. ii. 52.

PICAR, s. Hind. pākār, [which again is a corruption of Pers. pā-kār, pūtī, 'a foot'], a retail-dealer, an intermediate dealer or broker.

1690. — "Picar." See under DUSTOOR.

1693. — "Ye said Naylor has always corresponded with Mr. Chartouck, having been always his intimate friend; and without question either provides him goods out of the Hon. Cump. Warehouse, or connives at the Weavers and Picars doing of it." — Hodges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 193.

[1772. — "Pykārs (Deollo) (see DEOLL) and (Guastals) are a chain of agents through whose hands the articles of merchandize pass from the door of the manufacturer, or the store-house of the cultivator, to the public merchant, or exporter." — Verdel, "Pie of Bengal, Gloss. s.v."]

PICE, s. Hind. pīst, a small copper coin, which under the Anglo-Indian system of currency is 1/12 of an anna, 1/2 of a rupee, and somewhat less than 1/2 of a farthing. Pice is used slangishly for money in general. By Act XXIII. of 1870 (ed. 8) the following copper coins are current:—1. Double Pice or Half-anna. 2. Pice or 1/2 anna. 3. Half-pice or 1/4 anna. 4. Pīc or 1/8 anna. No. 2 is the only one in very common use. As with most other coins, weights, and measures, there used to be pucka pice, and cutcha pice. The distinction was sometimes between the regularly minted copper of the Government and certain amorphous pieces of copper.
PICOTA, s. An additional allowance or percentage, added as a handicup to the weight of goods, which varied with every description—and which the editor of the 'Subsidios' supposes to have lead to the varieties of bahar (q.v.). Thus at Ormuz the bahar was of 20 farinolas (see FRAZALA), to which was added, as picota, for cloves and mace 3 maunds (of Ormuz), or about \( \frac{1}{2} \) additional:

\[ \text{for cinnamon} \quad \frac{1}{2} \text{ additional; for benzoin} \quad \frac{1}{2} \text{ additional,
&c. See the Peas,
&c. of A. Nunes (1554) passim. We have not been able to trace the origin of this term, nor any modern use.} \]

\[ [1554.—"Picotta." (See under BRAZIL-WOOD, DOOCAUN.)] \]

PICOTTAH, s. This is the term applied in S. India to that ancient machine for raising water, which consists of a long lever or yard, pivotted on an upright post, weighted on the short arm and bearing a line and bucket on the long arm. It is the dhakli of Upper India, the shuluf of the Nile, and the old English sweep, swipe, or sweep-pole. The machine is we believe still used in the Terra Incognita of market-gardens S.E. of London. The name is Portuguese, picota, a marine term now applied to the handle of a ship's pump and post in which it works—a 'pump-break.'
The picota at sea was also used as a pillory, whence the employment of the word as quoted from Correa. The word is given in the Glossary attached to the "Fifth Report" (1812), but with no indication of its source.
Fryer (1673, pub. 1698) describes the thing without giving it a name. In the following word is used in the marine sense:

\[ 1524.—'He (V. da Gama) ordered notice to be given that no seaman should wear a cloak, except on Sunday . . . and if he did, that it should be taken from him by the constables (les serva tomarola polos devirrakes), and the man put in the picota disgrace, for one day. He found great fault with men of military service wearing cloaks, for in that guise they did not look like soldiers.' —Correa, Lendas, ii. ii. 222. \]

\[ 1582.—'Pour cet effet (arroser les terres) on emploie une machine appelée Picotte.
C'est une bascule dressée sur le bord d'un puits ou d'un réservoir d'eau pluviale, pour en tirer l'eau, et la conduire ensuite on l'vent.' —Nouveau, Voyage, i. 188. \]

\[ c. 1590.—'Partout les pakotés, ou puis as bascule, étaient en mouvement pour fournir leur nécessaire aux plantes, et partout on entendait les jardiniers égayer leurs travaux des chansons.' —Hauff, ii. 217. \]

\[ 1607.—'In one place I saw people employed in watering a rice-field with the Yahan, or Pacota, as it is called by the English.' —Buchanan, Journey through Myan-yar, &c., i. 15. [Here Yahan, Is Can. yabo
Tel. elama, Mal. Allam.] \]

\[ 1871.—"Aye, e'en picotta, work would gain
By using such hampcoos."—
Gove, Folk Songs of S. India, 181.]
PIE, s. Hind. पीटि, the smallest copper coin of the Anglo-Indian currency, being $\frac{1}{10}$ of an anna, $\frac{1}{10}$ of a rupee, about 4 1/2 a farthing. This is now the authorised meaning of pie. But पीटि was originally, it would seem, the fourth part of an anna, and in fact identical with pice (q.v.). It is the H.-Mahr. पिटि, a quarter of a rupee, or $\frac{1}{3}$ of a rupee. [Con. of an Order, 201.]

PIE-GOODS. This, which is now the technical term for Manchester cottons imported into India, was originally applied in trade to the Indian cottons exported to England, a trade which appears to have been deliberately killed by the heavy duties which Lancashire procured to be imposed in its own interest, as in its own interest it has recently procured the abolition of the small import duty on English piece-goods in India.* In 1859 a duty at the rate of 3 per cent. on cotton goods was reimposed.

* It is an easy assumption that this export trade from India was killed by the development of machinery in England. We can hardly doubt that this cause would have killed it in time. But it was not left to any such his own and natural death. Much time would be required to trace the whole of this episode of ancient history. But it is certain that this Indian trade was not killed by natural causes. It was as dead, as dead to this day, as the industries were in 1759 that they were declared to operate as a premium on smuggling, and they were closed to 15 per cent. ad valorem. In the year 1765 the value of piece-goods from India in England was £2,677,241, or one-third of the whole value of the imports from India, which was £8,262,905. And in the sixteen years between 1765 and 1781 (inclusive) the imports of Indian piece-goods amounted in value to £26,171,545. In 1750 the duties were raised. I need not give details, but will come down to 1814, just before the close of the war, when they were at a maximum. The duties then on "manilla" and "calicoes," were—

There was an Excise Duty upon British manufactured and printed goods of 3 d. per square yard, and, it is thought, that amount on foreign (Indian) called and printed goods. But it is denied, and the whole of both duty and excise upon such goods was recovered as drawback upon re-exportation. But on the exportation of Indian-wholes there was a drawback to the value of 1/2 per cent. of the duties printed in India were at the time, a serious and practical question. The duties upon goods at the time were—

The

In Sir A. Arthure's publication of Sir T. Munro's M. A., he states that he wrote a letter of Murrays to his friend in Scotland, written about 1763, which shows him surprisingly before his time in the matter of Free Trade,DELA, with reference to certain measures of Mr. Haldane's. The passage reads thus: "India is the country that has been responsible for the reformed arrangements of the trade. All her prohibitions of cottons and piece-goods have been removed freely into India, upon paying the same duties, and much more, which English duties (manufacturers) pay in India. When I see what is done in Parlia dem in India, I am ready to recommend the abolition of the duties now paid by the English in the Bengal Districts of the Carnatic and the Frontier.

Sir A. Arbuthnot adds a very appropriate passage from a note by the late Prof. H. H. Wilson in his continuation of James Mill's History of India (1843, vol. i, pp. 383-388), a passage which we also gladly insert here:

"It was stated in evidence (p. 134) that the cotton and silk goods of India, up to this period, could be sold for about 3/4 of the 18th cent. prices in India, and that the goods imported from England might have been sold in India at 5/10th of the 18th cent. prices in England, and had not been sold in India at a price of 50 to 60 per cent. lower than they were manufactured in England. It consequently became necessary to protect the latter by duties of 17 per cent. or 30 per cent. on unmanufactured goods. Had this not been the case, it is not unlikely that the English duties had been imposed, and that the profits of the English would have disappeared entirely. This act of self-defence was not permitted, as it was at the mercy of the manufacturers, and it is probable that the goods were sold without paying any duty, and the foreign manufacturer enjoyed the arm of political injustice too long, and ultimately engaged a competitor with whom he could not contend on equal terms."

Lists of the various kinds of Indian piece-goods will be found in Milburn (i. 44, 45, 46, and ii. 90, 221), and we assemble them below. It is not in our power to explain their peculiarities, except in very few cases, found under their proper heading. [In the present edition these lists have been arranged in alphabetical order. The figures before each indicate that they fall into the following classes: 1. Piece-goods formerly exported from Bombay and Surat; 2. Piece-goods exported from Madras and the Coast; 3. Piece-goods; the kinds imported into Great Britain from Bengal. Some notes and quotations have been added. But it must be understood that the classes of goods now known under these names may or may not exactly represent those made at the time when these lists were prepared. The names printed in capitals are discussed in separate articles.]

1865.—"I have sometimes stood amazed at the vast quantity of Cotton-Goods of all sorts, fine and others, tinted and white, and manufactured in..."
which the Hollanders alone draw from thence and transport into many places, especially into Jagna and Europe; not to mention what the English, Portingal and Indian merchants carry away from those parts."—Brenter, E.T. 111; [ed. Constable, 439].

1755.—(Res. of Court of Directors of the E.I.C., 8th October) "... that the Captains and Officers of all ships that shall sail from any part of India, after receiving notice hereof, shall be allowed to bring 9000 pieces of piece-goods and more . . . that 3000 pieces and no more, may consist of white Muslins and Callictees, stitched or plain, or either of them, of which 2000 pieces only 2000 may consist of any of the following sorts, viz., Allibalis, Alivaks (i), Costees, Dorais, Jundamnies, Madwlaa, Mansooks, Necklaths, Tungalls, and Terrindains, and that 3000 pieces and no more, may consist of coloured piece-goods. . . ."

[Abravan. P. al-i-rivadun, "flowing water"; a very fine kind of Dacca muslin. "Woven air" is the name applied in the Ardabun "Nigile to the Patna gauzes, a term originally used for the produce of the Com looms (India, 1785.)." The Hindoos use it with two stories, as instances of the fineness of this muslin. One, that the Emperor Aurungzebe was angry with his daughter for exposing her skin through her clothes; whenupon the young princess remonstrated in her justification that she had seven jamoahs (see JAMMA) or suits on; and another, in the Nabob Allavurey Khaun's time a weaver was chastised and turned out of the city for his neglect, in not preventing his cow from eating up a piece of abroon which he had spread and carelessly left on the grass."—Bolt, Considerations on Affairs of India, 206.

3. ADATIS.

3. ALLEJAS.

3. Allibalis. — "Alabell (signifying according to the weavers' interpretation of the word, 'very fine') is a muslin of fine texture." (J. Taylor, Account of the Cotton Manufacture of India, 45). According to this the word is perhaps from Ar. a'în, 'superior,' H. 'îbah, 'good.'

3. Allibanees.—Perhaps from a'lâ, 'superior,' bâna, 'woof.'

1. Annabatichies.

3. Arrahs.—Perhaps from the place of that name in Shahabad, where, according to Buchanan Hamilton (Eastern India, i. 548) there was a large cloth industry.

3. Aubrahs.

2. Aunneketchies.

3. BAFTAS.

3. BANDANNAS.

1. Eejutapauts. — H. be-jîra, 'without join,' pat, 'a piece.'

1. BETTEELAS.

3. Blue cloth.

1. Bombay Stuffs.

1. Brawi.—The N.E.D. describes Brawi as "the blue and white striped cloth manufactured in India." In a letter of 1616 (Forster, iv, 306) we have "Lolwee chammell and Burral." The editor suggests H. biral, 'open in texture, fine.' But Roquefort (s.v.) gives : "Bore, Burel, grosse étroite en laine de couleur rose ou grisâtre, dont s'habillent ordinairement les rameonneurs; cette étroite est faite de brebis noire et brute, sans aucune autre teinture." And see N. E. D. s.v. Borel.

3. Byrampaus. (See BEIRAMEL).

3. Callawapores.

3. Callipatties.—H. Kâlt, 'black,' patt, 'strip.'

3. CAMBAYS.

3. Cambries.

3. Carpets.

3. Carridaries.

2. Cattaketchies.

1. Chalies. (See under SHALEE.)

3. Charconnaes.—H. char-khânda, 'chequered.' "The char-khâna, or chequered muslin, is, as regards manufacture, very similar to the Doorea (see DOREAS below). They differ in the breadth of the stripes, their closeness to each other, and the size of the pattern, (Forbes Watson, Textile Man., 78). The same name is now applied to a silk cloth. "The word char-khâna simply means 'a check,' but the term is applied to certain silk or mixed fabrics containing small checks, usually about 8 or 10 checks in a line to an inch." (Yusuf Ali, Mus. on Silk, 93. Also see Journ. Ind. Art. iii. 6.)

1683.—"20 yards of charkonnas."—In Yule, Hedg's Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 94.

2. Chavonies.

1. Chelhoes. (See SHALEE.)

3. Chinechuras.—Probably cloth from Chiarsinga.

1. CHINTZ, of sorts.

3. Chittabullies.

3. Chowtars.—This is almost certainly not identical with Chudder. In a list of cotton cloths in the tin (i. 93) we have chautar, which may mean 'made with four threads or wires.' Chaut台风, 'four-fold,' is a kind of cloth used in the Punjab for counterpanes (Francis, Mus. Cotton, 7). This cloth is frequently mentioned in the early letters.

1610.—"Chautares are white and well requested."—Howers, Letters, i. 75.

1614.—"The Chauters of Agra and fine batas nyll doth not here vend."— Foster, Letters, ii. 45.

1615.—"Four pieces fine white Cowter."—Ibid. iv. 51.

3. Chuclaes.—This may be H. chukhâ, cloth, which Platts defines as "a kind of cloth made of silk and cotton."" 3. Chunderbannies.—This is perhaps H. chunder, "the moon," bâna, 'woof.'

3. Chundraconas.—Forbes Watson has: "Chunderbanna, second quality muslin for handkerchiefs": "Plain white bleached muslin called Chunderbanna." The word is probably chundakhâna, 'moon checks.'

3. Clouts, common coarse cloth, for which H. chowta, (N. E. D.)

3. Coopees.—This is perhaps H. kapâin, kapâ, 'the small lungoot worn by Fakires.'

3. Corahs.—H. korî, 'plain, unbleached, undery. What is now known as Kora silk is woven in pieces for waist-cloths (see Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 76).

3. Cossaeas.—This perhaps represents Ar. khīsa 'special.' In the *Tih we have khdag in the list of cotton cloths (i. 94). Mr. Taylor describes it as a muslin of a close fine texture, and identifies it with the fine muslin which, according to the Tih (ii. 124), was produced at Sonargaon. The finest kind he says is "jungle khīsa." (Taylor, op. cit. iii. 82).

3. Cushtaes.—These perhaps take their name from Kushṭa, a place of considerable trade in the Nadiya District.

3. Cuttanees. (See COTTON.)

1. Dhoties. (See DHOTY.)

1. Diapers.

3. Dimittes.

3. Doreas.—H. doriya, 'striped cloth,' dor, 'thread.' In the list in the Tih (i. 96), doriya appears among cotton stuffs. It is often given as a part of the name, so that the simplest pattern is the stripe; when the stripes are longitudinal the fabric is a doriya. ... The doriya was originally a cotton fabric, but it is now manufactured in silk, silk-and-cotton, *tašeer, and other combinations." (Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 57, 94).

1853.—"3 pieces Doorees." —H. dyes.

Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 94.

3. DOSOOTIES.

3. DUNGAREES.

3. Dysucksoys.

3. Eliatches.—Platts gives H. Echā, 'a kind of cloth woven of silk and thread so as to present the appearance of cardammum (dīkhā)." But it is not certain that it is identical with aleja. It was probably introduced to Agra, where now alone it is made, by the Moghuls. It differs from doriya (see DOREAS above) in having a substantial texture, whereas the doriya is generally lineny. (Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 96).

3. Emmerties.—This is H. amreti, inamreti, 'sweat as nectar.'

2. GINHAMS.

2. Ginileos (dimities).—There is a place of the name in the Neihgberry District, but it does not seem to have any cloth manufacture.

1. GUINEA STUFFS.

3. Gurrahs.—This is probably the H. gōdha: "unbleached fabrics which under names varying in different localities, constitute a large proportion of the clothing of the poor. They are used also for packing goods, and as a covering for the dead, for which last purpose a large quantity is employed both by Hindus and Mahomedans. These fabrics in Bengal pass under the name of garha and guzes." (Forbes Watson, op. cit. 8)

3. Habassies.—Probably P. ubasā, used of cloths dyed in a sort of magenta colour. The recipe is given by Hoob. Mon. on Dyeing in *loc. cit. 16.

3. Herbas Tadetties.—These are cloths made of Grass-cloth.

3. Humhums. from Ar. humān, 'a Turkish bath'... (apparently so named from its having been originally used at the bath), is a cloth of a thick stout texture, and generally worn as a wrapper in the cold season." (Taylor, op. cit. 83).

3. Jarees.—P. far, 'drawers, trousers.' Watson (op. cit. 57, note) says that in some places it is peculiar to men, the women's drawers being Turvees. Herklots (Dravvoor-Island, App. xiv.) gives saree as equivalent to shulwār, like the pyjama, but not so wide.

3. Jardaxies.—P. H. jandīrī, which is said to be properly jandīshā, a box-robe holding a suit. The jandīshā is a loosely figured muslin which Taylor (op. cit. i. 84) calls "the most expensive productions of the Dacca looms.

3. Jamwars. H. jumwār, 'sufficient for a dress.' It is not easy to say what stuff is intended by this name. In the Tih (ii. 24) we have jamākhādī, mentioned among Guzerat stuffs worked in gold thread, and again (i. 95) *jamwār *H. Farvār among woolen stuffs. Forbes Watson gives among Kash- mir shawls: "jamwārs, or striped shawl pieces"; in the Punjab they are of a striped pattern made both in pashm and wool (Johnstone, Mon. on Wool, 9), and Mr. Kipling says, "the stripes are broad, of alternate colours, red and blue, &c." (Makharī, Art Manufactures of India, 374.)*

3. Laccowries.

3. Lemmannaes.

3. LONG CLOTHS.

3. LOONGHEES, HERBA. (See GRASS-CLOTH.)

1. LOONGHEE, MAGHRUB. Ar. maghrāb, maghrāb, 'the west.'

3. Mamooldeatis.

3. Mamoomodies. Platts gives Mamhīdī, 'praised, fine muslin.' The Tih (i. 94) calls these names among cotton cloths, and at a low price. A cloth under this name is made at Shāhābād in the Hardoi District. (Oudh Gazetteer, ii. 25.)*

2. Monepore cloths. (See MUNNO-PORE.)*

2. Moorees.—"Moories are blue cloths, principally manufactured in the districts of Nellore and at Cannur in the Chinglepur collectorate of Madras... They are largely exported to the Straits of Malacca." (Bol. jour. Celt. ii. 982.)*

1845.—"Moories superfine, 1000 pieces." —Pringle, Diary Pl. St. Crois, 41.

3. Morlagoodeties. (See MOONGA.)*

3. MULMULS.

3. Mushraus.—P. muširā, 'lawful.' It is usually applied to a kind of silk or satin with a cotton back. "Pure silk is not allowed to men, but women may wear the most sumptuous silk fabrics" (Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 80, seq.). "All Mushra wash well, especially the finer kinds, used for bodices, petticoats, and trousers of both sexes." (Forbes Watson, op. cit. 87).

1852.—"... Mushhero (striped washing silks manufactured at Benares)." —Mrs. Met. Home. All. Observations, i. 185.
3. Nainsooks.—H. nainasukh, ‘pleasure of the eye.’ A sort of fine white calico. Forbes Watson (op. cit. 76) says it is used for neckerchiefs, and Taylor (op. cit. 46) defines it as “a thick muslin, apparently identical with the tensook (tansokh, Bhiclinames, i. 94) of the Aegre.” A cloth is made of the same name in silk, imitated from the cotton fabric. (Yesso’ Ath, op. cit. 95.)

1. Negamapta.
1. Nicanees.—Quoting from a paper of 1893, Orme (Fragments, 257) has “6000 Nicanneers. 13 yards long.”
1. Nillases.—Some kind of blue cloth, H. nill, ‘blue.’
1. Nunsarees.—There is a place called Nansari in the Bhandara District (Central Provinces Gazetteer, 336).
2. Oringal (cloths).—Probably take their name from the once famous city of Warangal in Hyderabad.
2. PALAMPORES.
3. Peniascos.—In a letter quoted by Birdwood (Report on Old Records, 40) we have Pinasco, which he says are stuffs made of pine-apple fibre.
2, 3. Percanis. H. parli, ‘a spark, a piece of a glass, pieces of glass.’ These were probably some kind of spangled robe, set with pieces of glass, as some of the modern Phoolkaris are.

In the Madras Diaries of 1684-5 we have “Percollas,” and “percalles, fine” (Privile, i. 53, iii. 119, iv. 41).

3. Photoes.—In a letter of 1615 we have “Lunagees (see LOONGHEE) and Footaes of all sorts.” (Fader, Letters, i. 306), where the editor suggests H. phal, ‘variegated.’ But in the 1614 we find “Puthaks (loin-bands)” (i. 93), which is the P. fiya, and this is from the connection the word probably meant.

3. Pulecat handkerchiefs. (See MADRAS handkerchiefs and BANDANNA.)
2. Punjun.—The Madras Gloss, gives Tal. punjam, Tam. punjam, l.t., ‘a collection.’ In Tel, a collection of 60 threads and in Tam, of 120 threads skeined, ready for the formation of the warp for weaving. A cloth is denominated 10, 12, 14, up to 40 pooomun, according to the number of times 60, or else 120, is contained in the total number of threads in the warp. Poomun thus also came to mean a cloth of the length of one pooomun as usually skeined; this usual length is 36 cubits, or 18 yards, and the width from 38 to 44 inches, 11 lbs. being the common weight; pieces of half length were formerly exported as Salemproof. Watson (op. cit. 341), Hume (Tel. Names, 347) says: “Here (in Salem) two punjams are designated by ‘first call,’ so that twelve punjams of cloth is called ‘six call,’ and so on.”

3. Puteals. (See PUTTEE.) In a letter of 1610 we have: “Patta, katuyon, with red stripes over throat through.” (Dancres, Letters, i. 72.)
2. Putton Ketchies. —Cloths which possibly took their name from the city of Aihnurai in Dutch.
1727.—“That country (Teematam) produces Pepper, and coarse cloth called catchas.” —J. Hamilton, i. 335.

3. Raings.—“Rong is a muslin which resembles jhena in its transparent gauze or net-like texture. It is made by passing a single thread of the warp through each division of the reed” (Taylor, op. cit. 44.) “1 Piece of Raigins.” —Hedges, Diary. Hak. Soc. i. 94.
1. Saloopauts. (See SHALEE.)
2. Sassergates.—Some kind of cloth called ‘that of the 1000 knots,’ H. sahera grahtu, “Sassergates” (Birdwood, Rep. on Old Records, 63).
2. Sastracundees.—These cloths seem to take their name from a place called Sastrakunda, ‘Pool of the Law.’ This is probably the place named in the Itin (ed. Jarrett, i. 124): “In the township of Kiproo Naduar we have a large reservoir which gives a peculiar whiteness to the cloths washed in it.” Gladwin reads the name Catarosoudou, or Catarocundweer (see Taylor, op. cit. 91).

3. Seerbands. Seerbetties.—These are names for turbans, H. sirband, sirbati, Taylor (op. cit. 47) names them as Dacca muslins under the names of seerband and sirbati.
3. Seershands. —This is perhaps P. sir-band, ‘head-deighting,’ some kind of turban or veil.
3. Shalbafet. —P. shalbaf, ‘shawl-weaving.’ (See SHAWL.)
3. Sicktersoys. SOSIESS.
3. Subnoms. Subloms.—“Shabnam is a thin pelleda muslin to which the Persian figurative name of ‘evening dew’ (shabnama) is given, the fabric being, when spread over the blanching-field, scarcely distinguish-able from the dew on the grass.” (Taylor, op. cit. 45.)

3. Succatoons. (See SUCLAT.)
3. Taffaties of sorts. “A name applied to plain woolen silks, in more recent times signifying a light thin silk stuff with a considerable lustre or gloss” (Drapers’ Dic.

t.) The word comes from P. tello, to dye. The Aiv (i. 91) has tiothak in the list of silks.
3. Tainsooks.—H. tansokh, ‘taking ease.’ (See above under NAINSOOKS.)
3. Tanjees. P. tazeb, ‘body a dressing.’
3. “A tolerably fine muslin” (Taylor, op. cit. 46; Forbes Watson, op. cit. 76). “The silk tazeb seems to have gone out of fashion, but that in cotton is very commonly used for the chicken work in Lucknow.” (Yesso’ Ath, i. 384.)
1. Tapseiis. (See under ALLEJA.) In the Aiv (i. 91) we have: “Tiffidak (a stuff from Mecca).”
1670.—“So that in your house are only left some Tapseiis and cotton yarn.” —In Yale, Hedges’ Diary. Hak. Soc. ii, cxxviii. Birdwood in Report on Old Records, 38, has the following:

2. Tarnamatties. —“There are various kinds of muslins brought from the East Indies, chiefly from Bengal, bales of these BEETTELA) tennamatt. . . .” (Chamber’s Cyc. of 1788, quoted in 3rd ser. N. d Q.
PIG-STICKING. This is Anglo-Indian hog-hunting, or what would be called among a people delighting more in lofty expression, ‘the chase of the Wild Boar.’ When, very many years since, one of the present writers, destined for the Bengal Presidency, first made acquaintance with an Indian mess-table, it was that of a Bombay regiment at Aden—in fact of that gallant corps which is now known as the 103rd Foot, or Royal Bombay Fusiliers. Hospitable as they were, the opportunity of enlightening an aspirant Bengalee on the short-comings of his Presidency could not be foregone. The chief counts of indictment were three: 1st. The inferiority of the Bengal Horse Artillery system; 2nd. That the Bengalees were guilty of the base effeminacy of drinking beer out of champagne glasses; 3rd. That in pig-sticking they throw the spear at the boar. The two last charges were evidently ancient traditions, maintaining their ground as facts down to 1840 therefore; and showed how little communication practically existed between the Presidencies as late as that year. Both the allegations had long ceased to be true, but probably the second had been true in the 18th century, as the third certainly had been. This may be seen from the quotation from R. Lindsay, and by the text and illustrations of Williamson’s Oriental Field Sports (1807), [and much later (see below)]. There is, or perhaps we should say more diffidently there was, still a difference between the Bengal practice in pig-sticking, and that of Bombay. The Bengal spear is about 6½ feet long, loaded with lead at the butt so that it can be grasped almost quite at the end and carried with the point down, inclining only slightly to the front; the boar’s charge is received on the right flank, when the point, raised to 45° or 50° of inclination, if rightly guided, pierces him in the shoulder. The Bombay spear is a longer weapon, and is carried under the arm in a dragon’s lance. Judgment from Elphinstone’s statement below we should suppose that the Bombay as well as the Bengalee originally was to throw the spear, but that both independently discarded this, the Quí-his adopting the short overhand spear, the Ducks the long lance.

1679.—‘In the morning we went a hunting of wild Hogs with Risma Reddy, the chief man of the Islands’ (at mouth of PIG-STALL, s. This term is often applied to the Chinaman’s long plait of hair, by transfer from the queue of our grandparents, to which the name was much more appropriate. Though now universal among the Chinese, this fashion was only introduced by their Manchu conquerors in the 17th century, and was “long resisted by the natives of the Amoy and Swatow districts, who, when finally compelled to adopt the distasteful fashion, concealed the badge of slavery beneath cotton turbans, the use of which has survived to the present day.” (Giles, Glossary of Reference, 32). Previously the Chinese wore their unshaven back hair gathered in a net, or knotted in a chignon. De Rhodes (Rome, 1615, p. 5) says of the people of Tongking, that “like the Chinese they have the custom of gathering the hair in fine nets under the hat.”

1879.—“One sees a single Sikh driving four or five Chinnamen in front of him, having knotted their pigtail together for reins.”—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 283.

PILAU, PILOW, PILÁF. &c., s. Pers. pulo, or pilor, Skt. pulaid, a ball of boiled rice. A dish, in origin purely Mahommedan, consisting of meat, or fowl, boiled along with rice and spices. Recipes are given by Herklot’s, ed. 1863, App. xxix.; and in the Ain-i-Akbari (ed. Blochmann, i. 60), we have one for kina puldo (kina = lash) with several others to which the name is not given. The name is almost as familiar in England as curry, but not the thing. It was an odd circumstance, some 45 years ago, that the two surgeons of a dragoon regiment in India were called Currie and Pilou.

1616.—“Sometimes they boil pieces of flesh or hens, or other fowl, cut in pieces in their rice, which dish they call pillaw. As they order it they make it a very excellent and a very well tasted food.”—Terry, in Perkus, ii. 1471.

c. 1630.—“The feast begins: it was compounded of a hundred sorts of pepo and candied dried meats.”—Sir T. Heron, ed. 1683, p. 138, [and for varieties, p. 310].
PINANG. 711  PINDARRY.

[1603.—"... my elegant hosts were fully employed in cramming their mouths with as much Felau as they could contain."

[1673.—"They admired Dainty where with they stuff themselves is Pulow, whereof they will fill themselves to the Throat and receive no hurt, it being so well prepared for the Stomach."

PINDARRY. s. Hind. pindārī, pindātra, but of which the more original form appears to be Mahr. pindātrā, a member of a band of plunderers called in that language pindākrā and pindātra. The etymology of the word is very obscure. We may discard as a curious coincidence only, the circumstance observed by Mr. H. T. Prinsep, in the work quoted below (i. 37, note), that "Pindara seems to have the same reference to Pindaur that Kozjak has to Cassack." Sir John Malcolm observes that the most popular etymology among the natives ascribes the name to the dissolute habits of the class, leading them to frequent the shops dealing in an intoxicating drink called pinda. (One of the senses of pindát, according to Molesworth's Mahr. Dict., is 'a drink for cattle and men, prepared from Holcus sphaerum' (see JOWAUR) 'by steeping it and causing it to ferment.' Sir John adds: 'Kurreem Khan' (a famous Pindarry leader) 'told me he had never heard of any other name for the beverage; and Major Henley had the etymology confirmed by the most intelligent of the Pindarries of whom he enquired' (Central India, 2nd ed. i. 433). Wilson again considers the most probable derivation to be from the Mahr. pindāt, but in the sense of a 'bundle of rice-straw,' and hara, 'who takes,' because the name was originally applied to horsemen who hung on to an army, and were employed in collecting forage. We cannot think either of the etymologies very satisfactory. We venture another, as a plausible suggestion merely, both pindātrā in Hindi, and pindātrā-baṣaṇ in Mahr. signify 'to follow'; the latter being defined to stick closely to; to follow to the death; used of the adherence of a disagreeable fellow.' Such phrases would apply aptly to these hangers-on of an army in the field, looking out for prey. [The question has been discussed by Mr. W. Irvine in an elaborate note published in the Indian Antiq. of 1890. To the above three suggestions he adds two made by other authorities; 4. that the term was taken from the Bedar race; 5. from Pindhrâ, pind, a lump of food, ār, ‘bringer,’ a plunderer. As to the fourth suggestion, he remarks that there was a Beder race dwelling in Mysore, Belary and the Nizam’s territories. But the objection to this etymology is that as far back as 1748 both words, Bedar and Pindhrâ, are used by the native historian, Râm Singh Munshi, side by side, but applied to different bodies of men. Mr. Irvine’s suggestion is that the word Pindhrâ, or more strictly Pandhrâ, comes from a place or region called Pandhrâ or Pandhrâ. This place is referred to by native historians, and seems to have been situated between Bharâmpur and Handiya on the Nerbudda. There is good evidence to prove that large numbers of Pindaris were settled in this part of the country. Mr. Irvine sums up by saying: “If it were not for a passage in Grant Duff (II. of the Mahrattas, Bombay reprint, 157), I should have been ready to maintain that I had proved my case. My argument requires two things to make it irrefutable: (1) a very early connection between Pandhrâ and the Pindhrâs; (2) that the Pindhrâs had no early home or settlement outside Pandhrâ. As to the first point, the recorded evidence seems to go no further back than 1794, when Sendhiah granted them lands in Nimâr; whereas before that time the name had become fixed, and had even crept into Anglo-Indian vocabularies. As to the second point, Grant Duff says, and he if anybody must have known, that “there were a number of Pindhrâs about the borders of Mahârâshtra and the Carnatic . . . .” Unless these men emigrated from Khandesh about 1726 (that is a hundred years before 1826, the date of Grant Duff’s book), their presence in the South with the same name tends to disprove any special connection between their name, Pindhrâ, and a place, Pandhrâ, several hundred miles from their country. On the other hand, it is a very singular coincidence that men known as Pindhrâs should have been newly settled about 1794 in a country which had been known as Pandhrâ at least ninety years before they thus occupied it. Such a mere fortuitous connection between Pandhrâ and the Pindhrâs is so extraordinary that we may call it an impossibility. A fair inference is that the region Pandhrâ was the original home of the Pindhrâs, that they took their name from it, and that grants of land between Bharâmpur and Handiya were made to them in what had always been their home-country, namely Pandhrâ.”

The Pindaris seem to have grown up in the wars of the late Mahomedan dynasties in the Deccan, and in the latter part of the 17th century attached themselves to the Mahrattas in their revolt against Aurangzâb; the first mention which we have seen of the name occurs at this time. For some particulars regarding them we refer to the extract from Prinsep—below. During and after the Mahratta wars of Lord Wellesley’s time many of the Pindari leaders obtained grants of land in Central India from Sindia and Holkar, and in the chaos which reigned at that time outside the British territory their raids in all directions, attended by the most savage atrocities, became more and more intolerable; these outrages extended from Bundelkhand on the N.E., Kadaqa on the S., and Orisa on the S.E., to Guzerat on the W., and at last repeatedly violated British territory. In a raid made upon the coast extending from Masulipatam northward, the Pindaris in ten days plundered 339 villages, burning many, killing and wounding 682 persons, torturing 3600, and carrying off or destroying property to the amount of £250,000. It was not, however, till 1817 that the Governor-General, the Marquis of Hastings, found himself armed with permission from home, and in a position to strike at them effectually, and with the most extensive strategic combinations ever brought into action in India. The Pindaris were completely crushed, and those of the native princes who supported them compelled to submit, whilst the British power for the first time was rendered truly paramount throughout India.

1706-7. — “Zoofâgar Khan, after the ruins pursued Dhamnah, who fled to the Bejapore country, and the Khan followed him to the banks of the Kistnah. The Pinderrehs took Velore, which however was soon retaken . . . . A great caravan, coming from Aurungabad, was totally plundered and everything carried off, by a body of Mahrattas, at only 12 coss distance from the imperial camp." — Narrative of a Bondela Officer, app. to Scott's Tr. of Firishta's H. of Delhi, ii. 122. [On this see Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed., p. 62.] Mr. Irvine in the paper quoted above shows that it is doubtful if the author really used the word. "By a strange coincidence the very copy used by J. Scott is now in the British Museum. On turning to the passage I find 'Peida Badar,' a well-known man of the period, and not Pindra or Pindreek at all.]"

1792. — "Swaee Madhoo Rao . . . began to collect troops, stores, and heavy artillery, so that he at length assembled near 100,000 horse, 90,000 Pindarehs, and 50,000 matchlock foot. . . . In reference to the Pindarehs, it is not unknown that they are a low tribe of robbers entertained by some of the princes of the Dakhan, to plunder and lay waste the territories of their enemies, and to serve for guides."—H. of Hodar Nakh, by Mr. hassan Ali Khan, 149. [Mr. Irvine suspects that this may be based on a misreading as in the following quotation. The earliest mention of the name in native historians is by Rain Singh (1748). There is a doubtful reference in the Tarikh-i-Muhammad (1722-23).]

1784. — "Bindarosas, who receive no pay, but give a certain monthly sum to the commander-in-chief for permission to maraud, or plunder, under sanction of his bannars." — Indian Vocabulary, s.v.

1806. — "Depend upon it that no Pindaries or straggling horse will venture to your rear, so long as you can keep the enemy in check, and your detachment well in advance."—Wellington, ii. 219.

1823. — "On asking an intelligent old Pindary, who came to me on the part of Kurrum Khan, the reason of this absence of high character, he gave me a short and shrill answer: 'Our occupation' (said he) 'was incompatible with the fine virtues and qualities you state; and I suppose if any of our people ever had them, the first effect of such good feeling would be to make him leave our community.'"—Sir John Malcolm, Central India, i. 493.

1825. — "The name of Pindara is coeval with the earliest invasion of Hindostan by the Maharras. . . . The designation was applied to a sort of sorry cavalry that accompanied the Peshwa's armies in their expeditions, rendering them much the same service as the Cossack—perform for the armies of Russia. . . . The several leaders went over with their bands from one chief to another, as best suited their private interests, or those of their followers. . . . The rivers generally became fordable by the close of February. . . . The horses then were shod, and a leader of strict courage and conduct having been chosen as Lakhhwani, all that were inclined set forth on a foray or Lubbur, as it was called in the Pindaree nomenclature; all were mounted, though not equally well. Out of a thousand, the proportion of good cavalry might be 400: the favourite weapon was a bamboo spear . . . but . . . it was a rule that every 15th or 20th man of the fighting Pindarees should be armed with a matchlock. Of the remaining 600, 400 were usually common looties (see LOOTY), indifferently mounted, and armed with every variety of weapon, and the rest, slaves, attendants, and camp-followers, mounted on tattoos, or wild ponies, and keeping up with the Lakhhwani in the best manner they could."—Prinsep, Hist. of Pol. and Mil. Transactions (1813-1823), i. 37, note.

1829. — "The person of whom she asked this question said 'Bindarya' (see BRINDARY) . . . but the lady understood him Pindarree, and the name was quite sufficient. She jumped out of the palanquin and ran towards home, screaming, 'Pindarees. Pindarees.'"—Mem. of John Ship, ii. 251.

[1861. — "So I took to the hills of Malwa, and the free Pindarree life,"—Sir A. Lyall, The Old Pindarree.

PINE-APPLE. (See ANANAS.) [The word has been corrupted by native weavers into pinaphal or minaphal, as the name of a silk fabric, so called because of the pineapple pattern on it. (See Yousaf Ali, Mon. on Silk, 99.)]

PINJAPOLE. s. A hospital for animals, existing perhaps only in Guzerat, is so called. Guez. pinjripor or pinjrapol, [properly a cage (pinj) for the sacred bull (pola) released in the name of Siva]. See Hober, ed. 1844, ii. 120. and Orvington, 390-391: [P. della Valli, Hak. Soc. i. 67, 70. Forbes (tr. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 156) describes "the Baniyan hospital" at Surat; but they do not use this word, which Molesworth says is quite modern in Mahr.] 1808. — "Every marriage and mercantile transaction among them is taxed with a contribution for the Pinjrapole ostentiously."—R. Drummond.

PINTADO. From the Port.

a. A 'painted' (or 'spotted') cloth. i.e. chintz (q.v.). Though the word was applied, we believe, to all printed goods, some of the finer Indian chintzes were, at least in part, finished by hand-painting.

1579. — "With cloth of diverse colours, not much unlike our usual pentadoes."—Drake, World Encompassed, Hak. Soc. 143. [1602. — "... some fine pintadoes."—Birdwell, First Letter Book, 34.]
PISACHEE.

1602-5.—"... about their loynes a fine Pintadoe."—Scott's Discourse of Ine, in Porches, i. 184.

1606.—"Hear the Generall delivered a Letter from the KINGS MAESTIE of ENGLAND, with a payre standing Cuppe, and a cover double gilt, with divers of the choicest Pintadoes, which hoe kindly accepted of."—Middleton's Voyage, E. 3.

1610.—"Pintadoes of divers sorts will sell... The names are Sarassa, Berumopy, large Chaudes, Selenatt Cambiaia, Selenatt white and black, Cheat Betime and divers others."—Dawes, Letters, i. 75.

c. 1630.—"Also they stain Linnen cloth, which we call pantadoes."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 304.

1665.—"To Woodcott... where was a roome hung with Pintado, full of figures greate and small, prettily representing sundry trades and occupations of the Indians."—Evelyn's Diary, Dec. 30.

c. 1758.—"The chintz and other fine painted goods... will, if the market is not overstocked, and immediate vent, and sell for 100 p. cent."—Letter from Pyge, in Dalrymple, Or. Rps. i. 129.

b. A name (not Anglo-Indian) for the Guineafowl. This may have been given from the resemblance of the speckled feathers to a chintz. But in fact pinta in Portuguese is 'a spot,' or fleck, so that probably it only means speckled. This is the explanation of Blincken. [The word is more commonly applied to the cape Pigeon. See Mr. Gray's note on Pintado de Land, Hak. Soc, i. 21, who quotes from Fryer, p. 12.]

PISACHEE. Skt. pīśīchṛ, a she-demon, m. pīśīchā. In S. India some of the demons worshipped by the ancient tribes are so called. The spirits of the dead, and particularly of those who have met with violent deaths, are especially so entitled. They are called in Tamil pey. Sir Walter Elliot considers that the Pīśīchās were (as in the case of Rākṣasas) a branch of the aboriginal inhabitants. In a note he says: 'The Pīśīchā dialect appears to have been a distinct Dravidian dialect, still to be recognised in the speech of the Paraiya, who cannot pronounce distinctly some of the pure Tamil letters.' There is, however, in the Hindu drama a Pīśīchā bhīṣṭha, a gibberish or corruption of Sanskrit, introduced. [This at the present day has been applied to English.] The term pīśīchā is also applied to the small circular storms commonly by Europeans called devils (q.v.). We do not know where Archdeacon Hare (see below) found the Pīśīchā to be a white demon.

1610.—"The fifth (mode of Hindu marriage) is the Pīśīchā-vriddha, when the lover, without obtaining the sanction of the girl's parents, takes her home by means of tales, incantations, and such like magical practices, and then marries her. Pīsach, in Sanskrit, is the name of a demon, which takes whatever person it fixes on, and as the above marriage takes place after the same manner, it has been called by this name."—The Dalīsīti, ii. 72; [See Mano, iii. 64.]

c. 1780.—"Que demandez-vous? leur cré dit-j'en un ton de voix rude. 'Pouquoi restez-vous là à m'attendre! et d'où vient que ces autres femmes se sont enfuies, comme si j'étois un Pēśacshā' (esprit maîlin), on une bête sauvage qui vouloit vous devourer?"—Huffner, ii. 287.

1801.—"They believe that such men as die accidental deaths become Pysachi, or evil spirits, and are exceedingly troublesome by making extraordinary noises in families, and occasioning fits and other diseases, especially in women."—F. Buchanan's Magz., iii. 17.

1818.—"Whirlwinds... at the end of March, and beginning of April, carry dust and light things along with them, and are called by the natives pešahsas or devils."—Aristotle Journal, ii. 567.

1819.—"These demons or peisasches are the usual attendants of Shiva."—Birkbeck on Elephants, in Br. Lit. Soc. Trans, i. 219.

1827.—"As a little girl was playing round me one day with her white freek over her head, I laughingly called her Pisachee, the name which the Indians give to their white devil. The child was delighted with so fine a name, and ran about the house crying out to everyone she met. I am the Pısașhee. I am the Pisache. Would she have done so, had she been wraft in black, and called witch or devil instead? Not for, as usual, the reality was nothing, the sound and colour everything."—J. C. Hare, in Cousins at Truth, by Two Brothers, 1st Series, ed. 1838, p. 7.

PISANG, s. This is the Malay word for plantain or banana (q.v.). It is never used by English people, but is the usual word among the Dutch, and common also among the Germans, [Norwegians and Swedes, who probably got it through the Dutch.]

c. 1785.—"Nous arrivames a grand village de Cella, où nous vismes de belles ailes de bannières en pisang..."—Huffner, ii. 85.
PLANTAIN.

[1875.—"Of the pisang or plantain... there are over thirty kinds, of which the Pisang-nasa, or golden plantain, so named from its colour, though one of the smallest, is nevertheless most deservedly prized."—Thomson, The Strait of Malacca, S.]

PISPASH. s. Apparently a facetious Anglo-Indian word, applied to a slop of rice-soup with small pieces of meat in it, much used in the Anglo-Indian nursery. [It is apparently P. pash-pash, 'shivered or broken in pieces'; from Pers. pash-kash.]

1834.—"They found the Secretary disengaged, that is to say, if surrounded with huge volumes of Financial Reports on one side, and a small silver tray holding a mess of pispash on the other, can be disengaged."—The Baboo, &c. i. 85.

PITARRAH. s. A coffer or box used in travelling by palanquin, to carry the traveller's clothes, two such being slung to a banghy (q.v.). Hind. pitāra, petāra, Skt. pitaka, 'a basket.' The thing was properly a basket made of cane; but in later practice of tin sheet, with a light wooden frame.

[1833.—'... he sat in the palanquin, which was filled with water up to his neck, whilst everything he had in his batara (or 'trunk') was soaked with wet...'—Travels of Dr. Woff, ii. 152.]

1819.—'The attention of the staff was called to the necessity of putting their pitarrahs and property in the Bungalow, as thieves abounded. 'My dear Sir, was the reply, 'we are quite safe, we have nothing.'—Delhi Gazette, Nov. 7.

1853.—'It was very soon settled that Oakfield was to send to the dak bungalow for his petarrahs, and stay with Saunton for about three weeks.'—H. B. Arnold, Tagfield, i. 223.

PLANTAIN. s. This is the name by which the Musa sapientum is universally known to Anglo-India. Books distinguish between the Musa sapientum or plantain, and the Musa paradisiaca or banana; but it is hard to understand where the line is supposed to be drawn. Variation is gradual and infinite. The botanical name Musa represents the Ar. no. 7, and that again is from the Skt. ma(ka)ta. The specific name sapientum arises out of a misunderstanding of a passage in Pliny, which we have explained under the head Jack. The specific paradisiaca is derived from the old belief of Oriental Christians (entertained also, if not originated by the Mahommedans) that this was the tree from whose leaves Adam and Eve made themselves aprons. A further mystical interest attached also to the fruit, which some believed to be the forbidden apple of Eden. For in the pattern formed by the core or seeds, when the fruit was cut across, our forefathers discerned an image of the Cross, or even of the Crucifix. Medieval travellers generally call the fruit either Musa or 'Fig of Paradise,' or sometimes 'Fig of India,' and to this day in the W. Indies the common small plantains are called 'figs.' The Portuguese also habitually called it 'Indian Fig.' And this perhaps originated some confusion in Milton's mind, leading him to make the Banyan (Ficus Indica of Pliny, as of modern botanists) the Tree of the aprons, and greatly to exaggerate the size of the leaves of that plant.

The name banana is never employed by the English in India, though it is the name universal in the London fruit-shops, where this fruit is now to be had at almost all seasons, and often of excellent quality, imported chiefly, we believe, from Madeira, and more recently from Jamaica. Mr. Skeat adds that in the Strait Settlements the name plantain seems to be reserved for those varieties which are only edible when cooked, but the word banana is used indifferently with plantain, the latter being on the whole perhaps the rarer word.

The name plantain is no more originally Indian than is banana. It, or rather platano, appears to have been the name under which the fruit was first carried to the W. Indies, according to Oviedo, in 1516: the first edition of his book was published in 1526. That author is careful to explain that the plant was improperly so called, as it was quite another thing from the platano described by Pliny. Bluteau says the word is Spanish. We do not know how it came to be applied to the Musa. [Mr. Guppy (8 ser. Notes & Queries, viii. 87) suggests that "the Spaniards have obtained platano from the Carib and Garibi words for banana, viz. balatano and platano, by the process followed by the Australian colonists when they converted a native name for the casuarina trees into 'she-oak'; and that we can thus explain how platano came in Spanish.
to signify both the plane-tree and the banana." Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v.) derives plantain from Lat. planta, 'a plant'; properly 'a spreading sucker or shoot'; and says that the plantain took its name from its spreading leaf. The rapid spread of the plantain or banana in the West, whence both names were carried back to India, is a counterpart to the rapid diffusion of the ananas in the Old World of Asia. It would seem from the translation of Mendoca that in his time (1585) the Spaniards had come to use the form plantano, which our Englishmen took up as plantan and plantain. But even in the 1736 edition of Bailey's Dict. the only explanation of plantain given is as the equivalent of the Latin plantago, the field-weed known by the former name. Plantano and Plantain are used in the Philippine Islands by the Spanish population.

c. 1350.—"Sunt enim in orto illo Adae de Seyllano primo musor, quas incendit deiscit vocant ... et istud viridum occulto nostris quod ubique inciditur per transversum, in utraque parte inciurese videtur ymago hominis Cruciferi ... et de istis foliis fecit Adam et Eva fecerunt sibi perizomata."—John de Marignolli, in Cathay, &c. p. 552.

1384.—"And there is again a fruit which many people assert to be that regarding which our first father Adam sinned, and this fruit they call Mus ... in this fruit you see a very great miracle, for when you divide it anyway, whether lengthways or across, or cut it as you will, you shall see inside, as it were, the image of the Crescifera; and of this we console many times made proof."—Viaggio di Simone Sigoli (Firenze, 1582, p. 160).

1526 (tr. 1557).—"There are also certaine plantes whiche the Christians call Plantani. In the mynest of the plant, in the highest part thereof, there groweth a cluster with fourtie or fiftie plantans about it. ... This cluster ought to be taken from the plant, when any one of the plantans begins to appeare yelowe, at which time they take it, and hang it in their houses, where all the clusters with trepe, with all his plantans."—Ovidio, transl. in Eden's Hist. of Travels, f. 208.

1552 (tr. 1582).—"Moreover the Island (of Mombas) is very pleasant, having many orchards, wherein are planted and are growing ... Figges of the Indians ..."—Castrateda, by N. L., f. 22.

1579.—"... a fruit which they call Figo (Magellane calls it a figge of a span long, but it is no other than that which the Spaniards and Portingalls have named Plantanes)."—Drake's Voyage, Hak. Soc. p. 142.

1555 (tr. 1588).—"There are mountaines very thicke of orange trees, siders (i.e. cetron, citrons), limes, plantanos, and palmas."—Mendoga, by R. Parke, Hak. Soc. ii. 330.

1588.—"Our Generall made their wines to fetch vs Plantans, Lymmons, and Oranges, Pine-apples, and other fruits."—Voyage of Master Thomas Candish, in Purchas, i. 64.

1588 (tr. 1604).—"... the first that shall be needefulle to treat of is the Plantain (Platano), or Plantano, as the vulgar call it. ... The reason why the Spaniards call it platano (for the Indians had no such name), was, as in other trees for that they have found some resemblance of the one with the other, even as they called some fruutes prunes, pines, and cucumbers, being far different from those which are called by those names in Castile. The platano however was most resemblance in my opinion, between the plantanos at the Indies and those which the ancients did celebrate, is the greatnes of the leaves ... But in truth, there is no more comparison nor resemblance of the one with the other than there is, as the Proverb saith, butwixt an egge and a chesnut."—Joseph de Acosta, transl. by E. G., Hak. Soc. i. 241.

1593.—"The Plantane is a tree found in most parts of Africa and America, of which two leaves are sufficient to cover a man from top to toe."—Hawkins, Voyage into the South Sea, Hak. Soc. 19.

1610.—"... and every day failed not to send each man, being one and fiftie in number, two cakes of white bread, and a quantitie of Dates and Plantans ..."—Sir H. Middleton, in Purchas, i. 254.

c. 1610.—"... Ces Gentils ayant pitie de nous, il y cut vne femme qui me mit vne seruente de feuilles de plantano accommodées ensemble anse des espeignes, puis me jetta dessus du wys cuiz anse vne certaine sauce qu'il appellent caril (see CURRY). ..."—Margaret, Voyages, 292.

[... "They (elephants) require ... besides leaves of trees, chiefly of the Indian fig, which we call Fannes and the Turks plantenes."—L'ard de Laral, Hak. Soc. ii. 315.]

1616.—"They have to these another fruit we English there call a Planten, of which many of them grow in clusters together ... very yellow when they are ripe, and then they taste like unto a Norwich Pear, but much better."—Terry, ed. 1655, p. 360.

c. 1635.—"... with candie Plantains and the jucie Pine, On choicest Melons and sweet Grapes they diue, And with Potatoes fat their wanton Swine."—Waller, Battle of the Summer Islands.
c. 1835.—
"Oh how I long my careless Limbs to lay
Under the Plantain's Shade; and all the Day
With amorous Airs my Fancy entertain."— Waller, Battle of the Summer Islands.

"The Plant (at Brasil Bacoon call'd) the Name Of the Eastern Plane-tree takes, but not the same:
Bears leaves so large, one single Leaf can shade
The Swan that is beneath her Covent laid;
Under whose verdant Leaves fair Apples grow, Sometimes two Hundred on a single Bough.
"—Cowley, of Plants, Bk. v.

1664—
"Wake, Wake Quevera! Our soft rest must cease,
And fly together with our country's peace.
No more must we sleep under plantain shade,
Which neither heat could pierce nor cold invade:
Where bounteous Nature never feels decay,
And opening buds drive falling fruits away."
Dryden, Prologue to the Indian Queen.

1738.—"Lower than these, but with a Leaf far broader, stands the curious Plantan, loading its tender Body with a Fruit, whose clusters amulate the Grapes of Canaan, which burnethen two men's shoulders."—Fryer, 19.

1686.—"The Plantain I take to be King of all Fruit, not except the Coco itself."—Dampier, i. 311.

1859.—"... and now in the Governour's Garden (at St. Helena) and some others of the Island are quantities of Plantains. Bonanoes and other delightful Fruits brought from the East. ..."—Ovington, 190.

1784—
"But round the upland huts, bananas plant:
A wholesome nutriment bananas yield,
And sunburnt labour loves its breezy shade.
Their graceful screen let kindred plantanes join.
And with their broad vans shiver in the breeze."
Granger, Bk. iv.

1805.—"The plantain, in some of its kinds, supplies the place of bread."—Orme, Fragments, 479.

PLASSEY, n.p. The village Palaśī, which gives its name to Lord Clive's famous battle (June 23. 1757). It is said to take its name from the ṁalas (or dhawk) tree.

1748.—"... that they have great reason to complain of Ensign English's conduct in not waiting at Placy... and that if he had stayed another day at Placy, as Tulleroyd Caun was marching with a large force towards Cutway, they presume the Mahrattas would have retreated inland on their approach and left him an open passage.

1757.—Clive's original report of the battle is dated on the "plain of Placie."—Birdwood, Report on Old Records, 57.

1753-71—"General Clive, who should have been the leader of the English troops in this battle (Plassey), left the command to Colonel Coote, and remained hid in his palankeen during the combat, out of the reach of the shot, and did not make his appearance before the enemy were put to flight."—Savouri, E.T. i. 456.
This stupid and inaccurate writer says that several English officers who were present at the battle related this "anecdote" to him. This, it may be hoped, is as untrue as the rest of the story. Even to such a writer one would have supposed that Clive's mettle would be familiar.

POOĐA, s. Hind. poddar, corn. of Pers. podsdr, from poda, a 'bag of money.' A cash-keeper, or especially an officer attached to a treasury, whose business it is to weigh money and bullion and appraise the value of coins.

[1590.—"The Treasurer. Called in the language of the day Fodadar."—Jin, ed. Jarrett, ii. 49.]

1680.—"Poodar." (See under DUSTOOR.)

1683.—"The like losses in proportion were preferred to be proved by Rammehrune Poodar, Bendura bin Poodar, and Mamoo-bishwas who produced their several books for evidence."—Holpe's Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 54.

[1772.—"Poodar, a money-changer or teller, under a shroff."—Virtue, View of Bengal, Gloss. s. v.]

POGGLE, PUDDLULLY, &c., s. Properly Hind. pādāṭ: 'a madman, an idiot'; often used colloquially by Anglo-Indians. A friend belonging to that body used to adduce a macaronic adage which we fear the non-Indian will fail to appreciate: "Pagal et pechdū jāddī sapeśtrūctī." [See NAUGHT.]

1520.—"It's true the people call me. I know not why the, pugley."—Mm. John Shipp, ii. 255.

1668.—"I was foolish enough to pay these budmashes beforehand, and they have thrown me over. I must have been a paugal to do it."—Tobias, The Last Daughter, 35.

[1855.—"He told me that the native name for a regular picnic is a 'Poggle-

POLEA, m.p. Mal. pulayan, [from Tam. paluman, 'a field,' because in Malabar they are occupied in rice cultivation]. A person of a low or impure tribe, who causes pollution (pula) to those of higher caste, if he approaches within a certain distance. [The rules which regulate their meeting with other people are given by Mr. Logan (Malabar, i. 118.)] From pula the Portuguese formed also the verbs empolesar-se, 'to become polluted by the touch of a low-caste person,' and dempolesar-se, 'to purify oneself after such pollution' (couvene, f. 97, and Synod, f. 52r, superstitious which Menezes found prevailing among the Christians of Malabar. (See HIRAVA.

1510.—"The fifth class are called Poliar, who collect pepper, wine, and nuts; the Poliar may not approach either the Naeri (see NAIR) or the Brahmans within 50 paces, unless they have been called by them..."—Vordakes, 132.

1516.—"There is another lower sort of gentiles called puler. They do not speak to the nares except for a long way off, as far as they can be heard speaking with a loud voice. And whatever man or woman should touch them, their relations immediately kill them like a contaminated thing."

1572.—"A ley, da gente toda, rieca e pobre; De fabulas composta se imagina: Anda so, e somente humo pano cobre As partes que a eubrir nature ensina. Dous nodos ha de gente; porquê a nobre Nayar chamadas são, e a minos dina.*

Poleas tem por nome, a quem obriga
A ley a o misurar a casta antigga."—Querido, viii. 87.

By Burton:

"The Law that holds the people high and low, is fraught with false phantastick tales long past; they go uncloathed, but a wrap they throw for decent purpose round the loins and waist:

Two modes of men are known: the nobles know the name of Nayrs, who call the lower caste Poléas, whom their haughty laws contain from intermingling with the higher strain..."

1598.—"When the Portingales came first into India, and made league and composition with the King of Cochin, the Nayras desired that men should give them place, and turn out of the Way, when they met the Poliyas,...[used to do].—Leechkins, 78; [Hak. Soc. i. 281; also see i. 279].

1606.—"he said by way of insult that he would order him to touch a Poleas, which is one of the lowest castes of Malabar."—Gouvei, f. 76.

1626.—"These Puler are Thieves and Surocresse."—Prechis, Pilgrimage, 563.

1727.—"Poulis; (See under *MUCAH."

1751.—"Nikalde and Pullie are two low castes on the Malabar coast..."—Fers, 26.

1766.—"... Poolighes, a cast hardly suffered to breathe the common air, being driven into the forrests and mountains out of the commerce of mankind."

1770.—"Their degradation is still more complete on the Malabar coast, which has not been subdued by the Mogul, and where they (the pariahs) are called Pouliats."—Raynal, E.T. 1798, i. 6.

1855.—"Further south in India we find polyandry among... Poleres of Malabar."—McKean, Primitive Marriage, 179.

POLIGAR, s. This term is peculiar to the Madras Presidency. The persons so called were properly subordinate feudal chiefs, occupying tracts more or less wild, and generally of predatory habits in former days; they are now much the same as Zemindars in the highest use of that term (q.v.). The word is Tam. palaiyakkaran, 'the holder of a palivagam,' or feudal estate; Tel. palaguda, and thence Mahr. paligur, the English form being do not taken from one of the two latter. The southern Poligars gave much trouble about 100 years ago, and the "Poligar wars" were somewhat serious affairs. In various assaults on Poonjalankurichi, one of their forts in Tinnevelly, between 1799 and 1801 there fell 15 British officers. Much regarding the Poligirs of the south will be found in Nelson's Madura, and in Bishop Caldwell's very interesting History of Tinnevelly. Most of the quotations apply to those southern districts. But the term was used north to the Mahratta boundary.

1851.—"They pulled down the Polegar's houses, who being conscious of his guilt, had fled and hid himself."—Wheler, i. 118.

1701.—"Le lendemain je me rendis a Talur, c'est une petite ville qui appartient a un autre Paleagaron."—Let. Editj. x. 269.

1775.—"J'espère que Votre Eminence agréera l'établissement d'une nouvelle Mission près des Montagnes appellées vul-gaiement des Palaeagars, où aucun Missionnaire n'avait jamais jusqu'à présent. Cette contrée est soumise à divers petits Rois appelés également Palaeagars, qui sont indépendants du Grand Mogul quelque places presque au milieu de son Empire."—Nobert, Mem. ii. 406-7.

1754. — "A Poligar ... undertook to conduct them through deserts and passes known to very few except himself."—Orme, i. 373.

1780. — "He (Hyder) now moved towards the pass of Chanizia, and encamped upon his side of it, and sent ten thousand polYGars to clear away the pass, and make a road sufficient to enable his artillery and stores to pass through."—Hog. James Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsay's, iii. 253.

"The matchlock men are generally accompanied by poligars, a set of fellows that are almost savage, and make use of no other weapon than a pointed bamboo spear, 18 or 20 feet long."—Munro's Narrative, 151.

1783. — "To Mahomet Ali they twice sold the Kingdom of Tanjore. To the same Mahommed Ali they sold at least twenty sovereign Princes called the Poligars."—Burke's Speech on Fox's India Bill, in Works, iii. 458.

1790. — "I think Poonamaya's mode of dealing with these rajahs ... is excellent. He sets them up in palamkins, elephants, &c., and a great sowarry, and makes them attend to his person. They are treated with great respect, which they like, but can do no mischief in the country. Old Hyder adopted this plan, and his operations were seldom impeded by poligar wars."—J. Wedderby to T. Munro, in Archibald's Mem. xii.

1801. — "The southern Poligars, a race of rude warriors habituated to arms of independence, had been but lately subdued."—Welsh, i. 57.

1809. — "Tondimann is an hereditary title. His subjects are Poligars, and since the late war ... he is become the chief of those tribes, among whom the singular law exists of the female inheriting the sovereignty in preference to the male."—Ld. Valentia, i. 364.

1818. — "There are 72 bastions to the fort of Madura; and each of them was now formally placed in charge of a particular chief, who was bound for himself and his heirs to keep his post at all times, and under all circumstances. He was also bound to pay a fixed annual tribute: to supply and keep in readiness a quota of troops for the Governor's armies; to keep the Governor's peace over a particular tract of country. ... A grant was made to him of a tract of a country ... together with the title of Poligar Káran (Poligar). ..."—Nelson's Madura, Pt. iii. p. 99.

... Some of the Poligars were placed in authority over others; and in time of war were responsible for the good conduct of their subordinates. Thus the Sethupari was chief of them all; and the Poligar of Dinidal-}

The word got transferred in English parlance to the people under such Chiefs—(see quotations above, 1750-1800); and especially, it would seem, to those whose habits were predatory:

1859. — "There is a third well-defined race mixed with the general population, to which a common origin may probably be assigned. I mean the predatory classes. In the south they are called Poligars, and consist of the tribes of Maramars. Kullars (see COLLERY), Bedars (see BYDE), Ramuses (see RAMOOST); and in the North are represented by the Kolis (see GOOLY), Cuzaran, and the Gumars (see GOOJUR) of the N.W. Provinces."—Sir Walter Elliot, in J. Ethn. Soc. L., N.S. i. 112.

POLIGAR DOG. s. A large breed of dogs found in S. India. "The Poligar dog is large and powerful, and is peculiar in being without hair" (Balfour, Cyc. i. 508s.).

[1858. — "It was evident that the original breed had been crossed with the bulldog, or the large Poligar dog of India."—Campbell, Old Forest Ranger, 3rd ed. p. 12.]

POLLAM. s. Tam. pollittum; Tel. paluma; (see under POLIGAR).

1843. — "The principal reason which they assigned against the extirpation of the poligars (POLIGAR) was that they were protected in their fortresses. They might have added, that the Company itself which stung them to death, had been warmed in the bosom of these unfortunate princes; for on the taking of Madras by the French, it was in their hospitable pollams that most of the inhabitants found refuge and protection."—Burke's Speech on Fox's E. I. Bill, in Works, iii. 183.

1795. — "Having submitted the general remarks on the Pollams I shall proceed to observe that in general the conduct of the Poligars is much better than could be expected from a race of men, who have hitherto been excluded from those advantages, which almost always attend conquered countries, an intercourse with their conquerors. With the exception of a very few, when I arrived they had never seen a European. ..."—Report on Dinidal, by Mr. Wynch, quoted in Nelson's Madura, Pt. iv. p. 15.

POLO, s. The game of hockey on horseback, introduced of late years into England, under this name, which comes from Balti; polo being properly in the language of that region the ball used in the game. The game thus lately revived was once known and practised (though in various forms) from Provence to the borders of China (see CHICANE). It had continued to exist down to our own day, it would seem, only near the extreme East and the extreme West of the Himalaya, viz. at Manipur in the East (between Cachar and Burma), and on the West in the high valley of the Indus (in Ladak, Balti, Astor and Gilgit, and extending into Chitrál). From the former it was first adopted by our countrymen at Calcutta, and a little later (about 1864) it was introduced into the Punjab, almost simultaneously from the Lower Provinces and from Kashmir, where the summer visitors had taken it up. It was first played in England, it would seem at Aldershot, in July 1871, and in August of the same year at Dublin in the Phoenix Park. The next year it was played in many places.* But the first mention we can find in the Times is a notice of a match at Lillie-Bridge, July 11, 1874, in the next day’s paper. There is mention of the game in the Illustrated London News of July 20, 1872, where it is treated as a new invention by British officers in India.
[According to the author of the Badminston Library treatise on the game, it was adopted by Lieut. Sherer in 1854, and a club was formed in 1859.
The same writer fixes its introduction into the Punjab and N.W.P. in 1861-62. See also an article in Baillie’s Magazine on “The Early History of Polo” (June 1890). The Central Asian form is described, under the name of Batiga or Kok-bura, ‘grey wolf,’ by Schuyler (Turkistan, i. 268 seqq.) and that in Dardistan by Biddulph (Tribes of the Hindoo Koosh, 84 seqq.).
In Ladak it is not indigenous, but an introduction from Baltistan. See a careful and interesting account of the game of those parts in Mr. F. Drew’s excellent book, The Jammu and Kashimir Territories, 1875, pp. 380-392.

We learn from Professor Tylor that the game exists still in Japan, and a very curious circumstance is that the polo rocket, just as that described by Jo, Cinnamus in the extract under CHICANE has survived there. [See 333 seqq.]

1835.—“The ponies of Muneepoor hold a very conspicuous rank in the estimation of the inhabitants. . . . The national game of Hockey, which is played by every male of the country capable of sitting a horse, renders them all adept equeristis, and it was by men and horses so trained, that the princes of Muneepoor were able for many years not only to repel the aggressions of the Burmans, but to save the whole country . . . and plant their banners on the banks of the Irrawaddy.”—Pemberton’s Report on the E. Frontier of Br. India, 31-32.

1838.—“At Shigurh I first saw the game of the Chauhan, which was played the day after our arrival on the Mydan or plain laid out expressly for the purpose. . . . It is in fact hockey on horseback. The ball, which is larger than a cricket ball, is only a globe made of a kind of willow-wood, and is called in Tibet “Pulu.” . . . I can conceive that the Chauhan requires only to be seen to be believed. It is the fit sport of an equestrian nation. . . . The game is played at almost every valley in Little Tibet and the adjoining countries. . . . Ladak, Yessen, Chitrál, &c.; and I should recommend it to be tried on the Hippodrome at Bayswater.”—Vigne, Travels in Kashmir, Ladak, &c., &c., (1842), ii. 289-302.

1848.—“An assembly of all the principal inhabitants took place at Iskardo, on some occasion of ceremony or festivity. . . . I was thus fortunate enough to be a witness of the changan, which is derived from Persia, and has been described by Mr. Vigne as hockey on horseback. . . . Large quadrangular enclosed meadows for this game may be seen in all the larger villages of Balti, often surrounded by rows of inglorious willow and poplar trees.”—Dr.
T. Thomson, Himalaya and Tibet, 280-291.

POLLOCK-SAUG. s. Hind. pālak, pālak-sāg: a poor vegetable, called also “country spinach” (Beta vulgaris, or B. Daubainensis, Roxb.). [Riddell (Domest. Eon. 579) calls it “Beigal Beet.”]

POLONGA. TIC-POLONGA. s. A very poisonous snake, so called in Ceylon (Bunguris, or Daboia daboia) by Singh, połongpra. [The Madras Gloss identifies it with the Daboia daboia, and calls it “Claw viper, ‘Necklace snake,’ Russian’s viper,” or ‘cobra manilla.’ The Singh name is said to be *titpolanga, tit, 'spotted,' polanga, 'viper.']

1681.—"There is another venomous snake called Polongo, the most venomous of all, that kills cattel. Two sorts of them I have seen, the one green, the other of reddish gray, full of white rings along the sides, and about or five or six feet long."—Knox, 29.

1825.—"There are only four snakes ascertainment to be poisonous: the cobra de capello is the most common, but its bite is not so certainly fatal as that of the tic polonga, which destroys life in a few minutes."—Mrs. Heber, in H. Journal, ed. 1844, ii. 167.

POMFRET, POMPHRET. s. A genus of sea-fish of broad compressed form, embracing several species, of good repute for the table on all the Indian coasts. According to Day they are all reducible to Stromates sinenis, 'the white Pomfret;' Str. cinctus, which is, when immature, 'the silver Pomfret,' and when mature, 'the gray Pomfret,' and Str. niger, 'the black P.' The French of Pondicherry call the fish pompe. We cannot connect it with the pompa of Aelian (xx. 23) and Athenaeus (Lib. VII, cap. xviii. segg.) which is identified with a very different fish, the 'pilot-fish' (Vulturates ductor of Day). The name is probably from the Portuguese, and a corruption of pompéo, 'a vine-leaf,' from supposed resemblance; this is the Portuguese name of a fish which occurs just where the pomfret should be mentioned. Thus:

1613.—"The fishes of this Mediterranean (the Malay sea) are very savoury sables, and see fish (serres) and pamphanos, and rays. . . ."—Godinho de Erédia, l. 33c.

*1727.—"Between Conna and Balloose Rivers . . . a very delicious Fish called the Pampelm, come in Sholes, and are sold for two Pence per Hundred. Two of them are sufficient to dine a moderate Man."—1. Hamilton, i. 396; [ed. 1741].

*1810.—"Another face look'd broad and bland Like pamphtet fountaining on the sand: Where'er she turned her piercing stare She seemed alert to spring in air."—Malay verses, rendered by Dr. Lowden, in Mrs Graham, 201.

*1813.—"The pomfret is not unlike a small turbot, but of a more delicate flavour: and epicures esteem the black pomfret a great dainty."—Forbes, Qu. Mem. i. 52-53; [2nd ed. i. 36].

*1822.—". . . the lad was brought up to catch pampheti and bombaboes. . . ."—Wallace, Fifteen Years in India, 106.*

1874.—"The greatest pleasure in Bombay was eating a fish called 'pomfret.'"—Sat. Rev., 9th May, 660.

*1896.—"Another account of this sort of seine fishing, for catching pomfret fish, is given by Mr. Guérin.*—Log. Rep.. Nations of savages, i. 455.*

POMMELO, PAMPLEMOOSE. &c., s. Citrus decumana, L., the largest of the orange-tribe. It is the same fruit as the shaddock of the West Indies; but to the larger varieties some form of the name Pommele seems also to be applied in the West. A small variety, with a fine skin, is sold in London shops as 'the Forbidden fruit.' The fruit, though grown in gardens over a great part of India, really comes to perfection only near the Equator, and especially in Java, whence it was probably brought to the continent. For it is called in Bengal Buddhi himbâ (i.e. Citrus Bambu- riana). It probably did not come to India till the 17th century; it is not mentioned in the Ain. According to Bretschneider the Pommele is mentioned in the ancient Chinese Book of the Shu-King. Its Chinese name is Yu.

The form of the name which we have put first is that now general in Anglo-Indian use. But it is probably only a modern result of 'striving after meaning' (quasi Pomno-melone). Among older authors the name goes through many strange shapes. Tavernier calls it pompe (Voy. des Indes, liv. iii. ch. 24; [ed. Ball, ii. 360]), but the usual French name is pomel-mousse. Dampier has Pampelmoos (ii. 125); Lockyer, Pampelmuse (51); Forrest, Pumpermose (32); Ives, pampple-nose, called in the West Indies Chadocks [19]. Maria Graham uses the French spelling (22). Pompolon is a form unknown to us, but given in the Eng. Cyclopaedia. Molesworth's Marathi Dict. gives "papanas, papanas, or papapis (a word of S. America)." We are unable to give the true etymology, though Littre says boldly "Tamoul, bumbulimius." Ainslie (M. Medico, 1813) gives Poomlimus as the Tamil, whilst Balfour (Cyc. of India) gives Pampanilus and Bambulimas as Tamil, PONDICHERRY. n.p. This name of what is now the chief French settlement in India, is Puduch'cheri, or Puthuggeri, 'New Town,' more correctly Puduvai, Puthuvai, meaning 'New Place.' C. P. Brown, however, says it is Pudi-cheri, 'New Tank.' The natives sometimes write it Pulcheri. [Mr. Garstín (Man. S. Arcot, 422) says that Hindus call it Puthuvai or Puthuggeri, while Muslims call it Pulcheri, or as the Malay Gloss, writes the word, Pulcheri.]

[1863. — "... Interlopers intend to settle att Verappatnam, a place near Puli-cherry. ..."—Pringle, Diary Pt. St. Geo., 1st ser. ii. 41. In iv. 113 (1865) we have Pondicherry.]

PONGOL. s. A festival of S. India, observed early in January. Tam. pūgol, 'boiling'; i.e., of the rice, because the first act in the feast is the boiling of the new rice. It is a kind of harvest-home. There is an interesting account of it by the late Mr. C. E. Gover (J. R. As. Soc. N.S. v. 91), but the connection which he traces with the old Vedic religion is hardly to be admitted. [See the meaning of the rite discussed by Dr. Fraser, Golden Bough, 2nd ed. iii. 305 seq.]

1651. — "... nous parlerons maintenant du Pongol, qui se celebre le 9 de Janvier en l'honneur du Soleil. ... Ils cuisent du riz avec du lait. ... Ce riz se cuit hors la maison, afin que le Soleil puisse luire dessus ... et quand ils voyent, qu'ils semblent le vouloir retirer, ils enrient d'une voix inteligible, Pongol, Pongol, Pongol, Pongol."

Mr. Reg. France, 1670, pp. 227 sq.

1871. — "Nor does the gentle and kindly influence of the time cease here. The files of the Munsí's Court will have been examined with cases from litigious enemies or greedy money lenders. But as Pongol comes round many of them disappear. ... The creditor thinks of his debtor, the debtor of the creditor. The one relents, the other is ashamed, and both parties are saved by a compromise. Often it happens that a process is postponed 'till after Pongol!'"—Gover, as above, p. 96.

POOJA. s. Properly applied to the Hindu ceremonies in idol-worship; Skt. pājā; and colloquially to any kind of rite. Thus jhānā ki pājā, or 'Pooja of the flag,' is the sepoy term for what in St. James's Park is called 'Trooping of the colours.' [Used in the plural, as in the quotation of 1900, it means the holidays of the Durga Pājā or Dussera.]

1891.—"Then the Pjari, or priest, takes the Bhuta sword and bell in his hands...—Monier-Williams, Brahmanism and Hinduism, 4th ed. 249.

POOL. s. P.—H. pul. 'a bridge.'

Used in two of the quotations under the next article for 'embankment.'

[1812.—"The bridge is thrown over the river...it is called the Pool Kran...—Morier, Journey through Persia, 124.]

POOLBUNDY. s. P.—H. pulbandi. 'Securing of bridges or embankments.'

A name formerly given in Bengal to a civil department in charge of the embankments. Also sometimes used improperly for the embankment itself.

[1765.—"Deduct Poolbundy, advanced for repairs of dykes, roads. &c."—Vereist, View of Bengal, App. 213.]

[c. 1751.—"Pay your constant devotions to Marian Allypore, or sell yourself soul and body to Poolbundy."—Ext. from Hickie's Gazette, in Bullett, Echoes of old Calcutta, 3rd ed. 175. This refers to Impay, who was called by this name in allusion to a lucrative contract given to his relative, a Mr. Fraser.]

1776.—"That the Superintendent of Poolbundy Repairs, after an accurate and diligent survey of the bunds and pools, and the provincial Council of Burdwan...had delivered it as their opinion..."

Articles of Charge against Warren Hastings, in Burke, vii. 93.

1802.—"The Collector of Midnapore has directed his attention to the subject of pool-bundy, and in a very ample report to the Board of Revenue, has described certain abuses and oppressions, consisting chiefly of pressing ryots to work on the pools, which call aloud for a remedy."—Parl. Report, App. p. 555.

1810.—"...the whole is obliged to be preserved from inundation by an embankment called the pool bany, maintained at a very great and regular expense."—Williamson, V. M., ii. 353.

POON. PEON. &c. s. Chn. poon. [Mal. poun, Skt. punam]. A timber tree (Calophyllum inophyllum, L.) which grows in the forests of Canara, &c., and which was formerly used for masts, whence also called mast-wood. [Linn. refers to this tree, but not by name (Hak. Soc. ii. 67).]

[1727.—"...good Poon-masts, stronger but heavier than Firr."—J. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i 267.]

[1773.—"...Poon tree...the wood light, but tolerably strong; it is frequently used for masts, but unless great care be taken to keep the wet from the ends of it, it soon rots..."—Ies. 466.]

1853.—"Poon or Pana...the largest sort is of a light, bright colour, and may be had at Mangalore, from the forests of Coromul in Canara, where it grows to a length of 150 feet. At Mangalore I procured a tree of this sort that would have made a foremast for the Leander, 60-gun ship, in one piece, for 1800 Rupees."—Eden, in J. R. A. Soc. ii. 304.

POONAMALEE. n.p. A town, and formerly a military station, in the Chingleput Dist. of Mahras Presidency, 13 miles west of Madras. The name is given in the Imp. Gazetteer as Poonamalle (I), and Pondicherry (I), whilst Col. Branfill gives it as "Poontha mali" for Poonthamallik, without further explanation. [The Mulars Gloss. gives Tam. Pandamalali, 'town of the jasmine creeper,' which is largely grown there for the supply of the Mahras markets.]

[1875.—"The dog, a small piebald cur, with a short tail, not unlike the 'Poonamalle terrier,' which the British soldier is wont to manufacture from Pariah dogs for 'Griffins' with sporting propensities, POORUB, and POORBEA, ss. Hind. pūrab, pūrb, 'the East,' from Skt.

pūra or pūrā, 'in front of,' as paśchā (Hind. pachham) means 'behind' or westerly and deśkina, 'right-hand' or southerly. In Upper India the term means usually Oudh, the Benares division, and Behar. Hence Poorbea (pūrbīya), a man of those countries, was, in the days of the old Bengal army, often used for a sepoy, the majority being recruited in those Provinces.

1538.—"Oumaum (Humâyûn) Patshiah ... resolved to follow Xerchen (Sher Khân) and try his fortunes against him ... and they met close to the river Ganges before it unites with the river Jamona, where on the West bank of the river there is a city

—Atter Singh loquitur, by 'Satwar,' Sir M. Durand in an Indian paper, the name and date lost.

POOTLY NAUTCH, s. Properly Hind. kāth-pūtli-nāch, 'wooden-puppet-dance.' A puppet show.

c. 1817.—"The day after tomorrow will be my lad James Dawson's birthday, and we are to have a puttully-nautch in the evening."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, 291.

POPPER-CAKE, in Bombay, and in Madras popadam, ss. These are apparently the same word and thing, though to the former is attributed a Hind and Mahr. origin pāpar, Skt.
purpati, and to the latter a Tamil one, pappadam, as an abbreviation of pārappu-adham, 'lentil cake.' [The Madras Gloss. gives Tel. appadam, Tam. apallem (see HOPPER), and Mal.
pappatam, from pārīpa, 'dhall, 'atta, 'cake.') It is a kind of thin scone or wafer, made of any kind of pulse or lentil flour, seasoned with asafoetida, &c., fried in oil, and in W. India baked crisp, and often eaten at European tables as an accompaniment to curry.
It is not bad, even to a novice.
1814.—"They are very fond of a thin cake, or wafer, called popper, made from the flour of oord or mahz... highly seasoned with assa-foetida; a salt called popper-khor; and a very hot massaula (see MUSSALLA), compounded of turmeric, black pepper, ginger, garlic, several kinds of warm seeds, and a quantity of the hottest Chili pepper." — Forbes, Or. Mon. ii. 35; [2nd ed. i. 347].

1820.—"Papadoms (fine cakes made of gram-flour and a fine species of alkali, which gives them an agreeable salt taste, and serves the purpose of yeast, making them rise, and become very crisp when fried..." — *Dr. Fors. Researches, xiii. 315.

"Paper, the flour of oored (see OORD), salt, assa-foetida, and various spices, made into a paste, rolled as thin as a wafer, and dried in the sun, and when wanted for the table baked crisp..." — T. Coates, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. iii. 194.

[1663-4.—"Your factories of Carwar and Porquatt are continued but to very little purpose to you." — Forrest, Bombay Letter, i. 15.]

PORCELAIN. s. The history of this word for China-ware appears to be as follows. The family of univalve mollusks called Cypraeidae, or Cowries (q.v.) were in medieval Italy called porcellana and porcellita, almost certainly from their strong resemblance to the body and back of a pig, and not from a grosser analogy suggested by Mahn (see in Littre sub voce). That this is so is strongly corroborated by the circumstance noted by Dr. J. E. Gray (see Enc. Cie, Nat. Hist., s.v. Cypraeida) that Pit is the common name of shells of this family on the English coast; whilst Sow also seems to be a name of one or more kinds. The enamel of this shell seems to have been used in the Middle Ages to form a coating for ornamental pottery, &c., whence the early application of the term porcellana to the fine ware brought from the far East. Both applications of the term, viz. to cowries and to China-ware, occur in Marco Polo (see below). The quasi-analogous application of pig in Scotland to earthen-ware, noticed in an imaginary quotation below, is probably quite an accident, for there appears to be a Gaelic ping, 'an earthen jar,' &c. (see Skeat, s.v. pingin). We should not fail to recall Dr. Johnson's etymology of porcelain from "pour cent annes" because it was believed by Europeans that the materials were matured under ground 100 years! (see quotations below from Barbosa, and from Sir Thomas Brown).

c. 1250.—*Company has the following passage in the work cited. Though the same writer published the Laws of the Consulado del Mar in 1791, he has deranged the whole of the chapters, and this, which he has quoted, is omitted altogether!"

"In the XLIVth chap. of the maritime laws of Barcelona, which are undoubtedly not later than the middle of the 15th century, there are regulations for the returning vessels of the ship-trading with Alexandria... In this are enumerated among articles brought from Egypt... cotton in bales and spun wool de capilla (for hats); porcellanas, alum, elephants' teeth..." — Memorias, Hist. de Barcelona, l. Pt. ii. p. 44.

c. 1298.—*Il out monoine en tel maniere con je voz dirai, car il excedent porcelaine blance, celle que se travein en la mer et que se metent au cueil des chienz, et valent les quatre-vingt porcelaines un sale i arjant que se sont deus venezians gros..." — Marco Polo, oldest French text, p. 192.

"Et encore voz di que en este provence, en une cite que est appelé Timouq, on se font escelue de porcelaine grant et plie les plus belles qu'en est peut devier..." — Ibid., l. 159.

c. 1328.—*Audivi quod ducentas civitates habet sub se imperator ille (Magnus Tur- tarus) majores quinam Tholosa: et ego certe credo quod plures habebant homines... Alia non sunt quae ego stiam in isto imperio digna relatione, nisi vasa putcherrima, et nobilissima, atque virtuosa porseletia..." — Jordanus Monachus, p. 59.

In the next passage it seems probable that the shells, and not China dishes, are intended.

c. 1343.—*... chomonerida, vernice, armoinaco, zaffira, colorinis, porcellana, mirra, mirabolant... si vendono una Vinegia a cento di poco matile" (by. by the cutcha hundredweight). — Petr. Pratiche della Mercatura, p. 194.

c. 1440.—*... this Cin and Macina that I have before named arr il very great measures, which is sent among the chief states, and there make they vessels and dishes of Porcellana..." — Giomafi Barbaro, Htk. Sec. 75.
In the next the shells are clearly intended:

1475.—"The seaports of Cheen and Machin are also large. Porcelain is made there, and sold by the weight and at a low price."—Aldini, in India in the X7th Cent. p. 21.

1517.—"... le mando lo inventario del presente del Soldano dato a Lorenzo. . . vasi grandi di Porcellana mai più veduti simili ne meglio lavorati."—Letter of P. de Ribbiana to Clar. de Medicis, in Roscoe's Lorenzo, ed. 1825, p. 371.

1520.—"... in questo tempo abrusiorno xii nave sopra il porto di Celehuni; et d'esse navi ebbe tute drogarie e specchierie che caricho le dicer soi nave. Praterene me ha mandato se vasi di porcellana exceltissimi e gradi; quatro bochali de argento grandi e certi vasi al modo loro e credentia."—Letter of K. Edward, 13.

1516.—"They make in this country a great quantity of porcelains of different sorts, very fine and good, which form for them a great article of trade for all parts, and they make them in this way. They take the shells of sea-oysters (t caroceli), and eggshells, and pound them, and with other ingredients make a paste, which they put underground to retine for the space of 80 or 100 years, and this mass of paste they leave as a fortunate to their children. . . ."—Burnes, in Risus, i. 329.

1555. (In China) "The service of their meals is the most elegant that can be: everything being of very fine proseriena (although they also make use of silver and gold plate), and they eat everything with a fork made after their fashion, never putting a hand into their food, much or little."—Barros, 111. ii. 7.

1554.—(After a suggestion of the identity of the same porcrain of the ancients): "Ce nom de Porcellane is donné à plusieurs coquilles de mer. Et pour ce qu'un beau Vaissem d'une coquille de mer ne se pourroit rendre mieux à propos suyant le nom antique, que de l'appeller de Porcellaine il y a pensée que ces coquilles polies et luisantes, ressemblant à Nacre de perles, ont quelque abîme avec la matière des vases de Porcellaine antiques: joient aussi que le peuple François nomme les potenomostes faictes de gros vignols, potenostres de Porcellaine. Les susdits vases de Porcellane sont transparents, et constituent bien cher au Caire, et disent mesmeem qu'ils les apportent des Indes. Mais cela ne me semble vraisemblable; car on n'en voyroit pas si grande quantité, ne de si grandes pieces, s'il failloit apporter de si loin. Une esquire, vn pot, ou vn autre vaissaym pour petit qu'elle soit, couste vn ducat: si c'est quelque grand vase, il constern d'aunantage."—P. Belon, Observations, f. 134.

1560. —"And because there are many opinions among the Portugals which have not bene in China, about where this Porcelane is made, and touching the substance whereof it is made, some saying, that it is of oysters shells, others of dung rotten of a long time, because they were not enformed of the truth, I thought it convenient to tell here the substance. . . ."—Gaspar de Cruz, in Porcsah, iii. 177.

I think, however, that the term Purgo is probably an obsolete Anglo-Indian corruption of an Indian corruption of the Portu. term barco, barca, a term used for any kind of sailing boat by the early Portuguese visitors to the East

PRA, PHRA, PRAW, s. This is a term constantly used in Burma, familiar to all who have been in that country, in its constant application as a style of respect, addressed or applied to persons and things of especial sanctity or dignity. Thus it is addressed at Court to the King; it is the habitual designation of the Buddha and his images and dagobas; of superior ecclesiastics and sacred books; corresponding on the whole in use, pretty closely to the Skt. स्वामि. In Burmese the word is written bhūrā, but pronounced (in Arakan) phrā, and in modern Burma proper, with the usual slurring of the r, Pyųā or Pyā. The use of the term is not confined to Burma; it is used in quite a similar way in Siam, as may be seen in the quotation below from Alabaster: the word is used in the same form Phra among the Shan; and in the form Prea, it would seem, in Cambodja. Thus Garnier speaks of Indra and Vishnu under their Cambodian epithets as Prea En and Prea Norea (Nārāyanā); of the figure of Buddha entering nirvāṇa, as Prea Nippān; of the King who built the great temple of Angkor Wat as Prea Kot Melen, of the King reigning at the time of the expedition as Prea Ang Reachea Vodey, of various sites of temples as Preaem. Preacrn, Prea Pithu, &c. (Forsyth's Exploration, i. 26, 49, 388, 77, 85, 72).

The word phra appears in composition in various names of Burmese kings, as of the famous Alom phra (1753-60), founder of the late dynasty, and of his son Bodhūn-phra (1781-1819). In the former instance the PRAKRT. s. A term applied to the older vernacular dialects of India, such as were derived from, or kindred to, Sanskrit. Dialects of this nature are used by ladies, and by inferior characters, in the Sanskrit dramas. These dialects, and the modern vernaculars springing from them, bear the same relation to Sanskrit that the "Romance" languages of Europe bear to Latin, an analogy which is found in many particulars to hold with most surprising exactness. The most completely preserved of old Prakrits is that which was used in Magadha, and which has come down in the Buddhist books of Ceylon under the name of Pali (q.v.). The first European analysis of this language bears the title "Institutiones linguae Pracriticae. Scripsit Christianus Lassen, Bonnæ ad Rheumna, 1837." The term itself is Skt. paśkrtí, 'natural, unrefined, vulgar', &c.

PRESIDENCY (and PRESI-DENT), s. The title 'President,' as applied to the Chief of a Principal Factory, was in early popular use, though in the charters of the E.I.C. its first occurrence is in 1661 (see: Letters Patent, below). In Sainsbury's Calendar we find letters headed "to Capt. Jourdain, president of the English at Bantam" in 1614 (i. 297-8); but it is to be doubted whether this wording is in the original. A little later we find a "proposal by Mr. Middleton concerning the appointment of two especial factors, at Surat and Bantam, to have authority over all other factors; Jourdain named." And later again he is styled "John Jourdain, Captain of the house" (at Bantam; see pp. 303, 325), and "Chief Merchant at Bantam" (p. 313).

1623.—"Speaking of the Dutch Commander, as well as of the English President, who often in this fashion came to take me for an airing, I should not omit to say that both of them in Surat live in great style, and like the grandees of the land. They go about with a great train, sometimes with people of their own mounted, but particularly with a great crowd of Indian servants on foot and armed, according to custom, with sword, target, bow and arrows."—I. della Valle, ii. 517.

... "Our boat going ashore, the President of the English Merchants, who usually resides in Surat, is chief of all their business in the E. Indies, Persia, and other places dependent thereon, and who is called Sign. Thomas Rastell... came aboard in our said boat, with a minister of theirs (so they term those who do the priest's office among them)."—Ibid. ii. 501-2; [Hak. Soc. i. 19.]

1638.—"As soon as the Commanders heard that the (English) President was come to Suratly, they went ashore. ... Indies, 3d April.

1870.—The Court, in a letter to Fort St. George, fix the amount of tonnage to be allowed to their officers (for their private investments) on their return to Europe:

But Mr. House, Mr. Ridges, and Mr. Master were of opinion that Batavia being a place of extraordinary charge and Expense in all things, the said Calash hire, &c. ought not to be charged to the Honourable Company's Account."—MS. Records in India Office.

The book containing this is a collation of fragmentary MS. diaries. But this passage pertains apparently to the proceedings of President Allen Catchpole and his council, belonging to the Factory of Chusan, from which they were expelled by the Chinese in 1701-2; they stayed some time at Batavia in their way home. Mr. Catchpole (or Ketchpole) was soon afterwards chief of an English settlement made upon Pulo Condore, off the Cambojan coast. In 1704-5, we read that he reported favourably on the prospects of the settlement, requesting a supply of young writers, to learn the Chinese language, anticipating that the island would soon become an important station for Chinese trade. But Catchpole was himself, about the end of 1705, murdered by certain people of Macassar, who thought he had broken faith with them, and with him all the English but two (see Bruce's Annals, 483-4, 550, 606, and A. Hamilton, ii. 205 [ed. 1744]). The Pulo Condore enterprise thus came to an end.

1727.—"About the year 1674, President Aungier, a gentleman well qualified for governing, came to the Chair, and leaving Suratt to the Management of Deputies, came to Bombay, and rectified many things."—A. Hamilton, i. 188.

PRICKLY-HEAT. s. A troublesome cutaneous rash (Lichen tropicus) in the form of small red pimples, which itch intolerably. It affects many Europeans in the hot weather. Fryer (pub. 1698) alludes to these "fiery pimples," but gives the disease no specific name. Natives sometimes suffer from it, and (in the south) use a paste of sandal-wood to alleviate it. Sir Charles Napier in Sind used to suffer much from it, and we have heard him describe it as standing, when giving an interview during the hot weather, with his back against the edge of an open door, for the convenience of occasional friction against it. [See RED DOG.]

My face, hands and feet are peeled off, and my body is covered all over with pimples that prick me, as so many needles."—Berenger, E.T. 125; [ed. Constable, 859].
PRICKLY-PEAR. 732

PRICKLY-PEAR, s. The popular name in both E. and W. Indies, of the Opuntia Dillenii, Haworth (Cactus Indica, Roxb.), a plant spread all over India, and to which Roxburgh gave the latter name, apparently in the belief of its being indigenous in that country. Undoubtedly, however, it came from America, wide as has been its spread over Southern Europe and Asia. On some parts of the Mediterranean shores (e. g. in Sicily) it has become so characteristic that it is hard to realize the fact that the plant had no existence there before the 16th century. Indeed at Palermo we have heard this scented, and evidence quoted in the supposed circumstance that among the mosaics of the splendid Duomo of Monreale (12th century) the fig-leaf garments of Adam and Eve are represented as of this uncomprising material. The mosaic was examined by one of the present writers, with the impression that the belief has no good foundation. [See 8th ser. Notes and Queries, viii. 254.] The cactus fruit, yellow, purple, and red, which may be said to form an important article of diet in the Mediterranean, and which is now sometimes seen in London shops, is not, as far as we know, anywhere used in India, except in times of famine. No cactus is named in Drury’s Useful Plants of India. And whether the Mediterranean plants form a different species, or varieties merely, as compared with the Indian Opuntia, is a matter for inquiry. The fruit of the Indian plant is smaller and less succulent. There is a good description of the plant and fruit in Orondo, with a good cut (see Ramusio’s Ital. version, bk. viii. ch. xxyv.). That author gives an amusing story of his first making acquaintance with the fruit in S. Domingo, in the year 1515.

Some of the names by which the Opuntia is known in the Punjab seem to belong properly to species of Euphorbia. Thus the Euphorbia Royleana, Bois., is called tsūi, chā, &c.; and the Opuntia is called Kābuli tsūi, Gangi shā, Kanghi chā, &c. Gangi chā is also the name of an Euphorbia sp. which Dr. Stewart takes to be the E. Nertifolia, L. (Punjab Plants, pp. 101 and 194-5). [The common name in Upper India for the prickly pear is udghant, ‘snake-hood,’ from its shape.] This is curious; for although certain cactuses are very like certain Euphorbias, there is no Euphorbia resembling the Opuntia in form.

The Zakām mentioned in the Áina (Ghadwin, 1800, ii. 68: [Jarrett, ii. 229; Sidi Ali, ed. Vamberg, p. 31] as used for hedges in Guzerat, is doubtless Euphorbia also. The Opuntia is very common as a hedge plant in cantonments, &c., and it was much used by Tippoo as an obstruction round his fortifications. Both the E. Royleana and the Opuntia are used for fences in parts of the Punjab. The latter is objectionable, from harbouring dirt and reptiles; but it spreads rapidly both from birds eating the fruit, and from the facility with which the joints take root.

PROME. 3. An important place in Pegu above the Delta. The name is Taung, properly Bran. The Bur-nese call it Pye or (in the Aracanese form in which the r is pronounced) Prahu and Pramyo (city).

1548.—"When he (the K. of Bratou) was arrived at the young King's palace, he caused himself to be crowned King of Prom, and during the Ceremony... made that poor Prince, whom he had deprived of his Kingdom, to continue kneeling before him, with his hands held up... The cause of this was the arrival of 12,000 men, whom the King of Pren sent in pursuit of the King of Arracan, knowing that he had fled that way. Our people hastening up had a stiff and well fought combat with them; for although they were fatigued with the fight which had been hardly ended, those of Pren were so disheartened at seeing the Portuguese, whose steel they had already felt, that they were fain to retire."—Beauro, 142. This author has Prom (p. 182) and Parao (p. 149). [Also see under AVA.]

1755.—"Proue... has the rains of an old brick wall round it, and immediately without that, another with Teak Timber."—Capt. G. Baker, in Batairome, i. 173.

1795.—"In the evening, my boat being ahead, I reached the city of Proveno, or Prone, &c., renowned in Birman history."—Sumes, pp. 228-9.

PROW, PARAo, &c., s. This word seems to have a double origin in European use; the Malayal. para, a boat; and the Island word (common to Malay, Javanese, and most languages of the Archipelago) prad or prah. This is often specifically applied to a peculiar kind of galley, "Malay Prow," but Crawford defines it as "a general term for any vessel, but generally for small craft." It is hard to distinguish between the words, as adopted in the earlier books, except by considering date and locality.

1499.—"The King despatched to them a large boat, which they call parao, well manned, on board which he sent a Naire of his with an errand to the Captains..."—Correa, Lendas, i. i. 115.

I replied: 'Let us go along this shore till we find a parao, that is, a small bark.'"—Ibid, 209.

1760.—Gouvea (f. 27) uses parao.

"An hour after this comming a board of the hollanders came a prawe or a canoe from Bantam."—Middleton's Voyage, v. 6 (c).

[1611.—"The Portuguese call their own sailbots Navires (navios) and those of the Malabars, Paraos. Most of these vessels were Chelibs (see CHETTY, that is to say, merchants). Immediately on arrival the Malabars draw up their Pados or sailbots on the beach."—Parodi de Local, Hik. Soc. i. 345.

[1823.—"In the Morning we discern'd four ships of Malabar Rovers near the shore they called them Paraos and they goe with Oars like our Galeote or Fols."—P. della Valle, Hik. Soc. ii. 201.]

1856.—"Con secreto provinio Lope de Rozca veinte bateles y gobernando y entrando por un rio, hallaron el peligro de cinco naves y ochenta paraos con mucha gente resuelta y de valor."—Faria y Sousa, F. d. i. 69.

1763.—"They are owners of several small Provies, of the same make, and Canoes, cut out of one entire Piece of Wood."—Fryer, 20. Elsewhere (c. 57, 59) he has Proes.

1727.—"The Andamaners had a yearly Custom to come to the Nicobar Islands, with a great number of small Praws, and kill or take Prisoners as many of the poor Nicobarens as they could overcome."—A. Hamilton, iii. 65 [et. 1744].

1816.—"... Prahu, a term under which the Malays include every description of vessel."—Raffles, in As. Rés. xi. 132.

1817.—"The Chinese also have many biesz... as well as native-built prahus."—Raffles, Jav. i. 205.
1868.—"On December 13th I went on board a prau bound for the Ara Islands."—
- Wallace, Malay Archv., 227.

PUCKA. adj. Hind. puckā, 'ripe, mature, cooked'; and hence substantial, permanent, with many specific applications, of which examples have been given under the habitually contrasted term cutcha (q.v.). One of the most frequent uses in which the word has become specific is that of a building of brick and mortar, in contradistinction to one of inferior material, as of mud, matting, or timber. Thus:

[1756.—"... adjacent houses; all of them of the strongest pecca work, and all most proof against our Mettal on ye Bastions," Capt. Grant, Report on Siege of Calcutta, ed. by Col. Temple, Ind. Ant., 1890, p. 7.]

1784.—"The House, Cook-room, bottleneck, godown, &c, are all pucka-built."—In Seton-Karr, i. 41.

1821.—"A little above this beautiful stream, some miserable pucka sheds pointed out the Company's warehouses."—Hober, ed. 1841, i. 259-60.

1825.—"I observe that there are in the town (Dehli) many buildings pucka-built, as it is called in India."—Wellington to Ld. Ellenborough, in Indian Adm. of Ind. E., p. 306.

1857.—"Your Lahore men have done nobly. I should like to embrace them; Donald, Roberts, Mac, and Dick are, all of them, pucka trumps."—Lord Lawrence, in Life, ii. 11.

1869.—"... there is no surer test by which to measure the prosperity of the people than the number of pucka houses that are being built."—Report of a Sub-committee on Proposed Indian Census.

This application has given rise to a substantive pucka, for work of brick and mortar, or for the composition used as cement and plaster.

1727.—"Fort William was built on an irregular Tetragon of Brick and Mortar, called Puckah, which is a Composition of Brick-dust, Lime, Molasses, and cut Hemp, and when it comes to be dry, it is as hard and tougher than firm Stone or Brick."—A. Hamilton, ii. 19; [col. 1744, i. 7].

The word was also sometimes used substantively for "pucka pice" (see CUTFHA).

c. 1817.—"I am sure I strive, and strive, and yet last month I could only lay by eight rupees and four puckers."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, 66.

In (Stockdale's) Indian Vocabulary of 1788 we find another substantive use, but it was perhaps even then inaccurate.

1788.—"Pucka—A putrid fever, generally fatal in 24 hours."

Another habitual application of pucka and cutcha distinguishes between two classes of weights and measures. The existence of twofold weight, the pucka ser and the cutcha, used to be very general in India. It was equally common in Medieval Europe. Almost every city in Italy had its libra grossa and libra sottile (c.g. see Pegolotti, 4, 34, 153, 228, &c.), and we ourselves still have them, under the names of pound accordroydis and pound troy.

1673.—"The Maund Pucka at Agra is double as much (as the Surat Maund)."—Flyger, 205.

1790.—"Les paccas coises... repondent à une tonne de l'isle de France."—Lett. Edir. xx. 189.

1803.—"If the rice should be sent to Coraygama, it should be in sufficient quantities to give 72 pucka seers for each load."—Wellington, Desp. (ed. 1837), ii. 43.

In the next quotation the terms apply to the temporary or permanent character of the appointments held.

1866.—"Susan. Well, Miss, I don't wonder you're so fond of him. He is such a sweet young man, though he is cutcha. Thank goodness, my young man is pucka, though he is only a subordinate Government Salt Chowkee."—Trevelyan, The Duke Bungalow, 222.

The remaining quotations are examples of miscellaneous use:

1853.—"Well, Jenkyns, any news? 'Nothing pucka that I know of.'"—Oakfield, ii. 57.

1864.—"I cannot endure a swell, even though his whiskers are pucka."—Trevelyan, The Duke Bungalow, in Fraser, lxxxiii, 220.

The word has spread to China:

"Dis pucka sing-song make show How smart man make mistake, gulow."—Lehand, Piaoja English Sing-Song, 54.

PUCKAULY. s. ; also PUCKAUL. Hind. puckahli, 'a water-carrier.' In N. India the puckahli [Skt. paqos, 'water;' khalta, 'skin'] is a large water-skin (an entire ox-hide) of some 20 gallons content, of which a pair are carried by a bullock, and the puckahl is the man who fills the skins, and supplies the water thus. In the Madras Drill Regulations for 1785 (33), ten puckalies are allowed to a battalion. (See also Williamson's I. M. (1810), i. 220.)
[1538.—Referring to the preparations for the siege of Diu, "which they brought from all the wells on the island by all the bullocks they could collect with their water-skins, which they call pacaals (Pacaáis)."—Costa, Dec. V. Bk. iii. ch. 2.]

1789.—"There is another very necessary establishment to the European corps, which is two "buccalies" to each company; these are two large leather bags for holding water, slung upon the back of a bullock. . . .—Menard’s Narrative, 183.

1868.—"It (water) is brought by means of bullocks in leather bags, called here puckally bags, a certain number of which is attached to every regiment and garrison in India. Black fellows called Puckauly-boys are employed to fill the bags, and drive the bullocks to the quarters of the different Europeans."—Percival’s Ceylon, 102.

202.—"It would be a much better arrangement to give the adjutants of corps an allowance of 26 rupees per mensum, to supply two puckalies men, and two bullocks with bags, for each company."—Waddington, i. 509.

1813.—"In cities, in the armies, and with Europeans on country excursions, the water for drinking is usually carried in large leather bags callèd pacallies, formed by the entire skin of an ox."—Parkes, in M. i. ii. 110; [2nd ed. i. 415.]

1812.—"I lost no time in confidentially communicating with Capt. Oliver on the subject of trying some experiments as to the possibility of conveying empty 'puckals' and 'mussacks' by sea to Sniz.—Sir W. Arthur, in Ellenborough’s Ind. Admin. 219.

[1850.—"On the reverse flank of companies march the Pickalliers, or men driving bullocks, carrying large leather bags filled with water. . . .—Hervey, Ten Years’ India, iii. 335.]

PUCKEROW. v. This is properly the imperative of the Hind. verb pakátrá, 'to cause to be seized, pakátrí, cause him to be seized,' or perhaps more correctly of a compound verb pakátrí, 'seize and come,' or in our idiom, 'Go and seize.' But puckeró belongs essentially to the dialect of the European soldier, and in that becomes of itself a verb 'to puckeró,' i.e. to lay hold of (generally of a recalcitrant native). The conversion of the Hind. imperative into an Anglo-Indian verb infinitive, is not uncommon; compare bunow, dumbeow. gubbrow, lugow, &c.

1896.—"Fanny, I am cutcha no longer. Surely you will allow a lover who is puck to puckero!"—Freethy, The Indian Fun, 380.

PUDIPATAN. n.p. The name of the very old seaport of Malabar, which has now ceased to have a place in the Maps. It lay between Cannanore and Calicut, and must have been near the Waddakaré of K. Johnston’s Royal Atlas. [It appears in the map in Logan’s Malabar as Putappatnam or Putapattana.] The name is Tamil, Pudipattana, ‘New City.’ Compare true form of Pondicherry.

C. 545.—"The most notable places of trade are these . . . and then five marts of Maláv and from which pepper is exported, to wit, Porto, Mangarth (see MANGALORE), Saloipattana, Saloipata, Pudopatana . . .—Cassins Indopropugatus, Bk. xi. (see in Cuthac, &c. p. cxxviii.)

1422.—"Buddapattan, which is a considerable city, situated upon a great estuary. . . . The haven of this city is one of the finest; the water is good, the betel-nut is abundant, and is exported thence to India and China."—Fais, Korla, iv. 57.

1420.—"A quaint curious se disbues vizinzi terrestri via contrulit ad urbeum portumque maritimum nomine Pudistaneam."—Conti. in Poggio, de Var. Fort. 1516.—". . . And passing those places you come to a river called Pudpítran, in which there is a great place having many Moorish merchants who possess a multitude of ships, and here begins the Kingdom of Calicut."—Barbosa, in Romério, i. f. 311. See also in Stanf’s Barbosa Pudopatani, and Tolufati-Pudoffan, by Rowlandson, pp. 71, 157, where the name (Budhapam) is misread Budufsan.

(PUG. s. Hind. pug, Skt. padaka, ‘a foot’; in Anglo-Indian use the footmarks of an animal, such as a tiger.

1538.—". . . sanguine we were sometimes on the report of a bare pug from the shikaree."—Oriental Spelt. Mag. reprint 1873, ii. 17s.

1532.—"Presently the large square 'pug' of the tiger we were in search of appeared."—Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 59.

PUGGRY, PUGGERIE. s. Hind. pagri, a 'turban.' The term being often used in colloquial for a scari of cotton or silk wound round the hat in turban-form, to protect the head from the sun, both the thing and name have of late years made their way to England, and may be seen in London shop-windows.

C. 1230.—"'Prithi aya . . . wore a pagari ornamented with jewels, with a splendid to." In his ears he wore pearls; on his neck a pearl necklace."—Obed Baddar E.T. by Besant, Ind. Ant. i. 232.

1627.—". . . I find it is the common mode of the Eastern People to shave the head all save a long lock which superstitiously they leave at the very top, such especially as wear Turbans, Mandlis, Dusters, and Puggarees."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 140.]

1673.—"They are distinguished, some according to the consanguinity they claim with Mahomet, as a Stad is akin to that imposture, and therefore only assumes to himself a Green Vest and Fuckery (or Turban)."—Fryer, 93; [comp. 158].

1689.—"... with a Puggaree or Turban upon their Heads."—Drington, 314.

1871.—"... They (the Negro Police in Demarrara) used frequently to be turned out to parade in George Town streets, dressed in a neat uniform, while puggreys framing in their ebony faces."—Jenkins, The Coolie.

PUGGY, s. Hind. perr (not in Shakespeare's Dict., nor in Platts), from pag (see PUG), 'the foot.' A professional tracker; the name of a caste, or rather an occupation, whose business is to track thieves by footmarks and is the like. On the system, see Burton, Sind Recisit, i. 180 seq.

[1824.—"... There are in some of the districts of Central India (as in Guzerat) puggreys, who have small fees on the village, and whose business it is to trace thieves by the print of their feet."—Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. ii. 19.]

1879.—"Good puggreys or trackers should be employed to follow the dacoits during the daytime."—Times of India, Overland Suppt., May 12, p. 7.

PUHUR, PORE, PYRE, &c., s. Hind. pahr, pahr, from Skt. prahara, 'A fourth part of the day and of the night, a watch' or space of 8 gharis (see GHURRY).

c. 1226.—"The natives of Hindostan divide the night and day into 60 parts, each of which they denominate a Gheri; they likewise divide the night into 4 parts, and the day into the same number, each of which they call a Pahar or watch, which the Persians call a Paks."—Baker, 351.

[c. 1590.—"The Hindu philosophers divide the day and night into four parts, each of which they call a pahr."—Tm, ed. Jarrett, iii. 15.]

1633.—"Par." See under GHURRY.

1673.—"Pore." See under GONG.

1803.—"I have some Jasooses selected by Col. C's brahmin for their stupidity, that they might not pry into state secrets, who go to Sindia's camp, remain there a phaur in fear. . . ."—M. Elphinstone, in Life, i. 62.

PULÁ, s. In Tamil pillaí, Malayal. pilla, 'child'; the title of a superior class of (so-called) Súdras, [especially curnums]. In Cochin and Travancore it corresponds with Nīgar (see NAIR). It is granted by the sovereign, and carries exemption from customary manual labour.

1553.—"... pulas, who are the gentlemen." (fidalgos).—Colonidades, iv. 2.

[1725.—"O Sagnate que o Commander tinha remetido como gristnave amin e as Paimares temos ca recebid."—Rutification, in Logos, Malabar; iii. 13.]

PULICAT, n.p. A town on the Madras coast, which was long the seat of a Dutch factory. Bp. Caldwell's native friend Seshagiri Sástri gives the proper name as pula-Velkánd, 'old Velkán or Verkád, the last a place-name mentioned in the Tamil Sinaité Texts (see also Valentijn below). [The Madras Gloss. gives Pachwerka-bula, 'old acacia forest,' which is corroborated by Dr. Hultzsch (Epigraphia Indica, i. 395).]

1519.—"And because he had it much in charge to obtain all the he (wherefore) that he could, the Governor learning from merchants that much of it was brought to the Coast of Choromandel by the vessels of Pegu and Martaban which visited that coast to procure painted cloths and other coloured goods, such as are made in Paleacate, which is on the coast of Choromandel, whence the traders with whom the Governor spoke brought it to Cochin; he, having got good information on the whole matter, sent a certain Frolentine (sir, frolentine) called Pero Escrico, whom he knew, and who was good at trade, to be factor on the coast of Choromandel. . . ."—Corda, ii. 567.

1553.—"The said Armenian, having already been at the city of Paleacate, which is in the Province of Choromandel and the Kingdom of Bijag, when on his way to Bengal, and having information of the place where the body of S. Thomas was said to be, and when they arrived at the port of Paleacate the wind was against their going on. . . ."—Barros, III, vii. 11.

[1611.—"The Dutch settled a factory at Pellacate."—Dunhur, Letters, i. 128; in Foster, ii. 83, Pollicat.]

1726.—"Then we come to Pellaane Willem Caldoe, called by us for shortness Pella-catta, which means in Malabars 'The old Fortress,' though most commonly we call it Castle Gobhria."—Valentijn, Chorom. 13.

"The route I took was along the strip of country between Porto Novo and Paleacatta. This long journey I travelled on foot; and preached in more than a hundred places. . . ."—Letter of the Missionary Schultze, July 19, in Notices of Madras, &c., p. 29.

1727.—"Policat is the next Place of Note to the City and Colony of Fort St George.
PUNCH.

... It is strengthened with two Forts, one contains a few Dutch soldiers for a Garrison, the other is commanded by an Officer belonging to the Mogul."—A. Hamilton, i. 375, [ed. 1744.

[1813.—"Pulecat handkerchiefs." See under PIECE-GOODS.

PULTUN. s. Hind. pultan, a corruption of Battalion, possibly with some confusion of平淡 or pulaton. The S. India form is patalam, patlaim. It is the usual native word for a regiment of native infantry; it is never applied to one of Europeans.

1800.—"All I can say is that I am ready primed, and that if all matters suit I shall go off with a dreadful explosion, and shall probably destroy two campoons and pultons which have been indiscriminately pushed across the Kistna."—A. Welsby to T. M'Intosh, in Mem. of Munro, by Arbuthnot, lxix.

1855.—"I know lots of Sahibs in a pullatoon at Bareilly."—Mrs Croker, Village Tales and Jungle Tragedies, 60.

PULWAH. PULWAR. s. One of the native boats used on the rivers of Bengal, carrying some 12 to 15 tons. Hind. pulwahr. [For a drawing see Grierson, Bihar Village Life, p. 42.]

1735.—"... We observed a boat which had come out of Sambar river, making for Pultan: the commandant detached two light puswaras after her..."—Hobwell, Hist. Events, &c. i. 69.

[1767.—"... a Peon came twice to Noon-golah, to apply for pulwars..."—Petels, View of Bengal, App. 197.]

1780.—"Besides this boat, a gentleman is generally attended by two others: a pulwar for the accommodation of the kitchen, and a smaller boat, a paunchway (q.v.).—Hodges, p. 39.

1782.—"To be sold. Three New Dacca Pulwars. 60 feet long, with Houses in the middle of each."—India Gazette. Aug. 31.

1824.—"The ghut offered a scene of bustling and vivacity which I by no means expected. There were so many hucksters and pulwars that we had considerable difficulty to find a mooring place."—Hibber, ed. 1814, i. 131.

1860.—"The Pulwar is a smaller description of native travelling boat, of nearer build, and less rusticity of character, sometimes used by a single traveller of humble means, and at others serves as cook-boat and accommodation for servants accompanying orders of the large kind of boats..."—Trav. Real Life in Bengal, p. 7, with an illustration.

PULWAUN. s. P.—H. puhlwa^n, which properly means...a native of ancient Persia" (see PAHLAVI). Mr. Skene notes that in Malay the word becomes pulhivian, probably from a confusion with Malay dawm, 'to fight'.

A champion: a professed wrestler or man of strength.

[1758.—"... the fourth, and least numerous of these bodies, were choice men of the Pehlevans..."—Hawker, iii. 194.

[1813.—"When his body has by these means imbued an additional portion of vigour, he is dignified by the appellation of Puhvian."—Gough's Letters, ed. 1892, p. 165.]

1828.—"I added a pahlvian or prize-fighter, a negro whose teeth were filed into saws, of a temper as ferocious as his aspect, who could throw any man of his weight to the ground, carry a jaekass, devour a sheep whole, eat fire, and make a fountain of his inside, so as to act as a spout."—Haji Bukh in England, i. 15.

PUN. s. A certain number of cowries, generally 80: Hind. puny. (See under COWRY). The Skt. pagi is "a stake played for a price, a sum," and hence both a coin (whence fanam, q.v.) and a certain amount of cowries.

1554.—"Pone." (See under PORTO PIQUENO.)

1683.—"I was this day advised Mr. Charnock put off Mr. Ellis's Cowries at 84 pund to ye Rupee in payment of all ye Peons and Servants of the Factory, whereas 85 pund are really bought by him for a Rupee..."—Hodges, Diary, Oct. 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 122].

1760.—"We now take into consideration the relief of the medial servants of this Settlement, respecting the exorbitant price of labor, exacted from them by tailors, washermen, and barbers, which appears in near a quadruple proportion compared with the prices paid in 1755. Agreed, that after the 1st of April they be regulated as follows:

...No tailor to demand for making:

1 Jamma, more than 3 annas.
+ + + + + + +
1 pair of drawers, 7 pun of cowries.
No washerman:
1 corse of pieces, 7 pun of cowries.
No barber for shaving a single person, more than 7 gundas" (see COWERY).—F. William Cowens, March 27, in Long, 209.

PUNCH. s. This beverage, according to the received etymology, was named from the Pers. pun, or Hind. and Mahr. punih, both meaning 'five'; because composed of five ingredients, viz. arrack, sugar, lime-juice, spice, and water. Fryer may be considered to give something like historical evidence of its origin: but there is also something of Indian idiom in the suggestion. Thus a famous horse-medicine in Upper India is known as batti, because it is supposed to contain 32 ("batti") ingredients. Schiller, in his Punschlied, sacrificing truth to trope, omits the spice and makes the ingredients only 4: "Vier Elemente Innig gesellt, Bilden das Leben, Bauen die Welt."

The Greeks also had a "Punch," πετρανάς, as is shown in the quotation from Athenaeus. Their mixture does not sound inviting. Littre gives the etymology correctly from the Pers. punj, but the 5 elements à la française, as tea, sugar, spirit, cinnamon, and lemon-peel,—no water therefore!

Some such compound appears to have been in use at the beginning of the 17th century under the name of Larkin (q.v.). Both Dutch and French travellers in the East during that century celebrate the beverage under a variety of names which amalgamate the drink curiously with the vessel in which it was brewed. And this combination in the form of Bole-ponjis was adopted as the title of a Miscellany published in 1851, by H. Meredith Parker, a Bengal civilian, of local repute for his literary and dramatic tastes. He had lost sight of the original authorities for the term, and his quotation is far astray. We give them correctly below.

c. 210.—"On the feast of the Scirrha at Athens he (Aristolemanus on Pindar) says a race was run by the young men. They ran this race carrying each a vine-branch laden with grapes, such as is called ἱδρας; and they ran from the temple of Dionysus to that of Athena Scirns. And the winner receives a cup such as is called Five-fold: and of this he partakes joyously with the band of his comrades. But the cup is called πετρανάς because it contains wine and honey and cheese and flour, and a little oil."—Athenaeus, XI. xcl.

1638.—"This voyage (Gombroon to Surat) ... we accomplished in 19 days ... We drank English beer, Spanish sack, French wine, Indian spirit, and good English water, and made good Palepunzen."—Mandelslo, (Dutch ed. 1658), p. 24. The word Palepunzen seems to have puzzled the English translator (John Davis, 2nd ed. 1659), who has "excellent good sack, English beer, French wines, Arab, and other refreshments." (p. 10).

[1658.—"Arrived this place where found the Bezar almost burnt and many of the People almost starved for want of Food, which caused much Saddens in Mr. Champock and my Seffe, but not so much as the absence of your Company, which wee have so often remembered in a bowl of the clearest Punch, having noe better Liquor."—Howes, Diary, Hak. Soc. iii. exiv.]

1659.—"Furs Dritte, Pale bunze getut- liert, von halb Wasser, halb Brantwein, dreyssig, vierzig Limonen, deren Körnlein ausgespeyet werden, und ein wenig Zucker eingeworfen; wie dem Geschmack so angenehm nicht, also auch der Gesundheit nicht."—Naur, ed. 1672, 60.

[1662.—"Amongst other spirituous drinks, as PUNCH, &c., they gave us Canarie that had been carried to and fro from the Indies, which was indeed incomparably good."—Evles, Diary, Jan. 16.]

c. 1666.—"Neunmoins depuis qu'ils (les Anglais) ont donne ordre, au-si bien que les Hollandois, que leurs équipages ne soient point de Bouleponges ... il n'y a pas tant de maladies, et il ne leur murt plus tant de monde. Bouleponge est un certain breuvage composé d'arance ... avec du suc de limons, de l'eau, et un peu de muscade rapée dessus: il est assez agréable au guot, mais c'est la poste du corps et de la santé."—Berner, ed. 1723, ii. 335 (Eng. Tr. p. 141); [ed. Constable, 44].

1670.—"Doch als men zekere andere drank, die zij Paleponzen noemen, daartusschen drinkt, zo word het quant enigins geweert."—Andries, 9. Also at p. 27, "Palepunzen."

We find this blunder of the compound word transported again to England, and explained as a 'hard word.'

1672.—Padre Vincenzo Maria describes the thing, but without a name: "There are many fruities to which the Hollander and the English add a certain beverage that they compound of lemon-juice, aquavitae, sugar, and nutmegs, to quench their thirst, and this, in my belief, augments not a little the evil influence."—Travels, p. 103.

1673.—"At Nerule is the best Jock or Nip (see NIPA) de Geo, with which the English on this Coast make that enervating Liquor called Pounch (which is Induban for Five), from Five Ingredients: as the Physicians name their Composition Diapente: or from four things, Diatesseron."—Traver, 157.

1674.—"Pulapunzts, a kind of Indian drink, consisting of Aquavitae, Rose-water, juice of Citrons and Sugar."—Glossographia, &c., by T. E.

[1675.—"Drank part of their boules of Punch (a liquor very strange to me)."—H. Trange, Diary, June I.]
1682.—“Some (of the Chinese in Batavia) also sell Sugar-beer, as well as cooked dishes and Sury (see SURA), arak or Indian brandy; wherefrom they make Musak and Follepons, as the English-men call it.” — Vennoff, Zee en Lant-Reizc, ii. 217.

1683.—“. . . Our own people and mariners who are now very numerous, and insolent among us, and (by reason of Punch) every day give disturbance.” — Hedges, Diary, Oct. 8th. [Hak. Soc. i. 123.]

1688.—“. . . the soldiers as merry as Punch could make them.” — In Wheeler, i. 157.

1689.—“Bengal (Arak) is much stronger spirit than that of Goa, tho' both are made use of by the Europeans in making Punch.” — Ortington, 287 S.

1694.—“If any man comes into a Victualling house to drink punch, he may demand one quart good Goa arak, half a pound of sugar, and half a pint of good line water, and make his own punch . . .” — Order Book of Bombay Govt., quoted by Anderson, p. 281.

1707.—“Un bon repas chez les Anglais ne se fait point sans boire ponne qu'on sert dans grand vase.” — Sieur Lvillier, Voy. aux Grandes Indes, 29.

1717.—“Hence every one (at Madras) has it in his Power to eat well, tho' he can afford no other Liquor at Meals than Punch, which is the common Drink among Europeans, and here made in the greatest Perfection.” — Locker, 22.

1724.—“Next to Drums, no Liquor deserves more to be stigmatised and banished from the Repasts of the Tender, Valuable, and Studious, than Punch.” — O. Chirnys, An Essay on Health and Longevity, p. 58.

1771.—“Des que l’Anglais eut cessé de manquer, le Paria . . . lit un signe à sa femme, qui apporça une grande calisse pleine de punch, qu’elle avoit préparé, pendant le somme, avec de l’eau, et du jus de citron, et du jus de canne de sucre. . . .” — B. de St. Pierre, Chanières Indo-ienn, 56.

PUNCH-HOUSE. s. An Inn or Tavern; now the term is chiefly used by natives (sometimes in the hybrid form Punch-ghar, [which in Upper India is now transferred to the meeting-place of a Municipal Board]) at the Presidency towns, and applied to houses frequented by seamen. Formerly the word was in general Anglo-Indian use. [In the Straits the Malay Punch-haus is, according to Mr. Skeat, still in use, though obsolescent.]

[1961.—“. . . the Commandore visiting us, we delivering him another examination of a Persee [ Parsee], who kept a Punch house, where the murder was committed.” — Forrest, Bombay Letters, Home Series, i. 189.]

1671-2.—“It is likewise enquired and declared hereby that no Victuallar, Punch-house, or other house of Entertainment shall be permitted to make stoppage at the pay day of their wages . . .” — Rubs, in Wheeler, iii. 423.

1758.—Major Puckle’s “Proposals to the Agent about the young men at Mitchle-patam.”

“That some pecuniary mule or fine be imposed . . . for misdemeanours.

—in Notes and Eats, No. 1. p. 40.

1655.—“. . . at his return to Achen he constantly frequented an English Punch-house, spending his Gold very freely.” — Dampier, ii. 134.

“. . . Mrs. Francs, wife to the late Lieutenant Francis killed at Hoogly by the Moors, made it her petition that she might keep a Punch-house for her maintenance.” — In Wheeler, i. 154.

1697.—“Monday, 1st April . . . Mr. Cheesely having in a Punch-house, upon a quarrel of words, drawn his sword . . . and being taxed therewith, he both doth own and justify the drawing of the sword . . . it thereupon ordered not to wear a sword while here.” — In Wheeler, i. 320.

1727.—“. . . Of late no small Pains and Charge have been bestowed upon its Buildings (of the Fort at Tellichery); but for what Reason I know not . . . unless it be for small Vessels . . . or to protect the Company’s Ware-house, and a small Punch-house that stands on the Sea-shore . . .” — J. Hamilton, i. 290 [ed. 1741.]

1759.—“Many . . . are obliged to take up their residence in dirty punch-houses.” — Maturin’s Narrative, 22.

1810.—“The best house of that description which admits boarders, and which are commonly called Punch-houses.” — Williamson, i. M. i. 135.

PUNCHAYET. s. Hind. punchayat, from pinch, ‘five.’ A council (properly of 5 persons) assembled as a Court of Arbiters or Jury; or as a committee of the people of a village, of the members of a Caste, or whatnot, to decide on questions interesting the body generally.

1778.—“The Honourable William Hornby, Esq., President and Governor of His Majesty’s Castle and Island of Bombay, &c.”

“The humble Petition of the Managers of the Punchayet of Parsis at Bombay . . .

1810.—“The Parsees . . . are governed by their own panchait or village Council.
The word punchait literally means a Council of five, but that of the Guereas in Bombay consists of thirteen of the principal merchants of the sect.” — Maria Graham, 41.

1813. — “The carpet of justice was spread in the large open hall of the durbar, where the arbitrators assembled; there I always attended, and agreeably to ancient custom, referred the decision to a punchaet or jury of five persons.” — Forbes, Or. Mem., ii. 359; [in 2nd ed. (ii. 2) Punchaunt.

1819. — “The punchayet itself, although in all but village cases it has the defects before ascribed to it, possesses many advantages. The intimate acquaintance of the members with the subject in dispute, and in many cases with the characters of the parties, must have made their decisions frequently correct, and, the judges being drawn from the body of the people, could act on no principles that were not generally understood.” — Elphinstone, in Life, ii. 59.

1821. — “I kept up punchayets because I found them. I still think that the punchayet should on no account be dropped, that it is an excellent institution for dispensing justice, and in keeping up the principles of justice which are less likely to be observed among a people to whom the administration of it is not at all intrusted.” — Ibid. 121.

1823. — “... when he returns assemble a punchayet, and give this cause patient attention, seeing that Hybbaty has justice.” — Pendranging Hori, 31; [ed. 1873, i. 42].

1832. — Bengal Regn. VI. of this year allows the judge of the Sessions Court to call in the alternative aid of a punchayet, in lieu of assessors, and so to dispense with the futwa. See LAW-OFFICER.

1853. — “From the death of Runjeet Singh to the battle of Sobraon, the Sikh Army was governed by Punchayets or Punches —committees of the soldiery. These bodies sold the Government to the Sikh chief who paid the highest, letting him command until murdered by one who paid higher.” — Sir C. Napier, Defects of Indian Government, 69.

1873. — “The Council of an Indian Village Community most commonly consists of five persons ... the punchayet familiar to all who have the smallest knowledge of India.” — Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, 221.

PUNDIT. s. Skt. pandita, ‘a learned man.’ Properly a man learned in Sanskrit lore. The Pundit of the Supreme Court was a Hindu Law-Officer, whose duty it was to advise the English Judges when needful on questions of Hindu Law. The office became extinct on the constitution of the High Court, superseding the Supreme Court and Sudder Court, under the Queen's Letters Patent of May 14, 1862.

In the Mahratta and Telegu countries, the word Pundit is usually pronounced Pat (in English colloquial Pant); but in this form it has, as with many other Indian words in like case, lost its original significance, and become a mere personal title, familiar in Mahratta history, e.g. the Nana Dhuondopant of evil fame.

Within the last 30 or 35 years the term has acquired in India a peculiar application to the natives trained in the use of instruments, who have been employed beyond the British Indian frontier in surveying regions inaccessible to Europeans. This application originated in the fact that two of the earliest men to be so employed, the explorations by one of whom acquired great celebrity, were masters of village schools in our Himalayan provinces. And the title Pundit is popularly employed there much as Dominic used to be in Scotland. The Pundit who brought so much fame on the title was the late Nain Singh, C.S.I. [See Markham, Memoir of Indian Survey, 2nd ed. 148 seqq.]

1574. — “I hereby give notice that ... I hold it good, and it is my pleasure, and therefore I enjoin on all the pandits (punditio) and Gentoo physicians (physici gentios) that they ride not through this City (of Goa) or the suburbs thereof on horseback, nor in andors and palanquins, on pain of paying, on the first offence 10 cruzados, and on the second 20, pero o supel,* with the forfeiture of such horses, andors, or palanquins, and on the third they shall become the galley-slaves of the King my Lord.” — Proc. of the Governor Antonio Mortiz Barreto, in Archiv. Port. Orient. Fascic. 5, p. 899.

1616. — “... Brachmanna una cum Panditis commanentes, simil quid iam ininde orbis exordiio in Indostane visum negat.” — Juric, Theorices, iii. 81-82.

* Pero o supel, i.e. for the marsh.” We cannot be certain of the meaning of this; but we may note that in 1743 the King, as a favour to the city of Goa, and for the commodity of its shipping, &c., makes a grant of the marsh inundated with sea-water (do supel abagado digo sahyada) which extends along the river-side from the houses of Antonio Correia to the houses of Alfonso Pupo, which grant is to be perpetual ... to serve for a landing-place and quay for the merchants to moor and repair their ships, and to erect their bankshalls (banyues), and never to be taken away to any other purpose. In possibly the times went into a fund for the drainage of this supel and formation of landing-places. See Archiv. Port. Orient., Fasc. 2, pp. 130-131.
1963.—"A Pendet" Brachman or Heatheh Doctor whom I had put to serve my Agah ... would needs make his Panezyrick ... and at last concluded seriously with this: When you put your Foot into the Stirrup, My Lord, and when you march on Horseback in the front of the Cavalry, the Earth trembleth under your Foot, the eight Elephants that hold it up upon their Heads not being able to support it." — Beres, E.T., 85; [ed. Constable, 261].

1755. — "I can no longer bear to be at the mercy of our panduits, who deal out Hindu laws as they please; and make it at reasonable rates, when they cannot find it ready made." — Letter of Sir W. Jones, in Mem. by Ed. Teignmouth, 1597, ii. 67.

1731. — "Il était au moment de s'embrasser for l'Angleterre, plein de perplexité et d'ennui, lorsque les brames de Benares lui apprirent que le brame supérieur de la fameuse pagode de Jagrenat ... était seul capable de Benares de résoudre les questions de la Société royale de Londres. C'était en effet le plus fameux pandect, ou docteur, dont on eût jamais ouï parler." — B. de St. Pierre, La Chauve-Hic, Indienne. The preceding exquisite passage shows that the blunder which drew forth Macaulay's flaming wrath, in the quotation lower down, was not a new one.

1789. — ... the most learned of the Panduits or Bramin lawyers, were called up from different parts of Bengal." — Rich. Hist. i. 42.

1856. — "Besides ... being a Pandit of learning, he (Sir David Brewster) is a bundle of talents of various kinds." — Life and Letters of Sydney Dobell, ii. 14.

1850. — "Mr. Visetolly next makes me say that the principle of limitation is found "amongst the Pandects of the Benares." The Benares he probably supposed to be some Oriental nation. What he supposes their Pandects to be I shall not presume to guess. ... If Mr. Visetolly had consulted the Unitarian Report, he would have seen that I spoke of the Pandits of Benares, and he might without any very long and costly research have learned where Benares is and what a Pandit is." — Macaulay, Preface to his Speeches.

1877. — "Colonel Y. — Since Nain Singh's absence from this country precludes my having the pleasure of handing to him in person this, the Victoria or Patron's Medal, which has been awarded to him, I beg to place it in your charge for transmission to the Pandit." — Address by Sir R. B. Ives, Pres. R. Geog. Soc., May 28.

"Colonel Y. — in reply, said: ... Though I do not know Nain Singh personally, I know his work. ... He is not a topographical automaton, or merely one of a great multitude of native employes with an average qualification. His observations have added a larger amount of important knowledge to the map of Asia than those of any other living man, and his journals form an exceedingly interesting book of travels. It will afford me great pleasure to take steps for the transmission of the Medal through an official channel to the Pandit." — Reply to the President, same date.

PUNJAUB, n.p. The name of the country between the Indus and the Sutlej. The modern Anglo-Indian province so-called, now extends on one side up beyond the Indus, including Peshāwār, the Dera-jat, &c., and on the other side up to the Jumna, including Delhi. [In 1901 the Frontier Districts were placed under separate administration.] The name is Pers. Pus-jab, 'Five Rivers.' These rivers, as reckoned, sometimes include the Indus, in which case the five are (1) Indus, (2) Jelum (see JELUM) or Behat, the ancient Vitisma which the Greeks made Teasτης (Strabo) and Bāṣāṣ (Ptol.), (3) Chenab, ancient Chandrabhagha and Asikā. Ptolemy preserves a corruption of the former Sanskrit name in Varahād, but it was rejected by the older Greeks because it was of ill omen, i.e., probably because Grecized it would be Σαντάσσαται, the devourer of Alexander. The alternative Asikā they rendered Λέσσας. 4) Kavi, the ancient Aintetah, Παντεστής (Strabo), Τομετής (Arrian), Adiṣu or Potadas (Ptol.). (5) Bina, ancient Vitisma, Τομές (Arrian), Bāṣāṣ (Ptol.). This excluded the Sutlej, Sarhur, Hastivīra of Pliny, Zapāsus or Zaādāsus (Ptol.), as Timiri excludes it below. We may take in the Sutlej and exclude the Indus, but we can hardly exclude the Chenab as Wassāf does below.

No corresponding term is used by the Greek geographers. "Putandum est nomen Panchanadacae Graecos aut omnino latissime, aut casu quodam non ad nostrā usque tempora pervenisse, quod in tanta monumentorum ruina facile accidere potuit" (Lassen, Pāṭīopātimā, 3). Lassen however has termed the country Pāṭīopātimā in a learned Latin dissertation on its ancient geography. Though the actual word Pus-jab is Persian, and dates from Mahommedan times, the corresponding Skt. Panchaṃbala is ancient and genuine, occurring in the Mahābhārata and Ramayāna. The name Pus-jab in older Mahommedan writers is applied to the Indus river, after receiving the rivers of the country which we call Punjaub. In that sense Punjnad, of equivalent meaning, is still occasionally used. [In S. India the term is sometimes applied to the country watered by the Tumbhadrâ, Wardhâ, Malprâhâ, Gatlprâhâ and Kistna (Wilks, Hist. Sketches, Madras reprint, p. 405).]

We remember in the newspapers, after the second Sikh war, the report of a speech by a clergyman in England, who spoke of the deposition of "the bloody Punjaub of Lahore."

R.C. E.—"Having explored the land of the Pahlavi and the country adjoining, there had then to be searched Panchanada in every part: the monkeys then explore the region of Kashmir with its woods of acacias."

—Iltâdâ'ar, Bk. iv. ch. 45.

c. 940.—May's full details (with no correctness) of the five rivers that form the Mhîrân or Indus. He proceeds: "When the Five Rivers which we have named have past the House of Gold which is Multân, they unite at a place three days distant from that city, between it and Mansûrâ at a place called Doshâb."—I. 347-8.

c. 1020.—"They all (Sind, Jilaham, Irâna, Bâb) combine with the Satlader (Satlaj) below Multân, at a place called Panjnad, or 'the junction of the five rivers.' They form a very wide stream."—Al-Birrâhî, in Elliot, i. 48.

c. 1300.—"After crossing the Panj-ab, or five rivers, namely Sind, Jelam, the river of Lahâwar (i.e. of Lahore, viz. the Râvi), Satlât, and Bâbâh. . . ."—Wassîf, in Elliot, iii. 36.

c. 1533.—"By the grace of God our caravan arrived safe and sound at Banjâb, i.e. at the River of the Sind. Banj (banj) signifies 'five,' and bâb, 'water;' so that the name signifies 'the Five Waters.' They flow into this great river, and water the country."—Ibn Battuta, iii. 91.

c. 1550.—"All these (united) rivers (Jelam, Chenâl, Râvi, Bâbâh, Sind) are called the Sind or Panj-ab, and this river falls into the Persian Gulf near Thatta."—The Emp. Tunis, in Elliot, iii. 476.

[c. 1600.—"He also takes a Survey of Pangob. . . ."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 63. He gives a list of the rivers in p. 70.]

1648.—". . . Pang-ab, the chief city of which is Lahore, is an excellent and fruitful province, for it is watered by the five rivers of which we have formerly spoken."—Van Twiet, 3.

"The River of the ancient Indus, is by the Persians and Magols called Pang-ab, i.e. the Five Waters."—Ibid. i.

1710.—"He found this ancient and famous city (Lahore) in the Province Panschaap, by the side of the broad and fish-abounding river Râri (or Râri)."—Valatgei, iv. (Narrative), 292.

1790.—"Investigations of the religious ceremonies and customs of the Hindoos, written in the Carnatic, and in the Punjaub, would in many cases widely differ."—Forster, Preface to Journey.

1793.—"The Province, of which Lahore is the capital, is often called Panjâb than Lahore."—Rennell's Memoir, 3rd ed. 82.

1804.—"I rather think . . . that he (Hollis) will go off to the Punjaub. And what gives me stronger reason to think so, is, that the seal of his letter to me he calls himself 'the Slave of Shah Mahmud, the King of Kings.' Shah Mahmud is the brother of Zemâna Shah. He seized the musnad and government of Caubul, after having defeated Zemâna Shah two or three years ago, and put out his eyes."—Wilkinson, Desp. under March 17.

1813.—"He (Subagtageen) . . . overran the fine province of the Punjaub, in his first expedition."—Malcolm, Hist. of Persia, i. 316.

PUNKAH. s. Hind. pankhā.

a. In its original sense a portable fan, generally made from the leaf of the palmyra (Borassus flabelliferus, or 'fan-shaped'), the natural type and origin of the fan. Such pankhās in India are not however formed as Chinese fans are, like those of our ladies; they are generally, whether large or small, of a bean-shape, with a part of the dried leaf-stalk adhering, which forms the handle.

b. But the specific application in Anglo-Indian colloquial is to the large fixed and swinging fan, formed of cloth stretched on a rectangular frame, and suspended from the ceiling, which is used to agitate the air in hot weather. The date of the introduction of this machine into India is not known to us. The quotation from Linschoten shows that some such apparatus was known in the 16th century, though this comes out clearly in the French version alone; the original Dutch, and the old English translation are here unintelligible, and indicate that Linschoten (who apparently never was at Ormuz) was describing, from hearsay, something that he did not understand. More remarkable passages are those which we take from Dozy, and from El-Fakhri, which show that the true Anglo-Indian pankhā was known to the Arabs as early as the 8th century.

1710.—"Alot in a Gallery the King sits in his chaire of State, accomplished with his Children and chiefe Vizier... no other without calling daring to goe vp to him, save only two Punkaws to gather wind.

II. Finck, in Punctas. i. 339. The word seems here to be used improperly for the men who plied the fans. We find also in the same writer a verb to punkaw:

"... behind one punkawing, another holding his sword."—Ibid. 433.

Terry does not use the word:

1616.—"... the people of better quality, lying or sitting on their Carpets or Pallats, have servants standing about them, who continually beat the air upon them with Plau-bullas, or Fans, of stiffened leather, which keep off the flies from annoying them, and cool them as they lye."—Ed. 1655, p. 405.

1663.—"On such occasions they desire nothing but... to lie down in some cool and shady place all along, having a servant or two to fan one by turns, with their great Punkas, or Fans."—Berier. E.T. p. 76; [ed. Constable, 241].

1757.—"Over her head was held a punker."—Sir C. Mack. in Parl. Papers, 1821, "Hindoo Woman.

1809.—"He... presented me... two punkahs."—Lord Vaubolt. i. 428.

1851.—"The chair of state, the silla gasto-buris, in which the Pope is borne aloft, is the ancient palanquin of the Roman nobles, and, of course, of the Roman Princes... the fans which go behind are the punkahs of the Eastern Emperors, borrowed from the Court of Persia."—Barnes Stanley, Chris-

c. 1150-60.—"Sous le nom de Khaych ou entend des etoффes de mauvais toile de lin qui servent a divers usages. Dans ce passage de Razees (c. A.D. 1060) ce sont des ventilateurs faits de cet etoffe, Ceci se pratique de cette maniere: on en prend un morceau de la grandeur d'un tapis, un peu plus grand ou un peu plus petit selon les dimensions de la chambre, et on le renbouvre avec des objets qui ont de la consistence et qui ne plient pas facilement, par exemple avec du sable. L'ayant ensuite suspendu au milieu de la chambre, on le fait tirer et lacher doucelement et continuuellement par un homme place dans le haut de l'appartement. De cette maniere il fait beau car de vent et le rafraichit l'air. Quelquefois on le trempe dans de l'eau de rose, et alors il parfume l'air en meme temps qu'il le rafraichit."—Glossaire sur le Moeuvre, quoted in Desy et Engelmann. p. 342. See also Desy, Sapp, and Dott. Add. in Ed. Khaych.

1166.—"He (Ibn Hamdon the Kabit) once recited to me the following piece of his composition, containing an enigmatical description of a linen fan: (1)

"Fast and loose, it cannot touch what it tries to reach; though tied up it moves swiftly, and though a prisoner it is free. Fixed in its place it drives before it the gentle breeze; though its path lie closed up it moves on in its nocturnal journey."—Quoted by Ibn Khatibias. E.T. iii. 91.

(1) The lines jin (Mirobat al Khaych) is a large piece of linen, stretched on a frame, and suspended from the ceiling of the room. They make use of it in Irak. See de Sayes Hariri, p. 474.—Note by MacGuckin de Slane, ibid. p. 92.

c. 1300.—"One of the innovations of the Caliph Mansur (A.D. 755-774) was the Khaych of linen in summer, a thing which was not known before his time. But the Sassanian Kings used in summer to have an apartment freshly plastered (with clay) every day, which they inhabited, and on the morrow another apartment was plastered for them."—El-Fakhri, ed. Alhedou, p. 152.

1580.—"And (they use) instruments like swings with fans, to rock the people in, and to make wind for cooling, which they call Cattavento,—Literal Transl. from Lin-

The French version is really a brief description of the punka:

1610.—"Il est aussi du Cattavento qui sont certains instruments pendus en l'air esqués se faisant donner le trans-e-fait tout le vent qui les rafraichit."—Ed. 1688, p. 17.

The next also perhaps refers to a suspended punka:

1692.—"... furnished also with good Cellars with great Flaps to stir the Air, for reposing in the fresh Air from 12 till 4 or 5 of the Clock, when the Air of these Cellars begins to be hot and stuffy."—Berier, p. 79; [ed. Constable, 247].

1807.—"As one small concern succeeds another, the punkah vibrates gently over my eyes."—Lord Minto in India. 27.

1819.—"Were it not for the punka (a large frame of wood covered with cloth) which is suspended over every table, and kept swinging, in order to freshen the air, it would be scarcely possible to sit out the melancholy heat of an Indian dinner."—Marais, Graham. 30.

Williamson mentions that punkahs were suspended in most dining halls."—Vide Memoir. i. 281.

1823.—"Punkas, large frames of light wood covered with white cotton, and looking not unlike enormous fire-boards, hung from the ceilings of the principal apartments."—Holer. ed. 1844. i. 25.

1852.—"Holy stones with rubbels and slaps (Our Christmas waists,) prelude the day; For holly and festoons of bay Swing feebie punkas,—or perhaps A wind sack dangling in collapse."—Christmas on board a L. and O., near the Equator.
1875.—“The punkah flapped to and fro lazily overhead.”—Chesney, The Dilemma, ch. xxxviii.

Mr. Busteed observes: “It is curious that in none of the lists of servants and their duties which are scattered through the old records in the last century (18th), is there any mention of the punkah, nor in any narratives referring to domestic life in India then, that have come under our notice, do we remember any allusion to its use... The swinging punkah, as we see it to-day, was, as every one knows, an innovation of a later period... This dates from an early year in the present century.”—Echoes of Old Calcutta, p. 115. He does not seem, however, to have found any positive evidence of the date of its introduction.

[“Hanging punkahs are said by one authority to have originated in Calcutta by accident towards the close of the last (18th) century. It is reported that a clerk in a Government office suspended the leaf of a table, which was accidentally waved to and fro by a visitor. A breath of cool air followed the movement, and suggested the idea which was worked out and resulted in the present machine” (Carey, Good Old Days of John Company, i. 81). Mr. Douglas says that punkahs were little used by Europeans in Bombay till 1810. They were not in use at Nuncomar’s trial in Calcutta (1775), Bombay and W. India, ii. 253.]

PUNSAREE. s. A native drug-seller; Hind. panaari. We place the word here partly because C. P. Brown says ‘it is certainly a foreign word,’ and assigns it to a corruption of dispensarium; which is much to be doubted. [The word is really derived from Skt. panaśāla, ‘a market, warehouse.”]

PURDAH. s. Hind. from Pers. purdâh. ‘A curtain’; a partition; and especially a curtain screening women from the sight of men; whence a woman of position who observes such rules of seclusion is termed purdânâishân, ‘one who sits behind a curtain.’ (See GOSHA.)

1809.—“On the fourth (side) a purdah was stretched across.”—Ad, Valentin, i. 189.

1810.—“If the disorder be obstinate, the doctor is permitted to approach the purdah (i.e. curtain, or screen) and to put the hand through a small aperture... in order to feel the patient’s pulse.”—Williamson, V. M. i. 130.

[1813.—“My travelling palankeen formed my bed, its purdoo or chintz covering my curtains.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 109.]

1875.—“Native ladies look upon the confinement behind the purdah as a badge of rank, and also as a sign of chastity, and are exceedingly proud of it.”—Life in the Missour, i. 113.

[1900.—“Charitable aid is needed for the purdah women.”—Pioneer Mail, Jan. 21.]

PURDESEE, s. Hind. purdâsî, usually written purdâsi, ‘one from a foreign country.’ In the Bombay army the term is universally applied to a sepoy from N. India. [In the N.W.P. the name is applied to a wandering tribe of swindlers and conmen.]

PURWANNA, PURWAUNA, s. Hind. from Pers. pûrwaunâ, ‘an order; a grant or letter under royal seal; a letter of authority from an official to his subordinate; a license or pass.’

1682. . . . we being obliged at the end of two months to pay Custom for the said goods, if in that time we did not procure a Pherwanna for the Emper of Decca to excuse us from it.”—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 16; [Hak. Soc. i. 34].

1693. . . . Egnmore and Purswannam were lately granted us by the Nabob’s purwannas.”—Wheeler, i. 281.

1759.—“Purwanna, under the Coochuck (or the small seal) of the Nabob Vizier Ulim Maleek, Nizam ul Muluck Bahadour, to Mr. John Spenser.”—In Cambridge’s Acts. of the War, 250. (See also quotation under HOSEODHOKUN.)

1774.—“As the peace has been so lately concluded, it would be a satisfaction to the Rajah to receive your purwanna to the purpose before the departure of the caravan.”—Bayle’s Diary, in Markham’s Tibet, p. 50. But Mr. Markham changes the spelling of his originals.

PUTCHECK, s. This is the trade-name for a fragrant root, a product of the Himalaya in the vicinity of Kashmir, and forming an article of export from both Bombay and Calcutta to the Malay countries and to China, where it is used as a chief ingredient of the Chinese pastille-rods commonly called jostick. This root was recognised by the famous Garcia de Orta as the Costus of the ancients. The latter took their word from the Skt. kushtha, by a modification of which name—putcho, tangas, it is still known and used as a medicine in Upper India. De Orta speaks of the plant as growing about Mandu and Chitore, whence it was brought for sale to Ahmadabad; but his informants misled him. The true source was traced in situ by two other illustrious men, Royle and Falconer, to a plant belonging to the N. O. Compositae, Sauressurea Xappe, Clarke, for which Dr. Falconer, not recognising the genus, had proposed the name of Aucklandia costus verus, in honour of the then Governor-General. The Costus is a gregarious plant, occupying open, sloping sides of the mountains, at an elevation of 8000 to 9000 feet. See article by Falconer in Trans. Linn. Soc. xix. 23-31.

The trade-name is, according to Wilson, the Telugu patchchaku, 'green leaf,' but one does not see how this applies. (Is there, perhaps, some confusion with Pathch? see PATCHOULI.) De Orta speaks as if the word, which he writes puchok, were Malay. Though neither Crawford nor Fawr gives the word, in this sense, it is in Marsden's earlier Malay Diet.: "Puchok: a plant, the aromatic leaves of which are an article of trade; said by some to be Costus indicus, and by others the Melissa, or Lavens." [On this Mr. Skel writes: "Puchok is the Malay word for a young shoot, or the growing shoot of a plant. Puchok in the special sense here used is also a Malay word, but it may be separate from the other. Klinkert gives puchok as a shoot or shoot and also as a radish-like root (indigenous in China etc., used in medicine for fermentation, &c.). Apparently it is always the root and not the leaves of the plant that are used, in which case Marsden may have confused the two senses of the word.] In the year 1837-38 about 250 tons of this article, valued at £10,000, were exported from Calcutta alone. The annual import into China at a later date, according to Wells Williams, was 2,000 pecks or 120 tons (Middle Kingdom, ed. 1857, ii. 305). In 1865-66, the last year for which the details of such minor exports are found in print, the quantity exported from Calcutta was only 492 cwt., or 24 tons. In 1875 the value of the imports at Hankow and Chefoo was £6,421. [Watt, Econ. Diet. vi. pt. ii. p. 482, Bombay Gazetteer, xi. 470.]

1516.—See Barbosa under CATEGU.

1529.—"We have prohibited the export of pepper to China . . . and now we prohibit the export of puchok and incense from these parts of India."—Carta de los Regimientos del Rey a Diego Ayres. Feitor da China, in Arch. Port. Oc., i. Fasc. v. 49.

1525.—"Puchok of Cambaya worth 35 tangas a maund."—Lebrunrgue, 59.

1527.—Mr. Whiteway notes that in a letter of Diego Calvo to the King, dated Jan. 17, puchok is mentioned as one of the imports to China.—India Obs. MS. Corpus Chronologicum, vol. i.

1541.—"The bear (see BAHAR) of puchok contains 20 para (see FRAZALLA), and an additional 4 of picota (q.v.). In all 24 para . . ."—A. Nites, 11.

1563.—"I say that costus in Arabic is called cost or cost; in Guzantin it is called apol (apotic); and in Malay, for in that region there is a great trade and consumption thereof, it is called puchok. I tell you the name in Arabic, because it is called by the same name by the Lattins and Greeks, and I tell it you in Guzantin, because that is the land to which it is chiefly carried from its birth-place; and I tell you the Malay name because the greatest quantity is consumed there, or taken thence to China."—Gaz. i. 72.

1617.—"5 hampers pochok . . ."—Cats, Diary, i. 224.

1726.—"Patsjaak (a leaf of Asjien (Acheen,) that is pounded to powder, and used in insence . . ."—Vedravia, Chorn. 34.

1727.—"The Wood Ligna diclis grows only in this country (Sind). It is rather a Wood than a Tree, and nothing of it is useful but the Root, called Puchcock or Puchok. There are great quantities exported from Soont, and thence to China, where it generally bears a good Price."—A. Hamilton, i. 126: (ed. 1744, i. 127).

1808.—"Elles emploient ordinairement . . . une racine aromatique appelee pichetok, un coupe par petits morceaux, et fait bouillir dans de l’huile de noix de coco. C’est avec cette huile que les dansesses se graissent ... ”—Haugjør, ii. 117.

1682.—“Koot is sent down country in large quantities, and is exported to China, where it is used as incense. It is in Calcutta known under the name of ‘Patchuk.’”— Punjab Tram Report, cvii.

PUTLAM, n.p. A town in Ceylon on the coast of the bay or estuary of Calpentyn; properly Puttelama; a Tamil name, said by Mr. Ferguson to be puttho- (pattu) alam, ‘New Salt-pans.’ Ten miles inland are the ruins of Tammanah Newera, the original Tam-ampauni (or Taprobaner), where Vijaya, the first Hindu immigrant, established his kingdom. And Putlam is supposed to be the place where he landed.

1288.—“The veal-3 hers ... go post to a place called Bet tellar, and (then) go six miles into the gulf.”—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 16.

c. 1315.—“The natives went to their King and told him my reply. He sent for me, and I proceeded to his presence in the town of Bättla, which was his capital, a pretty little place, surrounded by a timber wall and towers.”—Ibn Battuta, iv. 166.

1672.—“Putelaon . . .”—Baldens(Germ.), 373.

1726.—“ Portaloon or Putelan.”—Valeo-tijn, Ceylon, 21.

PUTNEE, PUTNEY, s.

a. Hind. and Beng. putti, optical putpi, or putpi, from v. put-ati, to be agreed or closed, (i.e. a bargain). Goods commissioned or manufactured to order.

1755.—“A letter from Cosimbazar mentions they had directed Mr. Warren Hastings to proceed to the Putney aurung (q.v.) in order to purchase putney on our Honble. Masters account, and to make all necessary enquiries.”—Fort William Crons., Nov. 10. In Larg. 61.

b. A kind of sub-tenure existing in the Lower Provinces of Bengal, the patnidar, or occupant of which “holds of a Zenindar a portion of the Zenindari in perpetuity, with the right of hereditary succession, and of selling or letting the whole or part, so long as a stipulated amount of rent is paid to the Zenindar, who retains the power of sale for arrears, and is entitled to a regulated fee or fine upon transfer” (Wilson, q.v.). Probably both a and b are etymologically the same, and connected with putti (see POTTAH).

1860.—“A perpetual lease of land held under a Zemindar is called a putnee,—and the holder is called a putneesar, who not only pays an advanced rent to the Zemindar, but a handsome price for the same.”—Great Rural Life in Bengal, 64.

PUTTÁN, PATHÁN, n.p. Hind. Patán. A name commonly applied to Afghans, and especially to people in India of Afghan descent. The derivation is obscure. Elphinstone derives it from Pushtán and Pukhtán, pl. Pukhtána, the name the Afghans give to their own race, with which Dr. Trump (and Dr. Bellew ( Races of Afghanistan, 25) agree. This again has been connected with the Pachtíva of Herodotus (iii. 102, iv. 44.) The Afghans have for the name one of the usual fantastic etymologies which is quoted below (see quotation, c. 1611). The Mahoomdedans in India are sometimes divided into four classes, viz. Putthán; Moguls (see MOGUL), i.e. those of Turki origin; Shirkhs, claiming Arab descent; and Sejjids, claiming also to be descendants of Mahommédan.

1553.—“This State belonged to a people called Patane, who were lords of that bilcountry. And as those who dwell on the skirts of the Pyrenees, on this side and on that, are masters of the passes by which we cross from Spain to France, or vice versa, so these Patan people are the masters of the two entrances to India, by which those who go thither from the landward must pass, . . .”—Barros, IV. vi. 1. 1563.—“ . . . This first King was a Patan of certain mountains that march with Bengal.”—Garcia, Coli. i. 34. 1572.—“Mas agora de nomes, et de uança, Novos et varas são os habitantes;
Os Delijs, os Patánês que em possencia De term, et gente são mais abundantes.”
Camões, vii. 20.

(By Aubertin):

“But now inhabitants of other name And custom new and various there are found.
The Delhis and Patans, who in the name
Of land and people do the most abound.”

1610.—“A Pattan, a man of good stature.”—Harckius in Purchas, i. 220.

c. 1611.—“ . . . the mightiest of the Afghan people was Kais . . . . The Prophet gave Kais the name of Abd Ursheed . . . . and . . . predicted that God would make his issue so numerous that they, with resspect to the establishment of the Faith, would outvie all other people; the angel Gabriel having revealed to him that their attachment to the Faith would, in strength, be like the wood upon which they lay the keel when constructing a ship, which wood the seamen call Pattan; on this account he conferred upon Abd Ursheed the title of Pathan" also.—Hist. of the Afghans, E.T., by Born, i. 38.

1658.—"... Oomanchon a Puttanian...

1648.—"... In general the Moors are a haughty and arrogant and proud people, and among them the Pathans stand out superior to the others in dress and manners."

1592.—"... Martin Alfonso and the other Portuguese delivered them from the war that the Pathans were making on them."

1673.—"They are distinguished, some according to the Consanguinity they claim with Mahomet: as a Saíd is a kin to that Imposture. ... A Shiek is a Cousin too, at a distance, into which Relation they admit all now made Proseleys. Mår is somewhat allied also. ... The rest are adopted under the Name of the Province of N.W.P., as Malgal, the Race of the Tartars... Pathan, Buttee."

1681.—"... En estas regiones ay vna curas gentes se dizien les Pathans."—Martínez de la Peña, Compendio, p. 21.

1729.—"... The Pathans (Patandres) are very different in gait, and surprise in valour and stout-heartedness in war."—Verrall, Hist. Canarese, Chap. 169.

1757.—"... The Colonel (Clive) complained bitterly of so many insults put upon him, and reminded the Souahir how different his own conduct was, when called upon to assist him against the Pytans."—Ives, i. 149.

1763.—"... The northern nations of India, although idolaters... were easily induced to embrace Mahometanism, and are at this day the Afghans or Pitans."—Hist. of India, i. 24. ed. 1803.

1758.—"... Moors are, for the most part, soldiers by profession, particularly in the cavalry, as are also... Pitans."—Moore, Travels. ii. 47.

[PUTTEE, PUTTY, s. Hind. putî.]

a. A piece or strip of cloth, bandage; especially used in the sense of a ligature round the lower part of the leg used in lieu of a gaiter, originally introduced from the Himalaya, and now commonly used by sportsmen and soldiers. A special kind of cloth appears in the old trade-lists under the name of puteahs (see PIECE GOODS).

b. In the N.W.P. "... Their names were forsworn scratched off the collector's books, and those of their eldest sons were entered, who became forsworn, in village and cumberry parliance, lumberdars of the shares of their fathers, or in other words, of puttee. Shere Singh and puttee Baz Singh."—Riddell, Notes on the N.W.P. 34.

c. In S. India, soldiers' pay.

1572.—"... Their names were forsworn scratched off the collector's books, and those of their eldest sons were entered, who became forsworn, in village and cumberry parliance, lumberdars of the shares of their fathers, or in other words, of puttee. Shere Singh and puttee Baz Singh."—Riddell, Notes on the N.W.P. 34.

PUTTWALLA. s. Hind. putî-vîlî, patti-vîlî (PUTTEE, see PUTTEE), "with a belt." This is the usual Bombay term for a messenger or orderly attached to an officer, and bearing a belt and brass badge, called in Bengal chupressy or peon (q.v.), in Madras usually by the latter name.

1572.—"... Here and there a belted Government servant, called a Puttawalla, or Patta-walla, because distinguished by a belt..."—Murder Williams, Modern India, 34.

PUTWA. s. Hind. putât. The Hillians salutaris, l. from the succulent acid flowers of which very fair jelly is made in Anglo-Indian households. [It is also known as the Roselle or Red Sorrel (Hist. Econ. Diet. iv. 243). Riddell (I. 367) calls it "Oselle or Roselle jam and jelly.

PYE. s. A familiar designation among British soldiers and young officers for a Pariah-dog (q.v.): a contraction, no doubt, of the former word.

[1892.—“We English call him a pariah, but this word, belonging to a low, yet by no means degraded class of people in Madras, is never heard on native lips as applied to a dog, any more than our other word ‘pie.’” —L. Kipling, Beast and Man, 296.]

PYJAMMAS, s. Hind. पीज़मान (see JAMMA), lit. ‘leg-clothing.’ A pair of loose drawers or trousers, tied round the waist. Such a garment is used by various persons in India, e.g. by women of various classes, by Sikh men, and by most Mahommedans of both sexes. It was adopted from the Mahommedans by Europeans as an article of dishabille and of night attire, and is synonymous with Long Drawers, Shulwàurs, and Mogul-breeches. [For some distinctions between these various articles of dress see Forbes-Watson, (Textile Manufacturers, 57.)] It is probable that we English took the habit like a good many others from the Portuguese. Thus Pyrrad (c. 1610) says, in speaking of Goa Hospital: “It’s out force calsons sans quoie confez intand les Portugais des Indes” (ii. p. 11; [Hak. Soc. ii. 9]). The word is now used in London shops. A friend furnishes the following reminiscence: “The late Mr. B——, tailor in Jermyn Street, some 40 years ago, in reply to a question why pyjammaz had feet sewn on to them (as was sometimes the case with those furnished by London outfitters) answered: ‘I believe, Sir, it is because of the White Ants!’”

[1828.—“His chief joy smoking a cigar In loose Faee-jams and native slippers.” —Oriat, Sport, Mag., reprint 1873, i. 61.] 1881.—“The rest of our attire consisted of that particularly light and airy white flannel garment, known throughout India as a pajama suit.”—Harkel, Cyclon, 329.

PYKE, PAIK, s. Wilson gives only one original of the term so expressed in Anglo-Indian speech. He writes: “Paık or Paýık, corruptly Pyk, Hind. &c. (from S. padāṭīka), Paık or Paýık, Mar. A footman, an armed attendant, an inferior police and revenue officer, a messenger, a village watchman: in Cut-tack the Paiks formerly constituted a local militia, holding land of the Za-nymidars or Bajas by the tenure of military service,” &c., quoting Bengal Regulations. [Platts also treats the two words as identical.] But it seems clear to us that there are here two terms rolled together:

a. Pers. Paık, ‘a foot-runner or courier.’ We do not know whether this is an old Persian word or a Mongol introduction. According to Hamner Purgstall it was the term in use at the Court of the Mongol princes, as quoted below. Both the words occur in the Ain, but differently spelt, and that with which we now deal is spelt paık (with the initial point).

[1500.—“The Jilavad (see under JULIBAR) and the Paık (a runner). Their monthly pay varies from 1200 to 12000 (daans), according to their speed and manner of running. Some of them will run from 60 to 100 krok (Coss) per day.”—Ia, E.T. by Blochmann, i. 158 (see orig. i. 144).]

1673.—“At the Court of Constantinople; ‘Les Peiks venoient ensuite, avec leurs bonnets d’argent doré ornez d’un petit piéneau de héron, un arc et un carquois chargé d’fèches.’—Journal d’A. Galland, i. 98.

1677.—“... the under officers and servants called Apian-Oylans, who are designed to the meaner uses of the Seraglio... most commonly the sons of Christians taken from their Parents at the age of 10 or 12 years. ... These are: 1. Porters, 2. Bostangies or Gardiners 3. Paiks and Schekes. ... Sir Paul Howard, Present State of the Ottoman Empire, 10.

1761.—“Ahmad Sultan then commissioned Shah Fasoul Khan ... the bedaurae (see HURCARRA) and the Paiks. ... The force was to consist of service. Some of them will run from 60 to 100 krok (Coss) per day.”—Hamner Purgstall, Gest. der Goldenen Horde, 243.

[1868.—“The Payeke is entrusted with the tehlin (see CHILLUM) (pipe), which at court (Khiva) is made of gold or silver, and must be replenished with fresh water every time it is filled with tobacco.”—Vandenberg, Sketches, 89.]

b. Hind paık and paýık (also Mahr.) from Skt. padāṭīka, and padāṭa, ‘a foot-soldier,’ with the other specific application given by Wilson, exclusive of ‘courier.’ In some narratives the word seems to answer exactly to peon.
PYKE. PAIK.

In the first quotation, which is from the Ain, the word, it will be seen, is different from that quoted under (a) from the same source.

C. 1500.—"It was the custom in those times, for the palace (of the King of Benkul) to be guarded by several thousand pykes (pātāka), who are a kind of infantry. An eunuch entered into a conference with these guards, who on one night killed the King, Putheh Shah, when the Eunuch ascended the throne, under the title of Barbuck Shah."—Gelad's Tr., ed. 1850, ii. 19 (orig. i. 143; Jarett ii. 149) gives the word as Payiks.

In the next quotation the word seems to be the same, though used for a 'seaman.' Compare uses of Lascar.

C. 1615.—"His fleet consisted of 20 beaked vessels, all well manned with the sailors whom they call paiques, as well as with Portuguese soldiers and topazes who were excellent musketeers: 50 hired paiques (see Gallevat) of like sort and his own (Sebastian Goncalves's) galliot (see Gallevat), which was about the size of a ucket, with 14 demi-falcons on each broadside, two pieces of 18 to 20 lbs. calibre in the forecastle, and 90 Portuguese soldiers, with more than 40 topazes and Cafres (see Caffer)."—Bombar and Bombara, 422.

1722.—Among a detail of charges at this period in the Zemindarry of Rajapal appears.

"... Paisa or the pikes, guard of villages, everywhere necessary... 2.161 reises."—Field Regt. App. p. 245.

The following quotation from an Indian Regulation of L.l. Cornwallis's time is a good example of the extraordinary multiplication of terms, even in one Province in India, denoting approximately the same thing:

1792.—All Pykes. Chokeydars (see Chokidar, Pateltam, Drawara, Nigalputa), Harves (see Harry), and other descriptions of village watchmen are declared subject to the orders of the Darogah (see Daroga...).—Ratna, for the Police... passed by the G.o.i. in C. Dec. 7.

... The army of Assam was a militia organised as follows. The whole male population was bound to serve either as soldiers or labourers, and was accordingly divided into sets of four men each, called gotes, the individuals comprising the gote being termed pykes.—Johnston's Hist. of W.'s Expedition in Assam, 1792-94, 94, commd. by Gen. Keatinge.

1822.—After a detail of persons of rank in Madras:

"None of these entertain armed followers except perhaps ten or a dozen Peons for state, but some of them have Pykes in considerable numbers, to keep the peace on their estates. These Pykes are under the magistrate's orders."—Bb. Rev. ii. p. 592.

1812.—"The whole of this last-mentioned numerous class of Pykes are understood to have been disbanded. In compliance with the new Police regulations.—Bb. Reg.. 71.

1782.—"... In or Officers of the peasant militia Paiks. The Paiks were settled chiefly around the fort in easy tenures."—Hume's Brit. ii. 202.

PYSE! interjection. The use of this is illustrated in the quotations. Notwithstanding the writer's remark (below) it is really Hindustani, viz. piss, look out! or 'make way!' apparently from Skt. pīś, look!—see:* M'Kersworth's Mod., 1819, p. 529, col. 3.; Fallon's Hind. Dict., 1834. 376, col. 3.; Platts, 2826.

1841.—"... three men came running up behind them, as if they were clearing the road for the one, by calling out "piss!"—see: Elphinstone's Rep. on Muster & Garrison Sentry in Pykes amounting to E. L. 4, 700. p. 124.

1858.—"... Un correspondent Col. Pridieaux knew the origin of the warning called out by hussy drivers to pedestrians in Bombay, 'Pyse!' It is not Hindustani.—Letter to N. & Q. Ser. VI. VIII. p. 383.

[Other expressions of the same kind are Malavālī pa, 'Get out of the way!'; and *Hind. Mahr. *kis, kīs, from bas-, to drop off.]

1605.—"At these hayros goe in the streets, they cri po. po. which is to say take heed."—Linschoten, Hdk. Ser. i. 282.

1824.—"I was awoke from disturbed rest by cries of kis! kis! to clear the way!"—Bowdich. Hist. ed. 1573, i. 49.

"QUAMOCLIT. " The Ismā'īlu quamoclitis, the name given by Linnæus to the Red Jasmine. The word is a corruption of Skt. Kītātā the creeper of Kāma, god of love.

"QUEMOCLIT. " This climber, the most beautiful and luxuriant imaginable, bears also the name of Kamalātā 'Love's Creeper.' Some have flowers of snowy hue, with a delicate fragrance, ..."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 310-11.

QUEDDA. n.p. A city, port, and small kingdom on the west coast of the Malay Peninsula, tributary to Siam. The name according to Crawfurd is Malay kedih, 'an elephant-trap' (see KEDDAH). [Mr. Skeat writes: "I do not know what Craw-furd's authority may be, but kedih does not appear in Klinkert's Dict.

... In any case the form taken by the name of the country is Kedah.

The coralling of elephants is probably a Siamese custom, the method adopted to the E. coast, where the Malays are left to themselves, being to place a decoy female elephant near a powerful noose."] It has been supposed sometimes that Kedah is the Kâd or Kâ al of Ptolemy's sea-route to China, and likewise the Kalah of the early Arab voyagers, as in the Fourth Voyage of Sindbad the Seaman (see Procs. R.

Geo. Soc. 1882, p. 653; Burton, Arabian Nights, iv. 386). It is possible that these old names however represent Kedah, 'a river mouth,' a denomination of many small ports in Malay regions. Thus the port that we call Quedah is called by the Malay

Kivala Batang.

1516. — "Having left this town of Tenassary, further along the coast towards Malacca, there is another seaport of the Kingdom of Anjou, which is called Quedah, in which also there is much shipping, and great interchange of merchandise."—Barbosa,

188-189.

1553. — "... The settlements from Tavay to Malacca are these: Tenassary, a notable city, Langur, Torroa, Quedah, producing the best pepper on all that coast, Pediao, Peri, Sulonung, and our City of Malacca. ..."—Barros, i. ix. 1.

Quêda Tavai cidade, onde começa

De Sêo largo o imperio tão esparrido:

Tenassari, Quédã, que he so cabeça.

Das que pimenta alli tem produzido."

Candias, x. 123.

By Burton:

"Behold Tavâ City, whence begin

Siam's dominions. Reign of vast extent:

Tenassari, Quêda of towns the Queen that bear the barthon of the hot piment."

1598. — "... to the town and Kingdom of Quedah ... which lyeth under 6 degrees and a halfe; this is also a Kingdom like Tenassari, it hath also some wine, as Tenassari hath, and some small quantitie of Pepper."—Linschoten, p. 31; [Hak. Soc.

i. 103].

1614. — "And so ... Diogo de Mendonc a

... sending the gaôies (see GALLEVAT) on before, embarked in the joloa (see GAL-LEVAT) of Joio Rodriguez de Paiva, and coming to Quedah, and making an attack at daybreak, and finding them unprepared, he bBurnt the town, and carried off a quantity of provisions and some tin" (colub an, see CALAY).—Bowen, Decade, 157.

1838. — "Leaving Penang in September, we first proceeded to the town of Quedah lying at the mouth of a river of the same name."—Quedah, &c., by Capt. Sherrard

Osborne, ed. 1865.

QUEMOY. n.p. An island at the cast opening of the Harbour of Amoy.

It is a corruption of Kiu-mum, in Chang-chau dialect Kin-mau; meaning 'Golden-door.'

QUI-HI, s. The popular distinctive nickname of the Bengal Anglo-Indian, from the usual manner of calling servants in that Presidency, viz. 'Kâ hâ?' 'Is any one there?' The Anglo-Indian of Madras was known as a

Mull, and he of Bombay as a Duck

((q.v.)).

1815. — "The Grand Master, or Adventures of Qui Hi in Hindostan, a Hudibrastic

Poem; with illustrations by Rowlandson."

1825. — "Most of the household servants are Parsees, the greater part of whom speak English. ... Instead of 'Koe hoo,'

Who's there? the way of calling a servant is 'boy,' a corruption, I believe, of 'kia, brother.'—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 98. But see under BOY.

c. 1830. — "J'ai vu dans vos gazettes de Calcutta les élansmètres des quoîhaüs (sobriquet des Européens Bengalis de ce côté) sur la chaleur."—Journ. de Corresp. n. 308.

QUILOA. n.p. i.e. Kilva, in lat.

9° 0' S., next in remoteness to Sofala, which for a long time was the m plus ultra of Arab navigation on the East Coast of Africa, as Capt. Boyados was that of Portuguese navigation on the West Coast. Kilva does not occur in the Geographies of Eirisi or Abuulfed, though Sofala is in both. It is mentioned in the Roteiro, and in Barros's account of Da Gama's voyage. Barros had access to a native chronicle of Quiloa, and says it was founded about

A.H. 400, and a little more than 70 years after Magadoxo and Brava, by a Persian Prince from Shiraz.

1229. — "Kilva, a place in the country of Zenj, a city."—Yâkût, (orig.), iv. 302.

c. 1330. — "I embarked at the town of Magadoxo (Magadoxo), making for the country of the Sawaini, and the town of Kulwa, in the country of the Zenj. . . ."— Tha Barthol., ii. 191. [See under SOFALA.]

1498.—"Here we learned that the island of which they told us in Mocomboýy as being peopled by Christians is an island at del which dwells the King of Mocomboýy himself, and that the half is of Moors, and the other half of Christians, and in this island is seeds-pearl, and the name of the island is Quileyne. . . ."—Rutíve du Viage de Vasco da Gama, 48.

1501.—"Quíloa is a citáde in Arabia in auna sufla giunta a terra firma, ben popolata de homines negri et mercandanti:
edificata al modo nò: Quíni hanno abun-dantia de aurop: argento: ambra: muschion:
et perle: ragionevolmente vesteno panni de sera: et bambaxi infinit."—Letter of K.
Emmaneul, 2.

1506.—"Del 1502 . . . mandá au viagio che fu quello che discoperse India. . . . a nell'anno del Cristo de Bonia speranza, zomne in uno loco chiamato Óchilla; là qual terra e dentro uno rio. . . ."—Leonardo Có-Maser, 17.

1553.—"The Moor, in addition to his natural hatred, bore this increased resentment on account of the chastisement inflicted on him, and determined to bring the ships into port at the city of Quíloa, that being a populous place, where they might get the better of our ships by force of arms. To break this mischief with greater safety to himself he told Vasco da Gama, as if wishing to gratify him, that in front of them was a city called Quíloa, half peopled by Christians of Abyssinia and of India, and that if he gave the order the ships should be steered thatither."—Bocca. i. iv. 5.

1572.—
"Esta ilha pequena, que habitamos.
He em toda esta terra certa escala
De todos os que as ondas navegamos.
De Quíloa, de Monbaqua, a de Sofala.
Gamba. i. 51.

By Burton:

"This little island, where we now abide, of all this seaboard is the one sure place for every merchantman that steams the tide from Quíloa, or Sofala, or Mombas. . . ."

QUILON. n.p. A form which we have adopted from the Portuguese for the name of a town now belonging to Travancore: once a very famous and much frequented port of Malabar, and known to the Arabs as Kovalam.
The proper name is Tamil, Kollam, of doubtful sense in this use. Bishop Caldwell thinks it may be best explained as 'Palace' or 'royal residence,' from Kol, 'the royal Presence,' or Hall of Audience. [Mr. Logan says: 'Kollam is only an abbreviated form of Koililavan or Koililavan, 'King's house'] (Malabar, i. 231, note.) For ages Kaulam was known as one of the greatest ports of Indian trade with Western Asia, especially trade in pepper and brazil-wood. It was possibly the Male' of Cosmas in the 6th century (see MALABAR), but the first mention of it by the present name is about three centuries later, in the Relation translated by Reinand.
The 'Kollam era' in general use in Malabar dates from A.D. 824: but it does not follow that the city had no earlier existence. In a Syrian extract (which is, however, modern) in Land's Anecdot. Sýriaca (Latin, i. 125; Syriac,
p. 27) it is stated that three Syrian missionaries came to Kaulam in A.D.
823, and got leave from King Shelkiri-birti to build a church and city at Kaulam. It would seem that there is some connection between the date assigned to this event, and the 'Kollam era': but what it is we cannot say.
Shelkibirti is evidently a form of Che-kravarti Rejju (see under CHUCKER-BUTTY). Quilon, as we now call it, is now the 3rd town of Travancore, pop.
(in 1891) 23,380; there is little trade.
It had a European garrison up to 1830, but now only one Sepoy regiment.

In ecclesiastical narratives of the Middle Ages the name occurs in the form Colombo, and by this name it was constituted a See of the Roman Church in 1328, suffragan of the Archbishop of Sultaniya in Persia; but it is doubtful if it ever had more than one bishop, viz. Jordannus of Severo, author of the Mirabilia often quoted in this volume. Indeed we have no knowledge that he ever took up his bishopric, as his book was written, and his nomination occurred, both during a visit to Europe. The Latin Church however which he had founded, or gained the use of, existed 20 years later, as we know from John de' Marignolli, so it is probable that he had reached his See. The form Colombo is accounted for by an inscription (see Ind. Antqy, ii. 360) which shows that the city was called Kolomba, (other forms being Kolomkapatuna, or Kolomkapatuna (Bombey Gazetteer,
v. i. pt. i. 183)). The form Palombo-bum also occurs in most of the MSS, of Friar Odoric's Journey: this is the more difficult to account for, unless it was a mere play (or a trick of memory) on the kindred meanings of columbo.
and palumbes. A passage in a letter from the Nestorian Patriarch Yeshu-yab (c. 650-60) quoted in Assemanni (iii. pl. i. 131), appears at that date to mention Colun. But this is an arbitrary and erroneous rendering in Assemanni's Latin. The Syriac has Kalah, and probably therefore refers to the port of the Malay regions noticed under CALAY and QUEDDA.

851.—"De ce lieu (Mascate) les mauris-moquent la voie pour Filindeu, et se dirigent vers Koulan-Malay; la distance entre Mascate et Koulan-Malay est d'un mois de marche, avec un vent modéré."—Relation, &c., tr. by Rooman, i. 15.

1166.—"Seven days from thence is Quilan, on the confines of the country of the sun-worshippers, who are descendants of Kush... and are all black. This nation is very trustworthy in matters of trade... Pepper grows in this country... Cinnamon, ginger, and many other kinds of spices also grow in this country."—Benjamin of Tudela, in Early Travels in Palestine, 114-115.

c. 1280-90.—"Royannes de Ma-pa'rh. Parmi tous les royaumes étrangers d'au-delà des mers, il n'y en que Ma-pa'rh et Kiu-lan (Mahar and Quilon) sur lesquels on peut parvenir à ebolide une certaine quantité surtout Kiu-lan... (Année 1282). Cette année... Kiu-lan a envoyé un ambassadeur à la cour (monzole) pour présenter en tribut des marchandises précieuses et un singe noir."—Chinese Annals, quoted by Paneth, More Pol., ii. 603, 643.

c. 1300.—"Beyond Guzerat are Kalkan and Tana; beyond them the country of Malibir, which from the boundary of Karlo to Kulam is 300 parasangs in length. The people are all Samanids, and worship idols."

"Kashkoddin," in Elffert, i. 68.

c. 1310.—"Mahar extends in length from Kulam to Nolina (Nellore) nearly 300 parasangs along the sea-coast..."—Wisey, in Elffert, iii. 32.

c. 1322.—"... as I went by the sea... towards a certain city called Polumbun (where groweth the pepper in great store)."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, p. 71.

c. 1322.—"Poii venvi a Colonbrio, ch'è la migliore terra d'India per mercantili. Quali è il gengiovo in grande copia e del buono del mondo. Quali vanno tutti ignudi salvo... che portano un tanio innalzato... vai legnius de dietro."—Palutine MS. of Odoric, in Cathay, App., p. xlvii.

c. 1328.—"In India, whilst I was at Columbun, were found two cats having wings like the wings of bats..."—Friar Jordanus, p. 29.

1330.—"Joannes, &c., nobili vivon domino Nascenorum et universis sub eo Christianis Nascenentis de Columbo gratian in presenti, quae ducat ad gloriarn in futuro... quatenus venerabilem Fratrem nostrum Jordanam Catalani episcopum Columbiae... quam nuper ad episcopalis dignatam apicem acuta Mosto apostolica diximus promovendam..."—Letter of Pope John X.XII. to the Christians of Colun, in Odorici Regulaldi Ann. Eccles. v. 195.

c. 1343.—"The 10th day (from Calicut) we arrived at the city of Kaulam, which is one of the finest of Malibir. Its markets are splendid, and its merchants are known under the name of Salti (see CHOOLIA). They are rich; one of them will buy a ship with all its fittings and load it with goods from his own store."—Ibn Battuta, iv. 10.

c. 1348.—"And sailing on the feast of St. Stephen, we navigated the Indian Sea until Pulin Sunday, and then arrived at a very noble city of India called Columbun, where the whole world's pepper is produced... There is a church of St. George there, of the Latin communion, at which I dwelt. And I adorned it with fine paintings, and taught there the holy Law."—John Marigozti, in Cathay, &c., pp. 314-311.

c. 1400.—"... Coloun, civitatem nobilium venit, cujus ambitus duodemia millia passuum amplitudine. Gigniber qui cobdi (coliombi) dicitur, piper, verumum, cunnellae quae esse apparellantur, ite in provincia, quam vocant Melbriarum, legitur."—Curt, in Peginos de Var. Furtune.

c. 1418.—"In the year Bharati (641) of the Kolamba era, King Adityavarmi the ruler of Vanchi... who has attained the sovereignty of Manubaya Mahabila, hung up the bell..."—Ibn, in Tirmichiyy, see Ind. Antig. ii. 390.

1510.—"... we departed... and went to another city called Colon... The King of this city is a Pagan, and minstrelly and poetry... and he has 20,000 horsemen, and many archers. This country has a good port near to the sea-coast. No grain grows here, but fruits as at Calicut, and pepper in great quantities..."—Varthema, 182-3.

1516.—"Further on along the same coast towards the south is a great city and good sea-port which is named Coulam, in which dwell many Moors and Gentiles and Christians. They are great merchants and very rich, and own many ships with which they trade to Chonimelled, the Island of Ceylon, Bengal, Malaca, Sumatra, and Pegu... There is also in this city much pepper..."—Beylant, 157-8.

1572.—"A hum Cochim, e a outro Gunamar A qual Chalé, a qual a filha da Pimenta. A qual Coulao, a qual da Crangarao. E os maus, a quem o mais sofreu e contenta..."—Gomes, vii. 35.
By Burton:

"To this Cochin, to that falls Cananor, one hath Chaké, another th' Isle Piment, a third Coulam, a fourth takes Cranganor, the rest is theirs with whom he rests content."

1726. "... Coylang."—Valentin's Chor., 115.

1727. "Coloan is another small principality. It has the Benefit of a River, which is the southernmost Outlet of the Ceylon Islands; and the Dutch have a small Fort, within a Mile of it on the Sea-shore. ... keeps a Garrison of 30 Men, and its trade is inconvenient."—A. Hamilton, i. 333 [ed. 1744].

QUIRPELE. s. This Tamil name of the mungoose (q.v.) occurs in the quotation which follows; properly Kirippillai, ['little squeaker'].

1601. "... bestiola quaedam Quil sive Quirpele vocata. quae aspectu primo verme ..."—De Bry, iv. 63.

RADAREE. s. —H. rath-ḍarī, from ṛati-ḍari, 'road-keeper.' A transit duty; sometimes 'black-mail.' [Raḥ-ḍarī is very commonly employed in the sense of sending prisoners, &c., by escort from one police post to another, as along the Grand Trunk road].

1622.—"At the garden Pelengon we found a rahdar or guardian of the road, who was also the chief over certain other rahdarī, who are usually posted in another place 2 leagues further on."—Ibid. ii. 285.

1623.—"For Rahdars. the Khan has given them a firman to free them, also firman for a house. ..."—Sainsbury, iii. p. 183.

1667.—"... that the goods ... may not be stopped ... on pretence of taking Rahdaries, or other duties. ..."—Papers of Shah Aurung Zad, in Forrest, Bombay Letters, Home Series, i. 213.

1673.—"This great officer, or Farmer of the Emperor's Custom (the Shabunder [see SHABUNDER]), is obliged on the Roads to provide for the safe travelling for Merchants by a constant Watch ... for which Rahdorage, or high Imposts, are allowed by the Merchants, both at Landing and in their passage inland."—Fryer, 222.

1685.—"Here we were forced to compound with the Rattaree men for ye Duties on our goods."—Hodges, Dorn, Dec. 15: [Hak. Soc. i. 213. In i. 190, Rawdari].

c. 1731.—"Nizam-ul-Mulk ... thus got rid of ... the rahdarī from which latter impost great annoyance had fallen upon travellers and traders."—Khají Khan, in Elliot, vii. 531.

1744.—"Passing the river Kishalvàn we ascended the mountains by the Rahdarī (a Persian toll) of Noglabar. ..."—Hamilton, i. 226.

RAGGY. s. Ḳaḍi (the word seems to be Dec. Hindustani, [and is derived from Skt. ṭaḍa, 'red,' on account of the colour of the grain]. A kind of grain, Eleusine Coracana, Gaertn.; Cygnusorus Coracanus, Linna.; largely cultivated, as a staple of food, in Southern India.

1792.—"The season for sowing raggy, rice, and bajerha from the end of June to the end of August."—Life of T. More, iii. 92.

1793.—"The Mahatta supplies consisting chiefly of Raggy, a coarse grain, which grows in more abundance than any other in the Mysore Country, it became necessary to serve it out to the troops, giving rice only to the sick."—Ibid. 10.

1800.—"The Deccany Mussulmans call it Ragy. In the Tamil language it is called Keér (kēžarag)."—Bichard, Mysor. i. 190.

RAINS. THE. s. The common Anglo-Indian colloquial for the Indian rainy season. The same idiom, as charis, had been already in use by the Portuguese. (See WINTER).

c. 1666.—"Lastly, I have imagined that it in Dègli, for example, the Rains come from the East, it may yet be that the Seas which are Southerly to it are the origin of them, but that they are forced by reason of some Mountains ... to turn aside and discharge themselves another way. ..."—Beccari, E.T., 138; [ed. Constable, 483].

1707.—"We are heartily sorry that the Rains have been so very unhealthy with you. ...Letter in Owen's Fragments.

1750.—"The Rains ... setting in with great violence, overflowed the whole country."—Owen, Hist., ed. 1893, i. 159.

1865.—"The place is pretty, and although it is 'the Rains,' there is scarcely any day when we cannot get out."—By. Melman, in Memoir. p. 67.

[RAIS. s. Ar. rā'is, from ra's, 'the head,' in Ar. meaning 'the captain, or master, not the owner of a ship;'] India it generally means 'a native gentleman of respectable position.'

1610.—"... Reyses of all our Nauyes."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 435.

1785.—"... their chief (more worthless in truth than a horsekeeper)."—In note—"In the original the word syse is introduced for the sake of a jingle with the word Ryse (a chief or leader)."—Tippoo's Letters, 18.

1870.—"Racees." See under RYOT.

1900.—"The petition was signed by representative landlords, raises."

[Flower Mail, April 13.]

RAJA, RAJAH. s. Skt. rājā, 'king.' The word is still used in this sense, but titles have a tendency to degenerate, and this one is applied to many humbler dignitaries, petty chiefs, or large Zemindars. It is also now a title of nobility conferred by the British Government, as it was by their Mahommedan predecessors, on Hindus, as Nawāb is upon Moslem. Rāj, Rāío, Rānd, Rāné, Rāya (in S. India), are other forms which the word has taken in vernacular dialects or particular applications. The word spread with Hindu civilisation to the eastward, and survives in the titles of Indo-Chinese sovereigns, and in those of Malay and Javanese chiefs and princes.

It is curious that the term Rājā cannot be traced, so far as we know, in any of the Greek or Latin references to India, unless the very questionable instance of Pliny's Iuchias be an exception. In early Mahommedan writers the now less usual, but still Indian, forms Rāo and Rāi, are those which we find. (Ibn Batuta, it will be seen, regards the words for king in India and in Spain as identical, in which he is fundamentally right.) Among the English vulgarisms of the 18th century again we sometimes find the word barbarised into Roger.

RAJPOOT. Bege Roger's junk six peculees (see PECUL) of lead."—Foster, Letters, iv. 107.

1623.—"A Raja, that is an Indian Prince."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 84.

1863.—"I went a hunting with ye Rajaee, who was attended with 2 or 300 men, armed with bows and arrows, swords and targets."

—Hedges, Diary, March 1; [Hak. Soc. i. 66.]

1756.—Tippoo with gross impropriety addresses Louis XVI. as "the Rajah of the French."—Select Letters, 369.

RAJAMUNDRY, n.p. A town, formerly head-place of a district, on the lower Godavery R. The name is in Telegu Rājamundheraavaram, 'King-chief's(Town),' and takes its name from Mahendradaev of the Orissa dynasty; see Morris, Godavery Mon. 23.

RAJPOOT. s. Hind. Rājpūt, from Skt. Rājaputra, 'King's Son.' The name of a great race in India, the hereditary profession of which is that of arms. The name was probably only a homoronic assumption; but no race in India has furnished so large a number of princely families. According to Chand, the great mediæval bard of the Rajputs, there were 36 clans of the race, issued from four Kshatriyas (Parihār, Prāmar, Solankhī, and Chauhmān) who sprang into existence from the sacred Agnikunda or Firepit on the summit of Mount Ābū. Later bards give five eponyms from the firepit, and 90 clans. The Rajputs thus claim to be true Kshatriyas, or representatives of the second of the four fundamental castes, the Warriors; but the Brahmins do not acknowledge the claim, and deny that the true Kshatriya is extant. Possibly the story of the fireborn ancestry hides a consciousness that the claim is fictitious. "The Rajputs," says Forbes, "use animal food and spirituous liquors, both nuclein in the last degree to their puritanic neighbours, and are scrupulous in the observance of only two rules,—those which prohibit the slaughter of cows, and the remarriage of widows. The clans are not forbidden to eat together, or to intermarry, and cannot be said in these respects to form separate castes" (Rājā-mūdt, reprint 1878, p. 537).

An odd illustration of the fact that to partake of animal food, and especially of the heroic repast of the flesh of the wild boar killed in the chase,

[GOONT.] RAJPOTT.

(see Terry's representation of this below), is a Rajput characteristic, occurs to the memory of one of the present writers. In Lord Canning's time the young Rajput Raja of Alwar had betaken himself to degrading courses, insomuch that the Viceroy felt constrained, in open durbar at Agra, to admonish him. A veteran political officer, who was present, inquired of the agent at the Alwar Court what had been the nature of the conduct thus rebuked. The reply was that the young prince had become the habitual associate of low and profligate Mahommedans, who had so influenced his conduct that among other indications, he would not eat wild pig. The old Political, hearing this, shook his head very gravely, saying, 'Would not eat Wild Pig! Dear! Dear! Dear!' It seemed the ne plus ultra of Rajput degradation: The older travellers give the name in the quaint form Rashboot, but this is not confined to Europeans, as the quotation from Sidi 'Ali shows; though the aspect in which the old English travellers regarded the tribe, as mainly a pack of banditti, might have made us think the name to be shaped by a certain sense of aptness. The Portuguese again frequently call them Reys Butos, a form in which the true etymology, at least partially, emerges.

1516.—'There are three qualities of these Gentles, that is to say, some are called Rashbutes, and they, in the time that their King was a Gentile, were Knights, the defenders of the Kingdom, and governors of the Country.'—Barlow, 50.

1533.—'Inasmuch that whilst the battle went on, Saladin placed all his women in a large house, with all that he possessed, whilst below the house were combustibles for use in the fight; and Saladin ordered them to be set fire to, whilst he was in it. Thus the house suddenly blew up with great explosion and loud cries from the unhappy women; whereupon all the people from within and without rushed to the spot, but the Resbutos fought in such a way that they drove the Guzarat troops out of the gates, and others in their hasty flight cast themselves from the walls and perished.'—Corda, iii. 527.

... "And with the stipulation that the 200 pindas, which are paid as allowance to the lascars of the two small forts which stand between the lands of Baqaim and the Reys buutos, shall be paid out of the revenues of Baqaim as they have been paid hitherto."—Treaty of Nano da Cunha with the K. of Cambay, in Subsidias, 137.

c. 1554.—"But if the caravan is attacked, and the Butis (see BHAT) kill themselves, the Rashbuts, according to the law of the Butis, are adjudged to have committed a crime worthy of death."—Sidi 'Ali Kapadina, in J. As., Ser. I., tom. ix. 95.

c. 1614.—"The next day they embarked, leaving in the city, what of those killed in fight and those killed by fire, more than 500 persons, the most of them being Regibutos, Moors of great value: and of ours fell eighteen. ..."—Bocarro, Douda, 210.

[1614.—"... in great danger of thieves called Rashbouts. ..."—Foster, Letters, ii. 260.]

1616.—"... it were fitter he were in the Company of his brother ... and his safe better more regarded, then in the hands of a Rashboote Gentile."—Sir T. Roe, i. 535-4: [Hak. Soc. ii. 292].

... "The Rashbootes eate Swines-flesh most hateful to the Mahometans."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1479.

1638.—"These Rashbutes are a sort of Highway men, or Tories."—Mandelb. Eng. by Davies, 1699, p. 19.

1648.—"These Resbouts (Resbourn) are held for the best soldiers of Guzuratta."—Von Treist, 39.

e. 1660.—"The word Ragipous signifies Sons of Rajus."—Ber nier, ed. Constable, 39.

1673.—"Next in esteem were the Rash- boots, Rashpoots, or Soildiers."—Fryer, 27.

1689.—"The place where they went ashore was at a Town of the Moors, which name our Seamen give to all the Subjects of the Great Mogul, but especially his Mahometan Subjects: calling the Idolaters Gentous or Rashbouts."—Despinier, i. 567.

1791.—"... Quatre cijayas ou reis- boutes montés sur des chevaux persans, pour l'escorter."—B. de St. Pierre, Choe- nière Indienne.

RAMASAMMY. s. This corruption of Rāmaseswāni ("Lord Rāma"), a common Hindū proper name in the South, is there used colloquially in two ways:

(a) As a generic name for Hindūs, like Tommy Atkins for a British soldier. Especially applied to Indian coolies in Ceylon, &c.

(b) For a twisted roving of cotton in a tube (often of wrought silver) used to furnish light for a cigar (see FULEETA). Madras use:

1843.—"I have seen him almost swallow it, by Jove, like Ramo Samee, the Indian juggler."—Thackeray, Book of Snobs, ch. i.
1850.—"... if you want a clerk to do your work or a servant to attend on you, you would take on a sapomaceous Bongali Baboo, or a servile abject Madrasi Ramasamy. ... A Madrasi, even if wrongly abused, would simply call you his father, and his mother, and his aunt, defender of the poor, and epitome of wisdom, and would take his change out of you in the bazaar accounts."—Cornhill Mag., Nov., pp. 52-3.

RAMBOTANG, s. Malay, rambâtan (Fielè, No. 6750, p. 256). The name of a fruit (Nephelium lappaceum, L.), common in the Straits, having a thin fleshy pulp, closely adhering to a hard stone, and covered externally with bristles like those of the external envelope of a chestnut. From rambât, 'hair.'

1613.—"And other native fruits, such as baches (perhaps backery, the Mangifera fo-tata) rambotans, ramse, baadecos; and pomegranates, and innumerable others. ..."—Godinho de Eredta, 16.

1726.—"... the rambotan-tree (the fruit of which the Portuguese call Jérou dos cafufros or Caffer's fruit)."—Valentijn (v.), Nieuwca, 3.

1727.—"The Rambostan is a Fruit about the Bigness of a Walnut, with a tongh Skin, beset with Cupillaments; within the Skin is a very savoury Pulp."—A. Hamilton, ii. 83; [ed. 1744, ii. 89].

1783.—"Mangustines, rambustines, &c."—Forest, Marqui, 10.

[1812.—"... mangustan, rambudan, and dorian ..."—Heyne, Tracts, 411.]

RAMDAM, s. Hind, from Ar. ramawzin (ramawilin). The ninth Mahommedan lunar month, viz. the month of the Fast.

1615.—"... at this time, being the preparation to the Ramdam or Lent."—Sir T. Roe, in Papers, i. 537; [Hak. Soc. ii. 21; also 58, 72, ii. 274].

1732.—"The 29th June: I think that (to-day) the Moors have commenced their ramchadan, according to the rule by which I calculate."—P. della Valle, ii. 607; [Hak. Soc. i. 179].

1886.—"... They are not ... very curious or strict in observing any Days or Times of particular Devotions, except it be Ramdam time as we call it ... In this time they fast all Day, ..."—Dampier, i. 313.

* Favre gives (Dict. Malys-François): "Dubu" (boue = fruit). "Nom d'un fruit de la grosseur d'un œuf de poule; il paraît être une grosse espèce de longanisse." (It is L. doméstica.) The Rambus is figured by Marsden in Atlas to Hist. of Sumatra 3rd ed, pl. vi. and pl. ix. It seems to be Eucleaera dulcis, Mill. (Pieravella dulcis, Jack).

RAMOOSY, u.pl. The name of a very distinct caste in W. India, Mahr. Rammosi, [said to be from Mahr. rammati, 'jungle-dweller']; originally one of the theiving castes. Hence they came to be employed as hiree-dity watchmen in villages, paid by cash or by rent-free lands, and by various petty dues. They were supposed to be responsible for thefts till the criminals were caught; and were often themselves concerned. They appear to be still commonly employed as hired chokidars by Anglo-Indian households in the west. They come chiefly from the country between Poona and Kolhapur. The surviving traces of a Ramoosy dialect contain Telegu words, and have been used in more recent days as a secret slang. [See an early account of the tribe in: "An Account of the Origin and Present condition of the tribe of Ramoosies, including the Life of the Chief Oomiah Naik, by Capt. Alexander Mackintosh of the Twenty-seventh Regiment, Madras Army," Bombay 1853.]

[1817.—"His Highness must long have been aware of Ramoosies near the Mahadeo pagoda."—Ephraim's Letter to Pedros, in Papers relating to E.I. Affairs, 23.]

1833.—"... There are instances of the Ramoosy Naiks, who are of a bold and daring spirit, having a great ascendancy over the village Fateills (Patil) and Koollurnees (Coolcurnees), but which the latter do not like to acknowledge openly ... and it sometimes happens that the village officers participate in the profits which the Ramoosies derive from committing such irregularities."—Macintosh, Acc. of the Tribe of Ramoosies, p. 19.

1883.—"... Till a late hour in the morning he (the chamoleon) sleeps sounder than a ramoosey or a chowkeydar; nothing will wake him."—Tribes on My Frontier.

RAM - RAM! The commonest salutation between two Hindus meeting on the road; an invocation of the divinity.

[1652.—"... then they approach the idol waving them (their hands) and repeating many times (the words) Ram, Ram, i.e. God, God."—Torevaer, ed. Bull, i. 263.]

1673.—"... Those whose Zeal transports them no further than to die at home, are immediately Washed by the next of Kin, and bound up in a Sheet; and as many as go with him carry them by turns on a Cotstaff; and the rest run almost naked and shaved, crying after him Ram, Ram."—Heyne, 101.
1726.—"The wives of Braminas (when about to burn) first give away their jewels and ornaments, or perhaps a pinang, (q.v.), which is under such circumstances a great present, to this or that one of their male or female friends who stand by, and after taking leave of them, go 'lie over the corpse, calling out only Ram, Ram.' —Valentijn, v. 51.

[1852.—See under SUTTEE.]

c. 1855.—Sir G. Birdwood writes: 'In 1839-70 I saw a green parrot in the Crystal Palace aviary very deafful, dull, and miser- able to behold. I called it 'pretty poll,' and coaxed it in every way, but no notice of me would it take. Then I behought me of its being a Mahratta popot, and hailed it Ram Ram! and spoke in Mahari to it: when at once it roused up out of its lethargy, and hopped and swung about, and answered me back, and cuddled up close to me against the bars, and laid its head against my knuckles. And every day thereafter, when I visited it, it was always in an eager hurry to salute me as I drew near to it.'

RANEE. s. A Hindu queen: râjî, fem. of râjâ, from Skt. râjâ (= re-gîn). 1853. — "Bedinor (Bedinor) ... is the Capital City, the Residence of the Ranne, the Bette of Shiam Shaker Sayy. — Fryer, 342.

1609.—"The young Ranie may marry whomsoever she pleases."—Lord Venetian, i. 364.

1597.—"There were once a Raja and a Rané who had an only daughter."—Miss Sower, Indian Fancy Tales, i.

RANGOON. n.p. Burm. Ram-poon, said to mean 'War-end': the chief town and port of Pegu. The great Pagoda in its immediate neighbourhood had long been famous under the name of Dagon (q.v.), but there was no town in modern times till Rangoon was founded by Alompra during his conquest of Pegu, in 1755. The name probably had some kind of intentional allusion to Dagon, whilst it "proclaimed his forecast of the immediate destruction of his enemies." Occupied by the British forces in May 1824, and again, taken by storm, in 1852, Rangoon has since the latter date been the capital, first of the British province of Pegu, and latterly of British Burma. It is now a flourishing port with a population of 134,176(1881); [in 1891, 180,824].

RANJOW. s. A Malay term, ran-jau. Sharp-pointed stakes of bamboo of varying lengths stuck in the ground to penetrate the naked feet or body of an enemy. See Marsden, H. of Sumatra, 2nd ed., 276. [The same thing on the Assam frontier is called a poca (Little, Wild Rices, 308), or panji (Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 233).]

RASEED, s. Hind. rasid. A native corruption of the English 'receipt,' shaped, probably, by the Pers. rasib, 'arrived'; viz. an acknowledgment that a thing has 'come to hand.'

1577.—"There is no Sindi, however wild, that cannot now understand Rased (receipt), and 'Apil' (appeal)."—Burton, Sind Revisited, i. 252.

RAT-BIRD. s. The striated bush-labbler (Chatterhoca caulata, Dumeril); see Tribes on My Frontier, 1883, p. 3.

RATTAN. s. The long stem of various species of Asiatic climbing palms, belonging to the genus Calamus and its allies, of which canes are made (not 'bamboo-canes,' improperly so called), and which, when split, are used to form the seats of cane-bottomed chairs and the like. From Malay rotan, [which Crawford derives from rowat, 'to pare or trim'], applied to various species of Calamus and Desmonorus (see Filet, No. 6064 et seq.). Some of these attain a length of several hundred feet, and are used in the Himalaya and the Kâsia Hills for making suspension bridges, &c., rivelling rope in strength.

1531. — "The Governor set out from Malaca in the beginning of December, of this year, and sailed along the coast of Pedir ... He met with such a contrary gale that he was obliged to anchor, which he did with a great anchor, and a cable of rotas, which are slenderer but tough canes, which they twist and make into strong cables."—Cortes, London, i. 228.

1533. — "They took thick ropes of rotas (which are made of certain twigs which are very flexible) and cast them round the feet, and others round the tucks."—Garcia, f. 90.

1538. — "There is another sort of the same reedies which they call Rotas; these are thinne like twisses of Willow for baskets ..."—Linschoten, 28; [Hak. Soc. i. 67].

1610. — "Il y a une autre sorte de canne qui ne vient jamais plus grosse que le petit doigt ... et il plove comme osier. Ils l'appellent Rotan. Ils en font des cables de maire, et quantité de sortes de panches; gentiment entre lassus."—Parcer de Lave, i. 207; [Hak. Soc. i. 381, and see i. 207].
RAVINE DEER. The sportsman’s name, at least in Upper India, for the Indian gazelle (Gazella bennetti, Jerdon, [Blanford, Mammalia, 526 seqq.]).

RAZZIA, s. This is Algerine-French, not Anglo-Indian, meaning a sudden raid or destructive attack. It is in fact the Ar. ghadziga, ‘an attack upon infidels,’ from ghâzât, ‘a hero.’

REAPER, s. The small laths, laid across the rafters of a sloping roof to bear the tiles, are so called in Anglo-Indian house-building. We find no such word in any Hind. Dictionary; but in the Mahratti Diet, we find rip in this sense.

[1741-5.—See under BANKSHALL.]

REAS, REES, s. Small money of account, formerly in use at Bombay, the 25th part of an anna, and 400th of a rupee. Port. real, pl. reis. Accounts were kept at Bombay in rupees, quarters, and rees, down at least to November 1834, as we have seen in accounts of that date at the India Office.

1673.—(In Geo.) “The Vidroon... 15 Biscouks (see BUDGBOOK). Whereof 75 make a Tango (see TANGA), and 60 Rees make a Tango.”—Fryer, 207.

1727.—“Their Accounts (Bombay) are kept by Rayes and Rejes. 1 Reyer is . . . 400 Rayes.”—A. Hamilton, ii. App. 6; [ed. 1744, ii. 315].

RED CLIFFS, n.p. The nautical name of the steep coast below Quilon. This presents the only bluffs on the shore from Mt. Dely to Cape Comorin, and is thus identified, by character and name, with the ἄγκος ὄσος of the Periplus.

c. 80-90.—“Another village, Bakaré, lies by the mouth of the river, to which the ships about to depart descend from Nei-kynda. . . . From Bakaré extends the Red-Hill (περίπος ὄσος) and then a long stretch of country called Paralia.”—Periplus, §§ 55-58.

1727.—“I wonder why the English built their Fort in that place (Anjengo), when they might as well have built it near the Red Cliffs to the Northward, from whence they have their Water for drinking.”—J. Hamilton, i. 332; [ed. 1741, i. 334].

1813.—“Water is scarce and very indifferent; but at the red cliffs, a few miles to the north of Anjengo, it is said to be very good, but difficult to be shipped.”—Madan, Or. Comm. i. 335. See also Manuals New Directory, 5th ed. 1780, p. 161.

1814.—“From thence (Quilohna) to Anjengo the coast is hilly and romantic; especially about the red cliffs at Bascoél (qu. Bakarg? as above?); where the women of Anjengo daily repair for water, from a very fine spring.”—Forbes, Or. Mem., i. 334; [2nd ed. i. 213].

1814.—“There is said to be fresh water at the Red Cliffs to the northward of Anjengo, but it cannot be got conveniently; a considerable surf generally prevailing on the coast, particularly to the southward, renders it unsafe for ships’ boats to land.”—Hodgson’s Dirce, ed. 1811, i. 515.

RED-DOG, s. An old name for Prickly-heat (q.v.).

c. 1752.—“The red-dog is a disease which affects almost all foreigners in hot countries, especially if they reside near the shore, at the time when it is hottest.”—Osborne’s Voyage, i. 190.

REGULATION, s. A law passed by the Governor-General in Council, or by a Governor (of Madras or Bombay) in Council. This term became obsolete in 1833, when legislative authority was conferred by the Charter Act (3 & 4 Will. IV. cap. 85) on those authorities; and thenceforward the term used is Act. By 13 Geo. IIII. cap. 63, § xxxv., it is enacted that it shall be lawful for the G.-G. and Council of Fort William in Bengal to issue Rules or Decrees and Regulations for the good order and civil government of the Company’s settlements, &c. This was the same Charter Act that established the Supreme Court. But the authorised compilation of “Regulations of the Gort. of Fort William in force at the end of 1853,” begins only with the Regulations of 1793, and makes no allusion to the earlier Regulations. No more does Regulation XLI. of 1793, which prescribes the form, numbering, and codifying of the REGULATION PROVINCES. 759 REINOL.

Regulations to be issued. The fact seems to be that prior to 1793, when the enactment of Regulations was systematized, and the Regulations began to be regularly numbered, those that were issued partook rather of the character of resolutions of Government and circular orders than of Laws.

1585.——"The new Commissioner... could discover nothing prejudicial to me, except, perhaps, that the Regulations were not sufficiently observed. The sacred Regulations! How was it possible to fit them on such very irregular subjects as I had to deal with?"—Lt.-Col. Lewis, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 376.

1580.——"The laws promulgated under this system were called Regulations, owing to a lawyer's doubts as to the competence of the Indian authorities to infringe on the legislative powers of the English Parliament, or to modify the 'laws and customs' by which it had been decreed that the various nationalities of India were to be governed."—Sjg. Review, March 13, p. 335.

REGULATION PROVINCES. See this explained under NON-REGULATION.

REGUR. s. Dakh. Hind. repur; also b剖析. The peculiar black loamy soil, commonly called by English people in India 'black cotton soil.' The word may possibly be connected with H.—P. reg. 'sand'; but regula and regali is given by Wilson as Telugu. [Platts connects it with Skt. rkiha, 'a furrow.']. This soil is not found in Bengal, with some restricted exception in the Râjmahal Hills. It is found everywhere on the plains of the Deccan trap-country, except near the coast. Tracts of it are scattered through the valley of the Krishna, and it occupies the flats of Coimbatore, Madura, Salem, Tanjore, Ramnad, and Tinnevelly. It occurs north of the Nerbudda in Saugor, and occasionally on the plain of the eastern side of the Peninsula, and composes the great flat of Surat and Broach in Guzerat. It is also found in Pegu. The origin of regar has been much debated. We can only give the conclusion as stated in the Manual of the Geology of India, from which some preceding particulars are drawn: "Regur has been shown on fairly trustworthy evidence to result from the impregnation of certain argillaceous formations with organic matter, but... the process which has taken place is imperfectly understood, and... some peculiarities in distribution yet require explanation."—Op. cit. i. 434.

REH. s. [Hind. rh. Skt. rēj, 'to shine, shake, quiver.] A saline efflorescence which comes to the surface in extensive tracts of Upper India, rendering the soil sterile. The salts (chiefly sulphate of soda mixed with more or less of common salt and carbonate of soda) are superficial in the soil, for in the worst rh tracts sweet water is obtainable at depths below 60 or 80 feet. [Plains infested with these salts are very commonly known in N. India as ōsor plains (Hind. úsqueda, Skt. úshara, 'impregnated with salt').] The phenomenon seems due to the climate of Upper India, where the ground is rendered hard and impervious to water by the scorching sun, the parching winds, and the treeless character of the country, so that there is little or no water-circulation in the subsoil. The salts in question, which appear to be such of the substances resulting from the decomposition of rock, or of the detritus derived from rock, and from the formation of the soil, as are not assimilated by plants, accumulate under such circumstances, not being diluted and removed by the natural purifying process of percolation of the rain-water. This accumulation of salts is brought to the surface by capillary action after the rains, and evaporated, leaving the salts as an efflorescence on the surface. From time to time the process culminates on considerable tracts of land, which are thus rendered barren. The canal-irrigation of the Upper Provinces has led to some aggravation of the evil. The level of the canal-waters being generally high, they raise the level of the reh-polluted water in the soil, and produce in the lower tracts a great increase of the efflorescence. A partial remedy for this lies in the provision of drainage for the subsoil water, but this has only to a small extent been yet carried out. [See a full account in Watt, Econ. Dict. VI. pt. i. 400 segg.]

REINOL. s. A term formerly in use among the Portuguese at Goa, and applied apparently to 'Johnny Newcomes3 or Griffins (q.v.). It is from cing, the Kingdom (viz. Portugal). The word was also sometimes used to distinguish the European Portuguese from the country-born.

1598.—"... they take great pleasure and laugh at him, calling him Reynol, which is a name given in jest to such as newly come from Portugal, and know not how to behave themselves in such grave manner, and with such ceremonies as the Portugalese use there in India."—Eischeden, ch. xxxi.; [Hak. Soc. i. 205].

c. 1610.—"... que es soldats Portu-gais arrirent de nouveau aux Indes portans encor leurs habits du pays, ceux qui sont la de long tés quand ils les voyent par les Mais les appellent Renol, chargez de poux, et mille autres inuirs et moqueries."—[Morgan, 96].

[3] "When they are newly arrived in the Indies, they are called Raignolles, that is to say 'men of the Kingdom,' and the older hands mock them until they have made one or two voyages with them, and have learned the manners and customs of the Indies; this name sticks to them until the fleet arrives the year following."—L'egard de Local, Hak. Soc. ii. 123.

[1727.—"The Reynolds or European fidalgos."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 251.]

At a later date the word seems to have been applied to Portuguese deserters who took service with the E.I. Co. Thus:

c. 1760.—"With respect to the military, the common men are chiefly such as the Company sends out in their ships, or deserters from the several nations settled in India, Dutch, French, or Portuguese, which last are commonly known by the name of Reynols."—Gros, i. 38.

RESHIRE. n.p. Risihir. A place on the north coast of the Persian Gulf, some 5 or 6 miles east of the modern port of Bushire (q.v.). The present village is insignificant, but it is on the site of a very ancient city, which continued to be a port of some consequence down to the end of the 16th century. I do not doubt that this is the place intended by Reynel in the quotation from A. Nunez under Dubber. The spelling Raxel in Barros below is no doubt a clerical error for Raxel.

c. 1340.—"Rishhir. ... This city built by Lohraos, was rebuilt by Shajur son of Ardelesh Babegian; it is of medium size, on the shore of the sea. The climate is very hot and unhealthy. ... The inhabitants generally devote themselves to sea-trade, but poor and feeble that they are, they live chiefly in dependence on the merchants of other countries. Dates and the cloths called Risihir are the chief productions."—Hamdulla Mustafi, quoted in Barbier de Meynard, Dict. de la Perse.

1514.—"And thereupon Pero Dalboqueque sailed away ... and entered through the straits of the Persian sea, and explored all the harbours, islands, and villages which are contained in it ... and when he was as far advanced as Bâreme, the winds being now westerly—he tacked about, and stood along in the tack for a two days voyage, and reached Raxel, where he found Mirbuzaac, Captain of the Xoque Ismail, (Shâh Ismaïl, of Persia), who had captured 2000 men from a Captain of the King of Ormaz."—Alboquerquc, Hak. Soc. iv. 114-115.

... "On the Persian side (of the Gulf) is the Province of Raxel, which contains many villages and castles along the sea, engaged in a flourishing trade."—Ibid. 165-7.

1534.—"And at this time insurrection was made by the King of Raxel, (which is a city on the east of Persia); who was a vessel of the King of Ormaz, so the latter King sought help from the Captain of the Castle, Antonio da Silvaire. And he sent down Jorge de Cralsto with a galliot and two foists and 100 men, all well equipt, and good muskeeters; and bade him tell the King of Raxel that he must give up the fleet which he kept at sea for the purpose of plundering, and must return to his allegiance to the K. of Ormaz."—Curren, iii. 557.

1553, 4. ... And Francisco de Gouvea arrived at the port of the city of Raxel, and having anchored, was forthwith visited by a Moor on the King's part, with refreshments and compliments, and a message that he would make peace with us, and submit to the King of Ormaz."—Barros, iv. iv. 26.

1565.—"Reyxel." See under DUBBER, as above.

1600.—"Reformados y proyencios en Har-nun y Har-nun; los tomaron y partir, y remaron esta vez por fuera de la isla Quesiione (see KISHM) corriendo la misma costa. Como de la primera, pasamos ... mas adelante la fortaleza de Raxel, celebré por el mucho y perfecto pan y frutos, que su territorio produce."—Teixeira, Viage, 70.

1856.—"18 hours sufficed to put the troops in motion northwards, the ships of war, led by the Admiral, advancing along the coast to their support. This was on the morning of the 9th, and by noon the enemy was observed to be in force in the village of Reshrire. Here amidst the ruins of old houses, garden-walls, and steep ravines, they occupied a formidably position; but notwithstanding their firmness, wall after wall was surmounted, and finally they were driven from their last defence (the old fort of Reshrire) bordering on the cliffs at the margin of the sea."—Dispatch in Lord's II, of the Indian Navy, ii. 316.
RESIDENT. s. This term has been used in two ways which require distinction. Thus (a) up to the organization of the Civil Service in Warren Hastings's time, the chiefs of the Company's commercial establishments in the provinces, and for a short time, the European chiefs of districts, were termed Residents. But later the word was applied (b) also to the representative of the Governor-General at an important native court, viz., at Lucknow, Delhi, Hydabad, and Buroda. And this is the only meaning that the term now has in British India. In Dutch India the term is applied to the chief European officer of a province (corresponding to an Indian Zillah) as well as to the Dutch representative at a native Court, as at Solo and Djojkocarta.

1745.—"We received a letter from Mr. Henry Kessel, Resident at Balasore."—F. W. Williams, Letters. Long. 3, 116.

1762.—"Agreed, Mr. Howitt the present Resident in Rajah Tilaca's country (viz., Burdwan) for the collection of the tuncahs (see TUNCA) be wrote to . . ."—Ibid. March 29, ibid. 244.

1778.—"My pay as Resident at Sylhet did not exceed 500/ per annum, so that fortune could only be acquired by my own industry."—H. R. Lindsay, Lives of the Ls., iii. 174.

b.—

1784.—"Having received overtures of a very friendly nature from the Rajah of Bhour, who 500/ requested the presence of a British Resident at his Court, I have despatched an ambassador to Nagore with full powers to ascertain the precise nature of the Rajah's views."—Major W. D'Arcy, Inspections, ii. 199.

RESPONDENTIA. s. An old trade technicality, thus explained: "Money which is borrowed, not upon the vessel as in botomry, but upon the goods and merchandise contained in it, which must necessarily be sold or exchanged in the course of the voyage, in which case the borrower personally is bound to answer the contract" (Wharton's Law Lexicon, 6th ed. 1876; [and see N.E.D., under Botomry]. What is now a part of the Calcutta Course, along the bank of the Hoogly, was known down to the first quarter of the last century, as Respondentia Walk. We have heard this name explained by the supposition that it was a usual scene of proposals and contingent jawaubs. (q.v.), but the name was no doubt, in reality, given because this walk by the river served as a sort of Change, where bargains in Respondentia and the like were made.

1720.—"I am concerned with Mr. Thomas Theobalds in a respondentia Bond in the 'George' Brigantine."—Treatise of Co., Merchant. In Wikenr, ii. 346.

1727.—"There was one Captain Perrin Master of a Ship, who took up about 500 L. on respondentia from Mr. Ralph Sheldon ... payable at his Return to Bengal."—A. Hamilton, ii. 141 (ed. 1744, ii. 12).

"... which they are enabled to do by the Money taken up here on Respondentia bonds ..."—In Wikenr, ii. 435.

1776.—"I have desired my Calcutta Attorney to insure some Money lent on Respondentia on ships in India. ... I have also subscribed 2500 L. towards a China Voyage."—MS. Letter of James Residents, Feb. 21.

1781.—"I assure you, Sir, Europe articles, especially good wine are not to be had for love, money, or respondentia."—The Indian Observer, by Hugh Boyd, et al., p. 292.

1780.—"A Grecian ship that has been built at the north end of the old Respondentia walk."—Biridston, Diary of Times, ii. 209.

RESSAIDAR. s. P.-H. Rassidir. A native subaltern of irregular cavalry, under the Ressaldar (q.v.). It is not clear what sense rassd has in the formation of this title (which appears to be of modern devising). The meaning of that word is "quickness of apprehension; fitness, perfection."

RESSAIDAR. s. Hind. from Ar. rassid. A troop in one of our regiments of native (so-called) Irregular Cavalry. The word was in India applied more loosely to a native corps of horse, apart from English regimental technicalities. The Arabic word properly means the charge or commission of a rassal, i.e. of a civil officer employed to make arrests (Dowg), [and in the passage from the Join, quoted under RESSAIDAR, the original text has Resdal]. The transition of meaning, as with many other words of Arabic origin, is very obscure.

1758.—"Presently after Shokum Sing and Harrem Cawn (formerly of Roy Dullub's Rissalla) came in and discovered to him the whole affair."—Letter of W. Hastings, in Rhassal. 762  Rhotass.

[1781.—“The enemy’s troops before the place are five Rosallars of infantry . . .”—Sir Egire Cote, letter of July 6, in Progs. of Council, September 7, Forrest, Letters, vol. iii.]

RESSALDAR, Ar.—P.—H. Rissal-dar (Rassala). Originally in Upper India the commander of a corps of Hindustani horse, though the second quotation shows it, in the south, employed to officers of infantry.
Now applied to the native officer who commands a rassala in one of our regiments of “Irregular Horse.” This title is applied honorifically to overseers of post-horses or stables. (See Punjab Notes & Queries, ii. 84.)

c. 1590.—“Besides, there are several copyists who write a good hand and a lucid style. They receive the gaddi(dh) (memorandum) when completed, keep it with themselves, and make a proper abridgement of it. After signing it, they return this instead of the gaddi(dh), when the bridge-ment is signed and sealed by the Waj'ahnawals, and the Rissaladar (in orig. rissalh).”

1773.—“The Nawab now gave orders to the Rissaldars of the regular and irregular infantry, to encircle the fort, and then commonuce the attack with their artillery and musketry.”—H. of Hyder Nahl, 327.

1803.—“The rassaldars finding so much money in their bands, began to quarrel about the division of it, while Perron crossed in the evening with the bodyguard.”—Mil.
Mem. of James Sirmur, i. 274.

e. 1831.—“Le lieutenant de ma trompe a bonne chance d’être fait Capitaine (resselldar).”—Jacquemont, Corry, ii. 8.

REST-HOUSE. s. Much the same as Dawk Bungalow (q.v.). Used in Ceylon only. [But the word is in common use in Northern India for the chokies along roads and canals.]

[1894.—“”“REST-Houses” or “staging bungalows” are erected at intervals of twelve or fifteen miles along the roads.”
G. W. Macnaghy, Ways and Works in India, p. 78.]

RESUM. s. Lascar’s Hind. for ration (Rohback).

RHINOCEROS. s. We introduce this word for the sake of the quotations, showing that even in the 16th century this animal was familiar not only in the Western Himalaya, but in the forests near Peshawar. It is probable that the nearest rhinoceros is to be found at the present time would be not less than 800 miles, as the crow flies, from Peshawar. See also GANDA, and for references to the animal in Greek accounts of India, McCrindle, Ancient India, its Invasion by Alexander, 186].

c. 1387.—“In the month of Zil Ka’du of the same year he (Prince Muhammad Khan) gave to the mountains of Sirmor (W. of the Jumna) and spent two months in hunting the rhinoceros and the elk.”—Takrkh-i-Mohiuddin Shad, in Elliot, iv. 16.

1898.—(On the frontier of Kashmir).
“Comme il y ait dans ces pays un lieu qui par sa vaste étendue, et la grande quantité de gibiers, semblait inviter les passants à chasser. . . . Timur s’en donna du divertissement, ils firent une infusion de gibiers, et l’on tua plusieurs rhinoceros à corps de sabre et de lances, qu’ils d’ap-ple animal . . . a la peau si ferme, qu’on ne could la perce que par des efforts extraordinaires.”—Petis de la Croix, H. de Timur-Be, iii. 139.

1519.—After sending on the army towards the river (Indus), I myself set off for Sawati, which they likewise call Karak-Khanich (kar-khanha, “the rhinoceros-haunt”), to hunt the rhinoceros. We started many rhinoceroses, but as the country abounds in bushwood, we could not get at them. A she rhinoceros, that had whelps, came out, and fled along the plain; many arrows were shot at her, but . . . she gained cover. We set tire to the bushwood, but the rhinoceros was not to be found. We got sight of another, that, having been scorched in the fire, was lamed and unable to run. We killed it, and every one cut off a bit as a trophy of the chase.”—Babur, 253.

1554.—“Nous vimes à la ville de Porsheur (Peshawur), et ayant heu-rentement passé le Koutel (Kotul), nous gagnâmes la ville de Djonashayeh. Sur le Koutel nous aperçûmes des rhinoceros, dont la grosseur approchait celle d’un elephant . . .”—Sidii, i. in J. As., 1st

Rhotass. n.p. This (Rhodas) is the name of two famous fortresses in India, viz. a. a very ancient rock-fort in the Shahabad district of Behar, occupying part of a tabular hill which rises on the north bank of the Son river to a height of 1400 feet. It was an important stronghold of Sher Shah, the successful rival of the Mogul Humayun: b. A fort at the north-end of the Salt-range in the Jhelum District, Punjab, which was built by the same king, named by him after the ancient Rohitas. The ruins are very picturesque.

b.—

c. 1560.—"Sher Shah was occupied night and day with the business of his kingdom, and never allowed himself to be idle. . . . He kept money (khandan) and revenue (chardaj) in all parts of his territories, so that, if necessity required, soldiers and money were ready. The chief treasury was in Rohitas under the care of Ikshiyar Khan."—Wak'at-i-Mukhtal/, in Elliot, iv. 551.

c. 1560.—"Rohitas is a stronghold on the summit of a lofty mountain, difficult of access. It has a circumference of 14 kos and the land is cultivated. It contains many springs, and whenever the soil is excavated to a depth of 3 or 4 yards, water is visible. In the rainy season many lakes are formed, and more than 200 waterfalls gladden the eye and ear."—Ibn, ed. Daruquietii, ii. 152, sq.

1665.—"You must leave the great road to Patna, and bend to the South through Exberbergh (th) [Akbarpur] and the famous Fortress of Rhodes."—Taylor, E.T. ii. 53; [ed. Barth II., 121.]

[1764.¬"From Shaw Malik, Kullah of Rots to Major Munroe."—In Long, 352.]

The ancient Rohitas. The ruins are very picturesque. a.—
c. 1560.—"Sher Shah . . . marched with all his forces and retinue through all the hills of Padmán and Garhíak, in order that he might choose a sitting site, and build a fort there to keep down the Ghakkars. . . . having selected Rohitas, he built there a fort which now exists."—Tehrík-i-Sharfs, in Elliot, iv. 290.

1590.—"Before we reached the Hydaspe we had a view of the famous fortress of Rohitas; but it was at a great distance. . . . Rohitas we understood to be an extensive but strong fort on a low hill."—Elphinstone, "Amul." ed. 1839, i. 108.

RICE. s. The well-known cereal, Oryza sativa, L. There is a strong temptation to derive the Greek ὀργύζω, which is the source of our word through L. risus, Fr. riz, etc., from the Amiil ari, rice deprived of husk, scribed to a root ari, to separate. It is quite possible that Southern India was the original seat of rice cultivation. Roxburgh (From India, i. 200) says that a wild rice, known as aevare [Sk. niśra, Tel. nīnirv] by the Telinga people, grows abundantly about the lakes in the Northern Circars, and he considers this to be the original plant. It is possible that the Arabic al-rus (rusz) from which the Spaniards rectly take their word arroz, may have been taken also directly from the Dravidian term. But it is hardly possible that ὀργύζω can have had that origin. The knowledge of rice apparently came to Greece from the expedition of Alexander, and the mention of ὀργύζω by Theophrastus, which appears to be the oldest, probably dates almost from the lifetime of Alexander (d. B.C. 323). Aristolochus, whose accurate account is quoted by Strabo (see below), was a companion of Alexander’s expedition, but seems to have written later than Theophrastus. The term was probably acquired on the Oxus, or in the Punjab. And though no Skt. word for rice is nearer ὀργύζω than bhris, the very common exchange of aspirant and sibilant might easily give a form like bhris or bhriz, (comp. hindi, sindb, etc.) in the dialects west of India. Though no such exact form seems to have been produced from old Persian, we have further indications of it in the Pushtu, which Raverty writes, sing. a grain of rice ‘bhrizel, pl. rice bhrizi, the former close to oryz. The same writer gives in Barakdé (one of the uncultivated languages of the Kabul country, spoken by a ‘Talik’ tribe settled in Logar, south of Kabul, and also at Kanheram in the Waziri country) the word for rice as bhriz, a very close approximation again to oryz. The same word is indeed given by Leech, in an earlier vocabulary, largely coincident with the former as riz. The modern Persian word for husked rice is bhrizj, and the Armenian bricz. A nasal form, deviating further from the hypothetical bhris or bhriz, but still probably the same in origin, is found among other languages of the Hindu Kush tribes. e.g. Barishi (Khajuna of Leitner) brizf, Shina (of Gilgit), bhrizj: Khoward of the Chitral Valley (Arniyah of Leitner) urji (Buddhagh. Tribes of Hindu Kush, App., pp. xxxiv., lxx., cxxxix. 1298.—"Il nia formant et ris uzez, mès se menentent point de formant par ce que est en celle provence enfermé, ne-memennon ris et font point rizze, cest de ris sey espèces ou mél. c est bhriz et est celi qui home evr a risi con fait le vin."—M. le P. de la Pop., Gen. of Madagascar (Urania sferic conform), cooked to pass as a bird's quill. Mr. Sibree, in his excellent book on Madagascar (The Great African Island, 1880), noticed this, but pointed out that the object was more probably the immensely long midrib of the rafia palm (Sago). Sir John Kirk, when in England in 1882, expressed entire confidence in this identification, and on his return to Zanzibar in 1883 sent four of these midribs to England. These must have been originally from 36 to 40 feet in length. The leaflets were all strit, but when entire the object must have strongly resembled a Broidlinguagian feather. These roc's quills were shown at the Forestry Exhibition in Edinburgh, 1884. Sir John Kirk wrote:

"I send today por S.S. Arcot . . . four fronds of the Raphia palm, called here Moob. They are just as sold and shipped up and down the coast. No doubt they were sent in Marco Polo's time in exactly the same state — i.e., stripped of their leaflets and with the tip broken off. They are used for making stages and ladders and last long if kept dry. They are also made into doors, by being cut into lengths and pinned through."

Some other object has recently been shown at Zanzibar as part of the wings of a great bird. Sir John Kirk writes that this (which he does not describe particularly) was in the possession of the R. C. priests at Bagamoyo, to whom it had been given by natives of the interior, and these declared that they had brought it from Tanganyika, and that it was part of the wing of a gigantic bird. On another occasion they repeated the statement, alleging that this bird was known in the Ucake (?) country, near the coast. The priests were able to communicate directly with their informants, and certainly believed the story. Dr. Hildebrand also, a competent German naturalist, believed in it. But Sir John Kirk himself say that what the priests had to show was most undoubtedly the whalebone of a comparatively small whale (see letter of the present writer in African Journal March 22nd, 1884).

ROC, s. The Rak or fabulous colossal bird of Arabian legend. This has been treated of at length by one of the present writers in Marco Polo (Bk. iii, ch. 33, notes); and here we shall only mention one or two supplementary facts.

M. Marce states that rak-rak is applied by the Malays to a bird of prey of the vulture family, a circumstance which possibly may indicate the source of the Arabic name, as we know it to be of some at least of the legends. [See Skect, Malay Magic, 124.]

In one of the notes just referred to it is suggested that the roc's quills, spoken of by Marco Polo in the passage quoted below (a passage which evidently refers to some red object brought to China), might possibly have been some vegetable production such as the great frond of the Batavella.
ROGUE'S RIVER. n.p. The name given by Europeans in the 17th and 18th centuries to one of the Sunderbund channels joining the Lower Hooghly R. from the eastward. It was so called from being frequented by the Arakan Rovers, sometimes Portuguese vagabonds, sometimes native Muggs, whose vessels lay in this creek watching their opportunity to plunder craft going up and down the Hooghly.

Mr. R. Barlow, who has partially annotated Hedges' Diary for the Hakluyt Society, identifies Rogue's River with Channel Creek, which is the channel between Sangor Island and the Delta. Mr. Barlow was, I believe, a member of the Bengal Pilot service, and this, therefore, must have been the application of the name in recent tradition. But I cannot reconcile this with the sailing directions in the English Pilot (1711), or the indications in Hamilton, quoted below.

The English Pilot has a sketch chart of the river, which shows, just opposite Buffalo Point, "R. Theens," then, as we descend, the R. Rangatula, and, close below that, "Rouges" (without the word River), and still further below, Charnell Creek or R. Jessore. Rangatula R. and Channel Creek we still have in the charts.

ROGUE (Elephant), s. An elephant (generally, if not always a male) living in apparent isolation from any herd, usually a bold marauder, and a danger to travellers. Such an elephant is called in Bengal, according to Williamson, saun, i.e. saun [Hind. saun, Skt. shandla]; sometimes it would seem qundā [Hind. qundā, 'a rascal']; and by the Sinhalense hont. The term rogue is used by Europeans in Ceylon, and its origin is somewhat obscure. Sir Emerson Tennent finds such an elephant called, in a curious book of the 18th century, rambler or rammelor, of which he supposes that rogue may perhaps have been a modification. That word looks like Port. ronduer; 'a snorer, a noisy fellow, a bully,' which gives a plausible sense. But Littre gives rogue as a colloquial French word conveying the idea of arrogance and rudeness. In the following passage which we have copied, unfortunately without recording the source, the word comes still nearer the sense in which it is applied to the elephant: "On commence à appercevoir des Bayonne, que l'homme de ces peuples tient un peu de celle de ses voisins, et qu'ils sont rouges et peu communicatifs avec l'Estranger." After all however it is most likely that the word is derived from an English use of the word.

For Skeat shows that rogue, from the French sense of malapert, saucy, rude, surly, came to be applied as a cant term to beggars, and is used, in some old English passages which he quotes, exactly in the sense of our modern 'tramp.' The transfer to a vagabond elephant would be easy. Mr. Skeat refers to Shakspere—

"And wast thou fain, poor father, To hovel thee with swine, and rogues forlorn?"
—K. Lear. iv. 7.

1578.—"Much misconception exists on the subject of rogue or solitary elephants. The usually accepted belief that these elephants are turned out of the herds by their companions or rivals is not correct. Most of the so-called solitary elephants are the lords of some herds near. They leave their companions at times to roam by themselves, usually to visit cultivation or open country... sometimes again they make the expedition merely for the sake of solitude. They, however, keep more or less to the jungle where their herds are, and follow its movements."—Shaderton, p. 52.
After a careful comparison of all the notices, and of the old and modern charts, I come to the conclusion that the R. of Rogues must have been either what is now called Chingri Khâl, entering immediately below Diamond Harbour, or Kolpâ Creek, about 6 m. further down, but the preponderance of argument is in favour of Chingri Khâl. The position of this quite corresponds with the R. Theere of the old English chart; it corresponds in distance from Saugor (the Ganga Sangor of those days, which forms the extreme S. of what is styled Sangor Island now) with that stated by Hamilton, and also in being close to the "first safe anchoring place in the River," viz. Diamond Harbour. The Rogues' River was apparently a little 'above the head of the Grand Middle Ground' or great shoals of the Hoogly, whose upper termination is now some 7¾ m. below Chingri Khâl. One of the extracts from the English Pilot speaks of the "R. of Rogues, commonly called by the Country People, Adegum." Now there is a town on the Chingri Khâl, a few miles from its entrance into the Hoogly, which is called in Rennell's Map Oftegonga, and in the Atlas of India Sheet Huttosqum. Further, in the tracing of an old Dutch chart of the 17th century, in the India Office, I find in a position corresponding with Chingri Khâl, P.Rover's Sprâl, which I take to be 'Robber's (or Rogues') River.'

1683.—"And so we parted for this night, before which time it was resolved by ye' Councell that if I should not prevail to go this way to Decca, I should attempt to do it with ye' Shoopes by way of the River of Rogues, which goes through to the great River of Decca."—Hodges, Diary, Hak. Soc. 1, 36.

1711.—"Directions to go up along the Western Shore. . . . The nearer the Shore the better the Ground until past the River of Tygers. You may begin to edge over towards the River of Rogues about the head of the Grand Middle Ground; and when the Lighthouse Point bears from you ½ N. ¾ of a Mile, steer directly over for the East Shore E.N.E."—The English Pilot, Pt. iii. p. 51.

"Mr. Herring, the Pilot's Directions for bringing of Ships down the River of Hooghley. . . . From the lower point of the Narrows on the Starboard side . . . the Eastern Shore is to be kept close aboard, until past the said Creek, afterwards allowing only a small Birth for the Point off the River of Rogues, commonly called by the Country People, Adegum. . . . From the River Rogues, the Starboard (qu. larboard!) shore with a great ship ought to be kept close aboard at all along down to Channel Trees, for in the ebbing lies the Grand Middle Ground."—Ibid., p. 57.

1727.—"The first safe anchoring Place in the River, is off the Mouth of a River about 12 Leagues above Sagar," commonly known by the Name of Rogues River, which had that Appellation from some Bendiotts Portugese, who were followers of Shah Jâhân . . . for those Portugese . . . after their Master's Flight to the Kingdom of Areckan, betook themselves to Piracy among the Islands at the Mouth of the Ganges, and this River having communication with all the Channels from Chittagong (see CHITTAGONG) to the Westward, from this River they used to sally out."—Trotter, vol. ii. 3 [ed. 1741].

1752.—". . . On the receipt of your Honors' orders per Dunnington, we sent for Capt. Pinson, the Master of the Allion, directed him to issue out fresh orders to the Pilots not to bring up any of your Honors' Ships higher than Rogues River."—Letter to Court, in Long, p. 32.

ROHILLA, n.p. A name by which some or more particularly Afghans settled in Hindustan, are sometimes known, and which gave a title to the province Rohillând, and now, through that, to a Division of the N.W. Provinces embracing a large part of the old province. The word appears to be Pushtu, rohêlah or rohêlah, adj. formed from rôh, 'mountain,' thus signifying 'mountaineer of Afghan­stân.' But a large part of E. Afghani­stân specifically bore the name of Roh. Keene (Full of the Moghal Monarchy, 41) puts the rise of the Rohillas of India in 1744, when 'Ali Mahomed revolted, and made the territory since called Rohilkhand independent. A very comprehensive application is given to the term Roh in the quotation from Firishta. A friend (Major J. M. Trotter) notes here: "The word Rohilla is little, if at all, used now in Pushtu, but I remember a line of an ode in that language, 'Sàdik Rohilai yam pa Hindhâbâr gud,' meaning, 'I am a simple mountaineer, compelled to live in Hindustan'; i.e., 'an honest man among knaves.'"

* This is also points to the locality of Diamond Harbour, and the Chingri Khâl.
c. 1452.—"The King . . . issued favours to the chiefs of the various Afghan Tribes. On receipt of the favours, the Afghans of Roh Khan gave as they were wont, like ants and locusts, to enter the King’s service. The King (Bahol Lodi) commanded his nobles, saying,—Every Afghan who comes to Hide from the country of Roh to enter my service, bring him to me. I will give him a jägar more than proportional to his deserts."—Tārikh-i-Shir-Shahi, in Elliot, iv. 307.

c. 1542.—Actuated by the pride of power, he took no account of chancyp, which is much considered among the Afghans, and especially among the Rohilla men."—Ibid. 428.

c. 1612.—Roh is the name of a particular mountain [country], which extends in length from Swaid and Bajaur to the town of Sidi belonging to Bokhar. In breadth it stretches from Hasan Abdal to Khabul. Kandahār is situated in this territory."—Ibid. 568.

1745.—"This year the Emperor, at the request of Sudder Jung, marched to reduce Ali Mahammad Khan, a Rohilla adventurer, who had, from the negligence of the Government, possessed himself of the district of Kutteer (Kutheer), and assumed independence of the royal authority."—Ibid. H. of Sects. E.T. of Hist. of the Indian, &c., p. 218.

1763.—"After all the Rohillas are but the best of a race of men, in whose blood it would be difficult to find one or two single individuals endowed with good nature and with sentiments of equity: in a word they are Afghans.—Sir Metcalfe’s, iii. 240.

1786.—"That the said Warren Hastings . . . did in September, 1773, enter into a private engagement with the said Nabo of Oude . . . to furnish them, for a stipulated sum of money to be paid to the E. 1. Company, with a body of troops for the defence of the district of the nation of the Rohillas; a nation from whom the Company had never received, or pretended to receive, or apprehend, any injury whatever."—Art. of Charge against Hastings, in Bulk, vi. 562.

ROOLONG. s. Used in S. India, and formerly in W. India, for fine flour; semolina, or what is called in Bengal soojee (q.v.). The word is a corruption of Port. roldo or ruldo. But this is explained by Bluteau as farina secunda. It is, he says (in Portuguese), that substance which is extracted between the best flour and the bran.

1513.—"Some of the greatest delicacies in India are now made from the roolong flour, which is called thorough or kidney of the wheat."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 47: [2nd ed. i. 32].

1757.—"The old native coins seem to have consisted of Varunghs, rookas and Doodos. The Varungh is what is now generally called a pagoda . . . The rookas have now entirely disappeared, and have probably been melted into rupees. They varied in value from 1 to 2 Rupees. Though the coins have disappeared, the name still survives, and the ordinary name for silver money generally is rookaloa."—Gibb, Man. of Old Malay, 2nd ser.

ROOK. s. In chess the rook comes to us from Span. roque, and that from Ar. and Pers. rukh, which is properly the name of the famous grifphon, the roc of Marco Polo and the Arabian Nights. According to Marcel Devie it meant ‘warrior.’ It is however generally believed that this form was a mistake in transferring the Indian rith (see RUT) or ‘chariot,’ the name of the piece in India.

ROOM. n.p. ‘Turkey’ (Rūm); ROOMEE. n.p. (Rūm); ‘an Ottoman Turk.’ Properly ‘a Roman.’ In older Oriental books it is used for an European, and was probably the word which Marco Polo renders as ‘a Latini’—represented in later times by firinglee (c.g. see quotation from Ibn Batuta under RAJA). But Rūm, for the Roman Empire, continued to be applied to what had been part of the Roman Empire after it had fallen into the hands of the Turks, first to the Seljukian Kingdom in Anatolia, and afterwards to the Ottoman Empire seated at Constantinople. Garcia de Orta and Jarrie deny the name of Rámi, as used in India, to the Turks of Asia, but they are apparently wrong in their expressions. What they seem to mean is that Turks of the Ottoman Empire were called Rámi; whereas those others in Asia of Turkish race (whom we sometimes call Toorks), as of Persia and Turkestan, were excluded from the name.

Beudari-Rámi is, as the traveller explains, the ‘Port of the Turks.’ Gogola, a suburb of Diu on the mainland, was known to the Portuguese some years later, as Villa dos Rumes (see GOGOLLA, and quotation from Malfei above). The quotation below from Damian a Goes alludes apparently to Gogola.

1514.—"They were ships belonging to Moors, or to Rumi (there they give the name of Rumi to a white people who are, some of them, from Armenia the Greater and the Less, others from Creassia and Tartary and Rossia, Turks and Persians of Shao-nal called the Soji, and other renegades from all countries)."—Goe, de Empoli, 38.

ROMAUL, s. Hind. from Pers. rumal (lit. 'face-rubber') a towel, a handkerchief. ["In modern native use it may be carried in the hand by a high-born padra lady attached to her bellona or tiny silk handbag, and ornamented with all sorts of gold and silver trinkets; then it is a handkerchief in the true sense of the word. It may be carried by men, hanging on the left shoulder, and used to wipe the hands or face; then, too, it is a handkerchief. It may be as big as a towel, and thrown over both shoulders by men, the ends either hanging loose or tied in a knot in front; it then serves the purpose of a gulaband or muffler. In the case of children it is tied round the neck as a neckkerchief, or round the waist for mere show. It may be used by women much as the 18th century tucker was used in England in Addison's time" (Yenuf All, Mon. on Silk, 79; for its use to mark a kind ofshawl, see Forbes Watson, Textil. Manufactures, 123).] In ordinary Anglo-Indian Hind, it is the word for a 'pocket handkerchief.' In modern trade it is applied to thin silk piece-goods with handkerchief-patterns. We are not certain of its meaning in the old trade of piece-goods. e.g.:

[1615. — "2 handkerchiefs Rumall cotony."—Cookes Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 179.

ROTTLE, RATTLE, s. Arab. rāl, or rīth, the Arabian pound, becoming in S. Ital. rotole; in Port. arredel; in Spn. arélle; supposed to be originally a transposition of the Greek χρή, which went all over the Semitic East. It is in Syriac as līrit; and is also found as lītīm (pl.) in a Phoenician inscription of Sardina, dating c. B.C. 180 (see Corpus Inscription. Semitt. i. 188-189).

c. 1310.—"The rīl of India which is called sīr (see SEER) weighs 70 withīās... 40 sīr form a manā (see MAUND)."—Shahabadin Diniski, in Notes and Em. xiii. 189.

[c. 1500.—"Kafiz is a measure, called also sā having S. rātī, and, some say, more."

1 Rotola is = 16 Ome. or 1/1. Arrowd."—Fryer, 207.]

1803.—"At Judda the weights are:
15 Vakees = 1 Rattle.
2 Rattles = 1 maund."

Milburn, i. 88.

ROUND, s. This is used as a Hind. word, round, or corruptly roun goth, a transfer of the English, in the sense of patrolling, or 'going the rounds.' [And we find in the Madras Records the grade of 'Rounder,' or 'Gentlemen of the Round,' officers whose duty it was to visit the sentries.]

[163.—"... it is order'd that 18 Souldiers, 1 Corporall & 1 Rounder goe upon the Sloop Conimer for Hugly. ..."

—Pringle, Diary Fl. St. Geo. 1st ser. ii. 33.]

ROUNDEL, s. An obsolete word for an umbrella, formerly in use in Anglo-India. [In 1676 the use of the Roundell was prohibited, except in the case of "the Counsell and Chaplains" (Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cxxxii.)] In old English the name roundel is applied to a variety of circular objects, as a mat under a dish, a target, &c. And probably this is the origin of the present application, in spite of the circumstance that the word is sometimes found in the form arundel. In this form the word also seems to have been employed for the conical hand-guard on a lance, as we learn from Bhate's great Port. Dictionary: "Arundela, or Arandella, is a guard for the right hand, in the form of a funnel. It is fixed to the thick part of the lance or mace borne by men at arms. The Licentiate Covarrubias, who piques himself on finding etymologies for every kind of word, derives Arandella from Arundel, a city (so he says) of the Kingdom of England." Covarruvias (1611) gives the above explanation; adding that it also was applied to a kind of smooth collar worn by women, from its resemblance to the other thing. Unless historical proof of this last etymology can be traced, we should suppose that Arundel is even, in this sense, probably a corruption of roundel. [The N.E.D. gives arundell, arundell as forms of hirundelle, 'a swallow.'] 1673.—"Lusty Fellow running by his Sides with Arundels (which are broad Umbrelloes held over their Heads)."—Fryer, 30.

1676.—"Proposals to the Agent, &c., about the young men in Metchilipatam. "General. I.—Whereas each hath his peon and some more with their Rondells, that none be permitted but as at the Fort.”

1677-78. — “... That except by the Members of this Council, those that have formerly been in that quality, Cheefes of Factories, Commanders of Ships out of England, and the Chaplains, Rundells shall not be borne by any Men in this Towne, and by no Woman below the Degree of Factors' Wives and Ensigns' Wives, except by such as the Governor shall permit.”

1680. — “To Verona (the Company's Chief Merchant) his adopted son was given the name of Madoc Verona, and a Rundell to be carried over him, in respect to the memory of Verona, eleven cannon being fired, that the Company and Country might take notice of the honour done them.”

1716. — “All such as serve under the Honourable Company and the English Inhabitants, deserted their Employ: such as Cooks, Water bearers, Coolies, Palankeeinboys, Roundel men...”
—In Wheeler, ii. 290.

1726. — “Whenever the magistrates go on a journey they go not without a considerable train, being attended by their pipers, horn-blowers, and Rondel bearers, who keep them from the Sun with a Roundel (which is a kind of little round sun-shade).”
—Delaun. Chon. 54.

... “Their Priests go like the rest clothed in yellow, but with the right arm and breast remaining uncovered. They also carry a roundel, or parasol, of a Tallipot tree...”
—Ind. v. (Ceylon), 408.

1754. — “Some years before our arrival in the Country, they (the E. I. Co.) found such sumptuary laws so absolutely necessary, that they gave the strictest orders that none of these young gentlemen should be allowed even to hire a Roundel-boy, whose business it is to walk by his master, and defend him with his Roundel or Umbrella from the heat of the sun. A young fellow of honour, upon this last order coming over, altered the form of his Umbrella from a round to a square, called it a Squire-1 instead of a Roundel, and insisted that no order yet in force forbade him the use of it.”
—Ives, 21.

1785. — “He (Clive) enforced the Sumptuary laws by severe penalties, and gave the strictest orders that none of these young gentlemen should be allowed even to have a roundel-boy, whose business it is to walk by his master, and defend him with his roundel or umbrella from the heat of the sun.”
—Carroll, i. 253. This ignoble writer has evidently copied from Ives, and applied the passage (untruly, no doubt) to Clive.

ROWANAH. s. Hind. from Pers. rowanah, from ravan, ‘going.' A pass or permit.

[1784.—... that the English shall carry on their trade... free from all duties... excepting the article of salt... on which a duty is to be levied on the Rowana or Houghly market-price...” —Letter from Court, in Verlet, View of Bengal, App. 127.]

ROWCE. s. Hind. ravan, rota, rauwa. A Himalayan tree which supplies excellent straight and strong alpenstocks and walking-sticks, Cotoneaster bacillaris, Wall., also C. acuminata (N.O. Rosaceae). [See Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 581.]

1754.—“We descended into the Khud, and I was amusing myself jumping from rock to rock, and thus passing up the centre of the braewing mountain stream, aided by my long pole [pole of rauwa wood].”
—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 241; (also i. 112).

ROWNEE, s.

a. A fausse-braye, i.e. a subsidiary encircling surrounding a fortified place on the outside of the proper wall and on the edge of the ditch; Hind. rauwa. The word is not in Shakespeare, Wilson, Platts or Fallon. But it occurs often in the narratives of Anglo-Indian siege operations. The origin of the word is obscure. [Mr. Irvine suggests Hind. rondhund, ‘to enclose as with a hedge,' and says: “Fallon evidently knew nothing of the word rauwa, for in his E. H. Dict. he translates fausse-braye by dîhus, mâtî kâ pûshâth; which also shows that he had no definite idea of what a fausse-braye was, dîhus meaning simply an earthen or mud fort.” Dr. Grierson suggests Hind. ramunia, ‘a park,’ of which the fem., i.e. diminutive, would be ramunia or rônia; or possibly the word may come from Hind. rîr, Skt. râma, ‘sand,’ meaning “an encirclement of sand.”]

1799. —“On the 20th I ordered a mine to be carried under (the galleys) because the guns could not bear on the rownee.”
—Jas. Skinner's M.t. Memoirs, i. 172. J. B. Fraser, the editor of Skinner, parenthetically interprets rownee here as “counter-scarp,” but that is nonsense, as well as incorrect.

[1803.—Writing of Hathras. “Renny wall, with a deep, broad, dry ditch behind it—surrounds the fort...” Thack, Mem. of the War in India, p. 490.]

1805. —In a work by Major L. F. Smith (Sketch of the Rose, dec. of the Regular Corps in the Service of the Native Princes of India) we find a plan of the attack of Aligarh, in which is marked “Lower Fort or Renny, well supplied with grape,” and again, “Lower Fort, Renny or Faussebrayre.” ROWTEE. 772

ROBBEE.

ROZYE, s. Hind. razi and raji; a coverlet quilted with cotton. The etymology is very obscure. It is spelt in Hind, with the Ar. letter wazıl; and F. Johnson gives a Persian word so spelt as meaning ‘a cover for the head in winter.’ The kindred meaning of mirzai is apt to suggest a connection between the two, but this may be accidental, or the latter word fictitious. We can see no likelihood in Shakespeare’s suggestion that it is a corruption of an alleged Skt. rajīka, ‘cloth.’ [Platts gives the same explanation, adding “probably through Pers. *ražī∗, from *ražūdān, ‘to dye.’”] The most probable suggestion perhaps is that razi was a word taken from the name of some person called Raja, who may have invented some variety of the article; as in the case of Spencer, Wellingtons, &c. A somewhat obscure quotation from the Pers. Diet. called Bahār-i-Ajam, extracted by Yüllers (s.v.), seems to corroborate the suggestion of a personal origin of the word.

ROY, s. A common mode of writing the title rā́ (see RAJA); which sometimes occurs also as a family name, as in that of the famous Hind. Theist Rammohun Roy.

ROZAI, s. Ar. rauza, Hind. ravza. Properly a garden; among the Arabs especially the ravza of the great mosque at Medina. In India it is applied to such mausolea as the Taj (generally called by the natives the Taj-ravza); and the mausoleum built by Aurungzeb near Aurungabad.

1813.—“... the rozai [spelt rozai], a name for the mausoleum, but implying something sanctified.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 41; [2nd ed. ii. 413].
RUBLE. 773  RUM-JOHNNY.

[1866.—"It was in the month of November, when, if the rains closed early, irrigation is resorted to for producing the young rubbee crops."—Confessions of an Orderly, 179.]

RUBLE, s. Russ. The silver unit of Russian currency, when a coin (not paper) equivalent to 3s. 1d.; [in 1901 about 2s. 1d.]. It was originally a silver ingot; see first quotation and note below.

1559.—"Vix centum annos vtntur moneta argenta, praesertim apud illos causa. Initio eum argentum in provinciam inferebatur, fundebatur portuinculae oblongae argenteae, sine imagine et scriptura, aestimatione vnius rubli, quorum nulla nunc appareat." Herberstein, in Ruman Mascord, Actors, Franc. 1609, p. 42.

1591.—"This penalty or mullet is 20 dinoco (see TANGA) or pence upon every rubble or mark, and so ten in the hundred.

... Hee (the Emperor) hath besides for every name contained in the wards that pay out of their courts, five alten, an alten 5 pence sterling or thereabouts."—Treatise of the Russian Commonwealth, by Dr. Giles Fletcher, Hak. Soc. 31.

e. "1554-6, — "Dog dollars they (the Russians) are not acquainted with, these being attended with loss;... their own dinoco they call Rubbles."—Maoveres, E.T. by Balfour, i. 250.

RUFFUGUR, s. P.—H. rafiajar, Pers. rafta, 'darning.' The modern rafiajar in Indian cities is a workman who repairs rents and holes in Kashmir shawls and other woollen fabrics. Such workmen were regularly employed in the cloth factories of the E.I. Co., to examine the manufactured cloths and remove petty defects in the weaving.

1750.—"On inspecting the Dacca goods, we found the Secretaries (see PIECE-GOODS) very much frayed and very badly raff-rudded or joined."—Bengal Letter to E.I. Co., Feb. 29, India Office MSS.

These incepts were called saum. Ibn Batuta says: "At one day's journey from Usak are thistles of the Rax, who are Christians; they have red hair and blue eyes, they are ugly in feature and crafty in character. They have silver mants, and they bring to their country's army, i.e. in one of silver, with which they buy and sell in that country. The weight of each incept is five ounces."—Il. 414. Pegolotti (1294), speaking of the landscape to Cateray, says that on arriving at Cassid (i.e. Kinnay of Marco Polo or Hanschaufn) "you can dispose of the somni of silver that you have with you... and you may reckon the somni of golden flours."

"It would appear from Wadd, quoted by Hammer (Geschichte der Goldnen Hede, 224), that gold ingots also were called saum or sa'm, the rube is still called rie in Turkestan.

RUM. s. This is not an Indian word. The etymology is given by Wedgwood as from a slang word of the 16th century, rume for 'good'; rume-bottle, 'good drink'; and so, rum. The English word has always with us a note of vulgarity, but we may note here that Gorrissio in his Italian version of the Ramayana, whilst describing the Palace of Ravana, is bold enough to speak of it being pervaded by "an odoriferous breeze, perfumed with sandalwood, and bdellium, with rum and with sirop" (iii. 292). "Mr. N. Darnell Davis has put forth a derivation of the word rum, which gives the only probable history of it. It came from Barbados, where the planters first distilled it, somewhere between 1640 and 1645. A MS. 'Description of Barbados,' in Trinity College, Dublin, written about 1651, says: 'The chief distilling they make in the Island is Rambullion, alias Kill-Divil, and this is made of sugar-canes distilled, a hot, hellish, and terrible liquor.' G. Warren's Description of Surinam, 1661, shows the word in its present short term; 'Rum is a spirit extracted from the juice of sugar-canes... called Kill-Divil in New England.' 'Rambullion' is a Devonshire word, meaning 'a great tumult,' and may have been adopted from some of the Devonshire settlers in Barbados; at any rate, little doubt can exist that it has given rise to our word rum, and the longer name rumbowling, which sailors give to their grog."—Academy, Sept. 5, 1885.

RUM-JOHNNY, s. Two distinct meanings are ascribed to this vulgar word, both, we believe, obsolete.

a. It was applied, according to Williamson, (T.M., i. 167) to a low class of native servants who plied on the wharves of Calcutta in order to obtain employment from new-comers. That author explains it as a corruption of Romutich, which he alleges to be one of the commonest of Mahometan names. [The Mery-jhony Gully, of Calcutta (Carey, Good Old Days, )

139) perhaps in the same way derived its name from one Mir Jân.]

1810.—"Generally speaking, the present bawians, who attack themselves to the captains of European ships, may without the least hazard of controversy, be considered as nothing more or less than Rum-johnies of a larger growth."—Williamson, V. M., i. 191.

b. Among soldiers and sailors, 'a prostitute;' from Hind. rāmānī, Skt. rāmā-janī, 'a pleasing woman,' 'a dancing-girl.'

[1789.—"... and the Ramjennis (Hindu dancing women) have been all day dancing and singing before the idol."—Colebrooke, in Life, 156.]

1814.—"I lived near four years within a few miles of the solemn groves where those voluptuous devotees pass their lives with the ramjannies or dancing-girls attached to the temples; in a sort of luxurious superstition and sanctioned indolence unknown in colder climates."—Forbes, Or. Rec. iii. 6; 2nd ed. ii. 127.

[1816.—"But we must except that class of females called ravijanes, or dancing-girls, who are attached to the temples."—Asiatic Journal, ii. 375, quoting Watten, Tour to Madras and Ceylon.]

RUMNA. s. Hind. rūmānā, Skt. rūmāṇā, 'causing pleasure,' a chase, or reserved hunting-ground.

1769.—"Abdal Chab Cawn murdered at the Rumna in the month of March, 1769, by some of the Heracars..."—Van Swart, i. 63.

1792.—"The Peshwa having invited me to a novel spectacle at his rumna (read runna), or park, about four miles from Peshwa, says Sir C. Maitl, in Forbes, Or. Rec. ii. ii. 89. (See also verses quoted under PAWNEE.)

RUNN (OF CUTCH), n.p. Hind. rūn. This name, applied to the singular extent of sand-flat and salt-ward, often covered by high tides, or by land-flooding, which extends between the Peninsula of Cutch and the mainland, is a corruption of the Skt. śṛṃga or śrīṇa, 'a salt-swamp, a desert,' [or of acarāṇa, 'a wilderness']. The Runn is first mentioned in the Periplus, in which a true indication is given of this tract and its dangers.

c. A.D. 80-90.—"But after passing the Sinthus R. there is another gulph running to the north, not easily seen, which is called Irōn, and is distinguished into the Great and the Little. And there is an expanse of shallow water on both sides, and swift continnal eddies extending far from the land."—Periplus, § 40.

c. 1379.—"The guides had maliciously misled them into a place called the Künkhiran. In this place all the land is impregnated with salt, to a degree impossible to describe."—Shama-i-Siraj-Arif, in Elliot, iii. 324.

1583.—"Muzafer fled, and crossed the Ran, which is an inlet of the sea, and took the road to Jessualur. In some places the breadth of the water of the Ran is 10 kos and 29 kos. He went into the country which they call Kach, on the other side of the water."—Tambat-i-Akbār, Ind. v. 440.

c. 1590.—"Between Chalwan, Sircar Ahmedabad, Patton, and Surat, is a low tract of country, 90 cose in length, and in breadth from 7 to 30 cose, which is called Run. Before the commencement of the periodical rains, the sea swells and inundates this spot, and leaves by degrees after the rainy season."—Ayern, ed. Gladerin, 1800, ii. 71; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 219].

1819.—"On the morning of the 24th I embarked and landed about 6 p.m. in the Runn of Sindh.

"... a boggy syrtis, neither sea Nor good dry land...

RUPEE. s. Hind. rūpia, from Skt. rūpya, 'worth silver.' The standard coin of the Anglo-Indian monetary system, as it was of the Mahommedan Empire that preceded ours. It is commonly stated (as by Wilson, in his article on this word, which contains much valuable and condensed information) that the rupee was introduced by Sher Shah in (1542). And this is no doubt, formally true; but it is certain that a coin substantially identical with the rupee, i.e. approximating to a standard of 100 ratis (or 175 grains troy) of silver, an ancient Hindu standard, had been struck by the Mahommedan sovereigns of Delhi in the 13th and 14th centuries, and had formed an important part of their currency. In fact, the capital coins of Delhi, from the time of Ilyatminish (A.D. 1211-1236) to the accession of Mahommed Tughlak (1325) were gold and silver pieces, respectively of the weight just mentioned. We gather from the statements of Ibn Batuta and his contemporaries that the gold coin, which the former generally calls tanga and sometimes gold dinar, was worth 10 of the silver coin, which he calls dinar, thus indicating that the relation of gold to silver value was, or had recently been, as 10:1. Mahommed Tughlak remodelled the currency, issuing gold pieces of 200 grs. and silver pieces of 140 grs.—an indication probably of a great "depreciation of gold" (to use our modern language) consequent on the enormous amount of gold bullion obtained from the plunder of Western and Southern India. Some years later (1330) Mahommed developed his notable scheme of a forced currency, consisting entirely of copper tokens. This threw everything into confusion, and it was not till six years later that any sustained issues of ordinary coin were recommenced. From about this time the old standard of 175 grs. was readopted for gold, and was maintained till the time of Sher Shah. But it does not appear that the old standard was then resumed for silver. In the reign of Mahommed's successor Feroz Shah, Mr. E. Thomas's examples show the gold coin of 175 grs. standard running parallel with continued issues of a silver (or professedly silver) coin of 140 grs.; and this, speaking briefly, continued to be the case to the end of the Lodis dynasty (i.e. 1526). The coinage seems to have sunk into a state of great irregularity, not remedied by Baber (who struck ashrufs (see ASHR-RAFEE) and dirhams, such as were used in Turkestan) or Humayun, but the reform of which was undertaken by Sher Shah, as above mentioned.

His silver coin of 175-178 grs. was that which popularly obtained the name of rápiqa, which has continued to our day. The weight, indeed, of the coins so styled, never very accurate in native times, varied in different States, and the purity varied still more. The former never went very far on either side of 170 grs., but the quantity of pure silver contained in it sunk in some cases as low as 140 grs., and even, in exceptional cases, to 100 grs. Variation however was not confined to native States. Rupees were struck in Bombay at a very early date of the British occupation. Of these there are four specimens in the Br. Mus. The first bears ovr. 'THE RUPEE OF BOMBAY. 1677. BY AUTHORITY OF CHARLES THE SECOND: OR, KING OF GREAT BRITAIN, FRANCE, AND IRELAND.' Wt. 167-8 gr. The fourth bears ovr. 'HON. SOCI. ANG. IND., or' with a shield; rev. 'A. DEO. PAX. ET. INCREMENTUM.—MON. BOMBAY. ANGLIC. REGIM.' A2 7°. Weight 177-8 gr. Different Rupees minted by the British Government were current in the three Presidencies, and in the Bengal Presidency several were current; viz. the Sikka (see SICCA) Rupee, which latterly weighed 192 grs. and contained 176 grs. of pure silver; the Farrukhabad, which latterly weighed 180 grs.,* containing 165-215 of pure silver; the Benares Rupee (up to 1819), which weighed 174-76 grs., and contained 168-88 of pure silver. Besides these there was the Chalana or "current" rupee of account, in which the Company's accounts were kept, of which 116 were equal to 100 sikkas. ["The bhati or Company's Aroc rupee was coined at Calcutta, and was in value 3½ per cent. less than the Sikka rupee." (Beveridge, Bukharyang. 99.)]

The Bombay Rupee was adopted from that of Surat, and from 1800 its weight was 178-52 grs.; its pure silver 164-94. The Rupee at Madras—where however the standard currency was of an entirely different character, see PAGODA—was originally that of the Nawáb of the Carnatic (or 'Nabob of Arcot') and was usually known as the Arcot Rupee. We find its issues varying from 171 to 177 grs. in weight, and from 160 to 170 of pure silver; whilst in 1811 there took place an abnormal coinage, from Spanish dollars, of rupees with a weight of 188 grs. and 168-290 of pure silver.

Also from some reason or other, perhaps from commerce between those places and the 'Coast,' the Chittagong and Dacca currency (i.e. in the extreme east of Bengal) "formerly consisted of Arcot rupees; and they were for some time coined expressly for those districts at the Calcutta and

* The term Sonant rupees, which was of frequent occurrence down to the reformation and unification of the Indian coinage in 1835, is one very difficult to elucidate. The word is properly sonant, pl. of An sonant), a year. According to the old practice in Bengal, this denoted in value, in comparison with the rupee of account, when they passed the third year of their currency, and these rupees were termed sonant or sonant. But in 1775, to put a stop to this inconvenience, Government determined that all rupees coined in future should bear the impression of the 1sth or year of Sháh Âlam (the Mogul then reigning.) And in all later uses of the term Sonant it appears to be equivalent: in value to the Farrukhabad rupee, or the modern 'Company's Rupee' (which was of the same standard).
Dacca Mints." (Prinsep, Useful Tables, ed. by E. Thomas, 24.)

These examples will give some idea of the confusion that prevailed (without any reference to the vast variety besides of native coinsages), but the subject is far too complex to be dealt with minutely in the space we can afford to it in such a work as this. The first step to reform and assimilation took place under Regulation VII. of 1833, but this still maintained the exceptional Sicca in Bengal, though assimilating the rupees over the rest of India. The Sicca was abolished as a coin by Act XIII. of 1836; and the universal rupee of British territory has since been the "Company's Rupee," as it was long called, of 180 grs. weight and 165 pure silver, representing therefore in fact the Farinikhatbal Rupee.

1619.—"This armie consisted of 100,000 horse at the least, with infinite number of Camels and Elephants: so that with the whole baggage there could not bee lesse than five or sixe hundred thousand persons, insomuch that the waters were not sufficient for them: a Mussocke (see MUS-SUCK) of water being sold for a Rupia, and yet not enough to be had."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 127.

c. 1666.—"And for a Roupy (in Bengal) which is about half a Crown, you may have 20 good Pullets and more; Gees and Ducks, in proportion."—Berner, E.T. p. 140; [ed. Constable, 498].

1673.—"The other was a Goldsmith, who had coined copper Rupees."—Fryer, 97.

1677.—"We do, by these Presents . . . give and grant unto the said Governor and Company . . . full and free Liberty, Power, and Authority . . . to stamp and coin . . . Monies, to be called and known by the Name or Names of Rupees, Pices, and Budgrooks, or by such other Name or Names . . ."—Letters Patent of Charles II. In Charters of the E.I. Co., p. 111.

1771.—"We fear the worst however: that is, that the Government are about to interfere with the Company in the management of Affairs in India. Whenever that happens it will be high Time for us to decamp. I know the Tempter of the King's Officers pretty well, and however they may decry our mode of acting they are really enough to grasp at the Rupees whenever they fall within their Reach."—MS. Letter of James Rennell, March 31.

RUSSUD, s. Pers. rasad. The provisions of grain, forage, and other necessaries got ready by the local officers at the camping ground of a military force or official cortège. The vernacular word has some other technical meanings (see Wilson), but this is its meaning in an Anglo-Indian mouth.

[c. 1610-50.—Rasad. (See under TANA.)]

RUT, s. Hind, rath, 'a chariot.' Now applied to a native carriage drawn by a pony, or oxen, and used by women on a journey. Also applied to the car in which idols are carried forth on festival days. [See BOOK.]

1810-17.—"Tippoo's Aumul . . . wanted iron, and determined to supply himself from the rut, (a temple of carved wood fixed on wheels, drawn in procession on public occasions, and requiring many thousand persons to effect its movement)."—Wilk, Sketches, Madras reprint, ii. 291.

1813.—"In this camp hackeries and ruths, as they are called when they have four wheels, are always drawn by bulkoks, and are used, almost exclusively, by the Baxers, the Nax girls, and the bankers."—Broughton, Letters, ed. 1892, p. 117.

1829.—"This being the case I took the liberty of taking the rut and horse to camp as prize property."—Mem. of John Shipp, ii. 183.

RUTTEE, RETTEE. s. Hind. ratti, rat, Skt. rakthaka, from rakta, 'red.' The seed of a leguminous creeper (Abrus precatorius, L.) sometimes called country liquorice—a pretty scarlet pea with a black spot—used from time immemorial in India as a goldsmith's weight, and known in England as 'Crab's eyes.' Mr. Thomas has shown that the ancient ratti may be taken as equal to 175 grs. Troy (Numismata Orientalia, New ed., Pt. I. pp. 12-14). This work of Mr. Thomas contains interesting information regarding the old Indian custom of using standard weights upon the weight of seeds, and we borrow from his paper the following extract from Manu (viii. 132): "The very small mote which may be discerned in a sunbeam passing through a lattice is the first of quantities, and men call it a tvaseyana. 133. Eight of these tvaseyanas are supposed equal in weight to one minute poppy-seed (likhπi), three of those seeds are equal to one black mustard-seed (ruja-sarsapar), and three of these last to a white mustard-seed (gaura-sarsapar). 134. Six white mustard-seeds are equal to a middle-sized barley-corn (puru), three such barley-corns to one krishna (or raktika), five krishnas of gold are one masha, and sixteen such masha's one sunvarna," &c. (ibid. p. 13). In the Atá, Abdul Fazl calls the ratti surkh, which is a translation (Pers. for 'red'). In Persia the seed is called chashii-khruras, 'Cock's eye' (see Blochmann's E. T. ii. 16 n., and Jorret, ii. 354). Further notices of the rati used as a weight for precious stones will be found in Sir W. Elliot's Coins of Madras (p. 49). Sir Walter's experience is that the rati of the gem-dealers is a double rati, and an approximation to the manjadi (see MANGELIN). This accounts for Tavernier's valuation at 3½ grs. [Mr. Ball gives the weight at 2½ Troy grs. (Tavernier, ii. 448).] c. 1576. "At the mine of Sowndapour in Bengal, they weigh by Ratís, and the Rati is seven eighths of a Carat, or three grains and a half."—Tavernier, E. T. ii. 140; [ed. Ball, ii. 90].

RYOT. s. Ar. raiya, from roli, 'to pasture,' meaning originally, according to its etymology, 'a herd at pasture'; but then 'subjects' (collectively). It is by natives used for 'a subject' in India, but its specific Anglo-Indian application is to 'a tenant of the soil': an individual occupying land as a farmer or cultivator. In Turkey the word, in the form raiya, is applied to the Christian subjects of the Porte, who are not liable to the conscription, but pay a poll-tax in lieu, the Kharîj, or Jizya (see JEZYA).

[1609.—"Riats or clansmen." (See under DOAL.)]

1776. —"For some period after the creation of the world there was neither Magistrate nor Punishment . . . and the Ryots were nourished with perty and morality."—Halket, Gesta Cias., ii.

1759. "To him in a body the Ryots complain'd That their houses were burnt, and their cattle distrain'd." The Letters of Simpkin the Second, &c. 11. 1730.—"A raiyot is rather a farmer than a husbandman."—Calibrick, in Life, iv.

1506.—"The ryots were all at work in their fields."—Lord Valentia, ii. 127.

1513. —'And oft around the cavern fire On visionary schemes debate. To snatch the Rayahs from their fate." Baron, Bride of Abdyats.

1520.—"An acquaintance with the customs of the inhabitants, but particularly of the rayets, the various tenures . . . the agreements usual among them regarding cultivation, and between them and owners—see SOWCAR, respecting lands and advances . . . is essential to a judge."—T. Mora, in Life, ii. 17.

1570.—"Ryot a word which is much . . . misused. It is Arabic, but no rivulet comes through the Persian. It means 'protected one,' or 'innocent,' and distinguished from 'Raca,' or 'noble.' In a native mouth, to the present day, it is used in this sense, and not in this of 'tenant.'—Systems of Land Tenure (Golden Club), 166.

The title of a newspaper, in English but of native editing, published for some years back in Calcutta, corresponds to what is here said: it is Rias and Raiyat.

1577.—'The great financial distinction between the followers of Islam . . . and the rayahs or inferior subjects of the Sultan was the payment of kharîj or capitation tax."—Finlay, H. of Greece, v. 22 ed. 1577.

1584.—'Using the rights of conquest after the fashion of the Normans in England, the Turks had everywhere ascended the Caledon, and seized on the greater part of the most fertile lands. Hence they formed the landlord class of Greece: whilst the Rayahs, as the Turks style their non-Muslim subjects, usually farmed the territories of their masters on the master-system."—Marlow's Handbook for Greece (by A. F. Yule), p. 54.
SABAIO, ÇABAIO. &c., n.p. The name generally given by the Portuguese writers to the Mahommedan prince who was in possession of Goa when they arrived in India, and who had lived much there. He was in fact that one of the captains of the Bahman kingdom of the Deccan who, in the division that took place on the decay of the dynasty towards the end of the 15th century, became the founder of the Adil Shahi family which reigned in Bijapur from 1489 to the end of the following century (see IDALCAN). His real name was Ahmad Muzaffar Yusuf, with the surname Sabai or Sarai. There does not seem any ground for rejecting the intelligent statement of De Barros (II. v. 2) that he had this name from being a native of Sarai in Persia [see Bombay Gazetteer, xxiii. 404]. Garcia de Orta does not seem to have been aware of this history, and he derives the name from Sâbîh (see below), apparently a mere guess, though not an unnatural one. Mr. Birch's surmise (Alboquerque, ii. 82), with these two old and obvious sources of suggestion before him, that "the word may possibly be connected with sipâhi, Arabic, a soldier," is quite inadmissible (nor is sipâhi Arabic). On this word Mr. Whiteway writes: "In his explanation of this word Sir H. Yule has been misled by Barros. Conto (Dec. iv. Bk. 10 ch. 4) is conclusive, where he says: 'This Çufi extended the limits of his rule as far as he could till he went in person to conquer the island of Goa, which was a valuable possession for its income, and was in possession of a lord of Canara, called Savay, a vassal of the King of Canara, who then had his headquarters at what we call Old Goa. . . . As there was much jungle here, Savay, the lord of Goa, had certain houses where he stayed for hunting. . . . These houses still preserve the memory of the Hindu Savay, as they are called the Savayo's house, where for many years the Governors of India lived. As our Joao de Barros could not get true information of these things, he confounded the name of the Hindu Savay with that of Çufo (? Yûsuf) Adil Shâh, saying in the 5th Book of his 2nd Decade that when we went to India a Moor called Soay was lord of Goa, that we ordinarily called him Sabayo, and that he was a vassal of the King of the Deccan, a Persian, and native of the city of Savay. At this his sons laughed heartily when we read it to them, saying that their father was anything but a Turk, and his name anything but Çufi. This passage makes it clear that the origin of the word is the Hindu title Sîvâi, Hind. Sâvâi, 'having the excess of a fourth,' 'a quarter better than other people,' which is one of the titles of the Maharaja of Jaypur. To show that it was more or less well known, I may point to the little State of Sunda, which lay close to Goa on the S.E., of which the Raja was of the Vijayanagar family. This little State became independent after the destruction of Vijayanagar, and remained in existence till absorbed by Tippoo Sultan. In this State Sîvâi was a common honorific of the ruling family. At the same time Barros was not alone in calling Adil Shâh the Sabaio (see Alboquerque, Cartas, p. 24), where the name occurs. The mistake having been made, everyone accepted it."
There is a story, related as unquestionable by Firishta, that the Sabaio was in reality a son of the Turkish Sultan Ağa Murād (or ‘Amurath’) II., who was saved from murder at his father’s death, and placed in the hands of Inād-ūd-dīn, a Persian merchant of Sāvā, by whom he was brought up. In his youth he sought his fortune in India, and being sold as a slave, and going through a succession of adventures, reached his high position in the Deccan (Briggs, Firishta, iii. 7-8).

1510.—“But when Afonso Dalboquerque took Goa, it would be about 40 years more or less since the Sabaio had taken it from the Hindus.”—Dalboquerque, ii. 98.

“During this island (Goa called Goa) there is a fortress near the sea, walled round after our manner, in which there is sometimes a captain called Sāvaiu, who has 400 Mamelukes, he himself being also a Mameluke...”—Vartëma, 116.

1516.—“Going further along the coast there is a very beautiful river, which sends two arms into the sea, making between them an island, on which stands the city of Goa belonging to Deccan (Deccan), and it was a principality of itself with other districts adjoining in the interior: and in it there was a great lord, as vassal of the said King (of Deccan) called Sabaio, who being a good soldier, well mannered and experienced in war, this lordship of Goa was bestowed upon him, that he might continually make war on the King of Narsinga, as he did until his death. And then he left this city to his son Ĉabaym Hydulcan.”...—Barroso, Lisbon ed. 287.

1563.—“... And returning to our subject, as Adel in Persian means ‘justice,’ they called the prince of these territories Adel-Ermon, as it were ‘Lord of Justice.’

“B. A name highly inappropriate, for neither he nor the rest of them are wont to do justice. But tell me also why in Spain they call him the Sabaio?

“0. Some have told me that he was so called because they used to call a Captain by this name: but I afterwards came to know that in fact saibō in Arabic means ‘lord.’...”—Garcia, t. 93.

SAFLEAR. SAFRAS, SADRSAPATAM, n.p. This name of a place 42 m. south of Madras, the seat of an old Dutch factory, was probably shaped into the usual form in a sort of conformity with Madras or Madraspatam. The correct name is Sadrāi, but it is sometimes made into Sadrang- and Shatrang-patam. [The Madras Gloss. gives Tam. Sathārāngapattanam, Skt. chatur-anga, ‘the four military arms, infantry, cavalry, elephants and cars.’] Fryer (p. 28) calls it Sadrangapattam, which is probably a misprint for Sandraslapatam.

1672.—“From Tirepoplier you come... to Sadragespatam, where our people have a Factory.”—Baldwes, 152.

1726.—“The name of the place is properly Sadrangapatam; but for short it is also called Sadrapatam, and most commonly Sadrapsatam. In the Tellinna it indicates the name of the founder, and in Persian it means ‘thousand troubles’ or the Shabo-board which we call chess.”—Varthema, Choromandel, 11. The curious explanation of Shatrang or ‘chess,’ as ‘a thousand troubles,’ is no doubt some popular etymology; such as P. sād-ra’u, ‘a hundred griefs.’ The word is really of Sanskrit origin, from sātra-ang, literally, ‘quadrilateral;’ the four constituent parts of an army, viz. horse, foot, chariots and elephants.

[1727.—“Saderass or Saderass Patam.” (See under LONG-CLOTH.)

e. 1759.—“J’avois pensé que Sadras au-roid cê le lieu où devroit mîr mes con- trariétés et mes courses.”—Hauter, t. 141.

... Non, je ne suis point Anglais, m’entraîne-je avec indignation et transport; ‘je suis un Hollandais de Sadrangapatam.’”—Ibid., 191.

1781.—“The chief officer of the French now despatched a summons to the English commandant of the Fort to surrender, and the commandant, not being of opinion he could resist... evacuated the fort, and proceeded by sea in boats to Sudrung Puttan.”—II. of Hyder Nāâl, 447.

SAFLEAR. s. The flowers of the annual Cubanthurus tinctorius, L. (N.O. Composita), a considerable article of export from India for use of a red dye, and sometimes, from the resemblance of the dried flowers to saffron, termed ‘bastard saffron.’ The colouring matter of safflower is the basis of rouge. The name is a curious modification of words by the ‘striving after meaning.’ For it points, in the first half of the name, to the analogy with saffron, and in the second half, to the object of trade being a flower. But neither one nor the other of these meanings forms any real element in the word. Safflower appears to be an eventual corruption of the Arabic name of the thing, 经济技术. This word we find in medieval trade-lists (e.g. in Pegolotti) to take various forms such as asfōre, asfōle, asfōre, zafrōle, stīffore; from the last of which the transition to stīflower is natural. In the old Latin translation of Avicenna, it seems to be called Crocus hortulanus, for the corresponding Arabic is given husfor. Another Arabic name for this article is kurkum, which we presume to be the origin of the botanist’s curcumans. In Hind. it is called kusanambha or kusum. Bretschneider remarks that though the two plants, saffron and safflower, have not the slightest resemblance, and belong to two different families and classes of the nat. system, there has been a certain confusion between them among almost all nations, including the Chinese.

c. 1200—“Usfur . . . Abu Hanifa. This plant yields a colouring matter, used in dyeing. There are two kinds, cultivated and wild, both of which grow in Arabia, and the seeds of which are called al-kurkum.”—Ibn Batthur, ii. 196.

c. 1318—“Affoire vuol esser fresco, e ascuito, e colorito rosso in colore di buon zafferano, e non giallo, e chiaro a modo di fermentatione di zafferano, e che non sia trasanduto, che quando è vecchio e trasandato si spevolvere, e fae vermini.”—Pegolotti, 372.

1612—“The two Indian ships aforesaid did discharge these goods following . . . osfar, which is a red dye, great quantity.”—Capt. Sarah, in Purchas, i. 317.

1812—“Le safran làtard ou carthane, nommé dans le commerce safranion, est appelé par les Arabes . . . osfour ou . . . Kortum. Suivant M. Sonnini, le premier nom désigne la plante; et le second, ses graines.”—Site, de Sayy, Note on Abdallatif, p. 123.

1813—“Safflower (Cassow, Hind., As-four Arab.) is the flower of an annual plant, the Carthamus lortarius, growing in Bengal and other parts of India, which when well-cured is not easily distinguishable from saffron by the eye, though it has nothing of its smell or taste.”—Milburn, ii. 238.

SAFFRON, s. Arab. zafjarin. The true saffron (Crocus sativus, L.) in India is cultivated in Kashmir only. In South India this name is given to turmeric, which the Portuguese called acafrua do terra (‘country saffron’). The Hind. name is haldi, or in the Deccan balad. [Skt. hārira, harī, ‘green, yellow’]. Garcia de Orta calls it croco Indico, ‘Indian saffron’. Indeed, Dousy shows that the Arab. kurkum for turmeric (whence the bot. Lat. crocus) is probably taken from the Greek κρόκος or old. κρόκος. Moodeen Sherif says that kurkum is applied to saffron in many Persian and other writers.

c. 1200.—“The Persians call this root al-hard, and the inhabitants of Basra call it al-kurkum, and al-kurkum is Saffron. They call these plants Saffron because they dye yellow in the same way as Saffron does.”—Ibn Batthur, ii. 370.

1583.—“R. Since there is nothing else to be said on this subject, let us speak of what we call ‘country saffron.’

“O. This is a medicine that should be spoken of, since it is in use by the Indian physicians; it is a medicine and article of trade much exported to Arabia and Persia. In this city (Goa) there is little of it, but much in Malabar, i.e. in Cananor and Calecut. The Canarins call the root alad; and the Malabars sometimes give it the same name, but more properly call it manjute, and the Malays cuboth; the Persians, carthum, which is as much as to say ‘yellow-wood.’ The Arabs call it habet; and all of them, each in turn, say that this saffron does not exist in Persia, nor in Arabia, nor in Turkey, except what comes from India.”—Garcia, f. 78r. Further on he identifies it with curcuma.

1728.—“Curcuma, or Indian Saffron.”—Valentijn, Chor. 42.

SAGAR-PESHA, s. Camp-followers, or the body of servants in a private establishment. The word, though usually pronounced in vulgar Hind. as written above, is Pers. shaqi-rd-pesha (lit. shaqi-rd, ‘a disciple, a servant,’ and pesha, ‘business’).

[1767.—“Saggar Depesah-pay. . . .”—In Long, 513.]

SAGO, s. From Malay sāgū, the farinaceous pith taken out of the stem of several species of a particular genus of palm, especially Metroxylon tree, Mart., and M. Rumphii, Willd., found in every part of the Indian Archipelago, including the Philippines, wherever there is proper soil. They are most abundant in the eastern part of the region indicated, including the Moluccas and &. Guinea, which probably formed the original habitat; and in these they supply the sole bread of the natives. In the remaining parts of the Archipelago, sago is the food only of certain wild tribes, or consumed (as in Mindanao) by the poor only, or prepared (as at Singapore, &c.) for export. There are supposed to be five species producing the article.

1298.—“They have a kind of trees that produce flour, and excellent flour it is for food. These trees are very tall and thick, but have a very thin bark, and inside the bark they are crammed with flour."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. xi.

1330.—"But as for the trees which produce flour, tie after this fashion. ... And the result is the best pasta in the world, from which they make whatever they choose, cates of sorts, and excellent bread, of which I, Friar Odorie, have eaten."—Fr. Odoric in Cathay, &c., 32.

1522. — "Their bread (in Tidore) they make of the wood of a certain tree like a palm-tree, and they make it in this way. They take a piece of this wood, and extract from it certain long black thorns which are situated there; then they pound it, and make bread of it which they call sagu. They make provision of this bread for their sea voyages."—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. p. 136. This is a bad description, and seems to refer to the Sagwire, not the true sago-tree.

1132. — "There are also other trees which are called cagus, from the pith of which bread is made."—Castanheda, vi. 24.

1515.—"Generally, although they have some milllet and rice, all the people of the Isles of Malacca eat a certain food which they call Sagurum, which is the pith of a tree like a palm-tree, except that the leaf is softer and smoother, and the green of it is rather dark."—Barros, III. v. 5.

1579.—"... and a Kind of meal which they call Sago, made of the tops of certain trees, tasting in the Mouth like some curds, but melts away like sugar."—Dwight's Village, Hak. Soc. p. 112. Also in a list of "Certaine Words of the Natural Language of Iaua."—Sagu, bread of the Country."—Hokl. iv. 246.

v. 1830.—"Primo Sagus genuina, Malacca Sagur; sive Lower Java, h.e. vera Saga.—Rumphius, i. 75. (We cannot make out the language of lower Java.)

1727.—"And the inland people subsist mostly on Sagow, the Pith of a small Twig split and dried in the Sun."—A. Hamilton, ii. 93 : [ed. 1741].

SAGWIRE, s. A name applied often in books, and, formerly at least, in the colloquial use of European settlers and traders, to the Gomuti palm or Arenga saccharifera, Labill., which abounds in the Ind. Archipelago, and is of great importance in its rural economy. The name is Port. sagueira (analogous to palmira), in Spain, of the Indies sagraun, and no doubt is taken from sagu, as the tree, though not the Sago-palm of commerce, affords a sago of inferior kind. Its most important product, however, is the sap, which is used as toddy (q.v.), and which in former days also afforded almost all the sugar used by natives in the islands. An excellent cordage is made from a substance resembling black horse-hair, which is found between the trunk and the fronds, and this is the gomuti of the Malays, which furnished one of the old specific names (Borassus Gomutus, Loureiro). There is also found in a like position a fine cotton-like substance which makes excellent tinder, and strong stiff spines from which pens are made, as well as arrows for the blow-pipe, or Stumpit (see SARBATANE). "The seeds have been made into a confection, whilst their pulpy envelope abounds in a poisonous juice—used in the barbarian wars of the natives—to which the Dutch gave the appropriate name of "hell-water"."—Crawfurd, Dec. Dict. p. 145. The term sagueira is sometimes applied to the toddy or palm-wine, as will be seen below.

1515.—"They use no sustenance except the meal of certain trees, which trees they call Sagur, and of this they make bread."—Goe, du Empoli. 86.

1615.—"Oryza tamen magna his copia, ingens etiam modus arboreum quas Saguras vocant, quaeque varia sugerunt commoda."—Arret. i. 201.

1784.—"The natives drink much of a liquor called saguere, drawn from the palm-tree."—Forrest, Merqui, 73.

1820.—"The Portuguese, I know not for what reason, and other European nations who have followed them, call the tree and the liquor sagsow."—Crawfurd, Hist. i. 401.

SAHIB, s. The title by which, all over India, European gentlemen, and it may be said Europeans generally, are addressed, and spoken of, when no disrespect is intended, by natives. It is also the general title (at least where Hindustani or Persian is used) which is affixed to the name or office of a European, corresponding thus rather to Monsieur than to Mr. For Colonel Sáhib, Collector Sáhib, Lord Sáhib, and even Sergeant Sáhib are thus used, as well as the general vocative Sáhib! 'Sir!' In other Hind. use the word is equivalent to 'Master'; and it is occasionally used as a specific title both among Hindus and Musalmans, e.g. Appa Sáhib, Típa Sáhib; and generically is affixed to the titles of men of rank when indicated by those titles, as Khān Sāḥīb, Nawāb Sāḥīb, Rājā Sāḥīb. The word is Arabic, and originally means 'a companion'; (sometimes a companion of Mahommed).

[In the Arabian Nights it is the title of a Wazir (Burton, i. 218).]

1673.—"... To which the subtle Heathen replied, Sahāb (i.e. Sir), why will you do more than the Creator meant?"—Fréger, 417.

1689.—"Thus the dastard Husband in his Indian English confest, English fashion, Sahab, best fashion, have one Wife best for one Husband."—Ogilvie, 326.

1853.—"He was told that a 'Sahib' wanted to speak with him."—Ogilvie, ii. 252.

1878.—"... forty Elephants and five Sahibs with guns and innumerable followers."—Life in the Mogul, i. 194.

[ST. DEAVES, n.p. A corruption of the name of the island of Sandwicq in the Bay of Bengal, situated off the coast of Chittagong and Noakhali, which is best known in connection with the awful loss of life and property in the cyclone of 1876.

1888.—"From Chittagam we sailed away the 29th January, after had sent small vessels to search round the Island St. Deaves."—In Yale, Hodges' Diary, Hak. Soc. II. lxxx.]

a. An English sailor's corruption, which for a long time maintained its place in our maps. It is the Sinuqu of the old Arab Geographers, and was the first durable settling-place of the Parsee refugees on their emigration to India in the 8th century. [Docahblai Framji, Hist. of the Parsees, i. 30.]

The proper name of the place, which is in lat. 20' 12' and lies 88 m. north of Bombay, is apparently Sujan (see Hist. of Cambay, in B. Gart. Selections, No. xxvi., N.S., p. 52), but it is commonly called Sanjān, E. B. Eastwick in J. As. Soc. R. i. 167, gives a Translation from the Persian of the "Kisheh-i-Sanjān, or History of the arrival and settlement of the Parsees in India." Sanjān is about 3 m. from the little river-mouth port of Ummargām. "Evidence of the greatness of Sanjān is found, for miles around, in old foundations and bricks. The bricks are of very superior quality."—Bomb. Gazetteer, vol. xiv. 302, [and for medieval references to the place, ibid, i. Pt. i. 262, 520 seq.].

c. 1150.—"Sind their is 1/3 mile from the sea... The town is large and has an extensive commerce both in exports and imports."—Edrisi, in Elliot, i. 85.

c. 1599.—"When the Dastur saw the soil was good, he selected the place for their residence: The Dastur named the spot Sanjān.

And it became populous as the Land of Iran."—Kisseh, &c., as above, p. 179.

c. 1616.—"The aldea Nargol... in the land of Daman was infested by Malabar Moors in their parśa, who commonly landed there for water and provisions, and plundered the boats that entered or quitted the river, and the passengers who crossed it, with heavy loss to the aldeas adjoining the river, and to the revenue from them, as well as to that from the custom-house of Sangens."—Bocarro, Decada, 670.

1623.—"La mattina segnante, fatto giorno, scoprimmo terra di lontano... in un luogo poco discosto da Bassain, che g' Inglesi chiamano Terra di San Giovanni; ma nella carta da navigare vidi esser notato, in lingua Portoghese, nel nome d'Ano d'Ionic 'isole delle vecche' al modo nostro."—P. della Valle, ii. 500; [Hak. Soc. i. 16].

1630.—"It happened that in safety they made to the land of St. Johns on the shores of India."—Lord, The Religion of the Perses, 3.

1644.—"Besides these four posts there are in the said district four Tundeloria (see TANADAR), or different Captainships, called Sanjes (St. John's), Daman, Main, and Trapor."—Bocarro (Port. MS.).

1673.—"In a Week's Time we turned it up, sailing by Bacieen, Taraporo, Valentine's Peak, St. John's, and Daman, the last City northward on the Continent, belonging to the Portuguese."—Fréger, 82.

1808.—"They (the Parsee emigrants) landed at Dian, and lived there 19 years; but, disliking the place, the greater part of them left it and came to the Gujar coast, in vessels which anchored off Sepyjan, the name of a town."—R. Drummond.

1813.—"The Parsees or Guelres... continued in this place (Din) for some time, and then crossing the Gulph, landed at Suzan, near Namasce, which is a little to the southward of Surat."—Forbes, Or. Memo. i. 109; [2nd ed. i. 78].

1841.—"The high land of St. John, about 3 leagues inland, has a regular appearance..."—Horsburgh's Directory, ed. 1841, i. 470.

1872.—"In connexion with the landing of the Parsees at Sanjān, in the early part of the 8th century, there still exist copies of the 15 Sanskrit Skolas, in which their Mobeds explained their religion to Jād Rām, the Raja of the place, and the reply he gave them."—Ind. Antiqu, i, 214. The Skolas are given. See them also in Dacahblai Faramji's Hist. of the Parsees, i. 31.

b. ST. JOHN'S ISLAND, n.p. This again is a corruption of San-SALAK.

Shan, or more correctly Shau-choung, the Chinese name of an island about 60 or 70 miles S.W. of Macao, and at some distance from the mouth of the Canton River, the place where St. Francis Xavier died, and was originally buried.

1687.—"We came to Anchor the same Day, on the N.E. end of St. John's Island. This Island is in Lat. about 32 d. 30 min. North, lying on the S. Coast of the Province of Quantung or Canton in China."—Dumper, i. 498.

1727.—"A Portuguese Ship ... being near an Island on that Coast, called after St. Juan, some Gentlemen and Priests went ashore for Diversion, and accidentally found the Saint's Body uncorrupted, and carried it Passenger to Goa."—A. Hamilton, i. 252: [ed. 1744, ii. 255].

1780.—"St. John's." in Dana's New Directory, 472.

c. ST. JOHN'S ISLANDS. This is also the chart-name, and popular European name, of two islands about 6 m. S. of Singapore, the chief of which is properly Pulo Sibajang, [or as Denny's (Desc. Diet. 321) writes the word, Pulo Seiba].

SAIVA. s. A worshipper of Siva; Skt. Nara, adj.; belonging to Siva.

1653.—"The second sect of the Brahmuns, 'Sevia,' ... by name, say that a certain Eswara is the supreme among the gods, and that all the others are subject to him."—Roperius, 17.

1867.—"This temple is reckoned, I believe, the holiest shrine in India, at least among the Shaivites."—By. Milman, in Memoirs, p. 43.

SALA. s. Hind. sâlã, brother-in-law; i.e. wife's brother; but used elliptically as a low term of abuse.

[1856.—"Another reason for (infanticide) is the blind pride which makes them hate that any man should call them sala, or Susoor—brother-in-law, or father-in-law."—Forbes, Râo Mâbl, ed. 1578, 616.]

1851.—"Another of these popular Paris sayings is 'et la veur!' which is as insulting a remark to a Parisian as the apparently harmless remark sâllã, 'brother-in-law,' is to a Hindoo."—Sat. Rec., Sept. 10, 326.

SALAAAM. s. A salutation; properly oral salutation of Muhommedans to each other. Arab. salâm, peace. Used for any act of salutation; or for 'compliments.'

[c. 60 B.C.—
"'IAW ei meiv Sivaœ esari 'Salâm,' ei 'dv

—Melagros, in Anthologia Palatina, vii. 149.

The point is that he has been a bird of passage, and says good-bye now to his various resting-places in their own tongue;]

1513.—"The ambassador (of Benazar) entering the door of the chamber, the Governor rose from the chair on which he was seated, and stood up while the ambassador made him great calema."—Correa, Lendas, ii. 377. See also p. 431.

1552.—"The present having been seen he took the letter of the Governor, and read it to him, and having read it told him how the Governor sent him his calema, and was at his command with all his fleet, and with all the Portuguese. ..."—Catastro, iii. 445.

1626.—"Hee (Selim i.e. Jahângir) turneth over his Beades, and saith so many words, to wit three thousand and two hundred, and then presenteth himself to the people to receive their salames or good morrow." ...—Pacheco, Privyency, 553.

1635.—"En entrant ils se salissent de leur ...
Salom qu'ils accompagnent d'une profonde inclination."—Mandehlo, Paris, 1654, 223.

1648.—"... this salutation they call salam: and it is made with bowing of the body, and laying of the right hand upon the head."—Van Tiert, 55.

1689.—"The Salem of the Religious Brahmuns, is to join their Hands together, and spreading them first, make a motion towards their Head, and then stretch them out."—D'Impuign, 138.

1794.—"The Town Conicopolies, and chief inhabitants of Ezmore, came to make their Salam to the President."—Wheeler, i. 291.

1717.—"I wish the Priests in Tranquebar a Thousand fold Schalam."—Philipp's Act. 62.

1809.—"The old priest was at the door, and with his head uncovered, to make his saalam."—Ed. Valenta, i. 293.

1815.—"Ho! who art thou!—This is salam Replies, of Moslem faith I am."—Baron, The Giaour.

1832.—"Il me rendit tous les salames que je fis autrefois au Grand Mogol."—Jacquemont, Corresp. ii. 137.

1844.—"All chiefs who have made their salam are entitled to carry arms personally."—G. O. of Sir C. Napier, 2.

SALAK. s. A singular-looking fruit, sold and eaten in the Malay regions, described in the quotation.
It is the fruit of a species of ratan (Salacca edulis), of which the Malay name is rotau-saluq.

1768-71. — "The salac (Calamus rotang zalaca) which is the fruit of a prickly bush, and has a singular appearance, being covered with scales, like those of a lizard; it is nutritious and well tasted, in flavour somewhat resembling a raspberry." — Sarcoirus, E.T. i. 241.

SALEB, SALEP, s. This name is applied to the tubers of various species of orchis found in Europe and Asia, which from ancient times have had a great reputation as being restorative and highly nutritious. This reputation seems originally to have rested on the 'doctrine of signatures,' but was due partly no doubt to the fact that the mucilage of saleb has the property of forming, even with the addition of 40 parts of water, a thick jelly. Good modern authorities quite disbelieve in the virtues ascribed to saleb, though a decoction of it, spiced and sweetened, makes an agreeable drink for invalids. Saleb is identified correctly by Ibn Batithar with the Satyrion of Dioscorides and Galen. The full name in Ar. (analogous to the Greek orchis) is Khunisal-thulab, i.e. 'testiculus vulpis'; but it is commonly known in India as saleb misri, i.e. Salep of Egypt, or popularly salp-mirzq. In Upper India saleb is derived from various species of Eulophia, found in Kashmir and the Lower Himalaya. Saloop, which is, or used to be, supplied hot in winter mornings by itinerant vendors in the streets of London, is, we believe, a representative of Saleb; but we do not know from what it is prepared.

[In 1889 a correspondent to "Notes & Queries" (7 ser. vii. 35) stated that 'within the last twenty years saloop vendors might have been seen plying their trade in the streets of London. The term saloop was also applied to an infusion of the saffras bark or wood. In Pereira's "Materia Medica," published in 1850, it is stated that 'saffras tea, flavoured with milk and sugar, is sold at daybreak in the streets of London under the name of saloop.' Saloop in balls is still sold in London, and comes mostly from Smyrna."

In the first quotation it is doubtful what is meant by salp; but it seems possible that the traveller may not have recognised the thulab, salab in its Indian pronunciation.

[1c. 1340. — "After that, they fixed the amount of provision to be given by the Sultan, viz. 1000 Indian rills of flour . . . 1000 of meat, a large number of rills (how many 1 don't now remember) of sugar, of ghee, of saluf, of araca, and 1000 leaves of betel."—Ibn Batitha, iii. 382.

1727. — "They have a fruit called Salob, about the size of a Peach, but without a stone. They dry it hard . . . and being beaten to Powder, they dress it as Tea and Coffee are . . . They are of opinion that it is a great restorative."—A. Hamilton, i. 125; (ed. 1744, i. 126).

[1754.—In his list of Indian drugs Ives (p. 44) gives "Rud. Salop, Persia Rs. 35 per maund."

1888. — "Saleb Misree, a medicine, comes (a little) from Russia. It is considered a good nutritive for the human constitution, and is for this purpose powdered and taken with milk. It is in the form of flat oval pieces of about 80 grains each . . . It is sold at 2 or 3 Rupees per ounce."—Desc. of articles found in Bazars of Calcutta, in "Panjab Trade Report," 1862, App. vi.

1882 (!).—"Here we knock against an ambulant salep-shop (a kind of tea which people drink on winter mornings); there against boiling oil, salt, or water-vendors, bakers carrying brown bread on wooden trays, peddlars with cakes, fellows offering darling little bits of meat to the knowing purchaser."—Locke, "The Capital of Cyprus," ext. in St. James's Gazette, Sept. 10.

SALEM, n.p. A town and inland district of S. India. Properly Shebou, which is perhaps a corruption of Sherou, the name of the ancient monarchy in which this district was embraced. ['According to one theory the town of Salem is said to be identical with Seran or Sheran, and occasionally to have been named Sheralan; when S. India was divided between the three dynasties of Chola, Sera and Pandia, according to the generally accepted belief, Karur was the place where the three territorial divisions met; the boundary was no doubt subject to vicissitudes, and at one time possibly Salem or Serar was a part of Sera."

— Le Floo, "Man. of Salem," ii. 18.]

SALEMPOORY, s. A kind of chintz. See allusions under PALEMPORE. [The Madras Gloss, deriving the word from Tel. sale, 'weaver,' pura, Skt. 'town,' describes it as "a kind of cotton cloth formerly manufactured at Nellore; half the length of ordinary SALIGRAM.

Skt. Śālagrama, which is a real or imaginary tirtha or place of sacred pilgrimage, mentioned in the Mahābhārata. (Other and less probable explanations are given by Oppert, Anc. Inhabitants, 337.) A pebble having mystic virtues, found in certain rivers, e.g. Gandak, Son, &c. Such stones are usually marked by containing a fossil ammonite. The śālagrama is often adopted as the representative of some god, and the worship of any god may be performed before it.* It is daily worshipped by the Brahmans; but it is especially connected with Vaishnava doctrine. In May 18-3 a śālagrama was the ostensible cause of great popular excitement among the Hindus of Calcutta. During the proceedings in a family suit before the High Court, a question arose regarding the identity of a śālagrama, regarded as a household god. Counsel on both sides suggested that the thing should be brought into court. Mr. Justice Norris hesitated to give this order till he had taken advice. The attorneys on both sides, Hindus, said there could be no objection; the Court interpreter, a high-caste Brahman, said it could not be brought into Court, because of the earmarking, but it might with perfect propriety be brought into the corridor for inspection; which was done. This took place during the excitement about the "Ilbert Bill," giving natives magisterial authority in the provinces over Europeans; and there followed most violent and offensive articles in several native newspapers reviling Mr. Justice Norris, who was believed to be hostile to the Bill. The editor of the Bengalee newspaper, an educated man, and formerly a member of the covenanted Civil Service, the author of one of the most unscrupulous and violent articles, was summoned for contempt of court. He made an apology and complete retraction, but was sentenced to two months' imprisonment.

* Like the Bara-Ahar which the Greeks got through the Scythians. In Phthis there are extracts from Dhamasastra (Life of Padmasina the Philosopher), which speak of the stones called bādulakes and bātulō, which were objects of worship, gas, oracles, and were apparently used in healing. These appear, from what is stated, to have been meteoric stones. There were many in Lusotum (see Phil. Biblioth., ed. 1858, pp. 1047, 92a3). made it over to a Brahman ascetic with a money present."—Sawdâbâ, in Punjab Notes and Queries, ii. 109. The sâlagramâ is in fact a Hindu fetish.

SALLABAD, s. This word, now quite obsolete, occurs frequently in the early records of English settlements in India, for the customary or prescriptive exactions of the native Governments, and for native prescriptive claims in general. It is a word of Mahratti development, sâlabâd, 'perennial,' applied to permanent collections or charges; apparently a fictitious word from Pers. âsl, 'year,' and Ar. ābd, 'ages.'

[1890.—"Sâlabâd." See under ROOC-KÂ.]

1703.—"...although these are hardships, yet by length of time become Sâlabâd (as we esteem them), there is no great demur made now, and are not resented here as grievances."—In Wheeler, ii. 19.

1716.—"The Board upon reading them came to the following resolutions:—That for anything which has yet appeared the Comatess (Comaty) may cry out their Pennagundoo Nagaram... at their houses, feasts, and weddings, &c., according to Sallabâd but not before the Pagoda of Chindy Pillery..."—Ibid. 231.

1788.—"Sâlabâud. (Usual Custom). A word used by the Moors Government to enforce their demand of a present."—Indian Vocabulary (Stockdale).

SALOOTREE, SALUSTREE, s. Hind. Sâlotar, Sâlotri. A native farrier or horse-doctor. This class is now almost always Mahommedan. But the word is taken from the Skt. name Sâlotâtra, the original owner of which is supposed to have written in that language a treatise on the Veterinary Art, which still exists in a form more or less modified and imperfect. "A knowledge of Sanskrit must have prevailed pretty generally about this time (14th century), for there is in the Royal Library at Lucknow a work on the veterinary art, which was translated from the Sanskrit by order of Ghiyasud-d dîn Muhammad Shah Khilji. This rare book, called Kurvatâ-l-Malk, was translated as early as A.D. 753 (A.D. 1381), from an original styled Sâlotar, which is the name of an Indian, who is said to have been a Brâhman, and the tutor of Sururta. The Preface says the translation was made 'from the barbarous Hindi into the refined Persian, in order that there may be no more need of a reference to infidels,'* (Elliot, v. 575-4.)

[1891.—"...your aces are not genuine,' 'Oh yes, they are,' he exclaimed. 'My salotree got them from the Bazzar."—Or. Sport. Mag., reprint 1873, ii. 223.]

a. A considerable island immediately north of Bombay. The island of Bombay is indeed naturally a kind of pendant to the island of Salsette, and during the Portuguese occupation it was so in every sense. That occupation is still marked by the remains of numerous villas and churches, and by the survival of a large R. Catholic population. The island also contains the famous and extensive caves of Kûhâri (see KENNÉY). The old city of Tana (q.v.) also stands upon Salsette. Salsette was claimed as part of the Bombay dotation of Queen Catherine, but refused by the Portuguese. The Mahrattas took it from them in 1739, and it was taken from these by us in 1774. The name has been by some connected with the salt-works which exist upon the islands (Sâlins). But it appears in fact to be the corruption of a Mahratti name Shâshâti, from Shâshashti, meaning 'Sixty-six' (Skt. Shat-shashti), because (it is supposed) the island was alleged to contain that number of villages. This name occurs in the form Shat-sashti in a stone inscription dated Sak. 1103 (A.D. 1182). See Io. J. R. As. Soc. xii. 334. Another inscription on copper plates dated Sak. 748 (A.D. 1027) contains a grant of the village of Naura, "one of the 66 of Sri Shaitânak (Thana)," thus entirely confirming the etymology (J.R. As. Soc. ii. 383). I have to thank Mr. J. M. Campbell, C.S.L., for drawing my attention to these inscriptions.

b. Salsette is also the name of the three provinces of the Goa territory which constituted the Vellasa Conquests or Old Conquests. These lay all along the coast, consisting of (1)

* "It is curious that without any allusion to this work, another on the Veterinary Art, styled Sâlotari, and said to comprise in the Sanskrit original 16,000 slokas, was translated in the reign of Shah Jahan..." by Siyad Abdulla Khât Bâhadur Firozâng, who had found it among some other Sanskrit books which... had been plundered from Amar Singh, Rânâ of Chitor."
the Uhas (viz. the island of Goa and minor islands divided by rivers and creeks), (2) Bardez on the northern mainland, and (3) Salsette on the southern mainland. The port of Marmagaon, which is the terminus of the Portuguese Indian Railway, is in this Salsette. The name probably had the like origin to that of the Island Salsete; a parallel to which was found in the old name of the Island of Goa, Ticoari, meaning (Mahr.) Tis-widi, “30 hamlets.” [See BARGANY.]

A.D. 1186.—“1. Aparadiitya (“the paramount sovereign, the Ruler of the Konkana, the most illustrious King”) have given with a libation of water 24 drachms, after exempting other taxes, to the fixed revenue of the port in the village of Mahauli, connected with Shat-shashti.”—Inscription edited by Pandit Bhagwanlal Jindraj, in J. Bo. Br. R. A. S. xii. 332. [And see Bombay Gazetteer, 1. Pt. ii. 544, 557.]

1588.—“Beyond the Isle of Elephanta (do Alfrante) about a league distant is the island of Salsete. This island is seven leagues long by 5 in breadth. On the north it borders the Gulf of Cambay, on the south it has the I. of Elephanta, on the east the mainland, and on the west I. of Bombay or of Boa Viuda. This island is very fertile, abounding in provisions, cattle, and game of sorts, and in its hills is great plenty of timber for building ships and galleys. In that part of the island which faces the S.W. wind is built a great and noble city called Thana; and a leagie and a half in the interior is an immense edifice called the Pagoda of Salsete: with one and the other objects most worthy of note; Thana for its decay (deterioração) and the Pagoda as a work unique in its way, and the like of which is nowhere to be seen.”—Joho do Castro, Primo Relatorio da India, 69-70.

1510.—“And he next day, by order of the Governor, with his own people and many more from the Island (Goa) passed over to the mainland of Salsete and Antruz, scouring the districts and the tana-daris, and placing in them by his own hand tanadaris and collectors of revenue, and put all in such order that he collected much money, insomuch that he sent to the factor at Goa very good intelligence, accompanied by much money.”—Correia, ii. 161.

1544.—“We agree in the manner following, to wit, that I Talaka (Idalcan) promise and swear on our Koran (no nossa mogalao), and by the head of my eldest son, that I will remain always firm in the said amity with the King of Portugal and with his governors of India, and that the lands of Salsete and Bardees, which I have made contract and donation of to His Highness,
I confirm and give anew, and I swear and promise by the oath aforesaid never to reclaim them or make them the Subject of War."—Treaty between D. John de Castro and Idalxu, who was formerly called Idalpio (Adil Khân).—Botelho, Tombo, 40.

1598.—"On the South side of the Island of Goa, when the river runneth againe into the Sea, there cometh even out with the coast a land called Salsette, which is also under the subsection of the Portugales, and is . . . planted both with people and fruittie."—Linschoten, 51; [Hak. Soc. i. 177.]

1602.—"Before we treat of the Wars which in this year (c. 1548) Idalxi (Adil Shâh) waged with the State about the mainland provinces of Salsette and Bardés, which caused much trouble to the Government of India, it seems well to us to give an account of these Moor Kings of Vsiapor."—Conto, IV. x. 4.

SALWEN, n.p. The great river entering the sea near Martaban in British Burma, and which the Chinese in its upper course call Lü-kiam. The Burmese form is Than-bien, but the original form is probably Shan. [The Salween River, which empties itself into the sea at Manusmain, rivals the Irrawaddy in length but not in importance. (Forbes, British Burma, 8.)]

SAMBOOK, s. Ar. sanbuk, and sunbuk (there is a Skt. word śūmbāka, a bivalve shell, but we are unable to throw any light on any possible transfer); a kind of small vessel formerly used in Western India and still on the Arabian coast. [See Bombay Gazetteer, xiii. Pt. ii. 470.] It is smaller than the bayalā (see Buggalow), and is chiefly used to communicate between a roadstead and the shore, or to go about inside the reefs. Burton renders the word 'a foyst,' which is properly a smaller kind of galley. See description in the last but one quotation below.

c. 330.—"It is the custom when a vessel arrives (at Makidash) that the Sultan's sunbük boards her to ask whence the ship comes, who is the owner, and the skipper (or pilot), what she is laden with, and what merchants or other passengers are on board."—Botelho, ii. 185; also see pp. 17, 181, &c.

1488.—"The Zambuco came loaded with doves'dung, which they have in those islands, and which they were carrying, being mankindize for Cambay, where it is used in dyeing cloths."—Correa, Lendas, i. 33-34.

"In the curious Vocabulary of the language of Calicut, at the end of the Roqueiro of Vasco da Gama, we find: "Barcas; Cambuco." [1502.—"Zambucos." See under NA-CODA.]

1506.—"Questo Capitanio si prese uno sambuco molto ricco, veniva dalla Mecta per Colocut."—Leonardo Ca' Masser, 17.

1510.—"As to the names of their ships, some are called Sambuchi, and these are flat-bottomed."—Farthema, 154.

1516.—"Item—our Captain Major, or Captain of Cochim shall give passes to secure the navigation of the ships and zanbuquis of their ports . . . provided they do not carry spices or drugs that we require for our cargoes, but if such be found, for the first occasion they shall lose all the spice and drugs so loaded, and on the second they shall lose both ship and cargo, and all may be taken as prize of war."—Treaty of Maria Affonso de Souza with Cochim, in Botelho, Tombo, Subsidia, p. 32.

[1516.—"Zambucos." See under ARECA.]

1518.—"Zambuco." See under PROW.

1543.—"Item— that the Zanbuquis which shall trade in his port in rice or padi (paddy) and cotons and other matters shall pay the customary dues."—Treaty of Maria Affonso de Souza with Cochim, in Botelho, Tombo, 37.

[1814.—"Sambouk." See under DHOW.]

1855.—"Our pilgrim ship . . . was a Sambuk of about 400 ardeis (50 tons), with narrow washer, first bows, a clean water-line, a sharp keel, undecked except upon the poop, which was high enough to act as a sail in a gale of wind. We carried 2 masts, imminently raking forward, the main considerably longer than the mizen, and the former was provided with a large triangular lateen. . . ."—Barton, Pilgrimage to El Mebahah and Meaxah, i. 270; [Memorial ed. i. 188.]

1588.—"The vessels of the Arabs called Sembuk are small Baggelows of 50 to 100 tons burden. Whilst they run out forward, the after part of the vessel is disproportionately broad and elevated above the water, in order to form a counterpoise to the colossal triangular sail which is hoisted to the masthead with such a spread that often the extent of the yard is greater than the whole length of the vessel."—F. van Nieman, in Zeitschr. der Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesellsch. xii. 120.

1880.—"The small sailing boat with one sail, which is called by the Arabs 'Jambook' with which I went from Hodeida to Aden."—Letter in Athenaeum, March 13, p. 180.

1899.—"We scrambled into a sambouka crammed and stuffed with the baggage."—Bent, Southern Arabia, 220.]

SAMBRE, SAMBUR, s. Hind. sabar, såmbar; Skt. śāmbara. A kind of stag (Rusa Aristoteli, Jordan; [Blanford, Mammalia, 543 sqq.]) the elk of S. Indian sportsmen; ghau of Bengal; jarrow (jard) of the Himālaya; the largest of Indian stags, and found in all the large forests of India. The word is often applied to the soft leather, somewhat resembling chamois leather, prepared from the hide.

1673. — "... Our usual diet was of spotted deer, Sabre, wild Hogs and sometimes with Cows."—Pryer, 175.

[1819.—“Here he saw a number of deer, and four large sabirs or samboos, one considerably bigger than an ox...”—Diary, in Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 400.]

1823. — "The skin of the Sambre, when well prepared, forms an excellent material for the military accoutrements of the soldiers of the native Powers."—Malcolm, Central India, i. 9.

[1900.—“The Sambu stags which Lord Powelsey court turned out in his glens...”—Spectator, December 15, p. 883.]

SAMPAN. A kind of small boat or skiff. The word appears to be Javanese and Malay. It must have been adopted on the Indian shores, for it was picked up there at an early date by the Portuguese; and it is now current all through the further East. [The French have adopted the Annamite form tambon.] The word is often said to be originally Chinese, suanpan, = ‘three boards,’ and this is possible. It is certainly one of the most ordinary words for a boat in China. Moreover, we learn, on the authority of Mr. E. C. Baber, that there is another kind of boat on the Yangtse which is called wu-pan, ‘five boards.’ Giles however says: "From the Malay sampan = three boards”; but in this there is some confusion. The word has no such meaning in Malay.

1510. — "My companion said, ‘What means then might there be for going to this island?’ They answered: ‘That it was necessary to purchase a champana, that is a small vessel, of which many are found there.”—Varthema, 242.

1516. — "They (the Moors of Quilhares) perform their voyages in small vessels which they call champana.”—Barbosa, 172.

c. 1540. — "In the other, whereof the captain was slain, there was not one escaped. for Quiay Panaia pursued them in a Champana, which was the Boat of his Junk."—Pinta (Cogan. p. 79), orig. ch. lx.

1552.—... Champanas, which are a kind of small vessels.”—Cortes Adobe, ii. 76; [rather Bk. ii. ch. xxii. p. 76.]

[1622.—"Yt was thought fytt... to trym up a China Sampan to goe with the fleete..."—Cocks’s Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. 122.]

1648. — In Van Spilbergers’s Voyage we have Champane, and the still more odd Champaigne. [See under TOPAZ.]

1702.—"Sampans being not to be got we were forced to send for the Sarah and Eaton’s Long-boats."—MS. Correspondence in I., Office from China Factory (at Chusan), Jan. 8.

c. 1785. — "Some made their escape in prows, and some in sampans."—Mem. of a Malay Family, 3.

1795. — "The harbour is crowded with men-of-war and trading vessels... from vessels of several hundred tons burthen down to little fishing-boats and passenger sampans."—Wallace, Malay Archip. 21.

SAMSHOO. A kind of ardent spirit made in China from rice. Mr. Baber doubts this being Chinese; but according to Wells Williams the name is san-sho, ‘thrice fired’ (Guld. 220). ‘Distilled liquor’ is shao-siu, ‘fired liquor.’ Compare Germ. Brantwink, and XXX beer. Strabo says: "Wine the Indians drink not except when sacrificing, and that is made of rice in lieu of barley" ( xv. c. i. § 53).

SANDAL. SANDLE, SANDERS. SANDAL-WOOD. From Low Latin santalum, in Greek σαντάλος, and in later Greek σάνταλος; coming from the Arab, sandal, and that from Skt. chandana. The name properly belongs to the fragrant wood of the Santalum album. I. Three woods bearing the name santalum, white, yellow, and red, were in official use in the Middle Ages. But the name Red Sandalwood, or Red Sanders, has been long applied, both in English and in the Indian vernaculars, to the wood of Pterocarpus santalinus, L., a tree of S. India, the wood of which is inodorous, but which is valued for various purposes in India (pillars, turning, &c.), and is exported as a dye-wood. According to Hanbury and Flückiger this last was the sanders so much used in the cookery of the Middle Ages for colouring sauces, &c. In the opinion of those authorities it is doubtful whether the red sandal of the medieval pharmacologists was a kind of the real odorous sandal-wood, or was the wood of Pteroc. santal.

It is possible that sometimes the one and sometimes the other was meant. For on the one hand, even in modern times, we find Milburn (see below) speaking of the three colours of the real sandal-wood; and on the other hand we find Matthioli in the 16th century speaking of the red sandal as inodorous.

"It has been a question how the Pterocarpus santalinum came to be called sandal-wood at all. We may suggest, as a possible origin of this, the fact that its powder "mixed with oil is used for bathing and purifying the skin" (Drury, s.v.), much as the true sandal-wood powder also is used in the East."

25/453—"And from the remoter regions, I speak of Timista and other places of export, the imports to Taprobane are silk, aloeswood, cloves, Sandalwood (τιράνδρυ), and so forth. . . .—Cosmas, in Cathay, &c., clixxvii.

e. 1390.—"Take powdered rice and boil it in almond milk . . . and colour it with Sauders."—Recipe quoted by Wright, Domestic Manners, &c., 350.

1551.—"Le Santal done croist es Indes Orientales et Occidentales; en grandes Forestz, et fort espaces. Il s’en trouve trois espèces: mais le plus pasle est le meilleur; le blanc apres: le rouge est mis au dernier rance, pour ne qu’il n’aume odor: mais les deux premiers sentent fort bon."—Matthioli (old Fr. version), liv. i. ch. xix.

1553.—"The Sandal grows about Timor, which produces the largest quantity, and it is called chundana; and by this name it is known in all the regions about Malaca; and the Arabs, being those who carried on the trade of those parts, corrupted the word and called it sandal. Every Moor, whatever his nation, calls it thus . . . "—Garcia, f. 156v. He proceeds to speak of the sandale -wood as quite a different product, growing in Tenasserim and on the Coromandel Coast.

1613.—". . . certain renegade Christians of the said island, along with the Moors, called in the Hollanders, who thinking it was a fine opportunity, went one time with five vessels, and another time with seven, against the sand, fort, at a time when most of the people . . . were gone to Solor for the Sandal trade, by which they had their living."—Boerro, Dordao, 725.

1613.—"When the trees are felled, the bark is taken off; they are then cut into billets, and buried in a dry place for two months, during which period the white ants will eat the outer wood without touching the sandal; it is then taken up and . . . sorted into three kinds. The deeper the colour, the higher is the perfume; and hence the merchants sometimes divide sandal into red, yellow, and white; but these are all different shades of the same colour."—Milburn, i. 291.

1625.—"Redwood, properly Red Sauders, is produced chiefly on the Coromandel Coast, whence it has of late years been imported in considerable quantity to England, where it is employed in dyeing. It . . . comes in round billets of a thickish red colour on the outside, a deep brighter red within, with a wavy grain; no smell or taste."—Ibid. ed. 1625, p. 249.

SANDOWAY, n.p. A town of Arakan, the Burmese name of which is Thanwed (San-wè), for which an etymology ("iron-tied"), and a corresponding legend are invented, as usual [see Barmat Gazetteer, ii. 606]. It is quite possible that the name is ancient, and represented by the Suda of Ptolemy.

1553.—"In crossing the gulf of Bengal there arose a storm which dispersed them in such a manner that Martin Alfonso found himself alone, with his ship, at the island of Negmaie, opposite the town of Sode, which is on the mainland, and there was wrecked upon a reef . . . "—Barroso, IV. ii. 1.

In 1. i. 1, it is called Sede. 1606.—"Other places along this Coast, subjected to this King of Arman are Cormer concludes, Sede, Zara, and Port Mugatoon."—Appendix to Orcington, p. 563.
SANGUICEL. s. This is a term (pl. sanguiceis) often used by the Portuguese writers on India for a kind of boat, or small vessel, used in war. We are not able to trace any origin in a vernacular word. It is perhaps taken from the similar proper name which is the subject of the next article. [This supposition is rendered practically certain from the quotation from Albuquerque below, furnished by Mr. Whiteway.] Bluteau gives "Sanguicel; termo da India. He hum genero de embarcação pequena q serve na costa da India para dar aelancce aos parôs dos Mouros," 'to give chase to the prows of the Moors.'

1512.—"Here was Nuno Vaz in a ship, the St. John, which was built in Câmgucair. Albuquerque, Captains, p. 99. 'In a letter of Nov. 30, 1513, he varies the spelling to Câmgicar. There are many other passages in the same writer which make it practically certain that Sanguicels were the vessels built at Sanguicar.'

1598.—"The Conde (Francisco da Gama) was occupied all the winter (q.v.) in reforming the fleet... and as the time came on he nominated his brother D. Luiz da Gama to be Captain-Major of the Indian Seas for the expedition to Malabar, and wrote to Baqaim to equip six very light Sanguicels according to instructions which should be given by the Count Admiral because he perceived that big fleets were not of use to guard convoys, and that it was light vessels like these alone which could catch the parâos and vessels of the pirates... for these escaped our fleets, and got hold of the merchant vessels at their pleasure, darting in and out, like light horse, where they would..."—Conto, Dec. XII. liv. i. ch. 18.

1605.—"And seeing that I am informed that... the incursions of certain pirates who still infest that coast might be prevented with less apparatus and expense, if we had light vessels which would be more effective than the foists and galleys of which the fleets have hitherto been composed, seeing how the enemy use their sanguicels, which our ships and galleys cannot overtake. I enjoin and order you to build a quantity of light vessels to be employed in guarding the coast in place of the fleet of galleys and foists. . . .—King's Letter to Don Aftonso de Castro, in Livros dos Memores, p. 26.

1614.—"The eight Malaharesque Sanguicels that Francisco de Miranda despatched to the north from the head of Goa were divided into three chief captains, each of them to command a week in turn..."—Berton, Decada, 262.

SANGUICER, SANGUECA. ZINGUIZAR. &c., n.p. This is a place often mentioned in the Portuguese narratives, as very hostile to the Goa Government, and latterly as a great nest of corsairs. This appears to be Sangameshvar, lat. 17° 9', formerly a port of Canara on the River Shãstri, and standing 20 miles from the mouth of that river. The latter was navigable for large vessels up to Sangameshvar, but within the last 50 years has become impassable. [The name is derived from Stk. singama-Isvara, 'Siva. Lord of the river confluence.]

1516.—"Passing this river of Dabul, and going along the coast towards Goa you find a river called Cinguecer; inside of which there was a place where there is a traffic in many wares, and where enter many vessels and small Zanghires (Sambook) of Malabar to sell what they bring, and buy the products of the country. The place is peopled by Moors, and Gentiles of the aforesaid Kingdom of Daquem"—(Deccan).—Barbont, Lisbon ed. p. 256.

1538.—"Thirty-five leagues from Gua, in the middle of the Gulf of the Malabars there runs a large river called Zangizara. This river is well known and of great renown. The bar is bad and very tortuous, but after you get with the current in it you will find your way in for the difficulties without. It runs inland for a great distance with great depth and breadth."—De Castro, Primeiro Relatrio, 36.

1553.—De Burros calls it Zingacar in li. i. and Sangaça in iv. i. 14.

1551.—"There is a Haven belonging to these rivers (Zangizara), distant from Goa about 12 miles, and is called Sanguesa, where many of those Rovers dwell, and doe so much mischief that no man can passe by, but they receive some wrong by them... Which the Viceroy understanding, prepared an armie of 15 Foists, over which he made chief Captaine a Gentleman, his Nephew called Don Iulianes Mascarenhas, giving him express commandement first to go unto the Haven of Sanguesa, and utterly to razse the same downe to the ground."—Linschoten, ch. 92; Hak. Soc. ii. 170.

1609.—"Both these projects he now began to put in execution, sending all his treasures (which they said exceeded ten millions in gold) to the river of Sanguicuer, which was also within his jurisdiction, being a seaport, and there embarking it at his pleasure."—Conto, ix. 8. See also Dec. X. iv.

"How D. Gilvao's Mascarenhas arrived in Malabar, and how he entered the river of Sanguicuer to chastise the Naiveque of that place; and of the disaster in which he met his death, which is the event of 1584 related by Linschoten")—also Dec. X. iv.

SANSKRIT, s. The name of the classical language of the Brahmans, Sanskrita, meaning in that language 'purified' or 'perfected.' This was obviously at first only an epithet, and it is not of very ancient use in this specific application. To the Brahmans Sanskrit was the bhāṣa, or language, and had no particular name. The word Sanskrit is used by the proto-grammarian Panini (some centuries before Christ), but not as a denomination of the language. In the latter sense, however, both 'Sanskrit' and 'Prakrit' (Pracrit) are used in the Brihat Samhita of Varahamihira, c. A.D. 504, in a chapter on omens (lxxxvi. 3), to which Prof. Kern's translation does not extend. It occurs also in the Mrichchhakaṭakas, translated by Prof. H. H. Wilson in his Hindu Theatre, under the name of the 'Toy-cart'; in the works of Kumārila Bhatta, a writer of the 7th century; and in the Pāṇiniya Śākhā, a metrical treatise ascribed by the Hindus to Pāṇini, but really of comparatively modern origin.

There is a curiously early mention of Sanskrit by the Mahommedan poet AmīrKhwarzī of Delhi, which is quoted below. The first mention (to our knowledge) of the word in any European writing is in an Italian letter of Sassetti's, addressed from Malabar to Bernardo Davenzati in Florence, and dating from 1566. The few words on the subject of this writer, show much acumen.

In the 17th and 18th centuries such references to this language as occur are found chiefly in the works of travellers to Southern India, and by these it is often called Grondinii, or the like, from grantha, 'a book' (see GRUNTH, GRUNTHUM) i.e. a book of the classical Indian literature. The term Sanskrit came into familiar use after the investigations into this language by the English in Bengal (viz. by Wilkins, Jones, &c.) in the last quarter of the 18th century. [See Macdonell, Hist. of Sanskrit Lit. ch. i.]

1727.—"There is an excellent Harbour for Shipping 8 Leagues to the Southward of Dibul, called Sanguere, but the Country about being inhabited by Raparee, it is not frequented."—A. Hamilton, [ed. 1744] i. 244.

A.D. 1876.—"Three-and-sixty or four-and-sixty sounds are there originally in Prakrit (Pracrit) even as in Sanskrit, as taught by Paninii."—Pandit Khusru, quoted in Weber's Ind. Studien (1858), iv. 348. But see also Weber's Akadem. Vorlesungen (1875), p. 194.

1318.—"But there is another language, more select than the other, which all the Brachmans use. Its name from of old is Sahaskrit, and the common people know nothing of it."—Amīr Khwarzī, in Elliot, iii. 563.

1586.—"Sono scritte le loro scienze tutte in una lingua che dimandano Sam Pancuta, che vuol dire 'bene articolata' : della quale non si ha memoria quando fosse parla per, con ovre (com'io dico) memorie antichissime. Impararla cono la grec e la latina, e vi pongono molto maggior tempo, si che in 6 anni o 7 sene fanno padroni ; et ha la lingua d'oggi molte cose comuni con quella, nella quale sono molti de' nostri nomi, e particolarmente de numeri il 6, 7, 8, e 9, Dio, serpe, et altri assai."—Sassetti, extracted in De Gubernatis, Storia, &c., Livorno, 1875, p. 221.

c. 1590.—"Although this country (Kashmir) has a peculiar tongue, the books of knowledge are Sanskrit (or Sahaskrit). They also have a written character of their own, with which they write their books. The substance which they chiefly write upon is Tā, which is the bark of a tree,* which with a little pains they make into leaves, and it lasts for years. In this way ancient books have been written thereon, and the ink is such that it cannot be washed off."—Vin (orig.), l. p. 563; [ed. Jardt. ii. 331].

1623.—"The Jesuits conceive that the Brahmans are of the dispersion of the Hebrews, and their Books (called Samsaortan) do somewhat agree with the Scriptures, but that they understand them not."—Purchas, Pilgrimeage, 559.

1651.—"... Saur signifieth the Sun in Samsaortan, which is a language in which all the mysteries of Heathendom are written, and which is held in esteem by the Brahmas just as Latin is among the Learned in Europe."—Regenius, 4.

In some of the following quotations we have a form which it is difficult to account for:

SAPECA, SAPEQUE. s. This word is used at Macao for what we call cash (q.v.) in Chinese currency; and it is the word generally used by French writers for that coin. Giles says: “From sapek, a coin found in Tonquin and Cochyn-China, and equal to about half a pfennig (½pf. Thaler), or about one-sixth of a German Kreutzer” (Gloss. of Reference, 122). We cannot learn much about this coin of Tonquin. Millburn says, under ‘Cochyn China’: ‘The only currency of the country is a sort of cash, called sappica, composed chiefly of tutenague (see TOOTNAGUE), 600 making a quaos: this is divided into 10 mace of 60 cash each, the whole string together, and divided by a knot at each mace” (ed. 1825. pp. 444, 445). There is nothing here inconsistent with our proposed derivation, given later on. Mace and Sappica are equally Malay words. We can hardly doubt that the true origin of the term is that communicated by our friend Mr. E. C. Baker: “Very probably from Malay sa, ‘one,’ and paku, ‘a string or file of the small coin called pichis.’ Pichis is explained by Crawford as ‘small coin ... money of copper, brass, or tin. ... It was the ancient coin of Java, and also the only one of the Malays when first seen by the Portuguese.’ Puku is written by Favre puku (Dict. Malac-François) and is derived by him from Chinese p’ko, ‘cent.’ In the dialect of Canton puk is the word for ‘a hundred,’ and one puk is the colloquial term for a string of one hundred cash.” Sapex would then be properly a string of 100 cash, but it is not difficult to conceive that it might through some misunderstanding (e.g. a confusion of puku and pichis) have been transferred to the single coin. There is a passage in Mr. Gerson da Cunha’s Contributions to the Study of Portuguese Nomenclature, which may seem at first sight inconsistent with this derivation. For he seems to imply that the smallest denomination of coin struck by Albuquerque at Goa in 1510 was called cepayqua, i.e. in the year before the capture of Malacca, and consequent familiarity with Malay terms. I do not trace his authority for this; the word is not mentioned in the Commentaries of Albuquerque, and it is quite possible that the dinheiros, as these small copper coins were also called, only received the name cepayqua at a later date, and some time after the occupation of Malacca (see Du Cane, pp. 11-12, and 22). [But also see the quotation of 1610 from Correa under PARDOO. This word has been discussed by Col. Temple (Ind. Antiq., August 1897, pp. 222 seq.), who gives quotations establishing the derivation from the Malay sapaku.

[1632. — "It (aen, cash) hath a four-square hole through it, at which they string them on a Straw; a String of two hundred Canoes, called Sato, is worth about three farthings sterling, and five Satas tied together make a Sapoon. The Javanis, when this money first came amongst them, were so cheated with the Novelty, that they would give six bags of Pepper for ten Sapoons, thirteen whereof amount to but a Crown." — Mandelstam, Voyages, E. T. p. 117.

1703. — "This is the reason why the Canoes are valued so little: they are punched in the middle, and string'd with little twistes of Straw, two hundred in one Twist, which is called Santa, and is worth nine Deniers. Five Santas tied together make a thousand Canoes, or a Sapoon (? Sapoon)." — Collection of Dutch Voyages, 190.

[1830. — "The money current in Bula consists solely of Chinese piece with a hole in the centre. . . . They however put them up in hundreds and thousands; two Canoes are called satah, and are equal to one rupee copper, and a thousand called Sapaku, are valued at five rupees." — Singapore Chronicle, June 1850, in Moor, Indian Archip, p. 94.

SAPPAN-WOOD. s. The wood of Cersalypan sappan; the bahkam of the Arabs, and the Brazil-wood of medieval commerce. Bishop Caldwell at one time thought the Tamil name, from which this was taken, to have been given because the wood was supposed to come from Japan. Rumphius says that Siam and Champa are the original countries of the Sappan, and quotes from Rheeved that in Malabar it was called Tsajampangan, suggestive apparently of a possible derivation from Champa. The mere fact that it does not come from Japan would not disprove this derivation any more than the fact that turkeys and maize did not originally come from Turkey would disprove the fact of the birds and the grain (grain turco) having got names from such a belief. But the tree appears to be indigenous in Malabar, the Deccan, and the Malay Peninsula; whilst the Malayal, shappainam, and the Tamil sappu, both signifying 'red' (wood), are apparently derivatives from shava, 'to be red,' and suggest another origin as most probable. [The Mad. Gloss. gives Mal. chappainam, from chappu, 'leaf,' Skt. anka, 'body'; Tan. shapangam.] The Malay word is also sopang, which Crawfurd supposes to have originated the trade-name. If, however, the etymology just suggested be correct, the word must have passed from Continental India to the Archipelago. For curious particulars as to the names of this dye-wood, and its vicissitudes, see BRAZIL; [and Burnell's note on Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 121].

1860.—"The other productions which constituted the exports of the island were Sapan wood to Persia..."—Trayant, Ceylon, ii. 54.

SARBATANE, SARBACANE. s. This is not Anglo-Indian, but it often occurs in French works on the East, as applied to the blowing-tubes used by various tribes of the Indian Islands for discharging small arrows, often poisoned. The same instrument is used among the tribes of northern South America, and in some parts of Madagascar. The word comes through the Span. zebratana, cerbatana, zarbatana, also Port. sarabatana, &c., Ital. cerbotana, Mod. Greek γαρβοτάνα, from the Ar. zarbatâna, 'a tube for blowing pellets' (a pea-shooter in fact!). Dozy says that the r must have been sounded in the Arabic of the Spanish Moors, as Pedro de Alcala translates zebratana by Ar. zarbatâna. The resemblance of this to the Malay sumpit-tan (q.v.) is curious, though it is not easy to suggest a transition, if the Arabic word is, as it appears, old enough to have been introduced into Spanish. There is apparently, however, no doubt that in Arabic it is a borrowed word. The Malay word seems to be formed directly from sumpit, 'to discharge from the month by a forcible expiration' (Crawford, Mal. Dict.).

SARBOJI. s. This is the name of some weapon used in the extreme south of India; but we have not been able to ascertain its character or etymology. We conjecture, however, that it may be the long lance or pike, 18 or 20 feet long, which was the characteristic and formidable weapon of the Marava Colleries (q.v.). See Ep. Caldwell's H. of Timmerly, p. 103 and passim; [Sturt, Man. of Timmerly, 50. This explanation is probably incorrect. Welsh (Military Rom. i. 194) defines sarabogies as "a species of park guns, for firing salutes at feasts, &c. but not used in war." It has been suggested that the word is simply Hind. sarbojha, 'a head-load,' and Dr. Grierson writes: "'Laden with a head' may refer to a head carried home on a spear." Dr. Pope writes: "Sarboji is not found in any Dravidian dialect, as far as I know. It is a synonym for Siva. Sarua (sarboji) is honorific. In the Tanjore Inscription it is Sarfjii. In mythology Siva's name is 'arrow,' 'spear,' and 'head-burthen,' of course by metonymy." Mr. Brandt suggests Tam. sīrū, "war," bāqē, "a tube." No weapon of the name appears in Mr. Egerton's Hand-book of Indian Arms.]

SARNAU, SORNAY, n.p. A name often given to Siam in the early part of the 16th century; from Shahr-i-naw, Pers. 'New-city'; the name by which Yuthia or Avaolhya (see JUDEA), the capital founded on the Menam about 1350, seems to have become known to the traders of the Persian Gulf. Mr. Braddell (J. Ind. Arch., v. 317) has suggested that the name (Shoker-al-nawr), as he calls it) refers to the distinction spoken of by La Loubere between the Thai-Yai, an older people of the race, and the Thai-Noi, the people known to us as Siamese. But this is less probable.
We have still a city of Siam called Lopkaburi, anciently a capital, and the name of which appears to be a Sanskrit or Pali form, Navapura, meaning the same as Shahr-i-nao; and this indeed may have first given rise to the latter name. The Cernevoe of Nicolo Conti (c. 1430) is generally supposed to refer to a city of Bengal, and one of the present writers has identified it with Lakhnäti or Ganu; an official name of which in the 14th cent. was Shahr-i-nao. But it is just possible that Siam was the country spoken of.

1442.—"The inhabitants of the sea-coasts arrive here (at Ormuz) from the counties of Chín, Java, Bengal, the cities of Zirbád, Tenásirí, Sokotorá, Shahr-i-nao. . . ."—Abduzakar, in Not. et Exs. xiv. 429.

1510.—". . . They said they were from a city called Sarnau, and had brought for sale silken stuffs, and abeewood, and benzoin, and musk."—Tartemus, 272.

1514.—". . . Tanazzari, Sarnau, where is produced all the finest white benzoin, storax, and lac finer than that of Martaman."—Letter of Gião d'Empoli, in Arch. Storici Italiani, App. 89.

1540.—". . . all along the coast of Malaya, and within the Land, a great King commands, who for a more famous and recommendable Title above all other Kings, causeth himself to be called Prechau Saltn, Emperor of all Sornau, which is a Country wherein there are thirteen kingdoms, by us commonly called Simau" (Sião).—Pinta (orig. cap. xxxvi.), in Cogun, p. 43.

c. 1612.—"It is related of Simau, formerly called Sheher-al-Nawi, to which Country all lands under the wind here were tributary, that there was a King called Bubannia, who when he heard of the greatness of Mahaca sent to demand submission and homage of that kingdom."—Njara Malau, in J. Ind. Arch. v. 564.

1726.—"About 1340 reigned in the kingdom of Simau (then called Sjaharnouw or Sornau), a very powerful Prince."—Valencía, v. 319.

SARONG, s. Malay, sârung; the body-cloth, or long kilt, tucked or girt at the waist, and generally of coloured silk or cotton, which forms the chief article of dress of the Malays and Javannese. The same article of dress, and the name (saran) are used in Ceylon. It is an old Indian form of dress, but is now used only by some of the people of the south; e.g. on the coast of Malabar, where it is worn by the Hindus (white), by the Mappilas (Moplah) of that coast, and the Labbais (Lubbye) of Coromandel (coloured), and by the Bants of Canara, who wear it of a dark blue. With the Labbais the coloured sarong is a modern adoption from the Malays. Crawford seems to explain sarung as Javanese, meaning first 'a case or sheath,' and then a wrapper or garment. But, both in the Malay islands and in Ceylon, the word is no doubt taken from Skt. sarúnga, meaning 'variegated' and also 'a garment.'

[1830.—". . . the cloth or sarong, which has been described by Mr. Marsden to be 'not unlike a Scots highlander's plaid in appearance, being a piece of party-coloured cloth, about 6 or 8 feet long, and 3 or 4 feet wide, sewed together at the ends, forming, as some writers have described it, a wide sack without a bottom.' With the Malãy, the sarong is either worn slung over the shoulders as a sash, or tucked round the waist and descending to the ankles, so as to enclose the legs like a petticoat."—Hajlès, Java, i. 96.]

1865.—"He wore a sarong or Malay petticoat, and a green jacket."—Wallace, Mal. Arch. 171.

SATIGAM, n.p. Satigu, formerly and from remote times a port of much trade on the right bank of the Hoogly R., 30 m. above Calcutta, but for two and a half centuries utterly decayed, and now only the site of a few huts, with a ruined mosque as the only relic of former importance. It is situated at the bifurcation of the Saraswati channel from the Hoogly, and the decay dates from the settling up of the former. It was commonly called by the Portuguese Porto Pequeno (p. v.).

c. 1340.—"About this time the rebellion of Fakhri broke out in Bengal, Fakhri and his Bengali forces killed Kádar Khán (Governor of Lakhnauti). . . . He then plundered the treasury of Lakhnauti, and secured possession of that place and of Satgauw and Sumgauw."—Zia-ud-dín Birázi, in Elliot, iii. 245.

1535.—"In this year Diágo Rabello, finishing his term of service as Captain and Factor of the Coromandel Fishery, with license from the Governor went to Bengal in a vessel of his . . . and he went well armed along with two feasts which equipped with his own money, the Governor only lending him artillery and nothing more. . . . So this Diogo Rabello arrived at the Port of Satigao, where he found two great ships of Cambaya which three days before had arrived with great quantity of merchandise, selling and buying: and these, without touching them, he caused to quit the port and go down the river, forbidding them to carry on any trade, and he also sent one of the foists, with 30 men, to the other port of Chatigao, where they found three ships from the Coast of Choromandel, which were driven away from the port. And Diogo Rabello sent word to the Gozil that he was sent by the Governor with choice of peace or war, and that he should send to ask the King to choose to which prisoners, in which case he also would liberate his ports and leave them in their former peace. . . .—Correa, iii. 649.

SATIN, s. This is of course English, not Anglo-Indian. The common derivation [accepted by Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. 2nd ed. s.v.)] is with Low Lat. seta, ‘silk.’ Lat. seda, seduta, ‘a bristle, a hair,’ through the Port. setun. Dr. Wells Williams (Molv. King., ii. 123) says it is probably derived eventually from the Chinese sz‘-tun, though intermediate through other languages. It is true that sz‘-tun or sz-tecan is a common (and ancient) term for this sort of silk texture. But we may remark that trade-words adopted directly from the Chinese are comparatively rare (though no doubt the intermediate transit indicated would meet this objection, more or less). And we can hardly doubt that the true derivation is that given in "Cathay and the Way Thither," p. 486; viz. from Zaitun or Zayton, the name by which Chuan-chun (Chinchew), the great mediaeval port of western trade in Fokien, was known to western traders. We find that certain rich stuffs of damask and satin were called from this place, by the Arabs, Zitātu; the Span, avertina (for ‘satin’), the mediaeval French zatony, and the mediaeval Ital. zanti, afford intermediate steps.

1352.—In an inventory of this year in Donet d’Aray we have: ‘Zatony at 4 écus the ell’ (p. 342).

1405.—‘And besides, this city (Samar-kand) is very rich in many wares which come to it from other parts. From Russia and Tartary come hides and linens, and from China silk-stuffs, the best that are made in all that region, especially the setunis, which are said to be the best in the world, and the best of all are those that are without pattern.’—Clavijo (translated anew—the passage corresponding to Markham’s at p. 171). The word setuni occurs repeatedly in Clavijo’s original.

1440.—In the Libro de Gabelli, &c. of Giov. da Uzzano, we have mention among silk-stuffs, several times, of ‘zetani colbatati,’ and other kinds of zetani. —Della Decima, iv. 58, 107, &c.

SATRAP, s. Anc. Pers. kshatrapa, which becomes satrap, as kshatrya becomes shah. The word comes to us direct from the Greek writers who speak of Persia. But the title occurs not only in the books of Ezra, Esther, and Daniel, but also in the ancient inscriptions, as used by certain lords in Western India, and more precisely in Surashtra or Peninsular Guzarat. Thus, in a celebrated inscription regarding a dam, near Ginnār:

c. a.d. 150.—‘. . . he, the Māhā-Kshatrapa Rudrindūman . . . for the increase of his merit and fame, has rebuilt the embankment three times stronger.’—In Indica Antiquaria, vii. 262. The identity of this with satrap was pointed out by James Prinsep, 130 (ibid. Ant. Soc. Ben. vii. 345). There were two Indian satrap dynasties, viz. the Western Satraps of Surashtra and Gujarāt, from about a.d. 150 to a.d. 358; for which see Rapson and Indrawi, The Western Kshatrapas, J. R. A. S. N. S., 1890, p. 639); and the Northern Kshatrapas of Mathura and the neighbouring territories in the 1st cent. a.d. See articles by Rapson and Indrawi in J. R. A. S. N. S., 1894, pp. 525, 541.

1853.—‘An eminent Greek scholar used to warn his pupils to beware of false analogies in philology. ‘Because,’ he used to say, ‘sarapēs is the Greek for satrap. It does not follow that sarapēs is the Greek for rat-trap.’”—Nat. Rev. July 14, p. 56.
SATSUMA, n.p. Name of a city and formerly of a principality (daimio-ship) in Japan, the name of which is familiar not only from the deplorable necessity of bombarding its capital Kagosima in 1863 (in consequence of the murder of Mr. Richardson, and other outrages, with the refusal of reparation), but from the peculiar cream-coloured pottery made there and now well known in London shops.

1615.—"I said I had received satisfaction at his highest hands in having the good hap to see the face of noe mightie a King as the King of Shashma; whereat he smiled."— Cocks's Diary, i. 4-5.

SAUGOR, SAUGOR ISLAND,
n.p. A famous island at the mouth of the Hoogly R., the site of a great fair and pilgrimage—properly (Ganga Sagara ('Ocean Ganges'). It is said once to have been populous, but in 1688 (the date is clearly wrong) to have been swept by a cyclone-wave.
It is now a dense jungle haunted by tigers.

1683.—"We went in our Budgeros to see ye Pagodas at Sagor, and returned to ye Oyster River, where we got as many Oysters as we desired."—Holles, March 12; [Hak.
Soc. i. 68].

1684.—"James Price assured me that about 40 years since, when ye Island called Gonga Sagur was inhabited, ye Raja of ye Island there yearly Rent out of it, to ye amount of 26 Lacks of Rupees."—Ibid,
Dec. 15; [Hak. Soc. i. 172].

1705.—"Sagore est une Isle où il y a une Pagode très-respectée parmi les Gentils, où ils vont en pelerinage, et où il y a deux Fauqiers qui y font leur residence. Ces Fauqiers savent charmer les âtes forces, qu'on y trouve en quantité, sans quoi ils seroient tous tous jours exposés à estre de-vorez."—Lullier, p. 129.

1727.—"... among the Pagus, the Island Sagor is accounted holy, and great numbers of Joesins go yearly thither in the Months of November and December, to worship and sacrifice in Salt-Water, tho' many of them fall Sacrifices to the hungry Tigers."—
I. Hamilton, ii. 3; [ed. 1744].

SAUL-WOOD, s. Hind, sāl, from Skt. sāla; the timber of the tree Shorea robusta, Gaertner, N.O. Dipteroecarpae, which is the valuable building timber of Northern India.
Its chief habitat is the forest immediately under the Himalaya, at intervals throughout that region from the Brahmaputra to the Bîas; it abounds also in various more southerly tracts between the Ganges and the Godavery.
[The botanical name is taken from Sir John Shore. For the peculiar habitat of the Sāl as compared with the Teak, see Forsyth, Highlands of C.I. 25 seqq.
] It is strong and durable, but very heavy, so that it cannot be floated without more buoyant aids, and is, on that and other accounts, inferior to tea. It does not appear among eight kinds of timber in general use, mentioned in the Ain. The sāl has been introduced into China, perhaps at a remote period, on account of its connection with Buddha's history, and it is known there by the Indian name, so-to (Bretscher on Chinese Botan.
Works, p. 6).

o. 650.—"L'honorable du siècle, animé d'une grande pitié, et obéissant à l'ordre des temps, jugea utile de paraître dans le monde. Quand il eut fini de convertir les hommes, il se plongea dans les joies du Nirvana. Se placent entre deux arbres Sālas. il tourna sa tête vers le nord et s'endormit."—Hooven Tshang, Mémoires (L'voyages des Fel. Boudhh, ii. 340).

1755.—"The produce of the country consists of sāal timbers (a wood equal in quality to the best of our oak)."—Hobert, Hist. Events, &c. i. 200.

1774.—"This continued five kos. towards thence there are sāal and large forest trees."— Ib., in Jackson's Tach. 19.

1810.—"The sāal is a very solid wood
... it is likewise heavy, yet by no means so ponderous as teak; both, like many of our former woods, sink in fresh water."— Williamson, i. M. ii. 69.

SAVER, SYRE, &c., s. Hind. from Arab. sā'īr, a word used technically for many years in the Indian accounts to cover a variety of items of taxation and impost, other than the Land Revenue.

The transitions of meaning in Arabic words are (as we have several times had occasion to remark) very obscure; and until we undertook the investigation of the subject for this article (a task in which we are indebted to the kind help of Sir H. Waterfield, of the India Office, one of the busiest men in the public service, but, as so often happens, one of the readiest to render assistance) the obscurity attaching to the word sayer in this sense was especially great.

Wilson, s.v. says: "In its original purport the word signifies moving, walking, or the whole, the remainder; from the latter it came to denote the remaining, or all other, sources of revenue accruing to the Government in addition to the land-tax." In fact, according to this explanation, the application of the term might be illustrated by the ancient story of a German Professor lecturing on botany in the pre-scientific period. He is reported to have said: 'Every plant, gentlemen, is divided into two parts. This is the root,—and this is the rest of it!' Land revenue was the root, and all else was 'the rest of it.'

Sir C. Trevelyan again, in a passage quoted below, says that the Arabic word has "the same meaning as 'miscellaneous.'" Neither of these explanations, we conceive, pace tantorum virorum, is correct.

The term Sayer in the 15th century was applied to a variety of inland imposts, but especially to local and arbitrary charges levied by zamindars and other individuals, with a show of authority, on all goods passing through their estates by land or water, or sold at markets (bazar, haut, gunge) established by them, charges which formed in the aggregate an enormous burden upon the trade of the country.

Now the fact is that in सैर two old Semitic forms have coalesced in sound though coming from different roots, viz. (in Arabic) السیر, producing ساير, 'walking, current,' and सैर, producing सैर, 'remainder,' the latter being a form of the same word that we have in the Biblical Shear-jashub, 'the remnant shall remain' (Isaiah, vii. 3). And we conceive that the true sense of the Indian term was 'current or customary charges'; an idea that lies at the root of sundry terms of the same kind in various languages, including our own Customs, as well as the dustoory which is so familiar in India. This interpretation is aptly illustrated by the quotation below from Mr. Stuart's Minute of Feb. 10, 1790.

At a later period it seems probable that some confusion arose with the other sense of सैर, leading to its use, more or less, for 'et ceteras,' and accounting for what we have indicated above as erroneous explanations of the word.

I find, however, that the Index and Glossary to the Regulations, ed. 1832 (vol. iii.), defines: "Sayer. What moves. Variable imports, distinct from land-rent or revenue, consisting of customs, tolls, licenses, duties on merchandise, and other articles of personal moveable property; as well as mixed duties, and taxes on houses, shops, bazars, &c." This of course throws some doubt on the rationale of the Arabic name as suggested above.

In a despatch of April 10, 1771, to Bengal, the Court of Directors drew attention to the private Bazar charges, as "a great detriment to the public collections, and a burthen and oppression to the inhabitants"; enjoining that no Bazars or Gunges should be kept up but such as particularly belonged to the Government. And in such the duties were to be rated in such manner as the respective positions and prosperity of the different districts would admit.

In consequence of these instructions it was ordered in 1773 that "all duties coming under the description of sayer Chellunath (H. chalonta, 'in transit'), and Rad-darry (radaree) . . . and other oppressive impositions on the foreign as well as the internal trade of the country" should be abolished; and, to prevent all pretext of injustice, proportional deductions of rent were conceded to the zamindars in the annual collections. Nevertheless the exactions went on much as before, in defiance of this and repeated orders. And in 1786 the Board of Revenue issued a proclamation declaring that any person levying such duties should be subject to corporal punishment, and that the zamindar in whose zemindarry such an offence might be committed, should forfeit his lands.

Still the evil practices went on till 1790, when Lord Cornwallis took up the matter with intelligence and determination. In the preceding year he had abolished all radaree duties in Behar and Benares, but the abuses in Bengal Proper seem to have been more swarming and persistent. On June 11, 1790, orders were issued resuming the collection of all duties indicated into the hands of Government; but this was followed after a few weeks (July 28) by an order abolishing them altogether, with some exceptions, which will be presently alluded to. This double step is explained by the Governor-General in a Minute dated July 18: "When I first proposed the resumption of the Sayer from the Landholders, it appeared to me advisable to continue the former collection (the unauthorised articles excepted) for the current year, in order that by the necessary accounts [we might have the means] for making a fair adjustment of the compensation, and at the same time acquire sufficient knowledge of the collections to enable us to enter upon the regulation of them from the commencement of the ensuing year. . . . The collections appear to be so numerous, and of so intricate a nature, as to preclude the possibility of regulating them all; and as the establishment of new rates for such articles as it might be thought advisable to continue would require much consideration, . . . I recommend that, instead of continuing the collection . . . for the current year . . . all the existing articles of Sayer collection (with the exception of the Abkarry (Abkaree) . . .) be immediately abolished; and that the Collectors be directed to withdraw their officers from the Gunges, Bazars and Hauto" compensation being duly made. The Board of Revenue could then consider on what few articles of luxury in general consumption it might be proper to reimpose a tax.

The Order of July 28 abolished all duties, taxes, and collections coming under the denomination of Sayer (with the exception of the Government and Calcutta Customs, the duties levied on pilgrims at Gya, and other places of pilgrimage,—the Abkarry . . . which is to be collected on account of the Government . . . the collections made in the Gunges, Bazars and Hauto situated within the limits of Calcutta, and such collections as are confirmed to the landholders and the holders of Gunges &c. by the published Resolutions of June 11, 1790, namely, rent paid for the use of land (and the like) . . . or for orchards, pasture-ground, or fisheries sometimes included in the Sayer under the denomination of phulkur (Hind. phalkar, from phal, 'fruit'), baukur (from Hind. ban, 'forest or pasture-ground'), and jalkur (Hind. jallar, from jal, 'water') . . . ." These Resolutions are printed with Regn. XXVII. of 1793.

By an order of the Board of Revenue of April 28, 1790, correspondence regarding Sayer was separated from 'Land Revenue'; and on the 16th idem the Abkarry was separately regulated.

The amount in the Accounts credited as Land Revenue in Bengal seems to have included both Sayer and Abkarry down to the Acts, presented to Parliament in 1796. In the "Abstract Statement of Receipts and Disbursements of the Bengal Government" for 1793-94, the "Collections under head of Sayer and Abkarry" amount to Rs. 10,98,256. In the Accounts, printed in 1799, for 1794-5 to 1796-7, the "Land and Sayer Revenues" are given, but Abkari is not mentioned. Among the Receipts and Disbursements for 1800-1 appears "Syer Collections, including Abkaree, 7,81,925."

These forms appear to have remained in force down to 1833. In the accounts presented in 1834, from 1828-9, to 1831-2, with Estimate for 1832-3, Land Revenue is given separately, and next to it Sayer and Abkaree Revenue. Except that the spelling was altered back to Sayer and Abkarry, this remained till 1856. In 1857 the accounts for 1854-5 showed in separate lines,—

Land Revenue,
Excise Duties, in Calcutta, Sayer Revenue,
Abkarry ditto.

In the accounts for 1861-2 it became—

Land Revenue,
Sayer and Miscellaneous,
Abkaree,

and in those for 1863-4 Sayer vanished altogether.

The term Sayer has been in use in Madras and Bombay as well as in Bengal. From the former we give an example under 1802; from the latter we have not met with a suitable quotation.

The following entries in the Bengal accounts for 1858-59 will exemplify the application of Sayer in the more recent times of its maintenance:—

Under Bengal, Behar and Orissa:

Sale of Trees and Sunken Boats .... Rs. 555 0 0

Under Pegu and Martaban Provinces:

Fisheries .... Rs. 1,22,574 0 2 Tax on Birds’ nests (q.v.) .... 7,449 0 0 on Salt .... 43,061 3 10
Fees for fruits and gardens .... 7,287 9 1
Tax on Bees’ wax .... 1,178 8 0
Do. Collections .... 8,550 0 0
Sale of Government Timbers, &c. .... 4,19,141 12 8

Total .... 6,09,043 1 9

Under the same:

Sale proceeds of unclaimed and contested Timbers .... Rs. 146 11 10
Net Salvage on Drift Timbers .... 2,247 10 0

Total .... 2,394 5 10

1751.—“I have heard that Ramkissen Soot who lives in Calcutta has carried goods to that place without paying the Muzzafabad Sayer Chowkey (chokey) duties.”—Letter from Newsh to Frett. Br. William, in Long, 25.

1788.—“Sairiat—All kinds of taxation besides the land-rent. Sairs.—Any place or office appointed for the collection of duties or customs.”—The Indian Vocabulary, 112.

1790.—“Without entering into a discussion of privileges founded on Custom, and of which it is easier to ascertain the abuse than the origin, I shall briefly remark on the Collections of Sayer, that while they remain in the hands of the Zemindars, every effort to free the internal Commerce from the benevolent effects of their vexatious impositions must necessarily prove abortive.”—Minute by the Hon. C. Stuart, dd. Feb. 10, quoted by Lord Cornwallis in his Minute of July 18.

... “The Board last day very humbly and politically recommended unanimously the abolition of the Sayer.

“The statement of Mr. Mercer from Burdwan makes all the Sayer (consisting of a strange medley of articles taxable, not omitting even Hermaphrodites) amount only to 53,000 Rupees ...”—Minute by Mr. Law of the Bd. of Revenue, forwarded by the Board, July 12.

1792.—“The Jumna on which a settlement for 10 years has been made is about 1793.—“A Regulation for re-enacting with alterations and modifications, the Rules passed by the Governor General in Council on 11th June and 28th July, 1790, and subsequent dates, for the resumption and abolition of Sayer, or internal Duties and Taxes throughout Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa,” &c. “Passed by the Governor General in Council on the Ist May, 1793. ...”—Title of Regulation, XXVII. of 1793.

1802.—“The Government having reserved to itself the entire exercise of its discretion in continuing or abolishing partly or permanently, the articles of revenue included according to the custom and practice of the country, under the several heads of salt and saltpetre—of the sayer or duties by sea or land—of the abkarry ... of the excise ...—of all takes personal and professional, as well as those derived from markets, fairs and bazaars—of lukkimi (see LACKERAGE) lands. ... The permanent land-tax shall be made exclusively of the said articles now recited.”—Madras Regulation, XXV. § iv.

1817.—“Besides the land-revenue, some other duties were levied in India, which were generally included under the denomination of Sayer.”—Mill, H. of Br. Ind. v. 417.

1863.—“The next head was ‘Sayer,’ an obsolete Arabic word, which has the same meaning as miscellaneous. It has latterly been composed of a variety of items connected with the Land Revenue, of which the Revenue derived from Forests has been the most important. The progress of improvement has given a value to the Forests which they never had before, and it has been determined ... to constitute the Revenue derived from them a separate head of the Public Accounts. The other Miscellaneous Items of Land Revenue which appeared under ‘Sayer,’ have therefore been added to Land Revenue, and what remains has been denominated ‘Forest Revenue.’”—Sir C. Trevelyan, Financial Statement, dd. April 30.

SCAVENGER. s. We have been rather startled to find among the MS. records of the India Office, in certain “Lists of Persons in the Service of the Right. Honble, the East India Company, in Fort St. George, and the other Places on the Coast of Choromandell,” begin-Scaevenger. 802

Scaevenger.

From the Belgick Saxon, to scrape. Two of every Parish within London and the suburbs are yearly chosen into this Office, who hire men called Rakers, and carts, to cleanse the streets, and carry away the Dirt and Filth thereof, mentioned in 11 Car. 2, cap. 2. The Germans call him a Dericksman, from one Simon, a noted Scaevenger of Markyng.

"Schatfaldus, The officer who collected the Scaevage-Money, which was sometimes done with Extortion and great Oppression." (Then quotes Hist. of Durham from Wharton, Anglia Sacra, Pt. i. p. 75: "Anno 1311. Sehavaldos insurgentes in Episcopatu (Richardus episcopus) fortiter composit. Abiqui suspendebantur, aliqui extra Episcopatum fugabantur.")

In Spelman also (Glossarium Archiologiaen, 1688) we find:—

"Scaevaginum. Tributum quod a mercatoribus exigere solent nondumcarum domini, ob licentiam proponendi ibidem venditioni mercionia, a Saxon (scaewian) id est. Ostenderre, insipere, Angl. schtuage and shuage." Spelman has no Scaevenger or Scaevenger.

The scavenger then was a tax upon goods for sale which were liable to duty, the word being, as Skeat points out, a Law French (or Low Latin) formation from shewe. ["From O.F. scuvacery, to examine, inspect. O. Sax. skavon, to behold; cognate with A.S. skuvon, to look at." (Concise Dict. s.v.)] And the scavenger or scavenger was originally the officer charged with the inspection of the goods and collection of this tax. Passages quoted below from the Liber Albus of the City of London refer to these officers, and Mr. Riley in his translation of that work (1861, p. 34) notes that they were "Officers whose duty it was originally to take custom upon the Scaevanger, i.e. inspection of the opening out of imported goods. At a later date, part of their duty was to see that the streets were kept clean; and hence the modern word 'scavenger,' whose office corresponds with the raker (raker) of former times." The meaning and derivation of this word have been discussed in Notes & Queries, 2 ser. ix. 323; 5 ser. v. 49, 152.

We can hardly doubt then that the office of the Covenantal scavenger of the 18th century, united as we find it with that of "Rental General," or of Land-customer, and held by a senior member of the Company's Covenanted Service, must be understood in the older sense of Visitor or Inspector of Goods subject to duties, but (till we can find more light) we should suppose rather duties of the nature of bazar tax, such as at a later date we find classed as sayer (q.v.), than customs on imports from scavard. It still remains an obscure matter how the charge of the scavengers or scavengers came to be transferred to the oversight of streets and street-cleaning. That this must have become a predominate part of their duty at an early period is shown by the Scavenger's Oath which we quote below from the Liber Albis. In Skinner's Etymologieum, 1671, the definition is Collecter sorarium abrasorum (erroneously connecting the word with shaving and scraping), while he adds: "Nosti Scavengers villisimo omnium ministerio sordes et purgamenta urbis abuerendi funguntur." In Cotgrave's English-French Dict., ed. by Howel, 1673, we have: "Scavenger. Bouteur. Gadouard."—agreeing precisely with our modern use. Neither of these shows any knowledge of the less sordid office attaching to the name. The same remark applies to Lye's Junius, 1743. It is therefore remarkable to find such a survival of the latter sense in the service of the Company, and coming down so late as 1761. It must have begun with the very earliest of the Company's establishments in India, for it is probable that the denomination was even then only a survival in England, due to the Company's intimate connection with the city of London. Indeed we learn from Mr. Norton, quoted below, that the term scavenger was still alive within the City in 1829.

Prior to 1419. —"Et debent ad dictum Wardemutum per Aldermanum et proboe Wardae, nemo ne juratores, eligit Consulbarii, Scavegeours, Aleconners, Bedelle, et ali officiarii."—Liber Albis, p. 35.

"SEREMENT DE Scavagours. Vous jurez que vous surveillez diligentement que lez paviments danz vostre Garde soient bien et droitement reparillez et nettez enhauzez a nosance des veysens; et que lez chemyns, rues, et vennelles soient nettez de feus et de tous marais dez ordures, pur honestee de la citee; et que toz les chymneyes, fournes, terrailles soient de pie, et suffisamment defensables encontre peril de fez; et si vous trouvez rien a contraire vous monstrez al Alderman, issant que l'Alderman ordonnoy par amendement de celle. Et ces ne fersez—si Dieu vous eyde et lez Saintz."—Ibid., p. 313.

1594. — Letter from the Lords of the Council to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, requesting them to admit John de Cardenas to the office of Collector of Scavage, the reversion of which had been granted to him.—Index to the Remembrancia of the C. of London (1578), p. 234.

1607. — Letter from the Lord Mayor to the Lord Treasurer . . . enclosing a Petition from the Ward of Aldergate, complaining that William Court, an inhabitant of that Ward for 8 or 10 years past, refused to undergo the office of Scavenger in the Parish, claiming exemption . . . being privileged as Clerk to Sir William Spencer, Knight, one of the Auditors of the Court of Exchequer, and praying that Mr. Court, although privileged, should be directed to find a substitute or deputy and pay him.—Ibid., 288.

1628. — Letter . . . reciting that the City by ancient Charters held . . . the office of Package and Scavage of Strangers' goods, and merchandise carried by them by land or water, out of the City and Liberties to foreign parts, whereby the Customs and Duties due to H.M. had been more duly paid, and a stricter oversight taken of such commodities so exported.—Remembrancia, p. 321.

1632. — Order in Council, reciting that a Petition had been presented to the Board from divers Merchants born in London, the sons of Strangers, complaining that the "Packer of London required of them as much fees for Package, Ballaige, Shewage, &c., as of strangers not English-born . . ."—Ibid., 322.

1769. — Mr. Handle, applying to the Board to have his allowance of Scavenger increased, and representing to us the great fatigue he undergoes, and loss of time, which the Board being very sensible of, agreed we allow him Rs. 20 per month more than before on account of his diligence and assiduity in that post."—F. William Cons., in Long, 215. It does not appear from this what the duties of the scavenger in Mr. Handle's case were.

1789. — "The oversight of customizable goods. This office, termed in Latin supercus, is translated in another charter by the words search and surveying, and in the 2nd Charter of Charles I. it is termed the scavage, which appears to have been its most ancient and common name, and that which is retained to the present day. . . . The real nature of this duty is not a toll for surveying, but a toll paid for the oversight of surveying; and under that name (supercus apersonis) it was claimed in an action of debt in the reign of Charles II. . . . The duty performed was seeing and knowing the merchandise on which the King's import customs were paid, in order that no enhancement, or fraudulent practice . . . should deprive the King of his just dues . . . (The duty) was well known under the name of scavage, in the time of Henry III. . . . and it seems at that time to have been a franchise of the commonalty."—G. Norton, Commentaries on the Hist., &c., of the City of London, 3rd ed. (1669), pp. 350-351.

SCRIVAN, s. An old word for a clerk or writer, from Port. escritóu.

[1615.—]"He desired that some English might early on the Morow come to his house, when should meete a Scrivano and finish that business."—Sir T. Ros, Hak. Soc. i.173. On the same page "The Scrivane of Zulpheecaroon."

1673.—"In some Places they write on Cocoa-Leafes dried, and then use an Iron Style, or else on Paper, when they use a Pen made with a Reed, for which they have a Brass Case, which holds them and the Ink too, always stuck at the Girdles of their Scrivans."—Fryer, 191.

1683.—"Mr. Watson in the Taffaty ware-house without any provocation called me Pittyful Prodigall Scrivan, and told me my Hatt stood too high upon my head. . . ."—Letter of S. Langley, in Hedges' Diary, Sept. 5; [Hak. Soc. i. 108].

SCYMITAR, s. This is an English word for an Asiatic sabre. The common Indian word was tulwar (see TULWAUR). We get it through the French cimeterre, Italic. scimètare, and according to Marcel Devie originally from Pers. shamsir (chimshir as he writes it). This would be still very obscure unless we consider the constant clerical confusion in the Middle Ages between e and t, which has led to several metamorphoses of words; of which a notable example is Fr. cérquois from Pers. tirkash, scimètra representing shamsir might easily thus become seimètra. But we cannot prove this to have been the real origin. This word (shamsir) was known to Greek writers. Thus:

A.D. 114.—"Δώρα φέρει Τραβανό ψάρματα σημικα κα καί σαμψήρας αί δε εἰσί σπάθαι βαρβαρικά."—Quoted in Suidas Lexicon, s.v.

1595.—"... By this scimitar, That slew the Sophia, and a Persh prince That won three fields of Sultan Soliman..."—Merchant of Venice, ii. 1.

1610.—"... Anon the Patron starting up, as if of a socain restored to life; like a mad man skips into the boate, and drawing a Turkise Cymiter beginneth to lay about him (thinking that his vessell had been surprised by Pirats), when they all leapt into the sea; and dうing under water like so many Diue-dappers, ascended without the reach of his furie."—Sandys, Relation, sce. 1613, p. 28.

1614.—"Some days ago I visited the house of a goldsmith to see a scimitar (scimitara) that Nasubhashá the first vizir, whom I have mentioned above, had ordered as a present to the Grand Signor. Scabbard and hilt were all of gold; and all covered with diamonds, so that little or nothing of the gold was to be seen."—P. della Valle, i. 43.

c. 1630.—"They seldome go without their swords (shamsheers) they call them) form'd like a crescent, of pure metall, broad, and sharper than any raser; nor do they value them, unless at one blow they can cut in two an Asigeon. ..."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, p. 228.

1675.—"I kept my hand on the Cock of my Carabine; and my Comrade followed a foot pace, as well armed; and our January better than either of us both; but our Armenian had only a Scimèter."—(Sir) George Herber, Journey into Greece, London, 1682, p. 222.

1758.—"The Captain of the troop... made a cut at his head with a scymetar which Mr. Lally parried with his stick, and a Coffee (Caffer) servant who attend him shot the Tanjerine dead with a pistol."—Orme, i. 328.

SEACUNNY, s. This is, in the phraseology of the Anglo-Indian marine, a steer-man or quartermaster. The word is the Pers. sukkin, from Ar. sukkan, 'a helm.'

c. 1580.—"Aos Mocdães, Socões, e Vogas."—Primer ou Hora, sce. f. 68c. ("To the Mocduums, Seacunnis, and oarsmen.")

c. 1590.—"Sukkàngir, or helmman. He steers the ship according to the orders of the Mállin."—Ibn, i. 280.

1805.—"I proposed concealing myself with 5 men among the hales of cloth, till it should be night, when the Frenchmen being necessarily divided into two watches might be easily overpowered. This was agreed to... till daybreak, when unfortunately desiring the masts of a vessel on our weather beam, which was immediately supposed to be our old friend, the sentiments of every person underwent a most unfortunate alteration, and the Nakhoda, and the Soucan, as well as the Supercargo, informed me that they would not tell a lie for all the world, even to save their lives; and in short, that they would neither build airt nor paint in the business."—Letter of Legden, dd. Oct. 4-7, in Morton's Life.
SEBUNDY. s. Hind. from Pers. सिखङ्दी (sibhandi, "three"). The rationale of the word is obscure to us. [Platts says it means "three-monthly or quarterly payment." The Madras Gloss. less probably suggests Pers. सिखङ्दा (see SEPOY), "recruitment."]

It is applied to irregular native soldiery, a sort of militia, or imperfectly disciplined troops for revenue or police duties, &c. Certain local infantry regiments were formerly officially termed Sebundy. The last official appearance of the title that we can find is in application to the Sebundy Corps of Sappers and Miners employed at Darjeeling. This is in the E.I. Register down to July, 1869, after which the title does not appear in any official list. Of this corps, if we are not mistaken, the late Field-Marshal Lord Napier of Magdala was in charge, as Lieut. Robert Napier, about 1840. An application to Lord Napier, for corroboration of this reminiscence of many years back, drew from him the following interesting note:

"Captain Gilmore of the (Bengal) Engineers was appointed to open the settlement of Darjeeling, and to raise two companies of Sebundy Sappers, in order to provide the necessary labour. He commenced the work, obtained some (Native) officers and N.C. officers from the old Bengal sappers, and enlisted about half of each company.

"The first season found the little colony quite unprepared for the early commencement of the Rains. All the Coolies, who did not die, fled, and some of the Sappers deserted. Gilmore got sick: and in 1838 I was suddenly ordered from the extreme border of Bengal—Neycullo— to relieve him for one month. I arrived somehow, with a pair of pitarabs as my sole possession. Just then, our relations with Nepaul became strained, and it was thought desirable to complete the Sebundy Sappers with men from the Border Hills disconnected with Nepaul—Garrows and similar tribes. Through the Political Officer the necessary number of men were enlisted and sent to me. When they arrived I found, instead of the 'fair recruits' announced, a number of most untutored men; some of them mere or less crippled, or with defective sight. It seemed probable that, by the process known to us in india as sadhi, बूढ़ी (see BUDLEE), the original recruits had managed to insert substitutes during the journey! I was much embarrassed as to what I should do with them: but night was coming on, so I encamped them on the newly opened road, the only clear space amid the dense jungle on either side. To complete my difficulty it began to rain, and I pitied my poor recruits! During the night there was a storm—and in the morning, to my intense relief, they had all disappeared!

"In the expressive language of my sergeant, there was not a sapper of the men left.

The Sebundes were a local corps, designed to furnish a body of labourers fit for mountain-work. They were armed, and expected to fight if necessary. Their pay was £3s. a month, instead of a Sepoy's 7s. The pensions of the Native officers were smaller than in the regular army, which was a ground of complaint with the Bengal Sappers, who never expected in accepting the new service that they would have lower pensions than those of the regular Sepoys.

"I eventually completed the corps with Nepaulese, and, I think, left them in a satisfactory condition.

"I was for a long time their only sergeant-major. I supplied the Native officers and N.C. officers from India with a good pea-jacket each, out of my private means, and with a little gold-lace made them smart and happy.

"When I visited Darjeeling again in 1852, I found the remnant of my good Sapper officers living as pensioners, and waiting to give me an affectionate welcome.

"My month's acting appointment was turned into four years. I walked 30 miles to get to the place, lived much in hovels and temporary huts thrown up by my Hill-men, and derived more benefit from the climate than from my previous visit to England. I think I owe much practical knowledge of the Hill-men, the Hills and the Climate. I learnt the worst the elements could do to me—very nearly—excepting earthquakes! And I think I was thus prepared for any hard work."

C. 1783. "At Dacca I made acquaintance with my venerable friend John Cowe. He had served in the Navy so far back as the memorable siege of Havannah, was reduced when a lieutenant, at the end of the American War, went out in the Company's military service, and here I found him in command of a regiment of Sebundees, or native militia."—Hon. R. Lindsay, in L. of the Lindsays, iii. 101.

1755. "The Board were pleased to direct that in order to supply the place of the Sebundy corps, four regiments of Septoys be employed in securing the collection of the revenues."—In India. 92.

"One considerable charge upon the Nabob's country was for extraordinary sabbendees, sepoys and horsemen, who appear to us to be a very unnecessary incumbrance upon the revenue."—Append. to SEEDY. s. Hind. siddi; Arab. sajjd, 'lord' (whence the Cid of Spanish romantic history), sajjid, 'my lord'; and Mahr. siddi. Properly an honorific name given in Western India to African Mahommedans, of whom many held high positions in the service of the kings of the Deccan. Of these at least one family has survived in princely position to our own day, viz., the Nawab of Jangira (see JUNGEERA), near Bombay. The young heir to this principality, Siddhi Ahmad, after a minority of some years, was installed in the Government in Oct., 1883. But the proper application of the word in the ports and on the shipping of Western India is to negroes in general. [It "is a title still applied to holy men in Morocco and the Maghrib; on the East African coast it is assumed by negro and negroid Moslems, e.g. Sidi Mubarak Bombay; and 'Seedy boy' is the Anglo-Indian term for a Zanzibaranman" (Burton, Ar. Nights, iv. 231.).]

SEEMUL, SIMMUL, &c. (sometimes we have seen Symbol, and Cymbal), s. Hind. semal and sembhal; [Skt. sāmal]. The (so-called) cotton-tree Bombax Malabaricum, D.C. (N.O. Malvaceae), which occurs sporadically from Malabar to Sylhet, and from Burma to the Indus and beyond. It is often cultivated. "About March it is a striking object with its immense buttressed trunks, and its large showy red flowers, 6 inches in breadth, clustered on the leafless branches. The flower-buds are used as a potherb and the gum as a medicine" (Punjab Plants). We remember to have seen a giant of this species near Kishangan, the buttresses of which formed chambers, 12 or 13 feet long and 7 or 8 wide. The silky cotton is only used for stuffing pillows and the like. The wood, though wretched in quality for any ordinary purpose, lasts under water, and is commonly the material for the curbs on which wells are built and sunk in Upper India.

[c. 1807.—"... the Salmoi, or Simul... is one of the most gaudy ornaments of the forest or village."—Buchanan Hamilton, E. India, ii. 729.]

SEER. s. Hind. ser; Skt. setak. One of the most generally spread Indian denominations of weight, though, like all Indian measures, varying widely in different parts of the country. And besides the variations of local ser and ser we often find in the same locality a pucka (pucka) and a kochchhā (cutcha) ser; a state of things, however, which is human, and not Indian only (see under PUCKA). The ser is generally (at least in upper India) equivalent to 80 tolas or rupee-weights; but even this is far from universally true. The heaviest ser in the Useful Tables (see Thomas's ed. of Prinsep) is that called "Coolpahar," equivalent to 123 tolas, and weighing 3 lbs. 1 oz. 6 dr. avoid. The lightest is the ser of Malabar and the S. Mahratta country, which is little more than 8 oz. [The Maceed ser of Malabar, introduced in 1802, is of 130 tolas; 10 of these weigh 33 lb. (Madras Mun. ii. 516).]

Regulation VII. of the Govt. of India of 1833 is entitled "A Reg. for altering the weight of the Furruckabah Rupee (see RUPEE) and for assimilating it to the legal currency of the Madras and Bombay Presidencies; for adjusting the weight of the Company's sicca Rupee, and for fixing a standard unit of weight for India." This is the nearest thing to the establishment of standard weights that existed up to 1870. The preamble says: "It is further convenient to introduce the weight of the Furruckabah Rupee as the unit of a general system of weights for Government transactions throughout India." And Section IV. contains the following:

"The Tola or Sicca weight to be equal to 180 grains troy, and the other denominations or weights to be derived from this unit, according to the following scale:—

8 Rutties = 1 Ma-ha = 15 troy grains.
12 Mashas = 1 Tola = 150 ditto.
80 Tolas (or sicca weight) = 1 Seer = 1/2 lbs. troy.
40 Seers = 1 Mann or Bazar Maund = 100 lbs. troy."

Section VI. of the same Regulation says:

"The system of weights and measures (!) described in Section IV. is to be adopted at the mints and assay offices of Calcutta and Saugor respectively in the adjustment and verification of all weights for government or public purposes sent thither for examination."

But this does not go far in establishing a standard unit of weight for India: though the weights detailed in § iv. became established for Government purposes in the Bengal Presidency. The ser of this Regulation was thus 14,400 grains troy—2 1/2 lbs. troy, 2057 lbs. avoirdupois.

In 1870, in the Government of Lord Mayo, a strong movement was made by able and influential men to introduce the metrical system, and an Act was passed called "The Indian Weights and Measures Act" (Act XI. of 1870) to pave the way for this. The preamble declares it expedient to provide for the ultimate adoption of an uniform system of weights and measures throughout British India, and the Act prescribes certain standards, with powers to the Local Governments to declare the adoption of these.

Section II. runs:

"Standard.—The primary standard of weight shall be called ser, and shall be a weight of metal in the possession of the Government of India, which weight, when weighed in a vacuum, is equal to the weight known in France as the kilogramme des Archives."
Again, Act XXXI. of 1872, called "The Indian Weights and Measures of Capacity Act," repeats in substance the same preamble and prescription of standard weight. It is not clear to us what the separate object of this second Act was. But with the death of Lord Mayo the whole scheme fell to the ground. The ser of these Acts would be = 2:2 lbs. avoidrupois, or 0:1-13 of a pound greater than the 80 tola ser.

SEER-FISH, s. A name applied to several varieties of fish, species of the genus Cybium. When of the right size, neither too small nor too big, these are reckoned among the most delicate of Indian sea-fish. Some kinds salt well, and are also good for preparing as Tamarind-Fish. The name is sometimes said to be a corruption of Pers. sīaḥ (qu. Pers. "black") but the quotations show that it is a corruption of Port. sera. That name would appear to belong properly to the well-known saw-fish (Prionus)—see Bluteau, quoted below; but probably it may have been applied to the fish now in question, because of the serrated appearance of the rows of finlets, behind the second dorsal and anal fins, which are characteristic of the genus (see Day's Fishes of India, pp. 254-256, and plates lv., lvi.).

SEERPRAW, s. Pers. through Hind, sar-ul-pål — "cap-a-pie." A complete suit, presented as a Khilot (Killut) or dress of honour, by the sovereign or his representative.

c. 1666.—"He... commanded, there should be given to each of them an embroidered Vest, a Turbant, and a Girdle of Leather, with a Coverlet, which is that which they call Ser apah, that is, an Habit from head to foot."—Bernier, E.T. 37; [ed. Constable, 147].

SEETULPUTTY, s. A fine kind of mat made especially in Eastern Bengal, and used to sleep on in the cold weather. [They are made from the split stems of the mukta pata, Phrynium dichotomum, Roxb. (see Watt, Econ. Dict., vi. pt. i. 216 seq.)] Hind. situlpati, 'cold-slip.' Williamson's spelling and derivation (from an Arab. word impossibly used, see SICCLEGUR) are quite erroneous.

1810.—"A very beautiful species of mat is made... especially in the south-eastern districts... from a kind of reedy grass... These are peculiarly slippery, whence they are designated 'seekul-putty' (i.e. polished sheets)... The principal uses of the 'seekul-putty' are to be laid under the lower sheet of a bed, thereby to keep the body cool."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 41.

[1818.—"Another kind (of mat) the sheetulpatcess, laid on beds and couches on account of their coolness, are sold from one ropee to five each."—Ward, Hindoos, i. 106.]

1879.—In Fahlon's Dicty, we find the following Hindi riddle:—

"Chitā kā piyaṭā tā, kā jōptā nāhīn;
Mālījī kā bāg lapā, koi toptā nāhīn;
Situl-patī bāhātī, koi sātā nāhīn;
Rāy-hānī mātā, koi rotā nāhīn."

Which might be rendered:

"A china bowl that, broken, none can join;
A flowery field, whose blossoms none purloin;
A royal scion slain, and none shall weep;
A situlpatti spread where none shall sleep."

The answer is an Egg: the Starry Sky: a Snake (Raj-bansh, 'royal scion,' in a placatory name for a snake): and the Sea.

SEMBALL, s. Malay-Javan, sambil, simbal. A spiced condiment, the curry of the Archipelago. [Dennys (Deser. Dict. p. 337) describes many varieties.]

1817.—"The most common seasoning employed to give a relish to their insipid food is the hombock (i.e. red-pepper) triturated with salt: it is called sambel."—Raffles, H. of Java, i. 98.

SEPOY. SEAPPO. s. In Anglo-Indian use a native soldier, disciplined and dressed in the European style. The word is Pers. sipāh, from sipah, 'soldiery, an army'; which J. Oppert traces to old Pers. spāda, 'a soldier' (Le peuple et la Langue des Médéas, 1879, p. 24). But Shah is a horseman in Armenian; and sound etymologists connect sipāh with asy, 'a horse'; [others with Skt. padatī, 'a foot-soldier']. The original word sipāh occurs frequently in the poems of Amir Khusrū (c. A.D. 1300), bearing always probably the sense of a 'horse-soldier,' for all the important part of an army then consisted of horsemen. See sipāh below.

The word sepoy occurs in Southern India before we had troops in Bengal; and it was probably adopted from Portuguese. We have found no English example in print older than 1750, but probably an older one exists. The India Office record of 1747 from Fort St. David's is the oldest notice we have found in extant MS. [But see below.]

c. 1300.—"Pride had inflated his brain with wind, which extinguished the light of his intellect, and a few sipāhis from Hindustan, without any religion, had supported the credit of his authority."—Amir Khusrū, in Elliot, iii. 596.

1862.—"As soon as these letters were sent away, I went immediately to Ray Nundelall's to have ye seapay or Nabob's horseman, consigned to me, with order to see ye Perramana put in execution; but having thought better of it, ye Ray desired me to have patience till tomorrow morning. He would then present me to the Nabob, whose commands to ye seapay and Bulchands Vekh would be more powerful and advantageous to me than his own."—Hodges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 55, seq. Here we see the word still retaining the sense of 'horseman' in India.

[1717.—"A Company of Sepoys with the colours,"—Yule, in detla, ii. 1ccxl. On this Sir H. Yule notes: "This is an occurrence of the word sepop in its modern signification, five years earlier than any I had been able to find when publishing the A.-1. Gloss. I have one a year earlier, and expect now to find it earlier still."

[1783.—"You are next... to make a complete survey... of the number of fighting Sepoys..."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, ii. 55.]

1787.—"Ello com tota la força despinel, que eram 1156 soldados pagos em que entraram 281 chegados na mão Meres, e 759 sypaes na bascarina d'ascar, recuperam o territorio."—Exposiçao das Possesoes Portuguezes no Oriente, Soc. por João Maria Polidoro, Christiano Soares, Lisboa, 1851, p. 55.

1746.—"The Enemy, by the best Intelligence that could be got, and best Intelligence that could be formed, had or would have on Shore next Morning, upwards of 3000 Europoens, with at least 500 Cofigas, and a number of Cephoys and Peons."—Ext. of Present:—

Charles Flover, Esq., Governor.
George Gibson John Holland
John Crompton John Rodolph de Gingens
William Brown John Usgate Robert Sanderson.

"It is further ordered that Capt.
Crompton keep the Detachment under his Command at Cuddalore, in a readiness to march to the Choultry over against the Fort as soon as the Signal shall be made from the Place, and then upon his firing two Muskets, Boats shall be sent to bring them there, and to leave a serjeant at Cuddalore Who shall conduct his Seapilas to the Garden Guard, and the Serjeant shall have a Word by which He shall be received at the Garden."—Original MS.
Proceedings (in the India Office).

The Council of Fort St. David write to Bombay, March 10th, "if they could not supply us with more than 300 Europeans, We should be glad of Five or Six Hundred of the best Northern People their way, as they are reported to be much, better than ours, and not so liable to Desertion."

In Cebu, May 30th they record the arrival of the ships Leven, Wreath, and Hebetor, Princess Augusta, "on the 28th inst., from Bombay, (bringing) us a General from that Presidency," as entered No. 38, advising of having sent us by them sundry stores and a Reinforcement of Men, consisting of 70 European Soldiers, 200 Topasses (Topaz), and 100 well-trained Seapilas, all of which under the command of Capt.
Thomas Andrews, a Good Officer. . . .

And under July 13th. . . . The Re-forcement of Seapilas having arrived from Tillykerry, which, with those that were sent from Bombay, making a formidable Body, besides what are still expected and as there is far greater Dependence to be placed on these People than on our own Peons . . . many of whom have a very weakly Appearance, AGREED, that a General Review be now had of them, that all such may be discharged, and only the Choicest of them continued in the Service."—MS.
Records in India Office.

1752.—". . . they quitted their entrenchments on the first day of March, 1752, and advanced in order of battle, taking possession of a rising ground on the right, on which they placed 50 Europeans; the front

[1759.—"Beat rice extraordinary for the Gento Seapie. . . ."—Ibid. 174.]

1763.—"The Indian natives and Moors, who are trained in the European manner, are called Seapilas."—Orme, i. 80.

1763.—"Major Carmoe . . . observes that your establishment is loaded with the con-spiration of more Captains than need be, owing to the unnecessarily making it a point that they should be Captains who command the Seapilas Battalions, whereas such is the nature of Seapilas that it requires a peculiar genius and talent to be qualified for that service, and the Battalion should be given only to such who are so without regard to rank."—Cour's Letter, of March 1770.—"England has at present in India an establishment to the amount of 9800 European troops, and 54,000 sipoys well armed and disciplined."—Bengal (iv. 1771),

i. 459.

1774.—"Sipai sono il soldati Indians."— Delia Tombo, 297.

1778.—"La porta del ponente della città si custodiva dalli sipaisi soldati Indians radunati da tutte le tribù, e religioni."— 1780.—"Next morning the seopy came to see me. . . . I told him that I owed him my life. . . . He then told me that he was not very rich himself, as his pay was only a pagoda and a half a month—and at the same time drew out his purse and offered me a rupee. This generous behaviour, so different to what I had hitherto experienced, drew tears from my eyes, and I thanked him for his generosity, but I would not take his money."—Hon. J. Lindsay's Improvisment, Lives of Lithings, iii. 274.

1782.—"As to Europeans who run from their natural colours, and enter into the service of the country powers, I have heard one of the best officers the Company ever had . . . say that he considered them no otherwise than as so many Seapilas; for acting under blacks they became mere blacks in spirit."—Price, Some Observations, 95-96.

1789.—"There was not a captain, nor scarce a seapoy but a Prince would depose, or a Brahmit destroy."—Letter of Simphin the Second, &c., 8.

1803.—"Our troops behaved admirably the seapies astonished me."—Williamson ii. 384 1827. — "He was betrothed to the daughter of a Sipahie, who served in the mud-fort which they saw at a distance rising above the jungle."—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiii.

1856. — "The native army of the E. I. Company. . . Their formation took place in 1571. They are usually called sepoys, and are light and short."—In R. Phillipe, A Million of Facts, 718.

1851. — "As early as a.d. 1592 the chief of Sind had 200 natives dressed and armed like Europeans: these were the first 'sepoys.'"—Barton's Camera, A Commentary, ii. 445.

The French write cipaye or cipai:

1759. — "De quinze mille Cipayes dont l'armée est censée composée, j'en compte à peu près huit cents sur la route de Pondichery, chargé de sucre et de poivre et autres marchandises, quant aux Couils. Ils sont tous employés pour le même objet."—Letter of Lally to the Governor of Pondicherry, in Cambridge's Account, p. 150.

v. 1855-58.

"Il ne crient ni Kriss ni zagaies, il regarde l'homme sans fuir, Et rit des balles des cipayes Qui rebondissent sur son cuir."—Th. Gautier, L'Hippopotame.

Since the conquest of Algeria the same word is common in France under another form, viz., spahi. But the Spahi is totally different from the sepoy, and is in fact an irregular horseman. With the Turks, from whom the word is taken, the spahi was always a horseman.

1564. — "Adrant magnus numeribus praepositum multi, aderant prouteriani equites omnes Spahi. Garipigi, Cubafici, Glanizarum magnus numerus, sed nullus in tanto cavally neque nisi ex suis virtutibus et fortibus factis."—Ibn-Sina, Epistola, i. 99.

1562. — "The Spachi, and other orders of horsemen."—J. State, Tres Comas. (Tr.) fol. 53 ro. State, Dict. where many early instances of the word will be found.

1572. — "Mille ou quinze cents Spahiz, tous bien équipés et bien montés . . . terminoient toute cette longue, magnifique, et pompeuse cavalcade."—Journal d'Art. Galland, i. 142.

1675. — "The other officers are the sirdar (Sirdar), who commands the Janizaries . . . the Spahi Aga, who commands the Spahies or Turkish Horse."—Wheel's Journal, 448.

1686. — "I being providentially got over the river before the Spie employed by them could give them intelligence."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 228.

1738. — "The Arab and other inhabitants are obliged, either by long custom . . . or from fear and compulsion, to give the Sapehes and their company the waarden . . . . . which is such a sufficient quantity of provision for ourselves, together with straw and barley for our mules and horses."—Shaw's Travels inBarbary, ed. 1757, p. xii.

1786. — "Bajazet had two years to collect his forces . . . we may discriminate the janizaries . . . a national cavalry, the Spahies of modern times."—Gibbon, ch. lxxv.

1877. — "The regular cavalry was also originally composed of tribute children. . . . The sipahis acquired the same pre-eminence among the cavalry, which the janissaries held among the infantry, and their seditious conduct rendered them much sooner troublesome to the Government."—Finlay, H. of Græc, ed. 1877, v. 37.

SERAI, SERYE. s. This word is used to represent two Oriental words entirely different.

a. Hind. from Pers. sārā, sārāi. This means originally an edifice, a palace. It was especially used by the Tartars when they began to build palaces. Hence sārān, the name of more than one royal residence of the Mongol Khans upon the Volga, the Serra of Chaucer. The Russians retained the word from their Tartar oppressors, but in their language sārāi has been degraded to mean 'a shed.'

The word, as applied to the Palace of the Grand Turk, became, in the language of the Levantine Franks, servel and servaglio. In this form, as P. della Valle lucidly explains below, the "striving after meaning" connected the word with Ital. serva, 'shut up'; and with a word servaglio perhaps previously existing in Italian in that connection. [Servaglio, according to Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v.) is formed with suffix-aglio (L. aculum) from Late Lat. servo, 'to bar, shut in.'—Lat. serva, a 'bar, bolt'; Lat. serva, 'to join together.'] It is this association that has attached the meaning of 'women's apartments' to the word. Servai has no such specific sense.

But the usual modern meaning in Persia, and the only one in India, is that of a building for the accommodation of travellers with their pack-animals; consisting of an enclosed yard with chambers round it.

Recurring to the Italian use, we have seen in Italy the advertisement of a travelling menagerie as Servaglio di Buffo. A friend tells us of an old Scotchman whose ideas must have run in this groove, for he used to talk of a Servaglio of blackguards.' In the Diary in England of Annibale Litolfi of Mantua the writer says: “On entering the tower there is a Serraglio in which, from grandeur, they keep lions and tigers and cat-lions.” (See Roomen Brown’s Calendar of Papers in Archives of Venice, vol. vi. pt. iii. 1557-8. App.) [The Stauff. Dict. quotes Evelyn as using the word of a place where persons are confined: 1644. “I passed by the Piazza Judea, where their serraglio begins” (Diary, ed. 1872, i. 142.)]

c. 1584. — At Saraium Turcis palatium principis est, vel alium amplum aedificium, non a Geevo vocari Tatarica, quae regem significat, dictum; vnde Reinecoins Saraglion Turcis vocari patet, ut regiam. Nam alia quoque domus, extra Sultani regiam, nomen hoc ferent... vt ampla Turcorum hospitia, sive diversoria publica, quae vulgo Caravanseris (Caravansery) nostris vocant.
— Roomen Brown, ed. 1650, p. 403.

1609. — by it the great Suray, besides which are divers others, both in the city and suburbs, wherein divers neat lodgings are to be let, with doo res, lockes, and keys to each.” — W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 434.

1614.— “This term Serraglio so much used among us in speaking of the Grand Turk’s dwelling... has been corrupted into that form from the word serai, which in their language signifies properly a palace... But since this word serai resembles servio, as a Venetian would call it, or serejlo as we say, and seeing that the palace of the Turk is (serrato or) shut up all round by a strong wall, and also because the Venetian and a great part of the courtiers dwell in it barbed up and shut in, so it may perchance have seemed to some to have deserved such a name. And thus the real term serai has been converted into serraglio.” — P. della Valle, i. 36.

1615.— “Onely from one dayes Journey to another the S Sophia hath caused to be erected certaine kind of great harbours, or huge lodges (like hamlets) called caravansara, or surroyes, for the benefite of Caravanciers. ...”—De Montfort, 3.

1616. — In this kingdom there are no Innes to entertaine strangers, only in great Townes and Cities are faire Houses built for their receit, which they call Serray, not inhabited, where any Passenger may have room free, but must bring with him his Bedding, his Cooke, and other necessaries.” — Tregy, in Purchas, ii. 1175.

1638. — “Which being done we departed from our Serray (or Inne).” — W. Burton, in Hakl, v. 49.

b. A long-necked earthenware (or metal) flagon for water; a goglet (q.v.). This is Ar.—P. sraujit. [This is the dorok or kalhe of Egypt, of which Lane (Mod. Egypt, ed. 1871, i. 186 seq.) gives an account with illustrations.]

c. 1666.— “... my Naaub having vouchsafed me a very particular favour, which is, that he hath appointed to give me every day a new leaf of his house, and a Souray of the water of Ganges... Souray is that Tin-flagon full of water, which the Servant that marcheth on foot before the Gentlemen on house-lick, carrieth in his hand, wrapp up in a sleeve of red cloath.” — Berney, E.T. 114; [ed. Constable, 356].

1808. — “We had some bread and butter, and two surahees of water, and a bottle of brandy.” — Elphistone, in E.J., i. 183.

[1880.— “The best known is the gilt silver work of Cashmere, which is almost confined to the production of the water-vessels or sarais, copied from the clay goblets in use throughout the northern parts of the Panjab.” — Birdword, Indus. Arts of India, 149.]

SERANG. s. A native boatswain, or chief of a lascar crew; the skipper of a small native vessel. The word is Pers. surhang, a commander or overseer.” In modern Persia it seems to be used for a colonel (see Wilks, 80).

tains, with Pilots, quartermasters, clerks, and other officers, who are Portuguese; but manned by sailors who are Arabs, Turks, Indians, and Bengalis, who serve for so much a month, and provide themselves under the direction and command of a chief of their own whom they call the Saranghi, who also belongs to one of those nations, whom they understand, and recognise and obey, carrying out the orders that the Portuguese Captain, Master, or Pilot may give to the said Saranghi."—Carletti, Viaggi, ii. 206.

—Wallace, Fifteen Years in India, 256.]

SERAPHIN. See XERAFIN.

SERENDIB, n.p. The Arabic form of the name of Ceylon in the earlier Middle Ages. (See under CEYLON.)

SERINGAPATAM, n.p. The city which was the capital of the Kingdom of Mysore during the reigns of Hyder Ali and his son Tippoo. Written Sri-raniga-pattana, meaning according to vulgar interpretation 'Vishnu's Town.' But as both this and the other Sirangam (Serinagam town and temple, so-called, in the Trichinopoly district) are on islands of the Canuary, it is possible that ranuga stands for Lanka, and the true meaning is 'Holy-Isle-Town.'

[SERPEYCH. s. Pers. sarpech, sarpeh; an ornament of gold, silver or jewels, worn in front of the turban; it sometimes consists of gold plates strung together, each plate being set with precious stones. Also a band of silk and embroidery worn round the turban.

[1753.—"... a fillet. This they call a sirpeh, which is worn round the turban; persons of great distinction generally have them set with precious stones."—Hanway, iv. 191.

[1786.—"Surpaishes." See under CUL-SEE.

[1813.—"Serpeych." See under KIL-
LUT.]

SETT. s. Properly Hind. a'th, which according to Wilson is the same word with the Chetti (see CHETTY) or Shetti of the Malabar Coast, the different forms being all from Skt. sresththa, 'best, or chief; sresthi, 'the chief of a corporation, a merchant or banker.' C. P. Brown entirely denies the identity of the S. Indian shetti with the Skt. word (see CHETTY).

1749.—"The Sets being all present at the Board inform us that last year they consented to the employment of Fillick Chund (etc.), they being of a different caste: and consequently they could not do business with them."—In Long, p. 9.

1757.—"To the Seats Mootabray and Roopchund the Government of Chardum-agore was indebted a million and a half Rupees."—Orme, ii. 138 of reprint (Bk. viii.).

1770.—"As soon as an European arrived the Gentoes, who know mankind better than is commonly supposed, study his character ... and lend or procure him money upon bottomry, or at interest. This interest, which is usually 9 per cent, at this is higher when he is under a necessity of borrowing of the Cheyks.

"... These Cheyks are a powerful family of Indians, who have, time immemorial, inhabited the banks of the Ganges. Their riches have long ago procured them the management of the bank belonging to the Court. ..."—Regnol, tr. 1777. i. 427. Note that by Cheyks the Abbé means Setts.

[1883.—"... from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin a security endorsed by the Mathura Seth is as readily convertible into cash as a Bank of England Note in London or Paris."—E. S. Trow, Mathura, 14.]

SETTLEMENT. s. In the Land Revenue system of India, an estate or district is said to be settled, when instead of taking a quota of the year's produce the Government has agreed with the cultivators, individually or in community, for a fixed sum to be paid at several periods of the year, and not liable to enhancement during the term of years for which the agreement or settlement is made. The operation of arranging the terms of such an agreement, often involving tedious and complicated considerations and enquiries, is known as the process of settlement. A Permanent Settlement is that in which the annual payment is fixed in perpetuity. This was introduced in Bengal by Lord Cornwallis in 1793, and does not exist except within that great Province, [and a few districts in the Benares division of the N.W.P., and in Madras.]
SEVEN PAGODAS, n.p. The Tam. Mavalliparam, Skt. Mahabali-pura, "the City of the Great Ball," a place midway between Sadras and Covelong. But in one of the inscriptions (about 620 B.C.) a king, whose name is said to have been Amara, is described as having conquered the chief of the Mahamalla race. Malla was probably the name of a powerful highland chieftain subdued by the Chalukyans. (See Crole, Man. of Chingleput, 92 seq.) Dr. Oppert (Orig. Inhabit., 98) takes the name to be derived from the Malla or Palli race.

SEVEN SISTERS, or BROTHERS. The popular name (Hind. sisthāi) of a certain kind of bird, about the size of a thrush, common throughout most parts of India, Malacocercus terricolor, Hodgson, 'Bengal babbler' of Jerdon. The latter author gives the native name as Seven Brothers, which is the form also given in the quotation below from Tribes on My Frontier. The bird is so named from being constantly seen in little companies of about that number. Its characteristics are well given in the quotations. See also Jerdon's Birds (Godwin-Austen's ed., ii. 59). In China certain birds of a similar kind are called by the Chinese pu-lo, or "Eight Brothers," for a like reason. See Collingwood's Rambles of a Naturalist, 1868, p. 319. (See MYNA.)

1878.—"The Seven Sisters pretend to feed on insects, but that is only when they cannot get peas...sad-coloured birds hopping about in the dust, and incessantly talking whilst they hop."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 30-31.

1883.—"...the Sathbhai or 'Seven Brothers'...are too shrewd and knowing to be made fun of...Among themselves they will quarrel by the hour, and handy foul language like fishwives; but let a stranger treat one of their number with disrespect, and the other six are in arms at once...Each Presidency of India has its own branch of this strange family. Here (at Bombay) they are brothers, and in Bengal they are sisters; but everywhere, like Wordsworth's imaginative child, they are seven."—Tribes on My Frontier, 143.

SEVERN DROOG, n.p. A somewhat absurd corruption, which has been applied to two forts of some fame, viz.:

a. Suvarna-droog, or Swendroog, on the west coast, about 78 m. below Bombay (Lat. 17° 48' N.). It was taken in 1755 by a small naval force from Taluji Angria, of the famous piratical family. [For the commander of the expedition, Commodore James, and his monument on Shooter's Hill, see Douglas, Bombay and W. India, i. 117 seq.]

b. Savandrag; a remarkable double hill-fort in Mysore, standing on a two-topped bare rock of granite, which was taken by Lord Cornwallis's army in 1791 (Lat. 12° 55'). [Wilks (Hist. Sketches, Madras reprint, i. 228, ii. 232) calls it Seveny Droog, and Savendroog.]

SEYCHELLE ISLANDS, n.p. A cluster of islands in the Indian Ocean, politically subordinate to the British Government of Mauritius, lying between 3° 40' & 4° 50' S. Lat., and about 950 sea-miles east of Mombas on the E. African coast. There are 29 or 30 of the Seychelles proper, of which Mahé, the largest, is about 17 m. long by 3 or 4 wide. The principal islands are granitic, and rise "in the centre of a vast plateau of coral" of some 120 m. diameter.

These islands are said to have been visited by Soares in 1506, and were known vaguely to the Portuguese navigators of the 16th century as the Seven Brothers (Os sete Ilumãos or Hermanos), sometimes Seven Sisters (Sete Ilumãos), whilst in Delisle's Map of Asia (1700) we have both "les Sept Frères" and "les Sept Soeurs." Adjoining these on the W. or S.W. we find also on the old maps a group called the Malouintes, and this group has retained that name to the present day, constituting now an appendage of the Seychelles.

The islands remained unvisited and apparently unvisited, till near the middle of the 18th century. In 174 the celebrated Mahé de la Bourdonnais, who was then Governor of Mauritius and the Isle of Bourbon, despatched two small vessels to explore the island of this little archipelago, an expedition which was renewed by Lazan Picault, the commander of one of the two vessels, in 1774, who gave to the principal island the name of Mahé and to the group the name of Îles de Bourbonnaise, for which Îles Malé (which is the name given in the
The exact date of the settlement of the islands we have not traced. We can only say that it must have been between 1769 and 1772. The quotation below from the Abbé Rochon shows that the islands were not settled when he visited them in 1769; whilst that from Capt. Neale shows that they were settled before his visit in 1772. It will be seen that both Rochon and Neale speak of Mahé as "the island Seychelles, or Séchelyes," as in Bellin's chart of 1767. It seems probable that the cloud under which La Bourdonnais fell, on his return to France, must have led to the suppression of his name in connection with the group.

The islands surrendered to the English Commodore Newcome in 1794, and were formally ceded to England with Mauritius in 1815. Seychelles appears to be an erroneous English spelling, now however become established. (For valuable assistance in the preceding article we are indebted to the courteous communications of M. James Jackson, Librarian of the Société de Géographie at Paris, and of M. G. Marcel of the Bibliothèque Nationale. And see, besides the works quoted here, a paper by M. Elie Pujot, in L'Explorateur, vol. iii. (1876) pp. 523-526).

The following passage of Pyrard probably refers to the Seychelles:

"... Le Roy (des Maldives) envoya par deux foyes un tres expert pilote pour aller decouvrir une certaine ile nommée pellonous, qui leur est presque inconnue. ... Ils disent aussi que le diable les y tourmentoit visiblement, et que pour l'isle elle est fertile en toutes sortes de fruits, et mesme ils ont opinion que ces gros Cocos medicinaux qui sont si chers-la en viennent. ... Elle est aussi la hauteur de dix degres an delà de la ligne et environ six vingt SHABUNDER, s. Pers. Shabbandar, lit. ‘King of the Haven,’ Harbour-Master. This was the title of an officer at native ports all over the Indian seas, who was the chief authority with whom foreign traders and ship-masters had to transact. He was often also head of the Customs. Hence the name is of prominent and frequent occurrence in the old narratives. Portuguese authors generally write the word Xabender; ours Shabunder or Sabunder. The title is not obsolete, though it does not now exist in India; the quotation from Lane shows its recent existence in Cairo, [and the Persians still call their Consuls Shabbandar (Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 158)]. In the marine Malay States the Shabunder was, and probably is, an important officer of State. The passages from Lane and from Tavernier show that the title was not confined to seaports. At Aleppo Thevenot (1663) calls the corresponding official, perhaps by a mistake, ‘Scheck Bandar’ (Voyages, iii. 121). [This is the office which King Mihrijan conferred upon Sindbad the Seaman, when he made him “his agent for the port and registrar of all ships that entered the harbour” (Burton, iv. 351)].

c. 1350.—“The chief of all the Musalmans in this city (Kadoul—see QUILON) is Mahommed Shabbandar.”—Ibn Battuta, iv. 100.

c. 1359.—“This King (of the Batas) understanding that I had brought him a Letter and a Present from the Captain of Mahor, caused me to be entertained by the Xabander, who is he that with absolute Power governs all the affairs of the Army.”—Pinto (orig. cap. xv.), in Ogden’s Travels, p. 18.

1552.—“And he who most insisted on this was a Moor, Xabandar of the Guzartes” (at Malacca).—Cortesão, ii. 359.

1553.—“A Moorish lord called Salayo (Sabaio) ... as soon as he knew that our ships belonged to the people of these parts of Christendom, desiring to have confirmation on the matter, sent for a certain Polish Jew who was in his service as Shabander (Xabendar), and asked him if he knew of what nation were the people who came in these ships....”—Barros, i. iv. 11.

1561.—“... a boatman, who, however, called himself Xabendar.”—Correa, Londes, ii. 50.

1599.—“The Sabandar took off my Hat, and put a Roll of white linen about my head. ...”—J. Harris, in Purchas, i. 12.

1604.—“Sabindar.” See under KLING.
1606.—"Then came the Sabdor with light, and brought the Generall to his house."—Middleton's Voyage, E. (4).

1610.—"The Sabdander and the Governor of Manoeck (a place seitiuated by the River)"—Peter Williamson Floris, in Purchas, i. 322.

[1615.—"The opinion of the Sabindour shall be taken."—Foster, Letters, iv. 79.]

1633.—"The Shaddoc has his Grandeur too, as well as receipt of Custom, for which he pays the King yearly 22,000 Thonands."—Fryer, 222.

1638.—"When we arrived at Achin, I was carried before the Shabander, the chief Magistrate of the City."—Dampier, i. 502.

1711.—"The Duties the Honourable Company require to be paid here on Goods are not above one fifth Part of what is paid to the Shabander or Custom-Master."—Lockyer, 223.

1726.—Valentyn, v. 313, gives a list of the Shabandars of Malakka from 1641 to 1725. They are names of Dutchmen.

[1727.—"Shawbandaar." See under Tenasserim.]

1759.—"I have received a long letter from the Shazada, in which he complains that you have begun to carry on a large trade in salt, and betel nut, and refuse to pay the duties on those articles... which practice, if continued, will oblige him to throw up his post of Shabander Droga (Daroga)."—W. Hastings to the Chief at Dacca, in Van der Capellen, i. 5.

1765.—"... two or three days after my arrival (at Batavia), the landlord of the hotel where I lodged told me he had been ordered by the shebandar to let me know that my carriage, as well as others, must stop, if I should meet the Governor, or any of the council; but I desired him to acquit the shebandar that I could not consent to perform any such ceremony."—Capt. Carteret, quoted by trans. of Staarings, i. 251.

1795.—"The descendant of a Portuguese family, named Jannese, whose origin was very low... was invested with the important office of Shawbunder, or intendant of the port, and receiver of the port customs."—Symes, p. 160.

1837.—"The Sird Muhammad El Mahrookie, the Shahbendar (chief of the Merchants of Cairo) hearing of this event, suborned a common fellow."—Lane's Med. Egyptians, ed. 1857. i. 157.

SHADDOCK. s. This name properly belongs to the West Indies, having been given, according to Grainger, from that of the Englishman who first brought the fruit thither from the East, and who was, according to Crawford, an interloper captain, who traded to the Archipelago about the time of the Revolution, and is mentioned by his contemporary Dampier. The fruit is the same as the pommeleo (q.v.). And the name appears from a modern quotation below to be now occasionally used in India. [Nothing definite seems to be known of this Capt. Shaddock. Mr. R. C. A. Prior (7 ser. N. d. Q., viii. 375) writes: "Linnan, in Hortus Jamaicaenüs, vol. ii, p. 171, says, 'This fruit is not near as large as the shaddock, which received its name from a Capt. Shaddock, who first brought the plant from the East Indies.' The name of the captain is believed to have been Shattock, one not uncommon in the west of Somersetshire. Sloane, in his 'Voyage to Jamaica,' 1707, vol. i. p. 41 says, 'The seed of this was first brought to Barbados by one Capt. Shaddock, commander of an East Indian ship, who touch'd at that island in his passage to England, and left its seed there.' Watt (Econ. Dict. ii. 349) remarks that the Indian vernacular name Batâci woba, 'Batavian lime,' suggests its having been originally brought from Batavia."

[1754.—"... pimple-noses (pommeleo), called in the West Indies, Chadocks, a very fine large fruit of the citron-kind, but of four or five times its size."

1764.—"... Nor let thy bright impatient flames destroy The golden Shaddock, the forbidden fruit..."—Grainger, Bk. 1.

1803.—"The Shaddock, or pumplemos (pommeleo), often grows to the size of a man's head."—Perceval's Ceylon, 313.

1832.—"Several trays of ripe fruits of the season, viz., kurbootahs (shaddock), kaboosa (melons)...

1875.—"... the splendid Shaddock that, weary of ripening, lays itself upon the ground and swells at ease."—In My Indian Garden, 50.

1895.—"He has stripped my mills of the shaddock fruits and the green unripe pine."—R. Kipling, Barrack Room Ballads, p. 130.]
SHADE. (TABLE-SHADE, WALL-SHADE), s. A glass guard to protect a candle or simple oil-lamp from the wind. The oldest form, in use at the beginning of the last century, was a tall glass cylinder which stood on the table, the candlestick and candle being placed bodily within in. In later days the universal form has been that of an inverted dome fitting into the candlestick, which has an annular socket to receive it. The wall-shade is a bracket attached to the wall, bearing a candle or cocoa-nut oil lamp, protected by such a shade. In the wine-drinking days of the earlier part of last century it was sometimes the subject of a challenge, or forfeit, for a man to empty a wall-shade filled with claret.

The second quotation below gives a notable description of a captain's outfit when taking the field in the 18th century.

1789.—"Borrowed last Month by a Person or Persons unknown, out of a private Gentleman's House near the Esplanade, a very elegant Pair of Candle Shades. Whoever will return the same will receive a reward of 40 Sicca Rupees. — N. B. The Shades have private marks."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, April 8.

1789.—"His tent is furnished with a good large bed, mattress, pillow, &c., a few camp-stools or chairs, a folding table, a pair of shades for his candles, six or seven trunks with table equipage, his stock of linen (at least 24 shirts); some dozens of wine, brandy, and gin; tea, sugar, and biscuit; and a hamper of live poultry and his milch-goat."—Munro's Narrative, 186.

1817.—"I am now finishing this letter by candle-light, with the help of a handkerchief tied over the shade."—T. Munro, in Life, i. 511.

[1838.—"We bought carpets, and chandeliers, and wall shades (the great staple commodity of Indian furniture), from Calcutta. . . ."—Miss Eden, Up the Country, 2nd ed. i. 182.]

SHAGREEN, s. This English word,—French chagrin; Ital. zigrino; Mid. High Ger. Zeyer,—comes from the Pers. sagnri, Turk. sagnri, meaning properly the eroupe or quarter of a horse, from which the peculiar granulated leather, also called sagnri in the East, was originally made. Diez considers the French (and English adopted) chagrin in the sense of vexation to be the same word, as certain hard skins prepared in this way were used as files, and hence the word is used figuratively for gnawing vexation, as (he states) the Ital. lima also is (Etym. Wortherbuch, ed. 1861, ii. 240). He might have added the figurative origin of tribulation.

[This view is accepted by the N.E.D.; but Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict.) denies its correctness.]

1683.—". . . . to Alep . . . on y travaille aussi bien qu'à Damas le sagri, qui est ce qu'on appelle chagrin en France, mais l'on en fait une bien plus grande quantité en Perse . . . Le sagri sa fait du groupe d'ane," &c.—Theron, Voyages, iii. 115-116.

1862.—"Saguree, or Kermoukht, Horse or Ass-Hide,"—Voyages, App. ccxx.: [For an account of the manufacture of kinhakht, see Hoey, Mon. on Trades and Manufactures of N. India, 94.]

SHAITAN, Ar. 'The Evil One; Satan.' Shaitān kā bhāt, 'Brother of the Arch-Enemy,' was a title given to Sir C. Napier by the Amirs of Sind and their followers. He was not the first great English soldier to whom this title had been applied in the East. In the romance of Cœur de Lion, when Richard entertains a deputation of Saracens by serving at table the head of one of their brethren, we are told:

"Every man sat style and pokyd othir; They saide: 'This is the Deckyl brother, That sles our men, and thus hem otes . . ." [c. 1630.—"But a Mountebank or In postor is nick-named Shitian. Tabib, i.e. the Devil's Chirurgeon."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 304.]

1753. —"God preserve me from the Scheithan Abragim."—Hanray, iii. 90.]

1863.—"Not many years ago, an eccentric gentleman wrote from Sikkim to the Secretary of the Asiatic Society in Calcutta, stating that, on the snows of the mountains there were found certain mysterious footsteps, more than 30 or 40 paces asunder, which the natives alleged to be Shaitan's. The writer at the same time offered, if Government would give him leave of absence for a certain period, etc., to go and trace the author of these mysterious vestiges, and thus this strange creature would be discovered without any expense to Government. The notion of watching Shaitan without any expense to Government was a sublime piece of Anglo-Indian tact, but the offer was not accepted."—Sir H. Yule, Notes to Frier Jordanus, 37.

SHALEE, SHALOO, SHELLA, SALLO, &c., s. We have a little doubt as to the identity of all these words; the latter occur in old works as names of cotton stuffs; the first two (Shakespeare and Fallon give sala) are names in familiar use for a soft twilled cotton stuff, of a Turkey-red colour, somewhat resembling what we call, by what we had judged to be a modification of the word, shaloon. But we find that Skeat and other authorities ascribe the latter word to a corruption of Chalons, which gave its name to certain stuffs, apparently bed-coverlets of some sort. Thus in Chaucer:

"With shetes and with chalons faire yspredde."—The Ree's Tale.

On which Tyrwhitt quotes from the Monastic. "... aut pansos pictos qui vocantur chalons loco lactesternii." See also in Liber Albis:

"La charge de chalouns et draps de Reynes, ..."—p. 225, also at p. 231.

1314.—"I went then to Shalwyn (near Calicut—see CHALLA) a very pretty town, where they make the stuff (q.v. shali) that bear its name."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 109.

It is exceedingly difficult to disentangle the meanings and derivations of this series of words. In the first place we have saloo, Hind. sala, the Turkey-red cloth above described; a word which is derived by Platts from Skt. sīla, 'a kind of astringent substance,' and is perhaps the same word as the Tel. sīla, 'cloth.' This was originally an Indian fabric, but has now been replaced in the bazaars by an English cloth, the art of dyeing which was introduced by French refugees who came over after the Revolution (see 7 ser. n. & q. viii. 485 seq.). See PIECE-GOODS, SAULO-PAUTS.

[c. 1500.—"Sālu, per piece, 3 R. to 2 M."—Hun, i. 94.

1610.—"Sallallo, blue and black."—Dunbar, Letters, i. 72.

1672.—"Salloos, made at Gulcundah, and brought from thence to Surat, and go to England."—In Birdwood, Report on Old Records, 82.

1896.—"Salu is another fabric of a red colour prepared by dyeing English cloth named matera ('American') in the dye, and was formerly extensively used for turbans, curtains, borders of female coats and female dress."—Muhammad Haii, Mon. on Dyes, 84.

Next we have shelah, which may be identical with Hind. sala, which Platts connects with Skt. chela, chaila, 'a piece of cloth,' and defines as "a kind of scarf or mantle (of silk, or lawn, or muslin; usually composed of four breadthts depending from the shoulders loosely over the body: it is much worn and given as a present, in the Dakhhan); silk turban." In the Deccan it seems to be worn by men (Herklots, Qanoo-e-Islam, Madras reprint, 18). The Madras Gloss. gives sheelay, Mal. shila, said to be from Skt. chiru, 'a strip of cloth,' in the sense of clothes; and sullah, Hind. sela, 'gauze for turbans.'

[c. 1500.—"Shelah from the Dekhan, per piece, 3 to 2 M."—Fin, i. 95.

1598.—"Cheyla," in Linshoten, i. 91.

1603.—"Shillaz, or thin white muslins. ... They are very coarse, and are sometimes striped, and then called Dupathaz (see DOOPTUTTY)."—Buchanan, Myssor, ii. 240.

1509.—"The shalie, a long piece of coloured silk or cotton, is wrapped round the waist in the form of a petticoat, which leaves part of one leg bare, whilst the other is covered to the ankle with long and graceful folds, gathered up in front, so as to leave one end of the shalie to cross the breast, and form a drapery, which is sometimes thrown over the head as a veil."—Marta truhem, iii. [But as Sir H. Yule suggested, in this form the word may represent SAREE.]

183.—"Red Shelles or Salloes. ..."—Milburne, i. 124.

... "His sheila, of fine cloth, with a silk or gold thread border. ..."—Trans. Lit. Soc. Bo. iii. 219 seq.

The following may represent the same word, or be perhaps connected with P.—H. chilla, 'a selvage, gold threads in the border of a turban, &c.'

1610.—"Tsyle, the corge, Rs. 70."—Dunbar, Letters, i. 72.

1615.—"320 pieces red zelas."—Foster, Letters, iv. 129. The same word is used by Cocks, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 4.

SHAAMA. s. Hind. shāmā [Skt. śāma, 'black, dark-coloured.'] A favourite song-bird and cage-bird, Kitta cinaea macrura, Gmel. "In confinement it imitates the notes of other birds, and of various animals, with ease and accuracy." (Jerdon). The long tail seems to indicate the identity of this bird rather than the maíná (see MYNA) with that described by Aelian. [Mr. M'Crindle (Invasion of India, 186) favours the identification of the bird with the Maíná.]

c. a.D. 250.—“There is another bird found among the Indians, which is of the size of a parrot. It is particoloured; and in imitating the voice of man it is more loquacious and clever than a parrot. But it does not readily bear confinement, and yearning for liberty, and longing for intercourse with its kind, it prefers hunger to bondage with fat living. The Macedonians who dwell among the Indians, in the city of Bucephala and thereabouts . . . call the bird kercáw (‘Tally’); and the name arose from the fact that the bird twitches his tail just like a wagtail.”—Aelian, de Nat. Anim. xvi. 9.

SHAMAN, SHAMANISM, s. These terms are applied in modern times to superstitions of the kind that connects itself, with exorcism and “devil-dancing” as their most prominent characteristic, and which are found to prevail with wonderful identity of circumstance among non-Caucasian races over parts of the earth most remote from one another; not only among the vast variety of Indo-Chinese tribes, but among the Dravidian tribes of India, the Veddas of Ceylon, the races of Siberia, and the red nations of N. and S. America. “Hinduism has assimilated these ‘prior superstitions of the sons of Tur,’ as Mr. Hodgson calls them, in the form of Tantrika mysteries, whilst, in the wild performance of the Dancing Dervishes at Constantinople, we see, perhaps, again, the infection of Turanian blood breaking out from the very heart of Mussulman orthodoxy” (see Notes to Marco Polo, Bk. II. ch. 50). The characteristics of Shamanism is the existence of certain sooth-sayers or medicine-men, who profess a special art of dealing with the mischievous spirits who are supposed to produce illness and other calamities, and who invoke these spirits and ascertain the means of appeasing them, in trance produced by fantastic ceremonies and convulsive dancings.

The immediate origin of the term is the title of the spirit-conjuror in the Tunguz language, which is shaman, in that of the Manchus becoming sa-mun, pl. sa-muna. But then in Chinese Shu-mun or Shí-mun is used for a Buddhist ascetic, and this would seem to be taken from the Skt. šramana, Pali saṇāṇa. Whether the Tunguz word is in any way connected with this or adopted from it, is a doubtful question. W. Schott, who has treated the matter elaborately (Über den Doppelbien des Wortes Schamane und über den tungschen Schamanen-Cultus am Hobe der Mandjü Kasern, Berlin Akad. 1842), finds it difficult to suppose any connection. We, however, give a few quotations relating to the two words in one series. In the first two the reference is undoubtedly to Buddhist ascetics.

c. b.C. 320.—“Tois δὲ Σαρμάνας, τοὺς μὲν ἐντυπώσαντος Ἄριδος φησὶν ἀνωμά-ζοντα, ἔξαντες εἰς ταῖς θείαις ἀπὸ φύλων καὶ καρπῶν ἁγίων, ἐσθίασαν δὲ ἔξεν ἀπὸ φύλων δενδρίων, ἀρρηξίων χωρίς καὶ οἴνου.”—From Megasthenes, in Strabo, xv.

c. 712.—“All the Samanis assembled and sent a message to Bahrá, saying, ‘We are nāsik devotees. Our religion is one of peace and quiet, and fighting and slaughtering is prohibited, as well as all kinds of shedding of blood.’”—Chach Nāmu, in Elliot, i. 158.

1529.—“Kûni is the Mongol name of the spirit-conjuror or sorcerer, who before the introduction of Buddhism exercised among the Mongols the office of Sacrificer and Priest, as he still does among the Tunguses, Manjus, and other Asiatic tribes. . . . In Europe they are known by the Tunguz name schaman; among the Manjus as saman, and among the Tibetans as Ḥūbha. The Mongols now call them with contempt and abhorrence Bok or Bûjek, i.e. ‘Sorcerers,’ ‘Wizards,’ and the women who give themselves to the like fooleries Ĕdugun.”—I. J. Schmidt, Notes to Steuwig Setzen, p. 416.

1871.—“Among Siberian tribes, the shamans select children liable to convulsions as suitable to be brought up to the profession, which is apt to become hereditary with the epileptic tendencies it belongs to.”—Tylor, Primitive Culture, ii. 121.

SHAMBOGUE, s. Canar, shina- or shāna-boqā; shāntīya, ‘allowance of grain paid to the village accountant,’ Skt. bhoga, ‘enjoyment.’ A village clerk or accountant.

[c. 1766.—“. . . this order to be enforced in the accounts by the shanbague.”—Logan, Malabar, iii. 120.

[1800.—“Shanaboga, called Shanbogue by corruption, and Curnum by the Musulmans, is the village accountant.”—Buchanan’s Myore, i. 248.]

1801.—“When the whole kist is collected, the shanbogue and potail (see PATEL) carry it to the teshildar’s cutcherry.”—T. Mcrea, in Life, i. 316.
SHAMEEANA, SEMIANNA. s. Pers. Shamiyana or Shamieyna [very doubtfully derived from Pers. Shab, 'king,' Mijana, 'centre'], an awning or flat tent-roof, sometimes without sides, but often in the present day with canuats; sometimes pitched like a porch before a large tent; often used by civil officers, when on tour, to hold their court or office proceedings coram populo, and in a manner generally accessible. [In the early records the word is used for a kind of striped calico.]

c. 1590.—"The Shamyana—awning is made of various sizes, but never more than of 12 yards square."—Ain. i. 54.

1609.—"A sort of Calico here called semi-janes are also in abundance, it is broader than the Calico."—Inwards, Letters, i. 29.

[1813. — "The Hector having certain chueckeros (chucker) of nine Semian chowters."—Ibid. iv. 217. In Foster, iv. 230, semanes.]

1616,—... there is erected a throne fouro foote from the ground in the Durbar Court from the backe whereof, to the place where the King comes out, a square of 56 paces long, and 43 broad was ryalin in. and covered with fair Semiaeas or Canopies of Cloth of Gold, Silke, or Velvet iodyned together, and sustained with Canes so covered.—Sir T. Res. in Purchas, i. 4.

Hak. Soc. i. 112.

1674.—"We desire you to furnish him with all things necessary for his voyage... with bridle and sadie. Semeanoes canuats (Canaut). ..."—Forbes, Bombay Letters, 1. 89.

1814.—"I had seldom occasion to look out for gardens or pleasure grounds to pitch my tent or erect my Summiminian or Shamyana, the whole country being generally a garden."—Forbes, Or. Mem., ii. 455; 2nd ed. ii. 64. In ii. 294 he writes Shumeena.

1857.—"At an early hour we retired to rest. Our beds were arranged under large canopies, open on all sides, and which are termed by the natives 'Shameannahs.'"—M. Thornhill, Personal Adventures, 14.

SHAMPOO. v. To knead and press the muscles with the view of relieving fatigues. &c. The word has now long been familiarly used in England. The Hind. verb is champao, from the imperative of which, chantoo, this is most probably a corruption, as in the case of Bunow, Puckerow, &c. The process is described, though not named, by Terry, in 1616: "Taking thus their ease, they often call their Barbers, who tenderly gripe and snite their Armes and other parts of their bodies instead of exercise, to stirre the blood. It is a pleasing wantonness, and much valued in these hot climes." (In Purchas, ii. 1475). The process was familiar to the Romans under the Empire, whose slaves employed in this way were styled tractador and tractatrix. [Perhaps the earliest reference to the practice is in Strabo (McCride, Ancient India, 72.) But with the ancients it seems to have been allied to vice, for which there is no ground that we know in the Indian custom.

1748.—"Shamooing is an operation not known in Europe, and is peculiar to the Chinese, which I had once the curiosity to go through, and for which I paid but a trifle. However, had I not seen several China merchants shampoed before me, I should have been apprehensive of danger, even at the sight of all the different instruments..." (The account is good, but too long for extract).—A Voyage to the E. Indies in 1747 and 1748. London, 1752, p. 226.

1759—60.—"The practice of champng, which by the best Intelligence I could gather is derived from the Chinese, may not be unworthy particularising, as it is little known to the modern Europeans..."—Grose, i. 118. This writer quotes Martial, iii. Ep. 82, and Seneq, Epist. 66, to show that the practice was known in ancient Rome.

1800.—"The Sultan generally rose at break of day: after being champed, and rubbed, he washed himself, and read the Koran for an hour."—Baton, War with Tippeo, p. 139.

[1810.—"Shampoeing may be compared to a gentle kneading of the whole person, and is the same operation described by the voyagers to the Southern and Pacific ocean."—H. S. Hist. Sketches, Madras reprint, i. 276.]

"Then whilst they fanned the children, or champoed them if they were restless, they used to tell stories, some of which dealt of marvels as great as those recorded in the 1991 Nights."—Mrs. Sherwood, Automag. 410.

"That considerable relief is obtained from shampoeing, cannot be doubted; I have repeatedly been restored surprisingly from severe fatigue. ..."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 198.

1813.—"There is sometimes a voluptuousness in the climate of India, a stillness in nature, an indescribable softness, which soothes the mind, and gives it up to the most delightful sensations: independent of the effects of opium, champoing, and other luxuries indulged in by oriental sensuists."—Forbes, Or. Mem., i. 35; 2nd ed. i. 25.

SHAN, n.p. The name which we have learned from the Burmese to apply to the people who call themselves the great Tai, kindred to the Siamese, and occupying extensive tracts in Indo-China, intermediate between Burma, Siam, and China. They are the same people that have been known, after the Portuguese, and some of the early R. C. Missionaries, as Laos (q.v.); but we now give the name an extensive signification covering the whole race. The Siamese, who have been for centuries politically the most important branch of this race, call (or did call themselves—see De la Lou- bère, who is very accurate) Tai-Noe or 'Little Tai,' whilst they applied the term Tai-Yai, or 'Great Tai,' to their northern kindred or some part of these;* sometimes also calling the latter Tai-gut, or the 'Tai left behind.' The Tai or Shan are certainly the most numerous and widely spread race in Indo-China, and innumerable petty Shan States exist on the borders of Burma, Siam, and China, more or less dependent on, or tributary to, their powerful neighbours. They are found from the extreme north of the Irawadi Valley, in the vicinity of Assam, to the borders of Camboja; and in nearly all we find, to a degree unusual in the ease of populations politically so segregated, a certain homogeneity in language, civilisation, and religion (Buddhist), which seems to point to their former union in considerable States.

One branch of the race entered and conquered Assam in the 13th century, and from the name by which they were known, Ahom or Ahom, was derived, by the frequent exchange of aspirant and sibilant, the name, just used, of the province itself. The most extensive and central Shan State, which occupied a position between Ava and Yunnan, is known in the Shan traditions as Mung-Man, and in Burma by the Buddhista-classical name of Kausambi (from a famous city of that name in ancient India) corrupted by a usual process into Ko-Shan-pyi and interpreted to mean 'Nine-Shan-States.' Further south were those Tai States which have usually been called Laos, and which formed several considerable kingdoms, going through many vicissitudes of power. Several of their capitals were visited and their ruins described by the late Francis Garnier, and the cities of these and many smaller States of the same race, all built on the same general quadrangular plan, are spread broadcast over that part of Indo-China which extends from Siam north of Yunnan.

Mr. Cushing, in the Introduction to his Shan Dictionary (Rangoon, 1881), divides the Shan family by dialectic indications into the Ahoms, whose language is now extinct, the Chinese Shan (occupying the central territory of what was Mau or Kausambî), the Shaw (Proper, or Burmese Shan), Laos (or Siamese Shan), and Siamese.

The term Shan is borrowed from the Burmese, in whose peculiar orthography the name, though pronounced Shan, is written shan. We have not met with its use in English prior to the Mission of Col. Synes in 1795. It appears in the map illustrating his narrative, and once or twice in the narrative itself, and it was frequently used by his companion, F. Buchanan, whose papers were only published many years afterwards in various periodicals difficult to meet with. It was not until the Burmese war of 1824-1826, and the active investigation of our Eastern frontier which followed, that the name became popularly known in British India. The best notice of the Shans that we are acquainted with is a scarce pamphlet by Mr. Nej Elias, printed by the Foreign Dept. of Calcutta in 1876 (Intro. Sketch of the Hist. of the Shans, &c.). [The ethnology of the race is discussed by J. G. Scott, Upper Burma Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 187 seq. Also see Prince Henri d'Orléans, Du Tonkin aux Indes, 1898; H. S. Hallett, Among the Shans, 1885, and A Thousand Miles on an Elephant, 1890.]

Though the name as we have taken it is a Burmese oral form, it seems to be essentially a genuine ethnic name for the race. It is applied in the form Sam by the Assamese, and the Kakhyyens; the Siamese themselves have an obsolete Siém (written Sêyam) for themselves, and Sieng (Sêyang) for the Laos. The former word is evidently the Sien, which the Chinese used in the compound Sien-lo (for Siam,—see Marco Polo, 2nd ed. Bk. iii. ch. 7, note 3), and from which we got, probably through a Malay medium, our Siam (q.v.). The Burmese distinguish the Siamese Shan as ‘Yudia’ (see JUDEA) Shan, a term perhaps sometimes including Shan itself. Syms gives this (through Arakanese corruption) as ‘Yoodra-Shaan,’ and he also (no doubt improperly) calls the Manipur people ‘Cassy Shaan’ (see CASSAY).

1795.—“These events did not deter Shan-buan from pursuing his favourite scheme of conquest to the westward. The fertile plains and populous towns of Munnpoodna and the Cassay Shaan, attracted his ambition.”—Syms, p. 77.

... “Zemee (see JANGOMAY), Sandapoodna, and many districts of the Yoodra Shaan to the eastward, were tributary, and governed by Chobwas, who annually paid homage to the Birman king.”—Ibid. 102.

... “Shaan, or Shan, is a very comprehensive term given to different nations, some independent, others the subjects of the greater states.”—Ibid. 274.

c. 1818.—“... They were assisted by many of the Zabo (see CHOBWA) or petty princes of the Siam, subject to the Burmese, who, wearied by the oppressions and exactions of the Burmese Mandarins and generals, had revolted, and made common cause with the enemies of their cruel masters. ... The war which the Burmese had to support with these enemies was long and disastrous ... instead of overcoming the Siam (they) only lost day by day the territories ... and saw their princes range themselves ... under the protection of the King of Siam.”—Sturgeman, p. 57.

1861.—“Fie, Fie! Captain Spry! You are surely in joke With your wires and your trams, Going past all the Shams With branches to Bam-yen (see BAMO), and end in A-smoke.”—Ode on the proposed Yunnan Railway, Bhanoa and Esnow were names constantly recurring in the late Capt. Spry’s railway projects.

SHANBAFF, SINABAFF, &c., s. Pers. shanbash. A stuff often mentioned in the early narratives as an export from Bengal and other parts of India. Perhaps indeed these names indicate two different stuffs, as we do not now know what they were, except that (as mentioned below) the sinabaff was a fine white stuff. Sinabaff is not in Vuller’s Lexion. Shinbash is, and is explained as genus panni grossioris, sic descripta (E. T.): “A very coarse and cheap stuff which they make for the sleeves of kabds (see CABAYA) for sale.”—Bahar-i-Ajam. But this cannot have been the character of the stuffs sent by Sultan Mahommed Tughlak (as in the first quotation) to the Emperor of China. [Badger (quoted by Birdwood, Report on Old Records, 153) identifies the word with sina-bafta, ‘China-woven’ cloths.]

1434.—“When the aforesaid present came to the Sultan of India (from the Emp. of China) ... in return for this present he sent another of greater value ... 100 pieces of shirinbaf, and 500 pieces of shanbaf.”—Ibn Batuta, iv. 3.

1498.—“The overseer of the Treasury came next day to the Captain-Major, and brought him 20 pieces of white stuff, very fine, with gold embroidery which they call beyramies (beiramee), and other 20 large white stuffs, very fine, which were named sinabafos.”—Correa, E. T. b. Lt. Stanley, 197.

(1508.—See under ALJOFAR.)

1510.—“One of the Persians said: ‘Let us go to our house, that is, to Calicut.’ I answered, ‘Do not go, for you will lose these fine sinabaph (which were pieces of cloth we carried).’”—Varthema, 269.

1516.—“The quintal of this sugar was worth two ducats and a half in Malabar, and a good Sinabaffo was worth two ducats.”—Barbosa, 179.

[... “Also they make other stuffs which they call Mahomaid’s, others duqecas (duqetzè), others chowtars (see chowtars, under PIECE-GOODS), others sinabafas, which last are the best, and which the Moors hold in most esteem to make shirts of.”—Ibid., Lisbon ed. 362.]

SHASTER. s. The Law books or Sacred Writings of the Hindus. From Skt. śāstra, ‘a rule,’ a religious code, a scientific treatise.

1612.—“... They have many books in their Latin. ... Six of these they call Xatra, which are the bodies: eighteen which they call Purana (Poorana), which are the limbs.”—Canto, V. vi. 3.

1630.—“... The Banians deliver that this book, by them called the Shaster, or the Book of their written word, consisted of these three tracts.”—Lord’s Display, ch. viii.

1651.—In Rogerius, the word is everywhere misprinted Iasta.

1717.—“The six Sastrangol contain all the Points and different Ceremonies in Worship. ...”—Phillips’s Account, 40.

1765.—“... at the capture of Calcutta, A.D. 1756, I lost many curious Gentoo manuscripts, and among them two very correct and valuable copies of the Gentoo Shastar.”—J. Z. Holt, II. Interesting Hist. Events, &c., 24 ed., 1766, i. 3.

1770.—“The Shastar is looked upon by some as a commentary on the redam, and by others as an original work.”—Raynal (tr 1777), i. 50.
SHASTREE, s. Hind. šāstā (see SHASTER). A man of learning, one who teaches any branch of Hindu learning, such as law.

[1824. "Gungadhur Shastree, the minister of the Baroda state, . . . was murdered by Trimulkee under the circumstances which left no doubt that the deed was perpetrated with the knowledge of Bajerow. —Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. i. 307.]

SHAWL, s. Pers. and Hind. šalā, also dosha, a pair of shawls. The Persian word is perhaps of Indian origin, from Skt. śāvā, 'variegated.' Sir George Birdwood tells us that he has found among the old India records "Carmania shells" and "Carmania shawools," meaning apparently Kerānīn shawls. He gives no dates unfortunately. [In a book of 1685 he finds "Shawles Carmania" and "Carmania Wool"; in one of 1704, "Chawools" (Report on Old Records, 27, 40). Carmania goats are mentioned in a letter in Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 140.] In Meninski (published in 1680) šalā is defined in a way that shows the humble sense of the word originally:

"Panni viliores qui partim albi, partim cineriti, partim nigri esse solent ex lana et piliss caprinis; hujusmodi pannum seu telamin injuciunt humersi Dervisi . . . instar stolaex aut pullii." To this he adds, "Datur etiam sericea ejusmodi tela, fere instar nostrae multitii, sive simplices sive duplicitae." For this the 2nd edition a century later substitutes: "Shal-i-Hind" (Indian shawl). "Tela sericida subtillissima ex India adferri solita."

c. 1590.—In former times shawls were often brought from Kashmir. People folded them in four folds, and wore them for a very long time. . . . His Majesty encourages in every possible way the (šalā-baj) manufacture of shawls in Kashmir. In Lahor also there are more than 1000 workshops."—Jin i. 92. [Also see ed. Jarrett, ii. 349, 355.]

c. 1665.—"Ils mettent sur eux a toute saison, lorsqu'ils sortent, une Chal, qui est une maniere de toilette d'une laine tres-fine qui se fait a Cashmir. Ces Chals ont environ deux aunes (the old French aune, nearly 47 inches English) de long sur une de large. On les achete vingt-cinq ou trente ecus si elles sont fines. Il y en a meme qui contient cinquante ecus, mais ce sont les tres-fines."—Therond, v. 110.

c. 1666.—"Ces chales sont certaines pieces d'etoffe d'une aulne et demie de long, et d'une de large ou environ, qui sont brodes aux deux bonts d'une especie de broderie, faite au metier, d'un pied ou environ de large. . . . J'en ai vu de ceux que les Oomand'a font faire expris, qui contiennent jusqu'a cent cinquante Roupies; des autres qui sont a cette laine du pays, je n'en ai pas vu qui passaient 50 Roupies."—Bernier, ii. 280-281; [ed. Constable, 402].

1717.—"... Con tutto ciò pressoissime nobilissime e senza comparazione magnifiche sono le tele che si chiamano Scial, si nella lingua Hindustana, come ancora nella lingua Persiana. Tali Scial altro non sono, che alcuni manti, che si posano sulla testa, e facendo da man destra, e da man sinistra scegliere le due metà, con queste si cinge. . ."—MS. Narrative of Padre Ip. Desideri.

[1692.—"Another rich Skarf, which they call schal, made of a very fine stuff."—J. Davies, Ambassador's Tr., Bk. vi. 235, Statf. Dict.]

1727.—"When they go abroad they wear a Shawl fold'd up, or a piece of White Cotton Cloth lying loose on the Top of their Heads."—A. Hamilton, ii. 50; [Shaul in ed. 1744, i. 49].

C. 1760.—"Some Shawls are manufactured there. . . . Those coming from the province of Cachemire in the borders of Tartary, being made of a peculiar kind of silky hair, that produces from the loom a cloth beautiful, , bordered at both ends, with a narrow flowered selvage, about two yards and a half long, and a yard and a half wide . . . and according to the price, which is from ten pounds and upwards to fifteen shillings, join, to exquisite fineness, a substance that renders them extremely warm, and so plant that the fine ones are easily drawn through a common ring on the finger."—Gough, i. 118.

1781.—Sonment writes chales. He says: "Ces etoiffes (faites avec la laine des montains de Tibet) oujissent pour plus belles soieries en finesse."—Fougere, i. 52.

It seems from these extracts that the large and costly shawl, woven in figures over its whole surface, is a modern article. The old shawl, we see, was from 6 to 8 feet long, by about half that breadth; and it was most commonly white, with only a border of figured weaving at each end. In fact what is now called a Rampoor Chudder when made with figured ends is probably the best representation of the old shawl.

SHEEAH, SHIA, s. Arak. shī'a, i.e. 'sect.' A follower (more properly the followers collectively) of the Mahommedan 'sect,' or sects rather, which specially venerate 'Ali, and regard the Imāms (see IMAUM), his descendants, as the true successors to the Caliphate. The Persians (since the accession of the 'Sophy' dynasty, (q.v.) are Shfás, and a good many of the Moslems in India. The sects which have followed more or less secret doctrines, and the veneration of hereditary quasi-divine heads, such as the Karmathites and Ismaelites of Musulman history, and the modern Bohras (see BORA) and "Muláhis," may generally be regarded as Shfí. [See the elaborate article on the sect in Hughes, Dict. of Islam, 572 seqq.]

c. 1309. —"... dont encore il est ainsi, que tuit ci qui croient en la loy Haali dient que tuit ci croient en la loy Mahommet sont mesreçant: et aussi tuit ci qui croient en la loy Mahommet dient que tuit ci qui croient en la loy Haali sont mesreçant." —Jouville, 252.

1553. —"Among the Moors who have always been controversé ... which of the first Caliphs was the most legitimate successor to the Caliphate. The Arabians favoured Babae, Hamor, and Ottomman, the Persians (Persous) favoured Ali, and held the others for usurpers, and as holding it against the testament of Mahamed ... to the last this schism has endured between the Arabians and the Persians. The latter took the appellation Xiá, as much as to say 'Union of one Body,' and the Arabs called them in reproach Raffady Raffi, a heretic (lit. 'desertor'), as much as to say 'People astray from the Path,' whilst they call themselves Šunee (see SUNNÉE), which is the contrary." —Borron, II. x. 6.

1620. —"The Sonmite adherents of tradition, like the Arabs, the Turks, and an infinite number of others, accept the primacy of those who, in fact, possess it. The Persians and their adherents who are called Šhías (Schiai), i.e. 'Sectaries,' and are not ashamed of the name, believe in the primacy of those who have only claimed it (without possessing it), and obstinately contend that it belongs to the family of Ali only." —P. della Valle, ii. 75; [conf. Hak. Soc. i. 152.]

1626. —"He is by Religion a Mahumetan, descended from Persian Ancestors, and retaineth their opinions, which differing in many points from the Turks, are distinguished in their Sects by the names of Seaw and Sennée." —Purchas, Pilgrimage, 995.

1653. —"Les Persans et Keskíbaches (Kuzzíbash) se disent Šciai ... si les Ottomans estoient Šchais, ou de la Secte de Haali, les Persans se feroient Sónni qui est la Secte des Ottomans." —De la Boniface-le-Goy, ed. 1657, 106.

1673. —"His Substitute here is a Chias Moor." —Fryer, 29.

1798. —"In contradistinction to the Sonnès, who in their prayers cross their hands on the lower part of the breast, the Šcháhs drop their arms in straight lines." —G. Forster, Travels, ii. 129.

1805. —"The word Sh'eeah, or Sheeût, properly signifies a troop or sect ... but has become the distinctive appellation of the followers of Aly, or all those who maintain that he was the first legitimate Khudéfah, or successor to Moobummud." —Baillé, Digest of Mos. Law, II. xii.

1859. —"La tolerance indienne est venue diminuer dans l'Inde le fanatisme Musulman. La Sonnès et Schites n'ont point entre eux cette animosité qui divise les Tures et les Persans ... ces deux sectes divisent les musulmans de l'Inde; mais comme je viens de dire, elles n'excitent généralement entre eux aucune animosité." —Garcia de Tassy, Rel. Mus., p. 12.

SHEERMAUL. s. Pers. —Hind. shrímadl, a cake made with flour, milk and leaven; a sort of brioche. [The word comes from Pers. shir, 'milk,' māl, 'crushing.' Riddell (Domest. Econ., 461) gives a receipt for what he calls "Nama Sheer Mhăl," nám being Pers., 'bread."

1821. —"The dishes of mealah (mīlā, 'sweet') are accompanied with the many varieties of bread common to Hindoostaun, without leaven. As Sheeámahl, bakhkérkhaní (bakir-khania), chapattí (chupatty), &c.; the first two have milk and ghee mixed with the flour, and nearly resemble our pie-crust." —Mrs. Mor. Housan Ali, Observations, i. 101.

SHEIKH. s. Ar. شيخ; an old man, elder, chief, head of an Arab tribe. The word should properly mean one of the descendants of tribes of genuine Arab descent, but at the present day, in India, it is often applied to converts from Islam to the lower Hindu tribes. For the use of the word in the sense of a saint, see under PEER.

1835. —"Lieutenant (which the Arabians called zequen)." —Lincoln, Hak. Soc. i. 24.

1825. —"They will not have them judged by any Custom, and they are content that their Xeque doe determine them as he list." —Purchas, Pilgrimage, ii. 1149.

1769. —"... but if it was so, that he (Abraham) was their Sheék, as they allledge, they neither follow him in Morals or Religion." —J. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 37.

1835. —"Some parents employ a shéykh or fiéke to teach their boys at home." —Lane, Med. Egypt., ed. 1871, i. 77.

SHERBET. s. Though this word is used in India by natives in its native (Arab. and Pers.) form sharbat,*

* In both written alike, but the final 'i' in Arabic is generally silent, giving sharha, in Persian sharbat. So we get mistrans from Pers. and Turk, mandru, in Ar. (and in India) mandra (mandra).
of sherbet, or sherbet; in Sp. and Port., we have xarabe, azarabe (ash-sharab, the standard Ar. sharab, ‘wine or any beverage’), and xarope, and from these forms probably Ital. sciropo, siroppo, with old French ysserop and mod. French sirop; also English syrup, and more directly from the Spanish, shrub, Mod. Span. again gets, by reflection from French or Italian, sorbete and sirop (see Dozy, 17, and Marcel Doris, s.v. sirop). Our sherbet looks as if it had been imported direct from the Levant. The form shrub is applied in India to all wines and spirits and prepared drinks, e.g. Port-shrub, Sherry-shrub, Lall-shrub, Brandy-shrub, Beer-shrub.

c. 1334.—‘... They bring cups of gold, silver, and glass, filled with sugar-candied water; i.e. syrup diluted with water. They call this beverage sherbet’ (ash-sharab).—The Batuta, iii. 124.

1554.—‘... potio est gratissima prescripta semper ut multi auge, quae Constantino-poli nullo tempore defect, fuerit refirgerata, Arab Sorbet vocant, hoc est, poitionem Arabicam.’—Dinshy, Ep. i, p. 92.

1578.—‘The physicians of the same country use this xarave (of tamarinds) in bilious and ardent fevers.’—Acosta, 67.

c. 1580.—‘Et saccharo potum jucundissimum parant quem Sarbet vocant.’—Prosper Alpinus, Pt. i, p. 70.

1611.—‘In Persia there is much good wine of grapes which is called Xarab in the language of the country.’—Trinacria, i. 16.

c. 1650.—‘Their liquor may perhaps better delight you; tis faire water, sugar, rose-water, and jucye of Lenons mixt, call’d Sherbets or Zerbets, wholesome and potable.’—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1688, p. 241.

1682.—‘The Moors ... dranke a little milk and water, but not a drop of wine; they also dranke a little sorbet, and jocund (see JOCOLE).’—Evelyn’s Diary, Jan. 24.

1827.—‘On one occasion, before Barkel-Hadji left Madras, he visited the Doctor, and partook of his sherbet, which he preferred to his own, perhaps because a few glasses of rum or brandy were usually added to enrich the compound.’—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon’s Daughter, ch. x.

1837.—‘The Egyptians have various kinds of sherbets. ... The most common kind (called simply shurbat or shurbat sookhar ... ) is merely sugar and water ... lemonade (leymoCn, or sharab leymoCn) is another.’—Lane, Mod. Egypt., ed. 1837, i. 206.

1863.—‘The Estate overseer usually gave a dance to the people, when the most dissolute of both sexes were sure to be present, and to indulge too freely in the shrub made for the occasion.’—Waddell, 20 Years in the W. Indies, 17.

SHERBEF, s. Ar. sharif, ‘noble.’ A dignitary descended from Mahomed.

1498.—‘The ambassador was a white man who was Xarife, as much as to say a creio (i.e. clergy).’—Roteiro, 2nd ed. 36.

[SHERBET. 826

SHERISTADAR, s. The head ministerial officer of a Court, whose duty it is to receive plaints, and see that they are in proper form and duly stamped, and generally to attend to routine business. Properly H. P. from sar-rishta-dar or sarishta-dar, ‘register-keeper.’ Sar-rishta, an office of registry, literally means ‘head of the string.’ C. P. Brown interprets Sorristhadar as ‘he who holds the end of the string (on which puppets dance)’—satirically, it may be presumed. Perhaps ‘keeper of the clue,’ or ‘of the file’ would approximately express the idea.

1786.—(With the object of establishing) the officers of the Canongee’s Department upon its ancient footing, altogether independent of the Zemindars ... and to prevent confusion in the time to come. ... For these purposes, and to avail ourselves as much as possible of the knowledge and services of Mr. James Grant, we determined on the institution of an office well-known in this country under the designation of Chief Sorristhadar, with which we have invested Mr. Grant, to act in that capacity under your Board, and also to attend as such at your deliberations, as well as at our meetings in the Revenue Department.’—Letter from G. G. in C. to Board of Revenue, July 19 (Bengal Rev. Regulation xix.).

1878.—‘Nowadays, however, the Sorristhadar’s signature is allowed to authenticate copies of documents, and the Assistant is thus spared so much drudgery.’—Life in the Moghussil, i. 117.

[SHEVAROY HILLS, n.p. The name applied to a range of hills in the Salem district of Madras. The origin of the name has given rise to much difference of opinion. Mr. Lefanu (Man. of Salem, ii. 19 seq.) thinks that the original name was possibly Sivarayan, whence the German name Shivarai and the English Shervarayan; or that Sivarayan may by confusion have become Shervarayan, named after the Raja of Sera; lastly, he suggests that it comes from sharpu or sharru, 'the slope or declivity of a hill,' and eay, 'a mouth, passage, way.' This he is inclined to accept, regarding Shervarayan or Sharravrayan, as 'the cliff which dominates (rayan) the way (eay) which leads through or under the declivity (sharru). The Madras Gloss, gives the Tam. form of the name as Shervananyamalai, from Sharan, 'the Chera race,' irayan, 'king,' and malai, 'mountain.'

1823. — "Mr. Cockburn ... had the kindness to offer me the use of a bungalow on the Shervaya hills. ..." — Hoot, _Missions in Madras_, 252.

SHIBAR, SHIBBAR. s. A kind of coating vessel, sometimes described as a great pattamar. Molesworth (Mahr. Dict. s.v.) gives shibbar which, in the usual dictionary way, he defines as 'a ship or large vessel of a particular description.' The Bombay Gazetteer (x. 171) speaks of the shibidi, a large vessel, from 100 to 300 tons, generally found in the Ratnagiri sub-division ports; and in another place (xiii. Pt. ii. 720) says that it is a large vessel chiefly used in the Malabar trade, deriving the name from Pers. shah-bahri, 'royal-carrier.'

1864. — "The Mucaddam (MOCUDDUM) of this shibar bound for Goa." — _Jute_, in _Hedys Diary_, Hak. Soc. ii. clxxv.; also see clxxxii.

1727. — "... the other four were Graps or Galles, and Sheybars, or half Gallies." — _A. Hamilton_, ed. 1744, i. 194.

1755. — "... then we cast off a boat called a large seebar, bound to Muscat. ..." — _Fer., 196._

SHIGRAM. s. A Bombay and Madras name for a kind of hack palankin carriage. The camel-shigram is often seen on roads in N. India. The name is from Mahr. shigh, Skt. sghara, 'quick or quickly.' A similar carriage is the Judah, which takes its name from Hind. jhatka, 'swift.'

1880. — At Bombay, "In heavy coaches, lighter landaulets, or singular-looking shigrampoes, might be seen bevies of British fair ..." — _Mrs. E. Woolf, Narr. ii. 376.

1875. — "As it is, we have to go ... 124 miles in a dak gharry, bullock shigram, or mail-cart. ..." — _Wilson, Abode of Snow_, 18.

SHIKAR. s. Hind. from Pers. shikr, 'la chasse'; sport (in the sense of shooting and hunting); game.

e. 1590. — "... shikar, 27. Of Hunting (orig. Am. i. Shikar). Superficial worldly observers see in killing an animal a sort of pleasure, and in their ignorance stride about, as if senseless, on the field of their passions. But deep enquirers see in hunting a means of acquisition of knowledge. ... This is the case with His Majesty." — _Am., i. 252.

1809-10. — "Sykary, which signifies, seeking, or hunting." — _W. Finch, in Perchas_, i. 428.

1800. — "250 or 300 horsemen ... divided into two or three small parties, supported by our infantry, would give a proper shekar; and I strongly advise not to let the Mahratta boundary stop you in the pursuit of your game." — _Sir A. Wellesley to T. Munro, in Life of Munro_, iii. 117.

1847. — "Yet there is a charm in this place for the lovers of Shikar." — _Dry Leaves from Young Egypt_, 3.

1859. — "Although the jungles literally swarm with tigers. a shikar, in the Indian sense of the term, is unknown." — _Oliphant, Narr. of Mission_, i. 25.

1866. — "... May I ask what has brought you out to India, Mr. Cholmondeley? Did you come out for shikar, eh?" — _Trelagyn, The Black Bengalore, in Fraser_, lxxii. 222.

In the following the word is wrongly used in the sense of Shikaree.

1900. — "... That so experienced a shikar should have met his death emphasises the necessity of caution." — _Field_, Sept. 1.

SHIKARRE, SHEKARRY. s. Hind. shikari, a sportsman. The word is used in three ways:

a. As applied to a native expert, who either brings in game on his own account, or accompanies European sportsmen as guide and aid.

1822. — "Shecarries are generally Hindoos of low cast, who gain their livelihood entirely by catching birds, hares, and all sorts of animals." — _Johnson, Sketches of Field Sports_, 25.

1879. — "Although the province (Pegu) abounds in large game, it is very difficult to discover, because there are no regular shikarees in the Indian acceptation of the word. Every village has its local shikaree, who lives by trapping and killing game. Taking life as he does, contrary to the principles of his religion, he is looked upon as damned by his neighbours, but that does not prevent their buying from him the spoils of the chase."—Pollok, "Sport in Br. Burmah, &c., i. 13.

b. As applied to the European sportsman himself: e.g. "Jones is well known as a great Shikarce." There are several books of sporting adventure written circa 1860-75 by Mr. H. A. Leveson under the name of 'The Old Shekarry.'

[c. A shooting-boat used in the Cashmere lakes.

[1875.—"A shikari is a sort of boat, that is in daily use with the English visitors; a light boat manned, as it commonly is, by six men, it goes at a fast pace, and, if well fitted with cushions, makes a comfortable conveyance. A banjghi (see BUNDOOK) shikari is the smallest boat of all; a shooting-boat, used in going after wild fowl on the lakes."—Deer, Junmao, &c., 181.]

SHIKAR-GĀH, s. Pers. A hunting-ground, or enclosed preserve. The word has also a technical application to patterns which exhibit a variety of figures and groups of animals, such as are still woven in brocade at Benares, and in shawl-work in Kashmir and elsewhere (see Marco Polo, Bk. I. ch. 17, and notes). [The great areas of jungle maintained by the Amirs of Sind and called Shikargahs are well known.

[1881.—'Once or twice a month when they (the Ameers) are all in good health, they pay visits to their different shikargahs or preserves for game.'—J. Barnes, Visit to the Court of Sind, 103.]

SHIKHŌ, n. and v. Burmese word. The posture of a Burmese in presence of a superior, i.e. kneeling with joined hands and bowed head in an attitude of worship. Some correspondence took place in 1833, in consequence of the use of this word by the then Chief Commissioner of British Burmah, in an official report, to describe the attitude used by British envoys at the Court of Ava. The statement (which was grossly incorrect) led to remonstrance by Sir Arthur Phayre. The fact was that the envoy and his party sat on a carpet, but the attitude had no analogy whatever to that of shikho, though the endeavour of the Burmese officials was persistent to involve them in some such degrading attitude. (See KOWTOW.)

1855.—"Our conductors took off their shoes at the gate, and the Woondouk made an ineffectual attempt to induce the Envoy to do likewise. They also at four different places, as we advanced to the inner gate, dropped on their knees and shikhoed towards the palace."—I. yale, Mission to Ava, 82.

1882.—"Another ceremony is that of shekhoing to the spire, the external emblem of the throne. All Burmans must do this at each of the gates, at the foot of the steps, and at intervals in between..."—The Burman, His Life and Notions, ii. 206.

SHINBIN, SHINBEAM, &c., s. A term in the Burmese tea-trade; apparently a corruption from Burm., shin-byin. The first monosyllable (shin) means 'to put together side by side,' and byin, 'plank,' the compound word being used in Burmese for 'a thick plank used in constructing the side of a ship.' The shinbin is a thick plank, about 15" wide by 4" thick, and running up to 25 feet in length (see Milburn, i. 47). It is not sawn, but split from green trees.

SHINKALI, SHIGALA. n.p. A name by which the City and Port of Cranganore (q.v.) seems to have been known in the early Middle Ages. The name was probably formed from Tiruvan-jiculam, mentioned by Dr. Gundert below. It is perhaps the Gingaleh of Rabbi Benjamin in our first quotation; but the data are too vague to determine this, though the position of that place seems to be in the vicinity of Malabar.

c. 1167.—"Gingaleh is but three days distant by land, whereas it requires a journey of fifteen days to reach it by sea; this place contains about 1,000 Israelites."—Benjamin of Tudela, in Wright's Early Travels, p. 117.

c. 1300.—"Of the cities on the shore (of Malabar) the first is Sindabur (Goa), then Faknir (see BACANORe), then the country of Mangalore (see MANGALORE) ... the Chinkali (or Jinkali), then Kilam (see QUILON)."—Rashiduddin, see J. R. As. Soc., N.S., iv. pp. 342, 345.

SHINTOO, SINTOO. s. Japanese Shintau, 'the Way of the Gods.' The primitive relation of Japan. It is described by Faria y Sousa and other old writers, but the name does not apparently occur in those older accounts, unless it be in the Sento of Couto. According to Kaempfer the philosophic or Confucian sect is called in Japan Sento. But that hardly seems to fit what is said by Couto, and his Sento seems more likely to be a mistake for Sento. [See Lowell's articles on Eso-er Eshtrino, in Proc. As. Soc. Japan, 1893.]

1612.—"But above all these idols they adore one Sento, of which they say that it is the substance and principle of All, and that its abode is in the Heavens."—Couto, v. viii. 12.

SHISHAM. See under SISSOO.

SHISHMUHULL, s. Pers. shisamuhal, lit. 'glass apartment' or palace. This is or was a common appendage of native palaces, viz. a hall or suite of rooms lined with mirror and other glittering surfaces, usually of a gimp-crack aspect. There is a place of exactly the same description, now gone to hideous decay, in the absurd Villa Palagonia at Bagheria near Palermo.

1835.—"The Shisamahal, or house of glass, is both curious and elegant, although the material is principally pounded tale and looking-glass. It consists of two rooms, of which the walls in the interior are divided into a thousand different panels, each of which is filled up with raised flowers in silver, gold, and colours, on a ground-work of tiny convex mirrors."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 395.

SHOE OF GOLD (or of Silver). The name for certain ingots of precious metal, somewhat in the form of a Chinese shoe, but more like a boat, which were formerly current in the trade of the Far East. Indeed of silver they are still current in China, for Giles says: "The common name among foreigners for the Chinese silver ingot, which bears some resemblance to a native shoe. May be of any weight from 1 oz. and even less, to 50 and sometimes 100 oz., and is always stamped by the assayer and banker, in evidence of purity" (Gloss. of Reference, 128). [In Hissar the Chinese silver is called silli from the slabs (sili) in which it is sold (MacGregor, Mon. on Gold and Silver Work in Punjab, p. 5.)] The same form of ingot was probably the balish (or yastok) of the Middle Ages, respecting which see Cathay, &c., 115, 481, &c. Both of these latter words mean also 'a cushion;' which is perhaps as good a comparison as either 'shoe' or 'boat.' The word now used in C. Asia is yambu. There are cuts of the gold and silver ingots in Tavernier, whose words suggest what is probably the true origin of the popular English name, viz. a corruption of the Dutch Goldschuyl.

1566.—"... valuable goods exported from this country (China) ... are first, a quantity of gold, which is carried to India, in loaves in the shape of boats. ..."—C. Pedreii, in Rammio, iii. 390.

1611.—"Then, I tell you, from China I could lead ships with cakes of gold fashioned like boats, containing, each of them, roundly speaking, 2 marks weight, and so each cake will be worth 280 pataeas."—Conto, Dialogo do Soldado Pratico, p. 155.

1676.—"The Pieces of Gold mark'd Fig. 1, and 2, are by the Hollanders called Golschat. that is to say, a Boat of Gold, because they are in the form of a Boat. Other Nations call them Leaves of Gold. ... The Great Pieces come to 12 hundred Gilders of Holland Money, and thirteen hundred and fifty Livres of our Money."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 8.

1792.—"Sent the Moolah to be delivered the Nabob, Dewan, and Buxie 48 China Oranges ... but the Dewan bid the Moolah write the Governor for a hundred more that he might send them to Court; which is understood to be One Hundred shoes of gold, or so many thousand pagodas or rupees."—In Wheeler, i. 397.

1794.—"Price Currant, July, 1794, ... Gold, China, in Shoes 34 Touch.—Loocker, 70.

1862.—"A silver ingot 'yambu' weighs about 2 (Indian) sere ... = 4 lbs., and is called 'yambu' or rupees. Kowordsky, in his book, calls 'yambuka,' or small silver ingot, is worth 33 Rs. ... 5 yambuchas, being equal to 1 yambu. There are two descriptions of 'yambucha;' one is a square piece of silver, having a Chinese stamp on it; the other ... in the form of a boat, has no stamp. The Yambu is in the form of a boat, and has a Chinese stamp on it."—Punjab Trade Report, App. cxxxvii.-xxxviii. 1.

1875.—"The yambu or kars is a silver ingot something the shape of a deep boat with projecting bow and stern. The upper surface is lightly hollowed, and stamped with a Chinese inscription. It is said to be pure silver, and to weigh 50 (Cashmir) = 50,000 grains English."—Report of Forst's Mission to Kashighar, 491.

1876.—"... he received his pay in Chinese yambs (gold coins), at the rate of 128 rubles each, while the real commercial value was only 115 rubles."—Schorger, Turkistan, ii. 322.

1901.—"A piece of Chinese shoe money value 10 taels, was exhibited before the Numismatic Society.—Athenæum, Jan. 26 p. 118. Perhaps the largest specimen known of Chinese "boat-money" was exhibited. It weighed 800 pesos troy, and represented 50 taels, or £5. 8s. Od. English."—Ibid. Jun 25, 1902, p. 120.

SHOE-FLOWER, s. A name given in Madras Presidency to the flower of the Hibiscus Rosa-sinensis, L. It is a literal translation of the Tamil, shiyappatu, Singh, sappattunala, a name given because the flowers are used at Madras to blacken shoes. The Malay name Kemang sapatu means the same. Voigt gives the word shoe-flowere as the English name, and adds: "Petals astrigent used by the Chinese to blacken their..."

shoes (?) and eyebrows" (Hortus Suburbanus Calcuttensis, 116-7); see also Drury, s.v. The notion of the Chinese blackening their shoes is surely an error, but perhaps they use it to blacken leather for European use.

[1773.—"The flower (Treypalata, or Morroock) (which commonly by us is called Shoe-flower, because used to black our shoes) is very large, of a deep but beautiful crimson colour."—Ives, 475.]

1791.—"La nuit suivante . . . je joignis aux pavots . . . une fleur de foule sapatte, qui sert aux cordonniers à tendre leurs cuirs en noir."—B, de St. Pierre, Chavrière Indienne. This foule-sapatte is apparently some quasi Hindustani form of the name (phul-wadé) used by the Portuguese.

SHOE-GOOSE, s. This ludicrous corruption of the Pers. styg-kash, lit. 'black-ear,' i.e. lynx (Felis Caracal) occurs in the passage below from A. Hamilton. [The corruption of the same word by the Times, below, is equally amusing.]

[c. 1390.—". . . ounces, and another kind something like a greyhound, having only the ears black, and the whole body perfectly white, which among these people is called Siaigora."—Friar Jordanus, 18.]

1727.—"Antelopes, Hares and Foxes, are their wild game, which they hunt with Dogs, Leopards, and a small fierce creature called by them a Shoe-goose."—A. Hamilton, i. 124: [ed. 1744, i. 125.]

1802.—". . . between the cat and the lion, are the . . . syagush, the lynx, the tiger-cat, . . ."—Risdon, Essay on Abstinence from Animal Food, 12.

1813.—"The Moguls train another beast for antelope-hunting called the Syah-gush, or black-ears, which appears to be the same as the caracal, or Russian lynx."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 277; [2nd ed. i. 175 and 169.]

[1886.—"In 1760 a Moor named Abdallah arrived in India with a 'Shah Goest' (so spelt, evidently a Shawl Goat) as a present for Mr. Secretary Pitt."—Account of I. O. Records, in Times, Aug. 3.]

SHOE, s. A hobby, a favourite pursuit or whim. Ar.—shauk.

1796.—"This increased my shouq . . . for soldiering, and I made it my study to become a proficient in all the Hindostanee modes of warfare."—Milly, Mem. of Lt.-Col. J. Skinner, i. 109.

[1896.—"One Hakim has a shoukh for turning everything ootapotaal."—Confessions of an Orderly, 94.]

SHOLA, s. In S. India, a wooded ravine; a thicket. Tam. shoilei.

1862.—"At daylight . . . we left the Sispara bungalow, and rode for several miles through a valley interspersed with sholash of rhododendron trees."—Markham, Pers and India, 356.

1875.—"Here and there in the hollows were little jungles; sholash, as they are called."—Sir M. E. Grant-Duff, Notes of Indian Journey, 292.

SHOOCKA, s. Ar.—H. shukka (properly 'an oblong strip'), a letter from a king to a subject.

1757.—"I have received several melancholy Shukhas from the King (of Duhl) calling on me in the most pressing terms for assistance and support."—Letter of Lord Cornwallis, in Corresp. i. 307.

SHOOLDARY, s. A small tent with steep sloping roof, two poles and a ridge-piece, and with very low side walls. The word is in familiar use, and is habitually pronounced as we have indicated. But the first dictionary in which we have found it is that of Platts. This author spells the word chhooldari, identifying the first syllable with jhol, signifying 'puckering or bagging.' In this light, however, it seems possible that it is from jhol in the sense of a bag or wallet, viz. a tent that is cramped into a bag when carried. [The word is in Fallon, with the rather doubtful suggestion that it is a corruption of the English 'soldier's tent.' See PAWL.]

1808.—"I have now a shooldarree for myself, and a long paal (see PAWL) for my people."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 183.

[1892.—". . . the men in their suldaris, or small single-roofed tents, had a bad time of it. . ."—Ball, Jungle Life, 156.]

SHRAUB, SHROBB, s. Ar. sharab; Hind. sharab, shraab, 'wine.' See under SHERBET.

SHROFF, s. A money-changer, a banker. Ar. sarraf, saunif, saurf. The word is used by Europeans in China as well as in India, and is there applied to the experts who are employed by banks and mercantile firms to check the quality of the dollars that pass into the houses (see Giles under next word). Also shroffage, for money-dealer's commission. From the same root comes the Heb. sōrif, 'a goldsmith.' Compare the figure in Malachi, iii. 3: "He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver; and he shall purify the sons of Levi." Only in Hebrew do the goldsmiths test metal, while the zuraf tests coins. The Arab poet says of his mare: "Her forefeet scatter the gravel every midday, as the dirhams are scattered at their testing by the zuraf." (W. R. S.)

1554. — "Salaries of the officers of the Custom Houses, and other charges for which the Treasurers have to pay, ... Also to the Xaraffo, whose charge it is to see to the money, two parthus a month, which make for a year seven thousand and two hundred rual." — Botelho, Tombo, in Subsidios, 238.

1560. — "There are in the city many and very wealthy carafos who change money." — Tenreiro, ch. i.

1584. — "Five tangas make a seraphin (see XERAFINE) of gold; but if one would change them into basaruchies (see BUD-GROOK) he may have 5 tangas and 16 basaruchies, which everplus they call cerafagio. ..." — Barret, in Habl. ii. 410.

1585. — "This present year, because only two ships came to Goa, (the rains) have sold at 12 per cent, of Xaraffaggio (shroffeage), as this commission is called, from the word Xaraffo, which is the title of the banker." — Saisottti, in De Gabernatis, Norat, p. 203.

1596. — "There is in every place of the street exchangers of money, by which they call Xarafos, which are all christian Jews." — Linschoten, 66; [Hak. Soc. i. 291, and see 244.]

c. 1610. — "Dans ce Marché ... aussi sont les changeurs qu'ils nomment Cherasfes, dont il y en a en plusieurs autres endroits; leurs boutiques sont aux bouts des rues et carrefours, toutes couvertes de mnomoye, dont ils payent tribut au Rov." — Pyrard de Lenclos, ii. 59; [Hak. Soc. ii. 67.]

1614. — "... having been borne in hand by some Sarafos to pay money there." — Voyer, Lettres, iii. 282. The "Sheriff of Bantam" (ibid., iv. 7) may perhaps be a shroff, but compare Sheerief.

1673. — "It could not be improved till the Governor had released the Shroffs or Bankers." — Fryer, 413.

1697-8. — "In addition to the cash and property which they got by plunder, the enemy fixed two lists of rupees at the price of the ransom of the prisoners. ... To make up the balance, the Sarafes and merchants of Nandurbar were importuned to raise a sum, small or great, by way of loan. But they would not consent." — Khaf's Khan, in Elliot, vii. 302.

1750. — "... the Irruption of the Mo- rothas into Carnatic, was another event that brought several eminent Shroffs and wealthy Merchants into our Town; insomuch, that I may say, there was hardly a Shroff of any Note, in the Mogul empire but had a House in it; in a word, Madras was become the Admiration of all the Country People, and the Envy of all our European Neighbours." — Letter to a Proprietor of the E. I. Co. 53-54.

1809. — "I had the satisfaction of hearing the Court order them (i.e. Gen. Martin's executors) to pay two lacs and a half to the plaintiff, a shroff of Lucknow." — Ad. Valantia, i. 248.

[1891. — "The banker in Persia is looked on simply as a small tradesman—in fact the business of the Serof is despised." — Willa, in The Land of the Lion and the Sun, 192.]

SHROFF, TO, v. This verb is applied properly to the sorting of different rupees or other coins, so as to discard refuse, and to fix the various amounts of discount or aqio upon the rest, establishing the value in standard coin. Hence figuratively 'to sift,' choosing the good (men, horses, facts, or what not) and rejecting the inferior.

[1554. — (See under BATTA, b.)]

1878. — "Shroffing schools are common in Canton, where teachers of the art keep bad dollars for the purpose of exercising their pupils; and several jorks on the subject have been published there, with numerous illustrations of dollars and other foreign coins, the methods of scooping out silver and filling up with copper or lead, comparisons between genuine and counterfeit dollars, the difference between native and foreign milling, etc., etc." — Giles, Glossary of Refrane, 129.

1882. — (The Compradore) "derived a profit from the process of shroffing which (the money received) underwent before being deposited in the Treasury." — The Pankwa at Canton, 55.

SHUB, s. See under SHERBET.

SHULWAURS, s. Trousers, or drawers rather, of the Oriental kind, the same as pyjammas, long-drawers, or mogul-breeches (qq.v). The Persian is shubhr, which according to Prof. Max Muller is more correctly shubtar, from shul, 'the thigh,' related to Latin crus, curris, and to Skt. kshara or kkhura, 'hoof' (see Pusey on Daniel, 570). Be this as it may, the Ar. form is sirwai (vulg. shurwai), pl. sarawai, [which Burton (Arab. Nights, i. 205) translates 'bag-trousers' and 'petticoat-trousers,' "the latter being the divided skirt of the future." This appears in the ordinary editions of the Book of Daniel in Greek, as σαραβάπα, and also in the Vulgate, as follows: "Et capillus capitis eorum non esset addustus, et sarabala eorum non fuisse inmutata, et odor ignis non transisset per eos" (iii. 27). The original word is sarbālin, pl. of sarbāla. Luther, however, renders this "Mantel"; as the A.V. also does by "coats"; [the R.V. hosen]. On this Prof. Robertson-Smith writes:

"It is not certain but that Luther and the A.V. are right. The word sarbālin means 'cloak' in the Gemara; and in Arabic sībah is 'a garment, a coat of mail.' Perhaps quite an equal weight of scholarship would now lean (though with hesitation) towards the cloak or coat, and against the breeches theory.

"The Arabic word occurs in the Traditions of the Prophet (Bokhari, vii. 96).

"Of course it is certain that sarāba is from the Persian, but not through Arabic. The Bedouins did not wear trousers in the time of Ammonius, and don't do so now.

"The ordinary so-called LXX. editions of Daniel contain what is really the post-Christian version of Theodotion. The true LXX. text has Ἱσοδήμαρα.

"It may be added that Jerome says that both Aquila and Symmachus wrote sarabula." [The Encyc. Biblica also prefers the rendering of the A.V. (i. 607), and see iii. 2934.]

The word is widely spread as well as old; it is found among the Tartars of W. Asia as jālibar, among the Siberians and Bashkirds as sībah, among the Karluaks as shībār, whilst it reached Russia as shuravulī, Spain as zarquelles, and Portugal as zarelos. A great many Low Latin variations of the word will be found in Ducange, sarabula, sarabull, sarablla, sarabula, sarabura, and more: [And Crawfurd (Desc. Dict. 124) writes of Malay dress: "Trousers are occasionally used under the sarrun by the richer classes, and this portion of dress, like the imitation of the turban, seems to have been borrowed from the Arabs, as is implied by its Arabic name, sarawul, corrupted salawul."]

In the second quotation from Isidore of Seville below it will be seen that the word had in some cases been interpreted as 'turbans.'

A.D. (1).—"Kai ἐθέδωρι τοῖς ἀνδρασ δότι ἀνακαίνεσα τὸ τέρα τοῦ σώματος αὐτῶν καὶ ἡ θυσία τῆς κεφάλης αὐτῶν ἀνεργογίσθη καὶ τὰ σαραβάρα αὐτῶν ἀνεργογίσθη, καὶ ὄσμα πύρου ὅν ἦν ἐν αὐτοῖς."—Gr. Tr. of Dan. iii. 27.

1524.—"... tell me how much he will be contented with? Can I offer him five Tomans, and a pair of crimson Shulwars?"—Haji Baba, ed. 1855, p. 179.

1851.—"I used to wear a red shirt and velveten sharovary, and lie on the sofa like a gentleman, and drink like a Swede."—Ten Years of Penal Servitude in Siberia, by Fedor Dostoevski, E.T. by Maria v. Thilo, 191.

SIAM. s.p. This name of the Indo-Chinese Kingdom appears to come to us through the Malays, who call it Siyam. From them we presume the Portuguese took their Reyno de Sião as Barros and Couto write it, though we have in Correa Siam precisely as we write it. Camoes also writes Sião for the kingdom; and the statement of De la Loubère quoted below that the Portuguese used Siam as a national, not a geographical, expression cannot be accepted in its generality, accurate as that French writer usually is. It is true that both Barros and F. M. Pinto use os Siames for the nation, and the latter also uses the adjective form o regno Siame. But he also constantly says rey de Sião. The origin of the name would seem to be a term Sien, or Siam, identical with Shan (q.v.). "The kingdom of Siam is known to the Chinese by the name Sien-lo. . . . The supplement to Matwainl's Encyclopaedia describes Sien-lo as on the seaboard, to the extreme south of Chen-ching (or Cochín China). 'It originally consisted of two kingdoms, Sien and Lo-hoh. The Sien people are the remains of a tribe which in the year (A.D. 1341) began to come down upon the Lo-hoh and united with the latter into one nation.'" See Marco Polo, 2nd ed., Bk. iii. ch. 7, note 3. The considerations there adduced indicate that the Lo who occupied the coast of the Gulf before the descent of the Sien, belonged to the Laotian Shans, Thaïngui, or Great Tai, whilst the Sien or Siamese Proper were the T'ai Noi, or Little Tai. (See also Sarnau.) ["The name Siam . . . whether it is 'a barbarous Anglicism derived from the Portuguese or Italian word Scion,' or is derived from the Malay Segam, which means 'brown.'"]—J. G. Scott, Upper Burma Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 205.

1516.—"Proceeding further, quitting the kingdom of Pegou, along the coast over against Malaca there is a very great kingdom of pagans which they call Danseam (of Anseam); the king of which is a pagan also, and a very great lord."—Barboza (Lisbon, Acad.), 399. It is difficult to interpret this Assem, which we had also in C. Federici below in the form Asion. But the As is probably a Malay prefix of some kind. [Also see ansyne in quotation from the same writer under Malacca.]

c. 1522.—"The king (of Zamba) answered him that he was welcome, but that the custom was that all ships which arrived at his country or port paid tribute, and it was only 4 days since that a ship called the Junk of Ciama, laden with gold and slaves, had paid him his tribute, and to verify what he said, he showed them a merchant of the said Ciama, who had remained there to trade with the gold and slaves."—Pires, Hak. SICCA, s. As will be seen by reference to the article RUPEE, up to 1835 a variety of rupees had been coined in the Company's territories. The term sicca (sikka, from Ar. sikka 'a coin of die,'—and 'coined money'—whence Pers. sikka zadan, 'to coin') had been applied to newly coined rupees, which were at a batta o premium over those worn, or assumed to be worn, by use. In 1793 the Government of Bengal, with a view to terminating, as far as that Presidency was concerned, the confusion and abuses engendered by this system, ordered that all rupees coined for the future should bear the impression of the 19th year of Shâh 'Alam (the "Great Mogul" then reigning), and this rupee, "19 Smt Sikkah," 'struck in the 19th year,' was to be the legal tender in Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa. This rupee, which is the Sicca of more recent monetary history, weighed 192 grs. troy, and then contained 176:13 grs. of pure silver. The "Company's Rupee," which introduced uniformity of coinage over British India in 1825, contained only 165 grs. silver. Hence the Sicca bore to the Company's Rupee (which was based on the old Farrukhabad rupee) the proportion of 16:15 nearly. The Sicca was allowed by Act VII. of 1833 to survive as an exceptional coin in Bengal, but was abolished as such in 1836. It continued, however, a ghostly existence for many years longer in the form of certain Government Book-debts in that currency.

To this Mr. Bastedo adds: "Nor does there seem to be any foundation for the other time-honoured tory (also repeated by Kaye) in connection with this judgment, viz., the alleged inter-ruption of the Chief Justice, while he was delivering judgment, by Mr. Justice Hyde, with the eager suggestion or reminder of 'Siccas, Siccas, Brother Impey,' with the view of making the damages as high as the awarded figure as possible. Mr. Merivale says that he could find no confirmation of the old joke. ... The story seems to have been first promulgated in a book of 'Personal Recollections' by John Nicholls, M. SIND, SCINDE.

The territory on the Indus below the Punjab. [In the early inscriptions the two words Sindhu-Soura are often found conjoined, the latter probably part of Upper Sind (see Bombay Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 96.)] The earlier Mahommadeans hardly regarded Sind as part of India, but distinguished sharply between Sind and Hind, and denoted the whole region that we call India by the copula 'Hind and Sind.' We know that originally these were in fact but diverging forms of one word; the aspirant and sibilant tending in several parts of India (including the extreme east—compare ASSAM, Akom—and the extreme west), as in some other regions, to exchange places.

But from the association with the Khazars, and in a passage on the preceding page with Alans and Khazars, we may be almost certain that these Sind are not Indian, but a Sarmatic people mentioned by Ammianus xxii. 12. see what comes of it.' So we remained talking till one of his servants came in and said: 'There is a ship of Oman come in.' Shortly after, people arrived, carrying hampers with various things, such as cloths, and rose-water. As they opened one, out came a long lizard, which instantly clung to the wall and went to join the other one. It was the same person, they say, who enchanted the crocodiles in the estuary of Sindabur, so that now they hurt nobody.'

c. 1330. — 'A traveller states that the country from Sindabur to Hanawar towards its eastern extremity joins with Malabar . . .'-Abulafia, Fr. tr., ii. ii. 115. Further on in his Tables he jumbles up (as Edrisi has done) Sindabur with Sindin (see ST. JOHN).

'The heat is great at Aden. This is the port frequented by the people of India; great ships arrive there from Cambay, Tana, Kaulam, Calicut, Fundurina, Shalyyat, Manjarur, Fakanur, Hanaur, Sandabur, et cetera.'— Ibn Battuto, ii. 177.

c. 1313-14. — 'Three days after setting sail we arrived at the Island of Sandabur, within which there are 36 villages. It is surrounded by an inlet, and at the time of ebb the water of this is fresh and pleasant, whilst at flow it is salt and bitter. There are in the island two cities, one ancient, built by the pagans; the second built by the Musulmans when they conquered the island the first time. We left this island behind us and anchored at a small island near the mainland, where we found a temple, a grove, and a tank of water . . .'—Ibid. iv. 61-62.

1350. 1375.—In the Medecine and the Catalan maps of those dates we find on the coast of India Cintabor and Chintabor respectively, on the west coast of India.

c. 1551. — '24th Voyage: from Guvah-Sindabur to Aden. If you start from Guvah-Sindabur at the end of the season, take care not to fall on Cape Fil,' Soc.—Mohit, in J. A. S. B. v. 564.

The last quotation shows that Goa was known even in the middle of the 16th century to Oriental seamen as Goa-Sindabur, whatever Indian name the last part represented; probably, from the use of the snadv by the earlier Arab writers, and from the Chintabor of the European maps, Chandpear rather than Sandabur. No Indian name like this has yet been recovered from inscriptions as attaching to Goa; but the Turkish author of the Mohit supplies the connection, and Ibn Batuta's description even without this would be sufficient for the identification. His description, it will be seen, is that of a delta-island, and Goa is the only one partaking of that character upon the coast. He says it contained 36 villages; and Barros tells us that Goa Island was known to the nattves as Tzadddli, a name signifying "Thirty villages." (See SAL. SETTE.) Its identity to the island where Ibn Batuta proceeded to anchor, which we have shown to be Anchveda (q.v.), is another proof. Turning to Rashiduddin, the order in which he places Sindabur, Faknur (Baccanore), Manjarur (Mangalore), Hili (Mt. D'Ely), is perfectly correct, if for Sindabur we substitute Goa. The passage from Edrisi and one indicated from Abulfeda only show a confusion which has misled many readers since.

SINGALESE, CINGHALESE, n.p.

Native of Ceylon; pertaining to Ceylon. The word is formed from Singaha, 'Dwelling of Lions,' the word used by the natives for the Island, and which is the origin of most of the names given to it (see CEYLON). The explanation given by De Barros and Couto is altogether fanciful, though it lends them to notice the curious and obscure fact of the introduction of Chinese influence in Ceylon during the 15th century.

1552. — 'That the Chinese (Chigs) were masters of the Choromandel Coast, part of Malabar, and of this Island of Ceylon, we have not only the assertion of the Natives of the latter, but also evidence in the buildings, names, and language that they left in it. But because they were in the vicinity of this Cape Galle, the other people who lived from the middle of the Island upwards called those dwelling about there Chingalla, and their language the same, as much as to say the language, or the people of the Chins of Galle.'— Barros, III. i. 1.

1553. — (The Cauhin Chineins) 'are of the race of the Chingalays, which they say are the best kind of all the Malabars.'— Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 397.

1558. — 'inhabited with people called Cingalas. . . . '—Linschoten, 21; [Hak Soc. i. 77; in v. 81, Cingalas].

c. 1610. — 'Il si ciennent done que . . . les premiers qui y allèrent, et ci qui les pêlurent (les Maldives) furent . . . les Cingalais de l'isle de Ceylon.'—Parcet de Lestac, i. 155 [Hak. Soc. i. 105, and see i. 266].

1612. —(Couto, after giving the same explanation of the word as Barros, says: And as they spring from the Chins, who are the fahest heathen of the East . . . so they of this island the weakest, falsest, and most tricky people in all India, insomuch that, to this day, you never find truth or faith in a Chingalla."—V. i. 5.

1681.—"The Chingleys are naturally a people given to sloth and laziness: if they can but anyways live, they abhor to work." . . . —Knox, 32.

SINGAPORE, SINGAPORE. n.p.

This name was adopted by Sir Stamford Raffles in favour of the city which he founded, February 23, 1819, on the island which had always retained the name since the Middle Ages. This it derived from Sighapura, Skt. 'Lion-city,' the name of a town founded by Malay or Javanese settlers from Sumatra, probably in the 14th century, and to which Barros ascribes great commercial importance. The Indian origin of the name, as of many other names and phrases which survive from the old Indian civilisation of the Archipelago, had been forgotten, and the origin which Barros was taught to ascribe to it is on a par with his etymology of Singalese quoted in the preceding article. The words on which his etymology is founded are: no doubt Malay: singah, 'to tarry, halt, or lodge,' and pora-pora, 'to pretend'; and these were probably supposed to refer to the temporary occupation of Sinhapura, before the chiefs who founded it passed on to Malacca.

It may be noted that Dennys (Desc. Dict. s.v.) derives the word from singha, 'a place of call;' and pura, 'a city.' In Dalloquier's Comm. Hak. Soc. ii. 73, we are told: "Singapura, whence the city takes its name, is a channel through which all the shipping of those parts passes, and signifies in his Malay language, 'treacherous delay.'" See quotation from Barros below.

The settlement of Hinduized people on the site, if not the name, is probably as old as the 4th century, A.D., or inscriptions have been found there in a very old character. One of these on a rock at the mouth of the little river on which the town stands, was destroyed some 40 or 50 years ago for he accommodation of some wretched junglelaw.

The modern Singapore and its prosperity form a monument to the patriotism, sagacity, and fervid spirit of the founder. According to an article in the Geogr. Magazine (i. 107) derived from Mr. Archibald Ritchie, who was present with the expedition which founded the colony, Raffles, after consultation with Lord Hastings, was about to establish a settlement for the protection and encouragement of our Eastern trade, in the Nicobar Islands, when his attention was drawn to the superior advantages of Singapore by Captains Ross and Crawford of the Bombay Marine, who had been engaged in the survey of those seas. Its great adaptation for a mercantiile settlement had been discerned by the shrewd, if somewhat vulgar, Scot, Alexander Hamilton, 120 years earlier. It seems hardly possible, we must however observe, to reconcile the details in the article cited, with the letters and facts contained in the Life of Raffles; though probably the latter had, at some time or other, received information from the officers named by Mr. Ritchie.

1512.—"And as the enterprise was one to make good booty, everybody was delighted to go on it, so that they were more than 1200 men, the soundest and best armed of the garrison, and so they were ready incessantly, and started for the Strait of Cincapura, where they were to wait for the junks."—Correa, ii. 254-5.

1553.—"Anciently the most celebrated settlement in this region of Malaca was one called Cingapura, a name which in their tongue means 'pretended halt' (fula di-mora); and this stood upon a point of that country which is the most southerly of all Asia, and lies, according to our graduation, in half a degree of North Latitude . . . before the foundation of Malaca, at this same Cingapura . . . flocked together all the navigators of the Seas of India from West and East . . ."—Barros, ii. vi. 1.

[The same derivation is given in the Comm. of Dalloquier, Hak. Soc. iii. 73.]

1572.—"Mas na ponta da terra Cingapura Verdes, onde o caminho as naos se estreita; Daqui, tornando a costa à Cynosure, Se encerra, e para a Aurora se endireita."

Camões, x. 125.

By Burton:

"But on her Lands-end throneed see Cingapûr, where the wide sea-road shrinks to the narrow way: Therein curves the coast to face the Cynosure, and lastly trends Aurora-wards its lay."

1727.—"In anno 1703 I called at Johore on my Way to China, and he treated me very kindly, and made me a Present of the Island of Sincapure, but I told him it could be given me in a proper Place for a Company to settle a Colony in, lying in the Center of Trade, and being accommodated with good Rivers and safe Harbours, so conveniently situated that all Winds served Shipping, both to go out and come in."—A. Hamilton, ii. 98; [ed. 1744, ii. 97].

1818.—"We are now on our way to the eastward, in the hope of doing something, but I much fear the Dutch have hardly left us an inch of ground. . . . My attention is principally turned to Johore, and you must not be surprised if my next letter to you is dated from the site of the ancient city of Singapura."—Bragge's Letter to Marsden, dated Sandheats, Dec. 12.

SINGARA, s. Hind. singhârâ, Skt. srugâtâka, sgûya, 'a horn.' The caltrop or water-chestnut; Trapa bispinosa, Roxb. (N.O. Haloragaceae).

[c. 1590. — The Jâh (ed. Jervis, ii. 65) mentions it as one of the crops on which revenue was levied in cash.

1855.—"Here, as in most other parts of India, the tank is spoiled by the water-chestnut, singhara (Trapa bispinosa), which is everywhere as regularly planted and cultivated in fields under a large surface of water, as wheat or barley is in the dry plains. . . . The nut grows under the water after the flowers decay, and is of a triangular shape, covered with a tough brown integument adhering strongly to the kernel, which is wholly esculent, and of a fine cartilaginous texture. The people are very fond of these nuts, and are carried often upon bullocks' backs two or three hundred miles to market."—Shenwan, Rambles, &c. (1844), i. 191; [ed. Smith, i. 94.]

1859.—"The nuts of the Trapa bispinosa, called Singhara, are sold in all the Bazaars of India; and a species called by the same name, forms a considerable portion of the food of the inhabitants of Cashmere, as we learn from Mr. Forster [loc. cit.] that it yields the Government 12,000l. of revenue; and Mr. Moorcroft mentions nearly the same sum as Runjeet Singh's share, from 96,000 to 128,000 assloads of this nut, yielded by the Lake of Oulur."—Rogle, Him. Plants, 2. 211.

SIPAHSELAR, s. A General-in-chief; Pers. sipâh-salâr, 'army-leader,' the last word being the same as in the title of the late famous Minister-Regent of Hyderabad, Sir Sâlâr Jâng, i.e. 'the leader in war.'

[c. 1000-1100.—"Voici quelle était alors la gloire et la puissance des Orpédiens dans le royaume. Ils possédaient la charge de bsasalar, ou de généralissime de toute la Géorgie. SIRCAR, s. Hind. from Pers. surkâr, 'head (of) affairs.' This word has very divers applications; but its senses may fall under three heads.

palankins, to make Chicks (q.v.) and table-mats, and for many other purposes of rural and domestic economy.

1810.—"It is perhaps singular that I should have seen seerky in use among a group of gypsies in Essex. In India these itinerants, whose habits and characters correspond with this intolerable species of banditti, invariably shelter themselves under seerky."—Williamson, V.M. ii. 290.

1832.—"... neat little huts of sirrakee, a reed or grass, resembling bright straw."—Mrs. Mary Husson Alli, Observations, i. 23.

SIRRIS, s. Hind. siris, Skt. šīr-isha, shrı, 'to break,' from the brittleness of its branches; the tree Acacia Lebbeck, Benth., indigenous in S. India, the Sâtpûra range, Bengal, and the sub-Himalayan tract; cultivated in Egypt and elsewhere. A closely kindred sp., A. Julibrissin, Boivin, affords a specimen of scientific 'Hobson-Jobson'; the specific name is a corruption of Gulâb-reshm, 'silk-flower.'

1568.—"Quelques années après le mort de Dariyal, des charpentiers ayant abattu un arbre de Seris, qui croissait auprès de son tombeau, le couvèrent en plusieurs pièces pour l'employeur à des constructions. Tout-à-coup une voix terrible se fit entendre, la terre se mit à trembler et le tronc de cet arbre se releva de lui-même. Les ouvriers épouvantés s'enfuirent, et l'arbre ne tarda pas à reverter."—Afsâs, Arâjish-i-Maghfîl, quoted by Garcia de Tussy, Ref. Mrs. 88.

[c. 1850.—"An' it fell when sirris-shaws were sere, And the nights were long and mirth."—R. Kipling, Departmental Ditties, The Fall of Jack Gibson.]

SISSOO, SHISHAM, s. Hind. sītā, sītīn, shishum, Skt. śīnapā; Ar. sīsam, sāsim; the tree Dalbergia Sissoo, Roxb. (N.O. Leguminosae) and its wood. This is excellent, and valuable for construction, joinery, boat- and carriage-building, and furniture. It was the favourite wood for gun-carriages as long as the supply of large timber lasted. It is now much cultivated in the Punjab plantations. The tree is indigenous in the sub-Himalayan tracts; and believed to be so likewise in Beluchistan, Guzerat, and Central India. Another sp. of Dalbergia (D. latifolia) affords the Black Wood (q.v.) of S. and W. India. There can be little doubt that one or more of these species of Dalbergia afforded the sesame wood spoken of in the Periplus, and in some old Arabic writers. A quotation under Black Wood shows that this wood was exported from India to Chaldea in remote ages. Sissoo has continued in recent times to be exported to Egypt, (see Forskal, quoted by Royle, Hindu Medicin, 128). Royle notices the resemblance of the Biblical shittin wood to shisham.

c. A.D. 80.—"... Thither they are wont to despatch from Barygaza (Broach) to both these ports of Persia, great vessels with brass, and timbers, and beams of teak (ξιθον σαγαλίων και δωκών) ... and logs of shisham (φαλάγγων σασακίων) ..."—Periplos, Maria Erythri, cap 56.

c. 545.—"These again are passed on from Siededila to the marts on this side, such as Malé, where the pepper is grown, and Kàlikùn, whence are exported brass, and shisham logs (σασακίων ξίθη), and other wares."—Giatomi, lib. xi.

! before 1200.—"There are the wolf and the parrot, and the peacock, and the dove, And the plant of Zînî, and al-ğâsîm, and pepper, ..."—Verses on India by Abû-l-dhalî, the Sîdî, quoted by Kâzîmî, in Gildemeister, p. 218.

1810.—"Sissoo grows in most of the great forests, intermixed with sâul. This wood is extraordinarily hard and heavy, of a dark brown, inclining to a purple tint when polished."—Williamson, V.M. ii. 71.

1839.—"As I rode through the city one day I saw a considerable quantity of timber lying in an obscure street. On examining it I found it was shisham, a wood of the most valuable kind, all being not liable to the attacks of white ants."—Boy Leaves from Young Egypt, ed. 1851, p. 102.

SITTING-UP. A curious custom, in vogue at the Presidency towns more than a century ago, and the nature of which is indicated by the quotations. Was it of Dutch origin?

1777.—"Lady Impey sits up with Mrs. Hastings; culpa toad-eating."—Ph. Francis's Diary, quoted in Basted, Echoes of Old Calcutta, 124; [3rd ed. 125].

1780.—"When a young lady arrives at Madras, she must, in a few days afterwards sit up to receive company, attended by some beau or master of the ceremonies, which perhaps continues for a week, or until she has seen all the fair sex, and gentlemen of the settlement."—Moore's Narr, 56.

1795.—"You see how many good reasons there are against your scheme of my taking horse instantly, and hastening to throw myself at the lady's feet; as to the other, of proxy, I can only agree to it under certain conditions. ... I am not to be forced to sit up, and receive male or female visitors. ... I am not to be obliged to deliver my opinion on patterns for caps or petticoats for any lady. ...."—T. Munro to his Sister, in Life, i. 169.

1810. — "Among the several justly exploded ceremonies we may reckon that ... of 'Sitting up. ...' This 'Sitting up,' as it was termed, generally took place at the house of some lady of rank or fortune, who, for three successive nights, threw open her mansion for the purpose of receiving all ... who chose to pay their respects to such ladies as might have recently arrived in the country."—Williamson, i. 113.

SITTINGY, s. Hind. from Ar. shatrangi, shatrangi, and that from Pers. shatrang, 'chess,' which is again of Skt. origin, chațuranga, 'quadrupartite' (see SADRAS). A carpet of coloured cotton, now usually made in stripes, but no doubt originally, as the name implies, in chequers.

1648. — "... Een andere sorte van schiepte Tapijten die m'e noemt Chitrenga."—Van Teidt, 63.

1673. — "They pull off their Slippers, and after the usual Salams, seat themselves in Choultries, open to some Tank of purling Water: commonly spread with Carpets or Sittringees."—Fryer, 93.

1688. — "... sittringees."—In Yale, Hodges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cxlv.

1755.—"To be sold by public auction ... the valuable effects of Warren Hastings, Esquire ... carpets and sittringees."—In Seton-Karr, i. 111.

SIWALIK, n.p. This is the name now applied distinctively to that outer range of tertiary hills which in various parts of the Himalaya runs parallel to the foot of the mountain region, separated from it by valleys known in Upper India as dūns (see DHOUN). But this special and convenient sense (d) has been attributed to the term by modern Anglo-Indian geographers only. Among the older Mahommmedan historians the term Siwalik is applied to a territory to the west of and perhaps embracing the Aravalli Hills, but certainly including specifically Nagore (Nâyjaur) and Mandâwar the predecessor of modern Jodhpur, and in the vicinity of that city. This application is denoted by (a).

In one or two passages we find the application of the name (Siwalik) extending a good deal further south, as if reaching to the vicinity of Mâlwâ. Such instances we have grouped under (b). But it is possible that the early application (a) habitually extended thus far.

At a later date the name is applied to the Himalaya; either to the range in its whole extent, as in the passages from Cheerefaddin (Shariffuddin 'Ali of Yezd) and from Baber; sometimes with a possible limitation to that part of the mountains which overlooks the Punjab; or, as the quotation from Rennell indicates, with a distinction between the less lofty region nearest the plains, and the Alpine summits beyond, Siwalik applying to the former only.

The true Indian form of the name is, we doubt not, to be gathered from the occurrence, in a list of Indian national names, in the Vishnu Purâna, of the Saivâlas. But of the position of these we can only say that the nations, with whom the context immediately associates them, seem to lie towards the western part of Upper India. (See Wilson's Works, Vishnu Purâna, ii. 175.) The popular derivation of Siwalik as given in several of the quotations below, is from swâlihâk, 'One lakh and a quarter'; but this is of no more value than most popular etymologies.

We give numerous quotations to establish the old application of the term, because this has been somewhat confused in Elliot's extracts by the interpolated phrase 'Siwâlik Hills,' where it is evident from Raverty's version of the Tabaqât-i-Nâsîrî that there is no such word as Hills in the original.

We have said that the special application of the term to the detached sub-Himalayan range is quite modern. It seems in fact due to that very eminent investigator in many branches of natural science, Dr. Hugh Falconer; at least we can find no trace of it before the use of the term by him in papers presented to the Asiatic Society of Bengal. It is not previously used, so far as we can discover, even by Royle; nor is it known to Jacquemont, who was intimately associated with Royle and Cautley, at Sahâranpur, very shortly before Falconer's arrival there. Jacquemont (Journal, ii. 11) calls the range: "la première chaîne de montagnes que j'appellerai les montagnes de Dehra." The first occurrence that we can find is in a paper by Falconer on the 'Aptitude of the Himalayan Range for the Culture of the Tea Plant,' in vol. iii. of the J. As. Soc. Bengal, which we quote below. A year later, in the account of the Sivatherium fossil, by Falconer and Cautley, in the As. Researches, we have a fuller explanation of the use of the term Siwalik, and its alleged etymology.

It is probable that there may have been some real legendary connection of the hills in the vicinity with the name of Niva. For in some of the old maps, such as that in Berney's Travels, we find Siba given as the name of a province about Hurdwar; and the same name occurs in the same connection in the Mem. of the Emperor Jahangir (Elliot, vi. 352). [On the connection of Siva worship with the lower Himalaya, see Atkinson, Himalayan Gazetteer, ii. 743.]

c. 1247.—"... When the Sultan of Islam, Nāsir-ud Dūnya-wa-'ud-Dīn, ascended the throne of sovereignty ... after Malik Bāllān had come [to Court!] he, on several occasions made a request for Ucehah together with Muitan. This was acquiesced in, under the understanding that the Siwalik [territory] and Nāg-awr should be relinquished by him to other Maliks. ..."—Ibid. 751.

1255.—"When the new year came round, on Tuesday, the 1st of the month of Mulharram, 651 H., command was given to Ulugh Khān-i-A'zam ... to proceed to his fiefs, the territory of Siwalik and Hansī."—Ibid. 683.

1257.—"Malik Bāllān ... withdrew (from Dehi), and by way of the Siwalik [country], and with a slight retinue, less than 200 or 300 in number, returned to Ucehah again."—Ibid. 785.

1259.—"When the royal tent was pitched at Talh-pat, the [contiguous] forces of the Siwalik [districts], which were the fiefs of Ulugh Khān-i-A'zam, had been delayed ... (he) set out for Hansī ... (and there) issued his mandate, so that, in the space of 11 days, the troops of the Siwalik, 1528.—"The northern range of hills has been mentioned ... after leaving Kashmir, these hills contain innumerable tribes and states, pargannahs and countries; and extend all the way to Bengal and the shores of the Great Ocean. ... The chief trade of the inhabitants of these hills is in musk-bags, the tails of the mountain cow, saffron, lead, and copper. The natives of Hind call these hills Sewalik-Parbat. In the language of Hind Sewalik means a lak and a quarter (or 125,000), and Parbat means a hill, that is, the 125,000 hills. On these hills the snow never melts, and from some parts of Hindustan, such as Lahore, Sehrend, and Sambal, it is seen white on them all the year round."—Baber, p. 313.

c. 1545.—"Sher Shah's dying regrets. "On being remonstrated with for giving way to low spirits, when he had done so much for the good of the people during his short reign, after earnest solicitation, he said, 'I have had three or four desires on my heart, which still remain without accomplishment. ... One is, I wished to have depopulated the country of Roh, and to have transferred its inhabitants to the tract between the Nilaub and Lahore, including the hills below Nindina as far as the Siwalik.'"—Tarki-Khuda, John Lodi, in Elliot, v. 107-8. Nindina was on Balnah, a hill over the Jelan (compare Elliot, ii. 450-1).

c. 1547-8.—"After their defeat the Nižibs took refuge with the Ghakkars, in the hill-country bordering on Kashmir. Islám Sháh ... during the space of two years was engaged in constant conflicts with the Ghakkars, whom he desired to subdue. Skirting the hills he went thence to Máhá (i. e., and all the Kájás of the Sewalik presented themselves to Parzorán, the Kája of Gwáilor, became a staunch vassal of the King ... Gwáilor is a hill, which is on the right hand towards the South, amongst the hills, as you go to Kángrá and Nagarkot." (See NUGGUR-COTE).—Tarki.-Dádá, in Elliot, iv. 493-4.

c. 1555.—"The Imperial forces encountered the Afghans near the Sewalik mountains, and gained a victory which elicited gracious marks of approval from the Emperor. Sikandar took refuge in the mountains and jungles. Kája Kámdar, Kája of Nagarkot, was the most renowned of all the Kájás of the hills, and he came and made his submission."—Tabálat-i-Akbári, in Elliot, v. 248.

c. 1560.—"The Emperor (Akbar) then marched onwards towards the Sewalik hills, in pursuit of the Kháñ- Kháñán. He reached the neighbourhood of Talwára, a district in the Siwalik, belonging to Kája Gobind Chand. ... A party of adventuruous soldiers dashed forward into the hills, and surrounding the place put many of the defenders to the sword."—Ibid., 267.

c. 1570.—"Usman Kháñ ... set forth from Luctnow with the design of breaking down the idols, and demolishing the idol temples. For false reports of their unbounded treasures had come to his ears. He proceeded through Oudh, towards the Siwalik hills. ... He then ravaged the whole country, as far as the Káshká of Wajráj, in the country of Rája Ranka, a powerful zamindar, and from that town to Ajmir which is his capital."—Baddí, in Elliot, iv. 497.

1594-5.—"The force marched to the Siwalik hills, and the Bakhshí resolved to begin by attacking Jammú, one of the strongest forts of that country."—Akbári Námá, in Elliot, v. 125.

c. 1519.—"Rám Doa ... returned to Kanauj ... after that he marched into the Siwalik hills, and made all the zamindars tributary. The Kája of Kamám ... came out against Rám Doa and gave him battle."—The Piriáhs Introduction, in Elliot, vi. 561.

1793.—"Mr. Daniel, with a party, also visited Sirnagur the same year [1789]: ... It is situated in an exceedingly deep and very narrow valley; formed by Mount Sewalik, the northern boundary of Hindustan, on the one side; and the vast range of snowy mountains of Himáläh or Imaús, on the other: and from the report of the natives, it would appear, that the nearest part of the base of the latter (on which snow was actually falling in the month of March) was not more than 14 or 15 G. miles in direct distance to the N. or N.E. of Sirnagur town. "In crossing the mountains of Sewalick, they met with vegetable productions, proper to the temperate climates."—Bennett's Mem., ed. 1793, pp. 368-369.

1834.—"On the flank of the great range there is a line of low hills, the Sewalik, which commence at Rooppur, on the N.E., and run down a long way to the south, skirting the great chain. In some places they run up to, and rise upon, the Himálayas; in others, as in this neighbourhood (Sehánpur), they are separated by an intermediate valley. Between the Jumna and Ganges they attain their greatest height, which Capt. Herbert estimates at 2,000 feet above the plains at their foot, or 3,000 above the sea. Sehánpur is about 1,000 feet above the sea. About 25 miles north are the Sewalik hills."—Falconer, in J.A.S.B. iii. 152.

1835.—"We have named the fossil Sivatherium from Siva the Hindu god, and ḍhán, bull. The Siválik, or Sub-Himálayan range of hills, is considered, in the Hindu mythology, as the Látká or edge of the roof of Siva's dwelling on the Himálaya, and hence they are called the Siva-tála or Shála, which by an easy transition of sound became the Sewalik of the English. range, and we have given the name of Sivatherium to it, to commemorate the remarkable formation, so rich in new animals.
Another derivation of the name of the hills, as explained by the Mahant, or High Priest at Dehra, is as follows:—

"Sewalik, a corruption of Sivaivala, a name given to the tract of mountains between the Jumna and Ganges, from having been the residence of ISWARA SIVA and his son GAMES."—Falconer and Ogilvy, in \textit{As. Res.}, Xix. p. 2.

1879. — "These fringing ranges of the later formations are known generally as the Sub-Himalayas. The most important applied to the hills south of the Deyra Dun, but frequently employed in a wider sense."—\textit{Medlicott and Blanford, Man. of the Geology of India}, Intro. \textit{p. x}.

[1899.—Even so late as this year the old inaccurate etymology of the word appears:
"The term \textit{Sewalic} is stated by one of the native historians to be a combination of two Hindoo words \textit{siwa} and \textit{lu} (sir), the word \textit{siwa} signifying one and a quarter, and the word \textit{lu} being the term which expresses the number of one hundred thousand."—\textit{Thornhill, Haunts and Hobbits},

\textbf{SLAVE.} We cannot now attempt a history of the former tenure of slaves in British India, which would be a considerable work in itself. We only gather a few quotations illustrating that history.

1676.—"Of three Theeves, two were executed and one made a Slave. We do not approve of putting any to death for theft, nor that any of our own nation should be made a Slave, a word that becomes not an Englishman's mouth."—\textit{The Court to Ft. St.
Guz., March 7}. In \textit{Notes and Exhibs. No. i}, 18.

1862.—"... making also proclamation run away from us he should be free, and liberty to go where they pleased."—\textit{Hedges, Diary, Oct. 14}; [Hak. Soc. i. 35].

[ "There being a great number of \textit{Slaves} yearly exported from this place, to from them, by those who are constant traders in this way, the Agent, &c., considering the Scandal that might accrue to ye Government, &c., the great loss that many parents may undergo by such actions, have order'd that noe more \textit{Slaves} be sent off the shore again."—\textit{Pringle, 1687. — "We have taken into consideration the most effectual and speedy method for supplying our settlements upon the \textit{West Coast} with \textit{slaves}, and we have therefore fixed upon two ships for that purpose... to proceed from hence to Madagascar to purchase as many as can be procured, and the said ships conveniently carry, who are to be delivered by the captains of those ships to our agents at Fort Marlborough at the rate of £15 a head."—\textit{Court's Letter of Dec. 8, and Long}, 286.

1764. — "That as an inducement to the Commanders and Chief Mates to exert themselves in procuring as large a number of \textit{Slaves} as the Ships can conveniently carry, and to encourage the Surgeons to take proper care of them in the passage, there is to be allowed 20 shillings for every \textit{slave} shipped at Madagascar, to be divided, viz., 13s. 4d. a head to the Commander, and 6s. 8d. to the Chief Mate, also for every one delivered at Fort Marlborough the Commander is to be allowed the further sum of 6s. 8d. and Chief Mate 2s.; the Surgeon is likewise to be allowed 10s. for each \textit{slave} landed at Fort Marlborough."—

1778. — Mr. Busteed has given some curious extracts from the charge-sheet of the Calcutta Magistrate in this year, showing \textit{slaves} and \textit{slave-girls}, of Europeans, Portuguese, and Armenians, sent to the magistrate to be punished with the rattan for running away and such offences.—\textit{Echoes of Old Calcutta}, 117 seqq. [Also see extracts from newspapers, &c., in \textit{Carey, Good Old Days, ii. 71 seqq.}]

1782. — "At Monday the 29th inst. will be Buggy and Harness... some cut Diamonds, a quantity of China Sugarandy... a quantity of the best Danish Claret... deliverable at Scrampore: two \textit{slave Girls} about 6 years old; and a great variety of other articles."—\textit{India Gazette}, July 27.

1785. — "Malver. Hair-dresser from Europe, proposes himself to the ladies of the settlement to dress hair daily, at two gold mohurs per month, in the latest fashion, with gauze flowers, &c. He will also instruct the \textit{slaves} at a moderate price.
..."—\textit{Gazette}, Nov. 119; This was surely a piece of slang. Though we hear occasionally, in the advertisements of the time, of slave boys and girls, the domestic servants were not usually of that description.

1794. — "50 Rupees Reward for Discovery.

\textbf{SLING, SELING.} n.p. This is the name used in the Himalayan regions for a certain mart in the direction of China which supplies various articles of trade. Its occurrence in Trade Returns at one time caused some discussion as to its identity, but there can be no doubt that it is Si-ning (Fu) in Kan-su. The name Sling is also applied, in Ladak and the Punjab, to a stuff of goat's wool made at the place so called.

c. 1730.—"Kokonor is also called Toos-agom, which means blue lake. The Tibetans pretend that this lake belongs to them, and that the limits of Tibet adjoin those of the town of Shilin or Shilingh."—P. Orazio della Pena, E.T. in Markham's Tibet, 2d ed. 314.

1774.—"The natives of Kashmir, who like the Jews of Europe, or the Armenians in the Turkish Empire, scatter themselves over the Eastern kingdoms of Asia . . . have formed extensive establishments at Lhasa and all the principal towns in the country. Their agents, stationed on the coast of Coromandel, in Bengal, Benares, Nepal, and Kashmir, furnish them with the commodities of these different countries, which they dispose of in Tibet, or forward to their associates at Seling, a town on the borders of China."—Hodge's Narrative, in Markham's Tibet, 124.

1793.—... it is certain that the product of their looms (i.e. of Tibet and Nepaul) is as inconsiderable in quantity as it is insignificant in quality. The Jou (read TOOS) or flannel procured from the former, were it really a fabric of Tibet, would perhaps be admitted as an exception to the latter part of this observation : but the fact is that it is made at Siling, a place situated on the western borders of China."—Kirkpatrick's Ann. of Nepaul (1811), p. 134.

1862.—"Sling is a 'Pushkain' (fine wool) cloth, manufactured of goat-wool, taken from Karahair and Urumchi, and other districts of Turkish China. In a Chinese town called Sling."—Punjab Trade Report, App. p. cxxix.

1871.—"There were two Calmucks at Yarkand, who had belonged to the suite of the Chinese Amkan . . . Their own home they say is Zilm (Qu. Zilim ?) a country and town distant 1¼ month's journey from either Aksoo or Khoten, and at an equal distance in point of time from Lhasa . . . Zilm possesses manufactures of carpents, horse-trappings, pen-holders, &c. This account is confirmed by the fact that articles such as those described are imported occasionally into Ladik, under the name of Zilm or Zirm goods.

"Now if the town of Zilm is six weeks journey from either Lhasa or Aksoo, its position may be guessed at."—Nair, Visits to High Tartary, 38.

SLOTH, s. In the usual way of transferring names which belong to other regions, this name is sometimes applied in S. India to the Lemur (Loris gracilis, Jerdon).

SNAKE-STONE, s. This is a term applied to a substance, the application of which to the part where a snake-bite has taken effect, is supposed to draw out the poison and render it innocuous. Such applications are made in various parts of the Old and New Worlds. The substances which have this reputation are usually of a porous kind, and when they have been chemically examined have proved to be made of charred bone, or the like. There is an article in the 13th vol. of the Asiatic Researches by Dr. J. Davy, entitled An Analysis of the Snake-Stone, in which the results of the examination of three different kinds, all obtained from Sir Alex. Johnstone, Chief Justice of Ceylon, is given. (1) The first kind was of round or oval form, black or brown in the middle, white towards the circumference, polished and somewhat lustrous, and pretty enough to be sometimes worn as a neck ornament; easily cut with a knife, but not scratched by the nail. When breathed on it emitted an earthy smell, and when applied to the tongue, or other moist surface, it adhered firmly. This kind proved to be of bone partially calcined. (2) We give below a quotation regarding the second kind. (3) The third was apparently a bezoar, (q.v.), rather than a snake-stone. There is another article in the As. Res. xvi. 382 seqq. by Captain J. D. Herbert, on Zehr Mohor or Snake-Stone. Two kinds are described which were sold under the name given (Zehr mohra, where mohra is 'poison,' mohra, 'a kind of polished shell,' a bead,' applied to a species of bezoar). Both of these were mineral, and not of the class we are treating of.

c. 1666.—"C'est dans cette Ville de Din que se font les Pierres de Cobra si renommées: elles sont composées de racines qu'on brûle, et dont on amasse les cendres pour les mettre avec une sorte de terre qu'ils ont, et les brûler encore une fois avec cette terre; et après cela on en fait la pâte dont ces Pierres sont formées. . . Il faut faire sortir avec une égille, un peu de sang de la plate, y appliquer la Pierre, et l'y laisser jusqu'à ce qu'elle tombe d'elle même."—TheravdT, v. 97.
1673.—"There are also those Elephant Legged St. Thomeans, which the unblissful Enquirers will tell you chances to them two ways: By the Venom of a certain Snake, by which the Jangies (see JOGEE) or Pilgrims furnish them with a Fusticious Stone (which we call a snake-stone), and is a Counter-poison of all deadly Bites; if it stick, it attracts the Poison; and put into Milk it recovers itself again, leaving its virulence therein, discovered by its Greenness."—Freyer, 33.

e. 1676.—"There is the Serpent's stone not to be forgot, about the bigness of a double (doubloon!): and some are almost oval, thick in the middle and thin about the sides. The Indians report that it is bred in the head of certain Serpents. But I rather take it to be a story of the Idolater's Priests, and that the Stone is rather a composition of certain Drugs. . . . If the Person bit be not much wounded, the place must be incised; and the Stone being appl'd thereto, will not fall off till it has drawn all the poison to it: To cleanse it you must steep it in Womans-milk, or for want of that, in Cows-milk. . . . There are two ways to try whether the Serpent-stone be true or false. The first is, by putting the Stone in your mouth, for then it will give a leap, and fix to the Palate. The other is by putting it in a glass full of water; for if the Stone be true, the water will fall a boiling, and rise in little bubbles . . ."—Tavernier, E.T., Pt. ii. 155; [ed. Bell, ii. 152]. Tavernier also speaks of another snake-stone alleged to be found behind the hood of the Cobra: "This Stone being rubb'd against another Stone, yields a slime, which being drunk in water," &c. &c. — Ibid.

1690.—"The thing which he carried . . . is a specific against the Poison of Snakes . . . and therefore obtained the name of a Snake or Serpent-stone. . . . The Composition of it is Ashes of burnt Roots, mixed with a kind of Earth, which is found at Diu . . ."—Ovington, 260-261.

1772.—"Being returned to Roode-Zand, the much celebrated Snake-stone (Slange-sten) was shown to me, which few of the farmers here could afford to purchase, it being sold at a high price, and held in great esteem. It is imported from the Indies, especially from Malabar, and cost several, frequently sold for 12, rix dollars. It is round, and convex on one side, of a black colour, with a pale ash-grey speck in the middle, and tubulated with very minute pores. . . . When it is applied to any part that has been bitten by a serpent, it sticks fast to the wound, and extracts the poison; as soon as it is saturated, it falls off of itself. . . ."—Thomasson, Travels, E.T. i. 155 (A Journey into Caffraria).

1796.—"Of the remedies to which cures of venomous bites are often ascribed in India, some are certainly not less frivolous than those employed in Europe for the bite of the viper; yet to infer from thence that the effects of the poison cannot be very dangerous, would not be more rational than to ascribe the recovery of a person bitten by a Cobra de Capello, to the application of a snake-stone, or to the words muttered over the patient by a Brahmin."—Patrick Rauzll, Account of Indian Serpents, 77.

1820.—"Another kind of snake-stone was a small oval body, smooth and shining, externally black, internally grey; it had no earthy smell when breathed on, and had no absorbent or adhesive power. By the person who presented it to Sir Alexander Johnstone it was much valued, and for adequate reason if true, 'it had saved the lives of four men.'"—Dr. Davy, in As. Res. xiii. 318.

1860.—"The use of the Pamboo-Kaloo, or snake-stone, as a remedy in cases of wounds by venomous serpents, has probably been communicated to the Singhalese by the Hindoo snake-charmers who resort to the Island from the Coast of Coromandel; and more than one well-authenticated instance of its successful application has been told to me by persons who had been eye-witnesses. . . . (These follow.) . . . As to the snake-stone itself, I submitted one, the application of which I have been describing, to Mr. Faraday, and he has communicated to me, as the result of his analysis, his belief that it is a piece of charred bone which has been filled with the porous and absorbent earth, and then charred again. . . . The probability is, that the animal charcoal, when instantaneously applied, may be sufficiently porous and absorbent to extract the venom from the recent wound, together with a portion of the blood, before it has time to be carried into the system. . . ."—Tennent, Ceylon, i. 197-200.

1861.—"Have you been bitten? 'Yes Sahib,' he replied, calmly; 'the last snake was a vicious one, and it has bitten me. But there is no danger.' He added, extract ing from the recesses of his mysterious box a small piece of white stone. This he wetted and applied to the wound, to which it seemed to adhere . . . he apparently suffered no material hurt. I was thus effectively convinced that snake-charming is a real art, and not merely clever conjuring as I had previously imagined. These so-called snake-stones are well known throughout our country. Col. T. Lewis, A Fly or t Wheel, 91-92.

1872.—"With reference to the snake stones, which, when applied to the bite are said to absorb and suck out the poison
SNEAKER. s. A large cup (or small basin) with a saucer and cover. The native servants call it sínígar. We had guessed that it was perhaps formed in some way from sín in the sense of 'china-ware,' or from the same word, used in Ar. and Pers., in the sense of 'a silver' (see CHINA, s.). But we have since seen that the word is not only in Grosse's Lexicon Bata-rumvum, with the explanation 'a small bowl,' but is also in Todd: 'A small vessel of drink.' A sneaker of punch is a term still used in several places for a small bowl; and in fact it occurs in the Spectator and other works of the 18th century. So the word is of genuine English origin; no doubt of a semi-slang kind.

1714.—"Our little burlesque authors, who are the delight of ordinary readers, generally abound in these port phrases, which have in them more vivacity than wit. I lately saw an instance of this kind of writing, which gave me so truly an idea of it, that I could not forbear begging a copy of the letter...

"Dear Jack,

'Past 2 o'clock and a frosty morning.

'I have just left the Right Worshipful and his myrmidons about a sneaker of 5 gallons. The whole magistracy was pretty well disguised before I gave them the slip.'

The Spectator, No. 616.

1715.—"Hugh Peters is making

A sneaker within

For Luther, Buchanan,

John Knox, and Calvin;

And when they have tossed off

A brace of full bowls,

3 H

You'll swear you ne'er met

With honester souls.'

1743.—"Wild... then retired to his seat of contemplation, a night-cellar, where, without a single farthing in his pocket, he called for a sneaker of punch, and placing himself on a bench by himself, he softly vented the following soliloquy."—Fielding, Jonathan Wild, Bk. ii. ch. iv.

1772.—"He received us with great cordiality, and entreated us all, are in number, to be seated in a bungalow, where there were only two broken chairs. This compliment we could not accept of; he then ordered five sneakers of a mixture which he denominated punch."—Letter in Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 217.

[SNOW RUPEE. s. A term in use in S. India, which is an excellent example of a corruption of the 'Hobsun-Jobson' type. It is an Anglo-Indian corruption of the Tel. tsanauru, 'authority, currency."

SOFALA. n.p. Ar. Sofálá, a district and town of the East African coast, the most remote settlement towards the south made upon that coast by the Arabs. The town is in S. Lat. 20° 10', more that 2' south of the Zambezi delta. The territory was famous in old days for the gold produced in the interior, and also for iron. It was not visited by V. da Gama either in going or returning.

c. 1150.—"This section embraces the description of the remainder of the country of Sofálá... The inhabitants are poor, miserable, and without resources to support them except iron: of this metal there are numerous mines in the mountains of Sofálá. The people of the islands... come hither for iron, which they carry to the continent and islands of India... for although there is iron in the islands and in the mines of that country, it does not equal the iron of Sofálá.'—Edrisi, i. 65.

c. 1220.—"Sofálá is the most remote known city in the country of the Zenj... wares are carried to them and left by the merchants who then go away, and coming again find that the natives have laid down the price [they are willing to give] for every article beside it... Sofálá gold is well-known among the Zenj merchants."—Yákut, Majám al-Buldán, s.v.

In his article on the gold country, Yákut describes the kind of dumb trade in which the natives decline to come face to face with the merchants at greater length. It is a practice that has been ascribed to a great variety of uncivilized races; e.g. in various parts of Africa; in the extreme north of Europe and of Asia; in the Clove Islands; to the Veddas of Ceylon, to the Polians of Malabar, and (by Pliny, surely under some mistake) to the Seres or Chinese. See on this subject a note in Marco Polo, Bk. iv. ch. 21; a note by Mr. De B. Prinat, in J. R. S. A. S., xviii. 318 (in which several references are erroneously printed); Tenent's Ceylon, i. 583 seqq.; Rawlinson's Herodotus, under Bk. iv. ch. 196.

c. 1339.—"Sofala is situated in the country of the Kānān, the inhabitants are Muslim. Ibn Sāyd says that their chief means of subsistence are the extraction of gold and of iron, and that their clothes are of leopard-skin."—Abulfeda, Fr. Fr. i. 222.

"A merchant told me that the town of Sofala is a half month's march distant from Caína (Quiloa), and that from Sofala to Yūfī (Nūfī) is a month's march. From Yūfī they bring gold-dust to Sofala."—Ibn Battuta, ii. 192-3.

1499.—"Coming to Moçambique (i.e. Vasco and his squadron on their return) they did not desire to go in because there was no need, so they kept their course, and being off the coast of Cofala, the pilots warned the officers that they should be alert and ready to strike sail, and at night they should keep their course, with little sail set, and a good look-out, for just thereabouts there was a river belonging to a place called Cofala, whence there sometimes issued a tremendous squall, which tore up trees and carried cattle and all into the sea."—Correct, London, i. 134-135.

1516.—"...at xviii. leagues from them there is a river, which is not very large, whereon is a town of the Moors called Sofala, close to which town the King of Portugal has a fort. These Moors established there a long time ago on account of the great trade in gold, which they carry on with the Gentiles of the main-land."—Barkloe, 4.

1523.—"Item—that as regards all the ships and goods of the said Realm of Urmaz, and its ports and vassals, they shall be secure by land and by sea, and they shall be as free to navigate where they please as vassals of the King our lord, save only that they shall not navigate inside the Strait of Mecca, nor yet to Cofala and the ports of that coast, as that is forbidden by the King our lord. ..."—Treaty of Ibn Durutu de Menezes, with the King of Ormuz, in Bolelho, Tombo, 80.

1558.—"Vasco da Gama ... was afraid that there was some gulf running far inland, from which he would not be able to get out. And this apprehension made him so careful to keep well from the shore that he passed without even seeing the town of Cofala, so famous in these parts for the quantity of gold which the Moors procured there from the Blacks of the country by trade. ..."—Berrro, i. iv. 3.

1572.—"... Fizemos desta costa algum deverio Deitando para o pêgo toda a armada: Poque, ventando Noto manso e frio, Nāo nos apanhase a agua da enseada, Que a costa faz alli daquella banda, Donde a rica Sofala o ouro manda."—Camões, v. 73.

By Burton:

"off from the coast-line for a spell we stood, till deep blue water 'neath our kelsons lay; for frigid Notus, in his fainty mood, was fain to drive us leeward to the Bay made in that quarter by the crooked shore, whence rich Sofala sendeth golden ore."—1655.

"Mombaza and Quiloa and Melind. And Sofala, thought Ophir, to the realm Of Congo, and Angola farthest south."—Paradise Lost, xi. 399 seqq.

Milton, it may be noticed, misplaces the accent, reading Sofála.

1727.—"... Between Delagoa and Mozambique is a dangerous Sea-coast, it was formerly known by the names of Suffola and Ciana, but now by the Portuguese, who know that country best, is called Sena."—A. Hamilton, i. 8 [ed. 1741].

SOLA, vulg. SOLAR. s. This is properly Hind. sholá, corrupted by the Bengáli inability to utter the shibboleth, to solá, and often again into solar by English people, led astray by the usual "striving after meaning." Sholá is the name of the plant Aeschynomene aspera, L. (N.O. Leguminosae), and is particularly applied to the light pith of that plant, from which the light thick Sola topes, or pith hats, are made. The material is also used to pad the roofs of palankins, as a protection against the sun's power, and for various minor purposes, e.g. for slips of tinder, for making models, &c.

The word, until its wide diffusion within the last 45 years, was peculiar to the Bengal Presidency. In the Deccan the thing is called bhend, Mahr. bhenda, and in Tamil. wetti, ['breaking with a crackle.'] Solar hats are now often advertised in London. [Hats made of elder pith were used in S. Europe in the early 16th century. In Albert Dürer's Diary in the Netherlands (1520-21) we find: "Also Tomasin has given me a plaited hat of elder-pith" (Mrs. Heaton, Life of Albrecht Dürer, 269). Miss Eden, in 1839, speaks of Europeans wearing "broad white feather hats to keep off the sun." (Up the Country, ii. 56).
Illustrations of the various shapes of Sola hats used in Bengal about 1854 will be found in Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 105 seq.]

1836.—"I stopped at a fisherman's, to look at the curiously-shaped floats he used for his very large and heavy fishing-nets; each float was formed of eight pieces of shola, tied together by the ends. . . . When this light and spongy path is wetted, it can be cut into thin layers, which pasted together are formed into hats; Chinese paper appears to be made of the same material."—Wonders of a Pilgrim, ii. 190.

1872.—"In a moment the flint gave out a spark of fire, which fell into the sola; the sulphur match was applied; and an earthen lamp. . . ."—Gowinda Samanta, i. 10.

1878.—"My solar topee (pith hat) was whisked away during the struggle."—Life in the Mogul, i. 104.

1885.—"I have slipped a pair of galoshes over my ordinary walking-boots; and, with my solar topee (or sun helmet) on, have ridden through a mile of deserted streets and thronged bazaars, in a grilling sunshine."—A Professional Visit in Persia, St. James's Gazette, March 9.

[SOMBA, SOMBAY, s. A present. Malay sambah-un.
[1814.—"Sombay or presents."—Foster, Letters, ii. 112.
[1815.—"... concluded rather than pay the great Somba of eight hundred real."
[---Ibid. iv. 43.---]

SOMBERRO. s. Port. sombreiro. In England we now understand by this word a broad-brimmed hat; but in older writers it is used for an umbrella. Summerhead is a name in the Bombay Arsenal (as M.-Gen. Keatinge tells me) for a great umbrella. I make no doubt that it is a corruption (by 'striving after meaning') of Sombreiro, and it is a capital example of Hobson-Jobson.

1503.—"And the next day the Captain-Major before daylight embarked armed with all his people in the boats, and the King (of Cochin) in his boats which they call toves (see DONET). . . . and in the tow of the King went his Sombres, which are made of straw, of a diameter of 4 palms, mounted on very long canes, some 3 or 4 fathoms in height. These are used for state ceremonial, showing that the King is here in person, as it were his pennon or royal banner, for no other lord in his realm may carry the like."—Corma, i. 378.

1516.—"And besides the page I speak of who carries the sword, they take another page who carries a sombreiro with a stand to shade his master, and keep the rain off him; and some of these are of silk stuff finely wrought, with many fringes of gold, and set with stones and seed pearl. . . ."—Barbosa, Lisbon ed. 286.

1553.—"At this time Dom Jorge discerned a great body of men coming towards where he was standing, and amid them a sombreiro on a lofty staff, covering the head of a man on horseback, by which token he knew it to be some noble person. This sombreiro is a fashion in India coming from China, and among the Chinese no one may use it but a gentleman, for it is a token of nobility, which we may describe as a one-handed pallium (having regard to those which we use to see carried by four, at the reception of some great King or Prince on his entrance into a city). . . ."—Barnes, III. x. 9. Then follows a minute description of the sombreiro or umbrella.

[1602.—In his character of D. Pedro Mascarenhas, the Viceroy, Conto says he was anxious to change certain habits of the Portuguese in India: "One of these was to forbid the tall sombreiros for warding off the rain and sun, to relieve men of the expense of paying those who carried them; he himself did not have one, but used a woollen umbrella with small cords (i), which they called for many years Mascarados. Afterwards finding the sun intolerable and the rain immoderate, he permitted the use of tall umbrellas, on the condition that private slaves should bear them, to save the wages of the Hindus who carry them, and are called boys de sombreiro (see BOY)."

1630.—"Betwixt towns men usually travel in Chariots drawn by Oxen, but in Towns upon Palameens, and with Sombres de Sol over them."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1665, p. 46.

1657.—"A costé du cheval il y a un homme qui esvente Without, afin qu'il ne recevoit point d'imcommodite soit par les mouches, ou par la chaleur; et à chaque costé on porte deux Zombereiro, afin que le Soleil ne lisse pas sur leur, . . ."—Aer. Roger, Fr. Tr. ed. 1670, p. 223.

1673.—"None but the Emperor have a Sombreiro among the Moguls."—Fryer, 39.

1727.—"The Portuguese ladies . . . sent to beg the Favour that he would pick them out some lusty Dutch men to carry their Palameens and Somereras or Umbrellas."—A. Hamilton, i. 338; [ed. 1744, i. 340].

1768-71.—"Close behind it, followed the heir-apparent, on foot, under a sambrel, or sunshade, of state."—Somervilles, E.T. i. 87.

[1845.—"No open umbrellas or summerheads allowed to pass through the gates."—Public Notice on Gates of Bombay Town, in Douglas, Glimpses of Old Bombay, 86.]
SOXTHALS.

The channel between the northern part of the Nicobar group, and the southern part embracing the Great and Little Nicobar, has had this name since the early Portuguese days. The origin of the name is given by A. Hamilton below. The indications in C. Federici and Hamilton are probably not accurate. They do not agree with those given by Horsburgh.

1566.—"Si passa per il canale di Nicobar, onero per quello del Sombrero, li quali son per mezzo l'isola di Sumatra. . ."—C. Federici, in Rambusio, iii. 391.

1727.—"The Islands off this Part of the Coast are the Nicobars. . . The northernmost Cluster is low, and are called the Carniciboars. . . The middle Cluster is one grand Champain Land, and all but one, well inhabited. They are called the Somerera Islands, because on the South End of the largest Island, is an Hill that resembles the top of an Umbrella or Somerera."—A. Hamilton, i. 68 [ed. 1741].

1843.—"Sombrero Channel, bounded on the north by the Islands of Katechel and Noneowry, and by Merve or Passage Island on the South side, is very safe and about seven leagues wide."—Horsburgh, ed. 1843, ii. 59-60.

SONAPARANTA, n.p. This is a quasi-classical name, of Indian origin, used by the Burmese Court in State documents and formal enumerations of the style of the King, to indicate the central part of his dominions; Skt. Sunapara (Pali Sonapāra) or perhaps apārātta, ‘golden frontier-land,’ or something like that. There can be little doubt that it is a survival of the names which gave origin to the Chintal of the Greeks. And it is notable, that the same series of titles embraces Tamba-pdya (‘Copper Island’ or Region) which is also represented by the Calcutta Gazetteer. [Also see J. G. Scott, Upper Burma Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 103.]

(Ancient).—"There were two brothers resident in the country called Sunaparanta, merchants who went to trade with 500 wagons. . ."—Legends of Goanama Buddha, in Hardy's Manual of Buddhism, 259.

1636.—"All comprised within the great districts . . . of Tsa-Koo, Tsa-lan, Laygoun, Phoang-len, Kalé, and Thong-thwit is constituted the Kingdom of Tippe, called the Thunaparanta. All within the great districts of Pagan, Ava, Penya, and Myen-Zain, is constituted the Kingdom of Tampadewa."—Inscription at the Great Pagoda of Khong-Hmoo-dau, near Ava; from the MS. Journal of Major H. Burney, accompanying a Letter from him, dated 11th September, 1850, in the Foreign Office, Calcutta. Burney adds: "The Ministers told me that by Thunaparanta they meant all the countries to the northward of Ava, and by Tampadewa all to the southward. But this inscription shows that the Ministers themselves do not exactly understand what countries are comprised in Thunaparanta and Tampadewa."

[1798.—"... amongst a wild and unlettered tribe, denominated Soontaar, who have reduced the detection and trial of persons suspected of witchcraft to a system."—As. Res. iv. 359.]

1817.—"For several years many of the industrious tribes called Sonthurs have established themselves in these forests, and have been clearing and bringing into cultivation large tracts of lands. ..."—Sutherland's Report, quoted in Long, 569.

1867.—"This system, indicated and proposed by Mr. Eden,* was carried out in its integrity under Mr. George Yule, C.B., by whose able management, with Messrs. Robinson and Wood as his deputies, the Sonthals were raised from misery, dull despair, and deadly hatred of the government, to a pitch of prosperity which, to an uninitiated, has never been equalled in any other part of India under the British rule. The Regulation Courts, with their horde of leeches in the shape of badly paid, and corrupt Amlah (Omlah) and pettifogging Mooktears, were abolished, and in their place a Number of active English gentlemen, termed Assistant Commissioners, and nominated by Mr. Yule, were set down among the Sonthals, with a Code of Regulations drawn up by that gentleman, the pith of which may be summed up as follows:—

"... To have no medium between the Sonthal and the Hakim, i.e., Assistant Commissioner.

... To patiently hear any complaint made by the Sonthal from his own mouth, without any written petition or charge whatever, and without any Amlah or Court at the time.

... To carry out all criminal work by the aid of the villagers themselves, who were to bring in the accused, with the witnesses, to the Hakim, who should immediately attend to their statements, and punish them, if found guilty, according to the tenor of the law."

"These were some of the most important of the golden rules carried out by men who recognised the responsibility of their situation; and with an adored chief, in the shape of Yule, for their ruler, whose firm, judicious, and gentlemanly conduct made them work with willing hearts, their endeavours were crowned with a success which far exceeded the expectations of the most sanguine. ..."—Sonthalia and the Sonthals, by E. G. Mon, Barrister-at-Law, &c. Calcutta, 1867, pp. 125-127.

SOODRA, SOODER. s. Skt. Sudra, usually derived from root, sudr, 'to be afflicted,' but probably of non-Aryan origin. The (theoretical) Fourth Caste of the Hindus. In South India.

* This is apparently a mistake. The proposals were certainly original with Mr. Yule.

there being no claimants of the 2nd or 3rd classes, the highest castes among the (so-called) Sudras come next after the Brahmins in social rank, and Sudra is a note of respect, not of the contrary as in Northern India.

1630.—"The third Tribe or Cast, called the Shudderies."—Lord, Display, &c., ch. xii.

1867.—"La quatrième lignée est celle des Soudraes; elle est composée du commun peuple: cette lignée a sous son beaucoup de diverses familles, dont une chacune prétend surpasser l'autre."—Aber, Roger, Fr. ed. 1670, p. 8.

SOOJEE, SOOJY. s. Hind. सूजी, [which comes probably from Skt. suci, 'pure']; a word curiously misinterpreted ("the coarser part of pounded wheat") by the usually accurate Shakespear. It is, in fact, the fine flour, made from the heart of the wheat, used in India to make bread for European tables. It is prepared by grinding between two millstones which are not in close contact. [Sūjī] is a granular meal obtained by moistening the grain overnight, then grinding it. The fine flour passes through a coarse sieve, leaving the Suji and bran above. The latter is got rid of by winnowing, and the round, granular meal or Suji, composed of the harder pieces of the grain, remains" (Watt. Econ. Dict. VI. pt. iv. 167.) It is the semolina of Italy. Bread made from this was called in Low Latin similla: Germ. Semmelbröden, and old English simmel-cakes. A kind of porridge made with soojee is often called soojee simply. (See ROLOGO.)

1810.—“Bread is not made of flour, but of the heart of the wheat, which is very fine, ground into what is called soojy. . . . Soojy is frequently boiled into ‘strabou’ for breakfast, and eaten with milk, salt, and butter; though some of the more zealous may be seen to moisten it with porter.”—Williams, I. M. ii. 135-136.

1878.—“Sujees flour, ground coarse, and water.”—Life in the Moghul, i. 213.

SOORKY, s. Pounded brick used to mix with lime to form a hydraulic mortar. Hind. from Pers. sorkhi, ‘red-stuff.’

e. 1770.—“The terrace roofs and floors of the rooms are laid with fine pulverized stones, which they call zurkee; these are mixed up with lime-water and an inferior kind of molasses, and in a short time grow as hard and as smooth, as if the whole were one large stone.”—Stecorius, E.T. i. 514.

1777.—“The inquiry verified the information. We found a large group of miserable objects confined by order of Mr. Mills; some were simply so; some under sentence from him to beat Salkey.”—*Report of Impy and others, quoted in Stephen’s Newcomar and Impy, ii. 201.

1781.—“One lack of 9-inch bricks, and about 1400 maunds of soorkey.”—Notifia. in Seton-Karr, i. 34; see also ii. 15.

1811.—“The road from Calcutta to Barac-pore . . . like all the Bengal roads it is paved with bricks, with a layer of sulky, or broken bricks over them.”—Notorioies, Les Hindous, iii. The word is misused as well as miswritten here. The substance in question is khoa (q.v.).

SOORMA, s. Hind. from Pers. sūsā. Sulphuret of antimony, used for the purpose of darkening the eyes, kohl of the Arabs, the stibium and stibium of the ancient. With this Jezebel “painted her eyes” (2 Kings, ix. 30; Jeremiah, iv. 30 R.V.) “With it, I believe, is often confounded the sulphuret of lead, which in N. India is called sourme (ce is the feminine termination in Hindust.), and used as a substitute for the former: a mistake not of recent occurrence only, as Sprungel says, ‘Distinguish vero Phenius maren a femin’” (Royle, on Ant. of Hindv. Medicine, 100). [See Watt. Econ. Diet. i. 271.]

[1756.—“The powder is called by them surna; which they pretend refreshes and cools the eye, besides exciting its lustre, by the ambient blackness.”—Grose, 2nd ed. ii. 112.]

SOOSIE, s. Hind. from Pers. sūsā. Some kind of silk cloth, but we know not what kind. [Sir G. Birdwood (Industr. Arts, 246) defines sūsā as “fine-coloured cloths, made chiefly at Battala and Sialkote, striped in the direction of the warp with silk, or cotton lines of a different colour, the cloth being called dokanī [dokhani], ‘in two stripes’ if the stripe has two lines, if three, tinkanni [tinkhani], and so on.” In the Punjab it is “a striped stuff used for women’s trousers. This is made of fine thread, and is one of the fabrics in which English thread is now largely used” (Francis, Mon. on Cotton Manufactures, 7). A silk fabric of the same name is made in the N.W.P., where it is classed as a variety of chākhrān, or check (Yunuf Ali, Mon. on Silk, 93). Forbes Watson (Textile Manufactures, 55) speaks of Sousie as chiefly employed for trowsers, being a mixture of cotton and silk. The word seems to derive its origin from Susa, the Biblical Shushan, the capital of Susiana or Elam, and from the time of Darius I, the chief residence of the Achaemenian kings. There is ample evidence to show that fabrics from Babylonia were largely exported in early times. Such was perhaps the “Babylonish garment” found at Ai (Josh. vii. 21), which the R.V. marg. translates as a “mantle of Shinar”). This a writer in Smith’s Dict. of the Bible calls “robes trimmed with valuable furs, or the skins themselves ornamented with embroidery” (i. 452). These Babylonian fabrics have been often described (see Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, 537; Maspero, Dawn of Civ., 470, 758; *Encycl. Bibl. ii. 1286 seq.; Frazer, Pausanias, iii. 515 seq.). An early reference to this old trade in costly cloths will be found in the quotation from the Periplus under CHINA, which has been discussed by Sir H. Yule (Introil. to Gill, River of Golden Sand, ed. 1883, p. 88 seq.). This Sūsā cloth appears in a log of 1746 as Soacie, and was known to the Portuguese in 1550 as Soojies (J. R. As. Soc., Jan. 1900, p. 158).]

1630.—"Ismael at his Coronation proclaimed himself King of Persia by the name of Pot-shaw-Paishaw-Ismael-Sophy. Whence that word Sophy was borrowed is much controverted. Whether it be from the Armenian blom, signifying Wood, of which the Shashes are made that enabled his new order. Whether the name was from Sophy his grandsire, or from the Greek word Sophos imposed upon Aydar at his conquest of Trebizon by the Greeks there, I know not. Since then, many have called the Kings of Persia Sophy's: but I see no reason for it: since Ismael's son, grand and great grandsons Kings of Persia never continued that name, till this that now reigns, whose name indeed is Suffy, but casual."—Sir T. SOUBA, SOOBAH. s. Hind. from Pers. sōba. A large Division or Province of the Mogul Empire (e.g. the Sūbah of the Deccan, the Sūbah of Bengal). The word is also frequently used as short for Soubadar (see SOUBADAR), 'the Viceroy' (over a sōba). It is also "among the Marathas sometimes applied to a smaller division comprising from 5 to 8 tarafs" (Wilson).

c. 1591. — "In the fortieth year of his majesty's reign, his dominions consisted of 105 Sīras . . . The empire was then parcelled into 12 grand divisions, and each was committed to the government of a Soubadar . . . upon which occasion the Sovereign of the world distributed 12 Lacks of beetle. The names of the Soobahs were Allahabad, Agra, Owdh, Ajmeer, Amedabad, Bahar, Bengal, Dehly, Cabul, Lahoor, Multan, and Malwa: when his majesty conquered Berar, Khandees, and Ahmednagar, they were formed into three Soobahs, increasing the number to 15."—Ayer, ed. [c. 1817.—“This sahib was a very rich man, a Soudagur...”—Mrs. Sherwood, Last Days of Decay, S.]

a. The fruit Anona muricata, L., a variety of the Custard apple. This kind is not well known on the Bengal side of India, but it is completely naturalised at Bombay. The terms soursop and sweet sop are, we believe, West Indian.

b. In a note to the passage quoted below, Grainger identifies the soursop with the surrassck of the Dutch. But in this, at least as regards use in the East Indies, there is some mistake. The latter term, in old Dutch writers on the East, seems always to apply to the Common Jack fruit, the sour Jack, in fact, as distinguished from the superior kinds, especially the champada of the Malay Archipelago.

1775.—“The one which yields smaller fruit, without seed, I found at Colombo, Gale, and several other places. The name by which it is properly known here is the Muldivous Sour Sack, and its use here is less universal than that of the other sort, which... weighs 30 or 40 lbs.”—Thunberg, E.T. iv. 255.

[1833.—“Of the eatable fruited kinds above referred to, the most remarkable are the sweet sop, sour sop, and cherimoyser...”—Penny Cycl. ii. 54.

Sowar, Shooter, s. Pers. sawur, ‘a horseman.’ A native cavalry soldier; a mounted orderly. In the Greek provinces in Turkey, the word is familiar in the form sovthia, pl. sovthades, for a mounted gendarme. The regulations for sowars in the Mogul armies are given by Blockmann, Ain, i. 244 seq.

1824.—“... The sowars who accompanied him.”—Heber, Orig. i. 494.

1827.—“Hartley had therefore no resource save to keep his eye steadily fixed on the lighted match of the sowar... who rode before him.”—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon’s Daughter, ch. xiii.

[1830.—... Meeresa, an Asswar well known on the Collector’s establishment.”—Or. Sport. Mag. reprint 1873, i. 390.

Sowar, Shooter, s. Hind. from Pers. shutur-sawar, the rider of a dromedary or swift camel. Such riders are attached to the establishment of the Viceroy on the march, and of other high officials in Upper India. The word sowar is quite misused by the Great Duke in the passage below, for a camel-driver, a sense it never has. The word written, or intended, may however have been surwaun (q.v.)

[1815.—“As we approached the camp his oont-sowars (camel-riders) went ahead of us.”—Journal, Marquess of Hastings, i. 327.

SOY.

1803.—"You should not confine your dealings to one soucar. Open a communication with every soucar in Poonah, and take money from any one who will give it you for bills."—Wellington, Desp., ed. 1837, f. 1.

1826.—"We were also saboukars, and granted bills of exchange upon Bombay and Madras, and we advanced money upon interest."—Pandurang Hari, 174; [ed. 1873, i. 251].

[In the following the word is confounded with Sowar:

[1877.—"It was the habit of the sowars, as the goldsmiths are called, to bear their wealth upon their persons."—Mrs. Guthrie, My Year in an Indian Fort, i. 294.]

SOY, s. A kind of condiment once popular. The word is Japanese shi-yau (a young Japanese fellow-passenger gave the pronunciation clearly as shō-yu.—A. B.), Chin. shi-yu. [Mr. Platts (9 ser. N. & Q. iv. 475) points out that in Japanese as written with the native character soy would not be shi-yu, but shi-yu-yu; in the Romanised Japanese this is simplified to shō-yu ( colloquially this is still further reduced, by dropping the final vowel, to shō or soy). Of this monosyllable only the so represents the classical shi-yu; the final consonant (y) is a relic of the termination ye. The Japanese word is itself derived from the Chinese, which at Shanghai is zī-yu, at Amoy, sī-yu, at Canton, shì-yu, of which the first element means 'salted beans,' or other fruits, dried and used as condiments; the second element merely means 'oil.' It is made from the beans of a plant common in the Himalaya and E. Asia and much cultivated, viz. Glycine soja, Sieb. and Zucc. (Soja hispida, Moench), boiled down and fermented. [In India the bean is eaten in places where it is cultivated, as in Chutia Nāgpur (Watt Econ. Dict. iii. 510 seq.).]

[1900.—"Mushrooms shred into small pieces, flavoured with soyou" (soy).—Mrs. Frazer, A Diplomatick Wife in Japan, ii. 238.]

SPIN, s. An unmarried lady; popular abbreviation of 'Spinsters.' [The Port. equivalent soltera (solitiera) was used in a derogatory sense (Gray, note on Pyndre de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 128).]

SPONGE CAKE, s. This well-known form of cake is called throughout Italy pane di Spagna, a fact that suggested to us the possibility that the English name is really a corruption of Spanish cake. The name in Japan tends to confirm this, and must be our excuse for introducing the term here.

1880.—"There is a cake called kusateira resembling sponge-cake... It is said to have been introduced by the Spaniards, and that its name is a corruption of Castilla."—Miss Bird's Japan, i. 235.

SPOTTED DEER, s. Axis maculatus of Gray; [Cervus axis of Blanford (Mammalia, 546)]; Hind. chital, Skt. chitra, 'spotted.'

1673.—"The same Night we travelled easily to Megatana, using our Bowling; Places all the way, being here presented with Rich Game, as Peacocks, Doves, and Pigeons, Chitirs, or Spotted Deer."—Fryer, 71.

1677.—"Spotted Deare we shall send home, some by ye Europe ships, if they touch here."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 140.

1679.—"There being convenience in this place for ye breeding up of Spotted Deer, which the Hon'ble Company doe every yeare order to be sent home for His Majesty, it is ordered that care be taken to breed them up in this Factory (Madapollam), to be sent home accordingly."—Pt. St. George Councell (on Tour), 16th April, in Notes and Exts., Madras, 1871.

1682.—"This is a fine pleasant situation, full of great shady trees, most of them Tamarins, well stored with peacocks and Spotted Deer like our fallow-deer."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 16; [Hak. Soc. i. 39].

SQUEEZE, s. This is used in Anglo-Chinese talk for an illegal act. It is, we suppose, the translation of a Chinese expression. It corresponds to the malatolla of the Middle Ages, and to many other slang phrases in many tongues.

1882.—"If the licence (of the Hong merchants) ... was costly, it secured to them uninterrupted and extraordinary pecuniary advantages; but on the other hand it subjected them to 'calls' or 'squeezes' for contributions to public works, ... for the relief of districts suffering from scarcity ... as well as for the often imaginary ... damage caused by the overflowing of the 'Yangtse Keang' or the 'Yellow River.'"—The Enkavee at Canton, p. 36.

STATION, s. A word of constant recurrence in Anglo-Indian colloquial. It is the usual designation of the place where the English officials of a district, or the officers of a garrison (not in a fortress) reside. Also the aggregate society of such a place.

[1882.—"The nobles and gentlemen are frequently invited to witness a 'Station ball.'..."—Mrs. Moor Hassan AY, Observations, i. 196.]

1866. "And if I told how much I ate at one Motussi station. I'm sure 'twould cause at home a most extraordinary sensation."—Trevillion, The Dark Bungalow, in Fraser, lxxiii. p. 391.

... "Who asked the Station to dinner, and allowed only one glass of Simkin to each guest."—Ibid. 231.

STEVEDORE, s. One employed to stow the cargo of a ship and to unload it. The verb estivar [Lat. stiperre] is used both in Sp. and Port. in the sense of stowing cargo, implying originally to pack close, as to press wool. Estivador in the sense of a wool-packer only is given in the Sp. Dictionaries, but no doubt has been used in every sense of estivar. See Skeat, s.v.

STICK-INSECT, s. The name commonly applied to certain orthopterous insects, of the family...
Phasmdidae, which have the strongest possible resemblance to dry twigs or pieces of stick, sometimes 6 or 7 inches in length.

1754. — "The other remarkable animal which I met with at Cuddalore was the animated Stalk, of which there are several kinds. Some appear like dried straws tied together, others like grass . . ."—Ives, 20.

1860.—"The Stick-insect. — The Phasmdidae or spectres . . . present as close a resemblance to small branches, or leafless twigs, as their congers do to green leaves. . . ."—Tennent, Ceylon, i. 252.

[STICKLAC, s. Lac encrusted on sticks, which in this form is collected in the jungles of Central India.

[1880. — "Where, however, there is a regular trade in stick-lac, the propagation of the insect is systematically carried on by those who wish for a certain and abundant crop."—Bull, Jungle Life, 305.]

STINK-WOOD, s. Fortidius Mauritianus, Lin., a myrtaceous plant of Mauritius, called there Bois puant. "At the Carnival in Goa, one of the sports is to drop bits of this stink-wood into the pockets of respectable persons."—Birdwood (MS.).

STRIDHANA, STREEDHANA, s. Skt. stri-dhana, 'women's property.' A term of Hindu Law, applied to certain property belonging to a woman, which follows a law of succession different from that which regulates other property. The term is first to be found in the works of Jones and Colebrooke (1790-1800), but has recently been introduced into European scientific treatises. [See Mayne, Hindu Law, 541 seqq.]

1875.—"The settled property of a married woman . . . is well known to the Hindoos under the name of stridhan."—Maine, Early Institutions, 321.

STUPA. See TOPE.

SUÁKIN, n.p. This name, and the melancholy victories in its vicinity, are too familiar now to need explanation. Arab. Sawākin.

c. 1331.—"This very day we arrived at the island of Sawākin. It is about 6 miles from the mainland, and has neither drinkable water, nor corn, nor trees. Water is brought in boats, and there are cisterns to collect rain water . . ."—Ibn Battuta, ii. 161-2.

1536.—"The Prester continued speaking with our people, and said to Don Rodrigo that he would have great pleasure and complete contentment, if he saw a fort of ours erected in Macnha, or in Quauem, or in Zyla."—Correa, iii. 42; [see Dalboquerque, Comm. ii. 239].

[c. 1590.—". . . thence it (the sea) washes both Persia and Ethiopia where are Dahlak and Suakin, and is called (the Gulf of) Omnán and the Persian Sea."—Avn, ed. Jorsett, i. 121.]

SUCKER-BUCKER, n.p. A name often given in N. India to Upper Sind, from two neighbouring places, viz., the town of Sakkar on the right bank of the Indus, and the island fortress of Bukk or Bhakkar in the river. An alternative name is Roece-Bucker, from Rohri, a town opposite Bakkur, on the left bank, the name of which is probably a relic of the ancient town of Aror or Ahr, though the site has been changed since the Indus adopted its present bed. [See McCrindle, Invasion of India, 352 seqq.]

c. 1333.—"I passed 5 days at Lahrí . . . and quitted it to proceed to Bakkur. They thus call a fine town through which flows a canal derived from the river Sind."—Ibn Battuta, iii. 114-115.

1521. — Shah Beg "then took his departure for Bhakkar, and after several days' marching arrived at the plain surrounding Sakkar."—Turkhai Nama, in Elliot, i. 311.

SUCKET, s. Old English. Wright explains the word as 'dried sweetmeats or sugar-plums.' Does it not in the quotations rather mean loaf-sugar? [Palmer (Folk Etymol. 378) says that the original meaning was a 'slice of melon or gourd,' Ital. sucreta, 'a kind of meat made of Pumptions or Gourdes (Florio) from zucca, 'a gourd or pumpkin,' which is a shortened form of cucuzza, a corruption of Lat. cucurbita (Dios). This is perhaps the same word which appears in the quotation from Linschoten below, where the editor suggests that it is derived from Mahr sakata, 'slightly dried, desiccated,' and Sir H. Yule suggests a corruption of H. sosth, 'dried ginger.'

SACKCLOTH, SACKCLOTH, &c., s. Pers. sakullat, sakallat, saklatun, saklatun, applied to certain woollen stuffs, and particularly now to European broadcloth. It is sometimes defined as scarlet broad cloth; but though this colour is frequent, it does not seem to be essential to the name. [Scarlet was the name of a material long before it denoted a colour. In the Liberatic Roll of 14 Hen. III. (1290, quoted in N. & Q. S ser. i. 1290) we read of "sanguine scarlet, brown, red, white and scarlet coloris de Maribé." It has, however, been supposed that our word scarlet comes from some form of the present word (see Skeit, s.v. Scarlet). But the fact that the Arab dictionaries give a form sakrlat must not be trusted to. It is a modern form, probably taken from the European word, [as according to Skeat, the Turkish iskerlat is merely borrowed from the Ital. scarlatto].

The word is found in the medieval literature of Europe in the form sictou, a term which has been the subject of controversy both as to etymology and to exact meaning (see Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 58, notes). Among the conjectures as to etymology are a derivation from Ar. sukí, 'polishing' (see SICILEGUR); from Sicily (Ar. Sikilia); and from the Lat. cycallas, cyclaruras. In the Arabic Vorabulista of the 13th century (Florence, 1871), saklatun is translated by ciclus. The conclusion come to in the note on Marco Polo, based, partly but not entirely, on the modern meaning of sakllat, was that saklatun was probably a light woollen texture. But Dozy and De Jong give it as "etoffe de soie, brocher d'or, and the passage from Edrisi gives this undoubtedly. To the north of India the name saklat is given to a stuff imported from the borders of China.

1040. "The robes were then brought, consisting of valuable frocks of saklatun of various colours."—Butaké, in Elliot, ii. 148.

c. 1150. "Almeria (Almaria) was a Musulman city at the time of the Moavidae. It was then a place of great industry, and reckoned, among others, 500 silk looms, where they manufactured costly robes, brocades, the stuffs known as saklatun Isfahani... and various other silk tissues."—Edrisi (Joubert), ii. 40.

c. 1220. "Tabriz. The chief city of Azerbijan... They make there the stuffs called 'atábi (see TABBY), Sikkatun, Khálábit, fine satins and other textures which are exported everywhere."—Fakát, in Barber de Meynard, i. 133.

c. 1370. "His heer, his berd, was lyk saffron. That to his girdle raughte adoun His hooes of Cordewane, Of Brugges were his hosen broun His Robe was of Syklatoun That coste many a Jane."—Chaucer, Sir Thopas, 4 (Furnival, Ellesmere Text).

c. 1390. "Suklat-i-Rúmí: o Forangi o Porugolí:" (Broadcloth of Turkey, of Europe, and of Portugal)...—Ain (orig.) i. 110. Blochmann renders "scarlet Broadcloth" (see above). [The same word, saklit, is used later on of "woollen stuffs" made in Kashmir (Jarrett, Ain, ii. 355.).]

1673. "Sukatun is already full of London Cloath, or Sackcloath London, as they call it."—Fryer, 224.

c. 1625.—"... they laid them out, partly in fine Cotton Cloth... partly in Silken Stuff streaked with Gold and Silver, to make Vests and Summer Drawers of; partly in English Scarlet, to make two Arabian Vests of for their King..."—Berner, E.T. 48; [ed. Constable, 1818.] SUDDER DEATH. Anglo-Indian slang for a fowl served as a spatchcock, to be baked and dressed.

[SUDDER, adj., but used as s. Literally 'chief,' being Ar. sadr. This term had a technical application under Mahomedan rule to a chief Judge, as in the example quoted below. The use of the word seems to be almost confined to the Bengal Presidency. Its principal applications are the following:

a. Sudder Board. This is the 'Board of Revenue' of which there is one at Calcutta, and one in the N.W. Provinces at Allahabad. There is a Board of Revenue at Madras, but not called 'Sudder Board' there.

b. Sudder Court, i.e. Sudder Adawlut (sadr 'adwilat). This was till 1862, in Calcutta and in the N.W.P., the chief court of appeal from the Mofussil or District Courts, the Judges being members of the Bengal Civil Service. In the year named the Calcutta Sudder Court was amalgamated with the Supreme Court (in which English Law had been administered by English Barrister-Judges), the amalgamated Court being entitled the High Court of Judicature. A similar Court also superseded the Sudder Adawlut in the N.W.P.

c. Sudder Ameen, i.e. chief Ameen (q.v.). This was the designation of the second class of native Judge in the classification which was superseded in Bengal by Act XVI. of 1868, in Bombay by Act XIV. of 1869, and in Madras by Act III. of 1873. Under that system the highest rank of native

SUFEENA, s. Hind. safina. This is the native corr. of subpoena. It is shaped, but not much distorted, by the existence in Hind. of the Ar. word safina for 'a blank-book, a note-book.'

SUGAR, s. This familiar word is of Skt. origin. Saka or saka, originally signifies 'grit or gravel,' thence crystallised sugar, and through a Prakrit form saka or sakara gave the Pers. shakkar, the Greek σακχαρ and σάκχαρος, and the late Latin saccharum. The Ar. is shakkar, or with the article as-sukkar, and it is probable that our modern forms, It. zucchero and succero, Fr. sucre, Germ. Zucker, Eng. sugar, came as well as the Sp. azúcar, and Port. açúcar, from the Arabic direct, and not through Latin or Greek. The Russian is sukhar; Polish cukier; Hung. cukor. In fact the ancient knowledge of the product was slight and vague, and it was by the Arabs that the cultivation of the sugar-cane was introduced into Egypt, Sicily, and Andalusia. It is possible indeed, and not improbable, that palm-sugar (see JAGGERY) is a much older product than that of the cane. [This is disputed by Watt (Econ. Dict. vi. pt. i. p. 31), who is inclined to fix the home of the cane in E. India.] The original habitat of the cane is not known; there is only a slight and doubtful statement of Loureiro, who, in speaking of Cochin-China, uses the words...
“habitat et colitur,” which may imply its existence in a wild state, as well as under cultivation, in that country. De Candolle assigns its earliest production to the country extending from Cochin-China to Bengal.

Though, as we have said, the knowledge which the ancient had of sugar was very dim, we are disposed greatly to question the thesis, which has been so confidently maintained by Salmastius and later writers, that the original saccharon of Greek and Roman writers was not sugar but the siliceous concretion sometimes deposited in bamboos, and used in medieval medicine under the name tabasheer (q.v.) (where see a quotation from Royle, taking the same view). It is just possible that Pliny in the passage quoted below may have jumbled up two different things, but we see no sufficient evidence even of this. In White’s Latin Dict, we read that by the word saccharon is meant (not sugar but) “a sweet juice distilling from the joints of the bamboo.” This is nonsense. There is no such sweet juice distilled from the joints of the bamboo; nor is the substance tabashir at all sweet. On the contrary it is slightly bitter and pithy in taste, with no approach to sweetness. It is a hydrate of silica. It could never have been called “honey” (see Dioscorides and Pliny below); and the name of bamboo-sugar appears to have been given it by the Arabs merely because of some resemblance of its concretions to lumps of sugar. [The same view is taken in the Encyc. Brit. 9th ed. xxii. 625, quoting Not. et Extr. xxv. 267.] All the erroneous notices of σάκχαρον seem to be easily accounted for by lack of knowledge; and they are exactly paralleled by the loose and inaccurate stories about the origin of camphor, of lac, and what-not, that may be found within the boards of this book.

In the absence or scarcity of sugar, honey was the type of sweetness, and hence the name of honey applied to sugar in several of these early extracts. This phraseology continued down to the Middle Ages, at least in its application to uncrystallised products of the sugar-cane, and analogous substances. In the quotation from Pegolotti we apprehend that his three kinds of honey indicate honey, treacle, and a syrup or treacle made from the sweet pods of the carob-tree.

Sugar does not seem to have been in early Chinese use. The old Chinese books often mention shi-mi or ‘stone-honey’ as a product of India and Persia. In the reign of Taitsung (627-650) a man was sent to Gangetic India to learn the art of sugar-making; and Marco Polo below mentions the introduction from Egypt of the further art of refining it. In India now, Chāṇā (Cheeny) (Chinese) is applied to the whiter kinds of common sugar; Misr (Misree) or Egyptian, to sugar-candy; loaf-sugar is called āndā.

(and a great deal more).—Ibid. 362-365. We cannot interpret most of the names in the preceding extract. Bembillonia is 'Sugar of Babylon,' i.e. of Cairo, and Donna maschino of Damascos. Strange to say, the only sugar candy used until that time" (20 years before the date of the book) "was received from China; latterly, however, many gentlemen have speculated deeply in the manufacture. We now see sugar-candy of the first quality manufactured in various places of Bengal, and I believe that it is at least admitted that the raw sugars from that quarter are eminently good."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 133.

SULTAN, s. Ar. sultân, 'a Prince, a Monarch.' But this concrete sense is, in Arabic, post-classical only. The classical sense is abstract 'dominion.' The corresponding words in Hebrew and Aramaic have, as usual, šh or s. Thus sholtân in Daniel (e.g. vi. 26—"in the whole dominion of my kingdom") is exactly the same word. The concrete word, corresponding to sultân in its post-classical sense, is shalut, which is applied to Joseph in Gen. xliii. 6—"governor." So Saladin (Yusuf Salâh-ad-din) was not the first Joseph who was sultan of Egypt. ["In Arabia it is not a uncommon proper name and as a title it is taken by a host of petty kingslets. SUMATRA.
a. n.p. This name has been applied to the great island since about A.D.
1400. There can be no reasonable doubt that it was taken from the very similar name of one of the maritime principalities upon the north coast of the island, which seems to have origin-atated in the 13th century. The seat of this principality, a town called Sumudra, was certainly not far from Pasei, the Paeam of the early Portuguese writers, the Passeir of some modern charts, and probably lay near the inner end of the Bay of Telo Samawe (see notes to Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii.
276 seqq.). This view is corroborated by a letter from C. W. J. Wenniker (Bijdragen tot de Taal-Land-en Volken-kunde van Nederlandsch Indie, ser. iv.
vol. 6. (1882), p. 298) from which we learn that in 1851 an official of Netherlands India, who was visiting Pasei, not far from that place, and on the left bank of the river (we presume the river which is shown in maps as entering the Bay of Telo Samawe near Pasei) came upon a kampoma, or village, called Samudra. We cannot doubt that this is an indication of the site of the old capital.

The first mention of the name is probably to be recognised in Samara, the name given in the text of Marco Polo to one of the kingdoms of this cost, intervening between Besuma, or Pacem, and Dagroian or Dragoon, which last seems to correspond with Pedir.
This must have been the position of Samudra, and it is probable that d has disappeared accidentally from Polo’s Samara. Malay legends give trivial stories to account for the ety-ymology of the name, and others have been suggested ; but in all probability it was the Skt. Samudra, the ‘sea.’ [See Miscellaneous Papers relating to Indo-China, 2nd ser. ii. 50; Leyden, Malay Annals, 65.] At the very time of the alleged foundation of the town a kingdom was flourishing at Dwara Samudra in S. India (see DOOR SUMMUND).

The first authentic occurrence of the name is probably in the Chinese annals, which mention, among the Indian kingdoms which were prevailed on to send tribute to Kublai Khan, that of Sumutala. The chief of this State is called in the Chinese record Tu-han-pa-ti (Pauthier, Marc Pol, 605), which seems to exactly represent the Malay words Tuan-Pa'ti, 'Lord Ruler.'

We learn next from Ibn Batuta that at the time of his visit (about the middle of the 14th century) the State of Sumatra, as he calls it, had become important and powerful in the Archipelago; and no doubt it was about that time or soon after, that the name began to be applied by foreigners to the whole of the great island, just as Lemorî had been applied to the same island some centuries earlier, from Limbrî, which was then the State and port habitually visited by ships from India. We see that the name was so applied early in the following century by Nicolò Conti, who was in those seas apparently c. 1420-30, and who calls the island Shanathera. Fra Mauro, who derived much information from Conti, in his famous World-Map, calls the island Isola Siuamotra or Taprobane. The confusion with Taprobane lasted long.

When the Portuguese first reached those regions Pedir was the leading State upon the coast, and certainly no State known as Samudra or Sumatra then continued to exist. Whether the city continued to exist, even in decay, is obscure. The Atin, quoted below, refers to the "port of Sumatra," but this may have been based on old information. Valentijn seems to recognise the existence of a place called Samudra or Sumotara, though it is not entered in his map. A famous mystic theologian who flourished under the great King of Achîn, Iskandar Muda, and died in 1630, bore the name of Shamsuddin Shamatranî, which seems to point to a place called Shamatra as his birthplace. And a distinct mention of "the island of Sumatra" as named from "a city of this northern part" occurs in the soi-disant "Voyage which Juan Serano made when he fled from Malacca" in 1512, published by Lord Stanley of Alderley at the end of his translation of Barbosa. This man, on leaving Pedir and going down the coast, says: "I drew towards the south and south-east direction, and reached to another country and city which is called Samatra," and so on. Now this indicates the position in which the city of Sumatra must really have been, if it continued to exist. But, though this passage is not, all the rest of the narrative seems to be mere plunder from Varthema. Unless, indeed, the plunder was the other way; for there is reason to believe that Varthema never went east of Malabar.

There is, however, a like intimation in a curious letter respecting the Portuguese discoveries, written from Lisbon in 1515, by a German, Valentino Moravia (the same probably who published a Portuguese version of Marco Polo, at Lisbon, in 1502) and who shows an extremely accurate conception of Indian geography. He says: "The greatest island is that called by Marco Polo the Venetian Java Minor, and at present it is called Sumotra from a port of the said island" (see in De Gubernatis, Viaggi, Ital. 391).

It is probable that before the Portuguese epoch the adjoining States of Pasei and Sumatra had become united. Mr. G. Phillips, of the Consular Service in China, was good enough to send to one of the present writers, when engaged on Marco Polo, a copy of an old Chinese chart showing the northern coast of the island, and this showed the town of Sumatra (Sumantula). It seemed to be placed in the Gulf of Pasei, and very near where Pasei itself still exists. An extract of a Chinese account "of about a.d. 1413" accompanied the map. This was fundamentally the same as that quoted below from Groeneveldt. There was a village at the mouth of the river called Talun-mangkîn (qu, Telu-Samawe?). A curious passage also will be found below, extracted by the late M. Pauthier from the great Chinese Imperial Geography, which alludes to the disappearance of Sumatra from knowledge.

We are quite unable to understand the doubts that have been thrown upon the derivation of the name, given to the island by foreigners, from that of the kingdom of which we have been speaking (see the letter quoted above from the Bijdragen).

c. 1316.—"... after a voyage of 25 days we arrived at the island of Java (i.e. the Java Minor of Marco Polo, or Sumatra).... We thus made our entrance into the capital, that is to say into the city of Sumuthra. It is large and handsome, and is encompassed with a wall and towers of timber."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 228-230.

1416.—"SUMATRA [Su-men-ta-la]. This country is situated on the great road of western trade. When a ship leaves Malacca for the west, and goes with a fair eastern wind for five days and nights, it first comes to a village on the sea-coast called Tai-leu-man; and anchoring here and going south-east for about 10 li. (3 miles) one arrives at the said place."

"This country has no walled city. There is a large brook running out into the sea, with two tides every day; the waves at the mouth of it are very high, and ships continually founder there...."—Chinese work, quoted by Groenevelt, p. 85.
c. 1430.—"He afterwards went to a fine city of the island Taprobana, which island is called by the natives Sciamuthera."—Conti, in India in XVth. Cent., 9.

1459.—"Isola Siamotra."—Fra Mauro.

1498.—"... Camataira is of the Christians; it is distant from Calicut a voyage of 30 days with a good wind."—Rotariu, 109.

1510.—"Wherefore we took a junk and went towards Sumatra to a city called Pider."—Varthema, 228.

1522.—"... We left the island of Timor, and entered upon the great sea called Lant Chidol, and taking a west-south-west course, we left to the right and the north, for fear of the Portuguese, the island of Zumatra, anciently called Taprobana: also Pegu, Bengal, Malacca, Chelina (see KLIN) where are the Malaya quarters of the King of Narsinga."—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. 159.

1572.—
"Dizem, que desta terra, co'as possantes Ondas o mar intrando, divido A nobre ilha Samatra, que já d'antes Juntas ambas a gente antiqua vio: Chersonese foi dita, e das prestantes Viaõs d'ouro, que a terra produzio, Aurea por epitheto ihe ajuntaram Alguns que fosse Ophir imaginam."—Camões, x. 124.

By Burton:

"From this Peninsula, they say, the sea parted with puissant waves, and entering tore Samatra's noble island, went to be joined to the Main as seen by men of yore. These called Chersonese, and such degree again, by earth that yielded golden ore, they gave a golden epithet to the ground; some be who fancy Ophir here was founded."

c. 1590.—"The zabad (i.e. civet) which I brought from the harbour, town of Sumatra), from the territory of Achin, goes by the name of Sumatra zabad (chun az bandar-i Sâmâtrâ az mushafât-i Achin awandur, Sâmâtrâ goyand)."—Jfr. Blouchman, i. 79, (orig. i. 93). [And see a reference to Lâmi in ̄I[un, ed. Jearret, iii. 48.]

1612.—"It is related that Raja Shaheer-ul-Vori (see SARNAU) was a sovereign of great power, and on hearing that Samadra was a fine and flourishing land he said to his warriors—which of you will take the Raja of Samadra?"—Níyâra Malaya, in J. Ind. Archip., v. 316.

b.—

SUMATRA. S. Sudden squalls, precisely such as are described by Locker and the others below, and which are common in the narrow sea between the Malav Peninsula and the island of Sumatra, are called by this name.

1616.—"... it befel that the galliot of Miguel de Macedo was lost on the Ilha Grande of Malaca (b), where he had come to anchor, when a Samatra arose that drove him on the island, the vessel going to pieces, though the crew and most part of what she carried were saved."—Beavo, Decola, 629.

1711.—"Frequent squalls... these are often accompanied with Thunder and Lightening, and continue very fierce for Half an Hour, more or less. Our English Sailors call them Sumatras, because they always meet with them on the Coasts of this Island."—Lockyer, 59.

1726.—"At Malacca the straights are not above 4 Leagues broad; for though the opposite shore on Sumatra is very low, yet it may easily be seen on a clear Day, which is the Reason that the Sea is always as smooth as a Mirror, and never is ruffled with Squalls of Wind, which seldom come without Lightening, Thunder, and Rain, and though they come with great Violence, yet they are soon over, not often exceeding an Hour."—A. Hamilton, ii. 79, (ed. 1744).

1843.—"Sumatrâs, or squalls from the S. Westward, are often experienced in the S.W. Monsoon... Sumatrâs generally come off the land during the first part of the night, and are sometimes sudden and severe, accompanied with loud thunder, lightning, and rain."—Horsburgh, ed. 1849, ii. 215.
SUMJAO. 868  SUNDA.

[SUMJAO. v. This is properly the imp. of the H. verb samj̄āna, 'to cause to know, warn, correct,' usually with the implication of physical coercion. Other examples of a similar formation will be found under PUCKEROW.

[1826.—"... in this case they apply themselves to sumjao, the defendant."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1878, ii. 170.]

[SUMPITAN, s. The Malay blowing-tube, by means of which arrows, often poisoned, are discharged. The weapon is discussed under SARBATANE. The word is Malay sumpitan, properly 'a narrow thing,' from sumpit, 'narrow, strait.' There is an elaborate account of it, with illustrations, in Ling Roth, Natives of Sarawak and Br. N. Borneo, ii. 184 seqq. Also see Scott, Malayen Words, 104 seqq.

‘c. 1630.—"Semptans." See under UPAS.

[1841.—"In advancing, the sumpitan is carried at the mouth and elevated, and they will discharge at least five arrows to one compared with a musket."—Brooke, in Narrative of Events in Borneo and Celebes, i. 261.

[1883.—"Their (the Samangs') weapon is the sumpitan, a blow-gun, from which poisoned arrows are expelled."—Miss Bird, The Golden Chersonese, 16.]

SUNDA, n.p. The western and most mountainous part of the island of Java, in which a language different from the proper Javanese is spoken, and the people have many differences of manners, indicating distinction of race. In the 16th century, Java and Sunda being often distinguished, a common impression grew up that they were separate islands; and they are so represented in some maps of the 16th century, just as some medieval maps, including that of Fra Mauro (1459), show a like separation between England and Scotland. The name Sunda is more properly indeed that of the people than of their country. The Dutch call them Sundanezen (Soendanezen). The Sunda country is considered to extend from the extreme western point of the island to Cheribon, i.e. embracing about one-third of the whole island of Java. Hinduism appears to have prevailed in the Sunda country, and held its ground longer than in "Java," a name which the proper Javanese restrict to their own part of the island. From this country the sea between Sumatra and Java got from Europeans the name of the Straits of Sunda. Geographers have also called the great chain of islands from Sumatra to Timor "the Sunda Islands."

[Mr. Whiteway adds: "There was another Sunda near Goa, but above the Ghâts, where an offspring of the Vijâynamâgara family ruled. It was founded at the end of the 16th century, and in the 18th the Portuguese had much to do with it, till Tippoo Sultân absorbed it, and the ruler became a Portuguese pensioner.

1516.—"And having passed Samatara towards Java there is the island of Sunda, in which there is a rich good pepper, and it has a king over it, who they say desires to serve the King of Portugal. They ship thence many slaves to China."—Barboes, 196.

1526.—"Duarte Coelho in a ship, along with the galeot and a foist, went into the port of Çunda, which is at the end of the island of Çamatra, on a separate large island, in which grows a great quantity of excellent pepper, and of which there is a great traffic from this port to China, this being in fact the most important merchandize exported thence. The country is very abundant in provisions, and rich in groves of trees, and has excellent water, and is peopled with Moors who have a Moorish king over them."—Correa, iii. 92.

1553.—"Of the land of Jâlia we make two islands, one before the other, lying west and east as if both on one parallel. ... But the Jôos themselves do not reckon two islands of Jâo, but one only, of the length that has been stated ... about a third in length of this island towards the west constitutes Sunda, of which we have now to speak. The natives of that part consider their country to be an island divided from Jâila by a river, little known to our navigators, called by them Çhiamo or Chenano, which cuts off right from the sea,* all that third part of the land in such a way that when these natives define the limits of Jâila they say that on the west it is bounded by the Island of Sunda, and separated from it by this river Çhiamo, and on the east by the island of Bâle, and that on the north they have the island of Madura, and on the south the unexplored sea. ..."—Ke.—Barrois, IV, i. 12.

1554.—"The information we have of this part of Çalâqa, which is the same as Çunda, and of another port called Boyao, these two being 15 leagues one from the other, and

* "... hum rio ... que corta do mar todo aquelle terço de terra." ... We are not quite sure how to translate. Crawford renders: "This (river) intersects the whole island from sea to sea," which seems very free. But it is true, as we have said, that several old maps show Java and Sunda thus divided from sea to sea.
both under one King, is to the effect that the supply of pepper one year with another will be xxx thousand quintals," that is to say, xx thousand in one year, and x thousand the next year; also that it is very good pepper, as good as that of Malabar, and it is purchased with clothes of Cambaya, Bengalla, and Choromandel."—I. Nazee, in Subsidies, 42.

1566.—"Sonda, vn Isola de' Mori appresso costa della Giava."--Cos. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 391. c. 1570.—
"Os Sundas e Malaisios pimenta, Con massa, e nox ricos Bandanezze.
Com roupa e droga Cambila a opulenta,
E com cravo os longinquos Malaguenez."— Ant. de' Abrer, De. de Malaca.

1598.—Linschoten does not recognize the two islands. To him Sunda is only a place in Java:-

"... there is a straight or narrow passage between Sundar and Jana, called the straight of Sunda, of a place so called lying not far from thence within the lie of Jana... The principal haven in the Land is Sunda Calapa, whereof the straight beareth the name; in this place of Suda there is much Pepper."—p. 34.

SUNDERBUNDS, n.p. The well-known name of the tract of intersecting creeks and channels, swampy islands, and jungles, which constitutes that part of the Ganges Delta nearest the sea. The limits of the region so-called are the mouth of the Hoogly on the west, and that of the Megna (i.e. of the combined great Ganges and Brahmaputra) the east, a width of about 220 miles. The name appears not to have been traced in old native documents of any kind, and hence its real form and etymology remain uncertain.
Sundara-rana, a beautiful forest; Sundari-rana, or Jana, forest of the Sundari tree; Chandra-ban, and Chandra-band, moon-forest; or moonembankment; Chandra-bhanda, the name of an old tribe of salt-makers; Chandra dip-ban from a large zemindary called Chandra-dip in the Bakerganj district at the eastern extremity of the Sunderbunds; these are all suggestions that have been made. Whatever be the true etymology, we doubt if it is to be sought in sundara or sundari.
[As to the derivation from the Sundari tree which is perhaps most usually

* Apparently 30,000 quintals every two years.
† Sunda Calapa was the same as Jacatra, on the site of which the Dutch founded Batavia in 1619.
‡ These are mentioned in a copper tablet inscription of A.D. 1130; see Blochmann, as quoted further on, p. 226.

accepted, Mr. Beveridge (Man. of Bakerganj, 24, 167, 32) remarks that this tree is by no means common in many parts of the Bakerganj Sunder"bunds; he suggests that the word means 'beautiful wood' and was possibly given by the Brahmins.] The name has never (except in one quotation below) been in English months, or in English popular orthography, Sunderbunds, but Sunderbunds, which implies (in correct transliteration) an original sundra or chandra, not sundara. And going back to what we conjecture may be an early occurrence of the name in two Dutch writers, we find this confirmed. These two writers, it will be seen, both speak of a famous Sandery, or Santry, Forest in Lower Bengal, and we should be more positive in our identification were it not that in Van der Brocke's map (1660) which was published in Valentijn's East Indies (1726) this Sandery Forest is shown on the west side of the Hoogly R., in fact about due west of the site of Calcutta, and a little above a place marked as Basanderi, located near the exit into the Hoogly of what represents the old Saraswati R., which enters the former at Sankrāl, not far below the Botanical Gardens, and 5 or 6 miles below Fort William. This has led
Mr. Blochmann to identify the Sandari Bosch with the old Mahall Basandhari which appears in the Ain as belonging to the Sirkār of Sullīmanābād (Gladwin's Asen, ii. 207, orig. i. 407; Jarrett, ii.
140; Bloehm, in J. A.S. B. xlii. pt. i.
p. 232), and which formed one of the original "xxiv. Pergumas." Undoubtedly this is the Basanderi of V. den Brocke's map; but it seems possible that some confusion between Basanderi and Bosch Sandery (which would be Sandarban in the vernacular) may have led the map-maker to mis-place the latter. We should gather from Schulz that he passed the Forest of Sandry about a Dutch mile below Sankrāl, which he mentions.
But his statement is so nearly identical with that in Valentijn that we appre-

* Basandhari is also mentioned by Mr. James Grant (1750) in his View of the Revenues of Bengal, as the Perguma of Bello-bussuseney; and by A.
Hamilton as a place on the Damdār, producing much good sugar (Fifth Report, p. 405; A. Hist. ii. 4).
It would seem to have been the present Perguma of Bailla, some 13 or 14 miles west of the northern part of Calcutta. See Hunter's Bengal Gaz. i. 365.
† So called in the German version which we use; but in the Dutch original he is Schoten.
hend they have no separate value. Valentijn, in an earlier page, like Bernier, describes the Sunderbunds as the resort of the Arakan pirates, but does not give a name (p. 169).

1661.—"We got under sail again" (just after meeting the Arakan pirates) "in the morning early, and went past the Forest of Santry, so styled because (as has been credibly related) Alexander the Great with his mighty army was hindered by the strong rush of the ebb and flood at this place, from advancing further, and therefore had to turn back to Macedonia."—Valtcr Schulz, 155.

C. 1066.—"And thence it is?" (from piratical raids of the Mugs, &c.) "that at present there are seen in the mouth of the Ganges, so many fine Isles quite deserted, which were formerly well peopled, and where no other inhabitants are found but wild Beasts, and especially Tygers."—Bernier, E.T. 54; [ed. Constable, 442].

1726.—"This (Bengal) is the land wherein they will have it that Alexander the Great, called by the Moors, whether Hindostanders or Persians, Sultham Iskender, and in their historians Iskender Doulcarmain, was... they can show you the exact place where King Porus held his court. The natives will prize much of this matter; for example, that in front of the Sunderbunds Wood (Sunderie Bosch, which we show in the map, and which they call properly after him Iskenderie) he was stopped by the great and rushing streams."—Valentijn, v. 179.

1728.—"But your petitioners did not arrive off Sunderbund Wood till four in the evening, where they rowed backward and forward for six days; with which labour and want of provisions three of the people died."—Petition of Sheikh Mahmad Ameen and others, to Govr. of ft. St. Geo., in Wheeler, iii. 41.

1764.—"On the 11th Bhandan, whilst the Beasts were at Kerma in Soonderbund, a little before daybreak, Captain Ross arose and ordered the Manje to put off with the Budgerow..."—Native Letter regarding Murder of Captain John Ross by a Native Crew. In Long, 383. This instance is an exception to the general remark made above that the English popular orthography has always been Sunder, and not Soonder-bunds.

1786.—"If the Jelinghy be navigable we shall soon be in Calcutta; if not, we must pass a second time through the Sundarbans."—Letter of Sir W. Jones, in Life, ii. 83.

"A portion of the Sunderbunds... for the most part overflowed by the tides, as indicated by the original Hindoo name of Chundra Wood, signifying mounds, or offspring of the moon."—James Grant, in App. to Fifth Report, p. 240. In a note Mr. Grant notices the derivation from "Sunder-Nund, and "Sunder-ian," 'beautiful wood,' and proceeds: 'But we adhere to our own etymology rather... above all, because the richest and greatest part of the Sunderbunds is still comprised in the ancient Zemindarry pergunnah of Chundra deep, or lunar territory.'

1792.—"Many of these lands, what is called the Sundra bunde, and others at the mouth of the Ganges, if we may believe the history of Bengal, was formerly well inhabited."—Forrest, V. to Mergui, Pref. p. 5.

1793.—"That part of the delta bordering on the sea, is composed of a labyrinth of rivers and creeks, this tract known by the name of the Woods, or Sunderbunds, is in extent equal to the principality of Wales."—Kelly, Mem. of Map of Hind., 3rd ed., p. 358.

1853.—"The scenery, too, exceeded his expectations; the terrible forest solitude of the Sunderbunds was full of interest to an European imagination."—Oakfield, i. 38.

[SUNGAR, s. Pers. sang, Sanga, 'a stone.' A rude stone breastwork, such as is commonly erected for defence by the Afridis and other tribes on the Indian N.W. frontier. The word has now come into general military use, and has been adopted in the S. African war.

[1857.—... breastworks of wood and stone (marcha and sanga respectively)."

[1900.—"Conspicuous sungars are constructed to draw the enemy's fire."—Pioneer Mail, March 16.]

The same word seems to be used in the Hills in the sense of a rude wooden bridge supported by stone piers, used for crossing a torrent.

[1833.—"Across a deep ravine... his Lordship erected a neat sangah, or mountain bridge of pines."—Mundy, Pen and Pencil Sketches, ed. 1858, p. 117.

[1871.—"A sunga bridge is formed as follows: on either side the river piers of rubble masonry, faced with cross-beams of timber, are built up; and into these are inserted stout poles, one above the other in successively projecting tiers, the interstices between the latter being filled up with cross-beams."—Harcourt, Himalayan Districts of Kooloo, p. 67 seq.

[SUNGARA. s. Pers. sungara, 'a kind of orange, probably from Cinta. See under ORANGE a quotation regarding the fruit of Cinta, from Arabifca.

C. 1526.—"The Sangterel... is another fruit... In colour and appearance it is like the citron (Taran), but the skin of the fruit is smooth."—Baker, 328.

C. 1590.—"Sirkar Sihil is very mountainous. Here grows a delicious fruit called Soontara (sambil) in colour like an orange, but of an oblong form."—Ayeen, by

Gladwin, ii. 10; [Jarrett (ii. 124) writes Suntmarah].

1793.—"The people of this country have indefinitely more reason to be proud of their oranges, which appear to me to be very superior to those of Silhet, and probably indeed are not surpassed by any in the world. They are here called Sambula, which I take to be a corruption of Sengterrah, the name by which a similar species of orange is known in the Upper Provinces of India."— Kirkpatrick's Nepal, 129.

1835.—"The most delicious oranges have been procured here. The rind is fine and thin, the flavour excellent; the natives call them 'cintra.'"—Wanderings of a Pilgrim,
i. 99.

SUNN, s. Beng. and Hind, san, from Skt. sana; the fibre of the Crotalaria juncea, L. (N. O. Leguminosae); often called Bengal, or Country, hemp.
It is of course in no way kindred to ture hemp, except in its economic use.
In the following passage from the Ain the reference is to the Hibiscus cana-bibius (see Watt, Econ. Dict. i. 597).

[c. 1590.—"Hemp grows in clusters like a nosegay. . . . One species bears a flower like the cotton-shrub, and this is called in Hindostan, sun-pent. It makes a very soft rope."— Ayen, by Gladwin, ii. 59; in Block-mann (i. 87) Puttan.]

1838.—"Sunn a plant the bark of which is used as hemp, and is usually sown around cotton fields. — Playfair, Tulef-Shereef, 96.

[SUNNEE, SOONNEE. s. "Ar.
Sunn/, which is really a Pers. form and stands for that which is expressed by the Ar. Ahlord-Sunnah, 'the people of the Path,' a 'Traditionist.'
The term applied to the large Mahom-mediot sect who acknowledge the first four Khalifahs to have been the rightful descendants of the Prophet, and are thus opposed to the Sheeahs. The latter are much less numerous than the former, the proportion being, according to Mr. Wilfrid Blunt's estimate, 15 millions Shiah to 145 millions of Sunnis.

[c. 1590.—"The Mahommedans (of Kashmir) are partly Sunnies, and others of the sects of Aly and Noorbukshy; and they are frequently engaged in wars with each other."— Ayen, by Gladwin, ii. 125; ed.
Jarrett, ii. 322.

1623.—"The other two . . . are Sonni, as the Turks and Moghol."—P. della Valle, Ital. Soc. i. 152.

1812.—"A fellow told me with the gravest face, that a lion of their own country would never hurt a Sheyah . . . but would always devour a Sunni."—Morier, Journey through Persia, 62.]

SUNNUD. s. Hind. from Ar.
sanad. A diploma, patent, or deed of grant by the government of office, privilege, or right. The corresponding Skt.—H. is 6dsana.

[c. 1590.—"A paper authenticated by proper signatures is called a sunnud . . ."— Ayen, by Gladwin, i. 214; ed. Blockmann,
i. 259.]

1758.—"They likewise brought sunnuds, or the commission for the nabobship."—Orme, Hist., ed. 1803, ii. 284.

1759.—"That your Petitioners, being the Drainis, &c. were permitted by Sunnud from the President and Council to collect daily alms from each shop or doccan (Doocaun) of this place, at 5 cowries per diem."—In Long, 184.

1776.—"If the path to and from a House
. . . be in the Territories of another Person, that Person, who always hath passed to and from, shall continue to do so, the other Person foresaid, though he hath a Right of Property in the Ground, and hath an attested Sunnad thereof, shall not have Authority to cause him any Let or Molestation."—Halhed, Code, 100-101.

1799.—"I enclose you sunnuds for pension for the Killadar of Chittledroog."— Wellington, i. 45.

1800.—"I wished to have traced the nature of landed property in Soondah . . . by a chain of Sunnuds up to the 8th century."— Sir T. Munro, in Life, i. 248.

1809.—"This sunnud is the foundation of all the rights and privileges annexed to a Jagare (Jagheer)."—Harrington's Analysis,
i. 410.

SUNYASEE. s. Skt. sunnyi,'lit.
'who resigns, or abandons,' scil.
'wordly affairs'; a Hindu religious mendicant. The name of Sunyasee was applied familiarly in Bengal,
c. 1760-75, to a body of banditti claiming to belong to a religious fraternity, who, in the interval between the decay of the imperial authority and the regular establishment of our own, had their head-quarters in the forest-tracts at the foot of the Himalaya. From these they used to issue periodically in large bodies, plundering and levying exactions far and wide, and returning to their asylum in the jungle when threatened with pursuit. In the days of Nawab Mir Kasim 'Ali (1760-64) they were bold enough to plunder the city of Dacca; and in 1766 the great geographer James Supára, in an encounter with a large body of them in the territory of Koch (see COOCH) Bihar, was nearly cut to pieces. Rennell himself, five years later, was employed to carry out a project which he had formed for the suppression of these bands, and did so apparently with what was considered at the time to be success, though we find the depredators still spoken of by W. Hastings as active, two or three years later.

1766. — “The Sanasyah Faquirs (part of the same tribe which plundered Dacca in Cossim Ally’s Time*) were in arms to the number of 7 or 800 at the Time I was surveying Bôdar (a small Province near Bottan), and had taken and plundered the capital of that name within a few hours of my route. . . . I came up with Morrison immediately after he had defeated the Sanasbys in a pitched Battle. . . . Our Escort, which were a few Horse, rode off, and the Enemy with drawn Sabres immediately surrounded us. Morrison escaped unhurt, Richards, my Brother officer, received only a slight Wound, and fought his Way off; my Armagnan Assistant was killed, and the Sepoy Adjutant much wounded. . . . I was put in a Palanquin, and Morrison made an attack on the Enemy and cut most of them to Pieces. I was now in a most shocking Condition indeed, being deprived of the Use of both my Arms. . . . a cut of a Sable (sic) had cut through my Right Shoulder Bone, and laid me open for nearly a Foot down the Back, cutting thro’ and wounding some of my Ribs. I had besides a Cut on the left Elbow which took off the Muscular part of the breadth of a Hand, a Stab in the Arm, and a large Cut on the Head” — MS, Letter from James Rennell, dd. 1717. — “A Body of 5000 Sinasses have lately entered the Sircar Sorange country; the Phousard sent two companies of Sepoys after them, under the command of a sergeant the Sinasses stood their ground, and after the Sepoys had fired away their ammunition, fell on them, killed and wounded near 50, and put the rest to flight.” — Letter to President at Cal. William, from Thomas Rambold, Chief at Patna, dd. April 10, in Long, p. 520.

1773. — “You will hear of great disturbances committed by the Sinasses, or wandering Preaktan, who annually infest the provinces about this time of the year, in pilgrimage to Juggernaut, going in bodies of 1000 and sometimes even 10,000 men.” — Letter of Warren Hastings, dd. 1771. — “The history of these people is curious. . . . They . . . rove continually from place to place, recruiting their numbers with the healthiest children they can steal. . . . Thus they are the stoutest and most active men in India. . . . Such are the Sinasses, the gypsies of Hindostan.” — Do., dd. August 26, in Gleig, 303-4. See the headnote, also pp. 294, 296-7, 298.

1826. — “Being looked upon with an evil eye by many persons in society, I pretended to bewail my brother’s loss, and gave out my intention of becoming a Sanysée, and retiring from the world.” — Punditram Hori, 394; [ed. 1873, ii. 267; also i. 189.]

Súpára, n.p. The name of a very ancient port and city of Western India; in Skt. Sūpāra, popularly Supara. It was near Wāsū (Báguim of the Portuguese — see (1) Bassin) — which was for many centuries the chief city of the Konkan, where the name still survives as that of a well-to-do town of 1700 inhabitants, the channel by which vessels in former days reached

* Williams (Skt. Dér, s.v.) gives Súpāraka as the name of a mythical country; but it was real enough. There is some ground for believing that there was another Súpāraka on the coast of Orissa, Súpára of Ptolemy.

SUPREME COURT.

The designation of the English Court established at Fort William by the Regulation Act of 1773 (13 Geo. III. c. 63), and afterwards at the other two Presidencies. Its extent of jurisdiction was the subject of acrimonious controversies in the early years of its existence; controversies which were closed by 21 Geo. III. c. 70, which explained and defined the jurisdiction of the Court.
The use of the name came to an end in 1862 with the establishment of the 'High Court,' the bench of which is occupied by barrister judges, judges from the Civil Service, and judges promoted from the native bar.
The Charter of Charles II., of 1661, gave the Company certain powers to administer the laws of England, and that of 1853 to establish Courts of Judicature. That of Geo. I. (1726) gave power to establish at each Presidency Mayor's Courts for civil suits, with appeal to the Governor and Council, and from these, in cases involving more than 1000 pagodas, to the King in Council. The same charter constituted the Governor and Council of each Presidency a Court for trial of all offences except high treason. Courts of Requests were established by charter of Geo. II., 1753. The Mayor's Court at Madras and Bombay survived till 1797, when (by 27 Geo. III. ch. 142) a Recorder's Court was instituted at each. This was superseded at Madras by a Supreme Court in 1801, and at Bombay in 1823.

it from the sea being now dry. The city is mentioned in the Mahábhárata as a very holy place, and in other old Sanskrit works, as well as in cave inscriptions at Kárlí and Nášik, going back to the 1st and 2nd centuries of the Christian era. Excavations affording interesting Buddhist relics, were made in 1882 by Mr. (now Sir) J. M. Campbell (see his interesting notice in Bombay Gazetteer, xiv. 314-342; xvi. 125) and Pandit Indrají Bhagwánlal. The name of Supára is that of one of those which have been plausibly connected, through Sophir, the Coptic name of India, with the Ophir of Scripture. Some Arab writers call it the Sufála of India.

A.D. 1095.—The Mahámándika, the illustrious Aramadávala, the Emperor of the Kotíkan (Concan), has released the toll mentioned in this copper-grant given by the Sílláras, in respect of every cart belonging to two persons . . . which may come into any of the ports, Sí Síhánaka (Tana), as well as Nágarpur. Suppáraka, Chennali (Chaul) and others, included within the Kotíkan Fourteen Hundred. . . .—Copper-Plate Grant, in Ind. Antq. ix. 38.

c. 1150.—"Subára is situated ½ mile from the sea. It is a populous busy town, and is considered one of the entrepôts of India."—Edrisí, in Elliot, i. 53.

1321.—There are three places where the Friars might reap a great harvest, and where they could live in common. One of these is Supéra, where two friars might be stationed; and a second is in the district of Tarocco (Broach), where two or three might SURA, s. Toddy (q.v.), i.e. the fermented sap of several kinds of palm, such as coco, palmyra, and wild-date. It is the Skt. sura, 'vinous liquor,' which has passed into most of the vernaculars. In the first quotation we certainly have the word, though combined with other elements of uncertain identity, applied by Cosmas to the milk of the coco-nut, perhaps making some confusion between that and the fermented sap. It will be seen that Linschoten applies sura in the same way. Britten, curiously, calls this a Caffre word. It has in fact been introduced from India into Africa by the Portuguese (see Ann. Marit. iv. 293).

c. 515. — "The Argoll" (i.e. Narqil, or nargeela, or coco-nut) "is at first full of very sweet water, which the Indians drink, using it instead of wine. This drink is called Rhino-sura, and is exceedingly pleasant." — Cosmas, in Cathay, &c., cxvii.

[1554. — "Cura." See under ARRACK.]

1563. — "They grow two qualities of palm-tree, one kind for the fruit, and the other to give cura." — Cita, f. 67.

1578. — "Sura, which is, as it were, vino mosto." — Acosta, 100.

1598. — "...in that sort the pot in short space is full of water, which they call Sura, and is very pleasant to drink, like sweet hay, and somewhat better." — Linschoten, 101; [Hak. Soc. ii. 48].

1609-10. — "...A goodly country and fertile...abounding with Date Trees, whence they draw a liquor, called Tocree (Toddy) or Sura..." — W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 486.

1643. — "...La fe bois donc mes marins de telle sorte que peu s'en fatit quils ne rennerissent notre amadie ou batteau: Ce beuyage estoit du sura, qui est du vin fait de palmes." — Moret, Voyages, 252.

c. 1650. — "Nor could they drink either Wine, or Sury, or Strong Water, by reason of the great Imposts which they lay upon them." — Tucumer, E.T. ii. 86; [ed. Ball, i. 319].

1655. — "Les Portugais appellent ce liquor on vin des Indes, Soure...de ce liquore le singe, et la grande chaune-sorini...sont extrremely amateurs, aussi bien que les Indiens Mansulmans (sic), Paris, et quelque tribus d'Indon...." — De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, 263.

SURAT, n.p. In English use the name of this city is accented Suratt; but the name is in native writing and parlance generally Suratt. In the Ain, however (see below), it is written Sarrat; also in Sādīk Isfahānī (p. 106). Surat was taken by Akbar in 1573, having till then remained a part of the falling Mahommedan kingdom of Guzerat. An English factory was first established in 1608-9, which was for more than half a century the chief settlement of the English Company in Continental India. The transfer of the Chiefs to Bombay took place in 1687.

We do not know the origin of the name. Various legends on the subject are given in Mr. (now Sir J.) Campbell's Bombay Gazetteer (vol. ii.), but none of them have any probability. The ancient Indian Sūrārāṣṭrā was the name of the Peninsula of Guzerat or Kattywar, or at least of the maritime part of it. This latter name and country is represented by the differently spelt and pronounced Sārath (see SURATH). Sir Henry Elliot and his editor have repeatedly stated the opinion that the names are identical. Thus: "The names 'Surat' and 'Sīrath' are identical, both being derived from the Sankrit Sūrārāṣṭrā; but as they belong to different places a distinction in spelling has been maintained. 'Surat' is the city; 'Sīrath' is a ārāj or district of Kattywar, of which Junagahr is the chief town" (Elliot, v. 350; see also 197). Also: "The Sanskrit Sūrārāṣṭrā and Gurjara survive in the modern names Sārāt and Guzerat, and however the territories embraced by the old terms have varied, it is hard to conceive that Surat was not in Sūrārāṣṭrā nor Guzerat in Gurjara. All evidence goes to prove that the old and modern names applied to the same places. Thus Ptolemy's Sūrastre comp. Surat. ..." (Dowson (I) ibid. i. 359). This last statement seems distinctly erroneous. Surat is in Ptolemy's Λόφη, not in Συναρστρή, which represents, like Sūrārāṣṭrā, the peninsula. It must remain doubtful whether there was any connection between the names, or the resemblance was accidental. It is possible that continental Surat may have originally had some name implying its being the place of passage to Sūrārāṣṭrā or Sūrath.

Surat is not a place of any antiquity. There are some traces of the existence of the name ascribed to the 14th century, in passages of uncertain value in certain native writers. But it only came to notice as a place of any importance about the very end of the 15th century, when a rich Hindu trader, Gopi by name, is stated to have established himself on the spot, and founded the town. The way, however, in which it is spoken of by Barbosa previous to 1516 shows that the rise of its prosperity must have been rapid.

[Surat in English slang is equivalent to the French Rajot, in the sense of 'no great shakes,' an adulterated article of inferior quality (Burrère, s.v. Rajot). This perhaps was accounted for by the fact that 'until lately the character of Indian cotton in the Liverpool market stood very low, and the name Surarat,' the description under which the cotton of this province is still included, was a byword and a general term of contempt' (Berar Gazetteer, 226 seq.).]

1510.—'Don Afonso' (de Noronha, nephew of Alboquerque) 'in the storm not knowing whither they went, entered the Gulf of Cambay, and struck upon a shoal in front of Currate. Trying to save themselves by swimming or on planks many perished, and among them Don Afonso.'—Correa, ii. 28.

1516.—'Having passed beyond the river of Reyne, on the other side there is a city which they call Curate, peopled by Moors, and close upon the river; they deal there in many kinds of wares, and carry on a great trade; for many ships of Malabar and other ports sail thither, and sell what they bring, and return loaded with what they choose.'—Barbosa, Lisbon ed. 250.

1525.—'The corjas (Corge) of cotton cloths of Curate, of 14 yards each, is worth 200 Real.'—Lembrança, 45.

1528.—'Heytor da Silveira put to sea again, scouring the Gulf, and making war everywhere with fire and sword, by sea and land; and he made an onslaught on Currate and Reyne, great cities on the sea-coast, and sacked them, and burnt part of them, for all the people fled, they being traders and without a garrison.'—Correa, iii. 277.

1533.—'Thence he proceeded to the bar of the river Tapti; above which stood two cities the most notable on that gulf. The first they call Surat. 3 leagues from the mouth, and the other Reiner, on the opposite side of the river and half a league from the bank. The latter was the most sumptuous in buildings and civilization, inhabited by warlike people, all of them Moors inured to maritime war, and it was from there that the fort of the foils and ships of the King of Cambay's fleet were furnished. Surat again was inhabited by an unwarlike people whom they call Banyans, folk given to mechanic crafts, chiefly to the business of weaving cotton cloths.'—Barroso, iv. iv. 8.

1554.—'So saying they quitted their rowing-benches, got ashore, and started for Surat.'—Sidé, 'Atlas,' p. 89.

1573.—'Next day the Emperor went to inspect the fortress. . . During his inspection some large mortars and guns attracted his attention. Those mortars bore the name of Sulaimán, from the name of Sulaimán Sultan of Turkey. When he made his attempt to conquer the ports of Gujarât, he sent these . . . with a large army by sea. As the Turks . . . were obliged to return, they left these mortars. . . . The mortars remained upon the sea-shore, until Khudkhwâd Khán built the fort of Surat, when he placed them in the fort. The one which he left in the country of Surat was taken to the fort of Junâgârî by the ruler of that country.'—Tabakât-i-Ikhârî, in Elliot, v. 350.

c. 1590.—'Surat is among famous ports. The river Tapti runs hard by, and at seven coss distance joins the salt sea. Bânsâr on the other side of the river is now a port dependent on Surat, but was formerly a big city. The ports of Khandevâl and Balsâr are also annexed to Surat. Fruit, and especially the ananás, is abundant. . . . The sectaries of Zardaât, emigrant from Fârs, have made their dwelling here; they reverse the names of Páshâ and Pàshand and erect their darûkhâs (or places for exposing the dead). . . . Through the carelessness of the agents of Government and the commandants of the troops (sipah-saldrâns, Pipah Sela), a considerable tract of this Sirkâr is at present in the hands of the Frank, e.g., Daman, Sanjân (St. John's), Tarâpâr, Mâhmîn, and Bussal (see (1) Bassin), that are both cities and forts.'—Add. orig. i. 488; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 249].

1638.—'Within a League of the Road we entred into the River upon which Surat is seated, and which hath on both sides a very fertile soil, and many fair gardens, with pleasant Country-houses, which being all white, a colour which it seems the Indians are much in love with, afford a noble prospect amidst the greenness whereby they are encompassed. But the River, which is the Tapti . . . is so shallow at the mouth of it, that Barks of 70 or 89 Ton can hardly come into it.'—Mandello, p. 12.

1690.—'Suratt is reckon'd the most famous Emporium of the Indian Empire, where all Commodities are vendible. . . . And the River is very commodious for the Importation of Foreign Goods, which are brought up to the City in Hoes and Yachts, and Country Boats.'—Ovington, 218.

1770.—'There is some report that he (Gen. Goddard) is gone to Bider-Souret . . . but the truth of this God knows.'—Seir Mutag, iii. 328.
Sūrath. more properly Sōrath, and Sōreh, n.p. This name is the legitimate modern form and representative of the ancient Indian Saurashtra and Greek Suvrāstrēnā, names which applied to what we now call the Kattywar Peninsula, but especially to the fertile plains on the sea-coast. ["Surashtra, the land of the Sūs, afterwards Sanskritized into Sau- rashtra and the Goodly Land, preserves its name in Sūrath the southern part of Kathiavāda. The name appears as Sūräthtra in the Mahābhārata and Pāṇini's Gągapañtha, in Rudradāman's (A.D. 150) and Skandagupta's (A.D. 456) Gīrindr inscriptions, and in several Valabhi copper-plates. Its Prākrit form appears as Sūrathā in the Nāṣik inscription of Gotamiputra (A.D. 150) and in later Prākrit as Sūrāsthā in the Tirthaka-patra of Jina-prabhāsuri of the 13th or 14th century. Its earliest foreign mention is perhaps Strabo's Σουρασθρα and Pliny's Orata (Bombay Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 6). The remarkable discovery of one of the great inscriptions of Asoka (c. 250) on a rock at Gīrindr, near Junāgarh in Saurashtra, shows that the dominion of that great sovereign, whose capital was at Pataliputra (Pālauṣṭhra) or Patna, extended to this distant shore. The application of the modern form Sūrath or Sōrath has varied in extent. It is now the name of one of the four prāvāla or districts into which the peninsula is divided for political purposes, each of these prāvāla containing a number of small States, and being partly managed, partly controlled by a Political Assistant. Sōrath occupies the south-western portion, embracing an area of 5,220 sq. miles.

Sulkunda. s. Hind. sulkandā, [Skt. sura, 'reed-grass,' kāňḍa, 'joint, section']. The name of a very tall reed-grass, Süccheraum Sūra, Roxb., perhaps also applied to Süccheraum procerus, Roxb. These grasses are often tall enough in the riverine plains of Eastern Bengal greatly to overtop a tall man standing in a not indigenous among them. And in fact when we turn to Oviedo, we find the following distinct statement:

* Mangalore (m.v.) on this coast, no doubt called Sūrathī Mangalor to distinguish it from the well-known Mangalor of Canara.

"Batatas are a staple food of the Indians, both in the Island of Spaynguola and in the others... and a ripe Batata properly dressed is just as good as a marchpane twist of sugar and almonds, and better indeed. ... When Batatas are well ripened, they are often carried to Spain, i.e., if the voyage be a quiet one; for if there be delay they get spoilt at sea. I myself have carried them from this city of S. Domingo to the city of Avila in Spain, and although they did not arrive as good as they should be, yet they were thought a great deal of, and reckoned a singular and precious kind of fruit."—In Ramsio, iii. f. 134.

It must be observed however that several distinct varieties are cultivated by the Pacific islanders even as far west as New Zealand. And Dr. Bretschneider is satisfied that the plant is described in Chinese books of the 3rd or 4th century, under the name of Ken-chu (the first syllable = 'sweet'). See B. on Chin. Botan. Words, p. 13. This is the only good argument we have seen for Asiatic origin. The whole matter is carefully dealt with by M. Alph. De Candolle (Origine des Plantes cultivées, pp. 43-45), concluding with the judgment: "Les motifs sont beaucoup plus forts, ce me semble, en faveur de l'origine américaine.

The "Sanskrit name" Raktuabo, alleged by Mr. Piddington, is worthless. Ata is properly an esculent Armo, but in modern use is the name of the common potato, and is sometimes used for the sweet potato. Raktalā, more commonly rāt-āla, is in Bengal the usual name of the Yam, no doubt given first to a highly-coloured kind, such as Dioscorea purpurea, for rāt- or rāt-āla means simply 'red potato': a name which might also be well applied to the batatas, as it is indeed, according to Forbes Watson, in the Deccan. There can be little doubt that this vegetable, or fruit as Oviedo calls it, having become known in Europe many years before the potato, the latter robbed it of its name, as has happened in the case of brazil-wood (q.v.). The batata is clearly the 'potato' of the fourth and others of the following quotations. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 117 seqq.]

1519. — "At this place (in Brazil) we had refreshment of victuals, like fowls and meat of calves, also a variety of fruits, called batata, pigna (pine-apples), sweet, of singular goodness."—Pigafetta, E.T. by Lord Stanley of A., p. 43.

1540. — "The root which among the Indians of Spaynguola Island is called Batata, the negroes of St. Thomé (C. Verde group) called Ignanay, and they plant it as the chief staple of their maintenance; it is of a black colour, i.e., the outer skin is so, but inside it is white, and as big as a large turnip, with many branchlets; it has the taste of a chestnut, but much better."—Voyage to the I. of San Tomé under the Equinoxial, Ramsio, i. 117f.

1558. — "Wee met with sixtice or seventeen styleds of Canoes full of Saunages, who came off to Sea vnto vs, and brought with them in their Boates. Plantans, Cocos, Potatoo-roetes, and fresh Bsh."—Voyage of Master Thomas Candish, Purchas, i. 66.

1609. — "The Batattas are somewhat redder of colour, and in forme almost like Indianno (see YAM), and taste like Earth-nuts."—In Purchas, ii. 95f.

1615. — "I took a garden this day, and planted it with Pottatos brought from the Liquea, a thing not yet planted in Japan. I must pay a ten, or 5 shillings sterling, per annum for the garden."—Cocks's Diary, i. 11.

1615. — "... pattate; c'est vne racine comme naumeux, mais plus longue et de couleur rouge et jaune: cela est de tres-bon goist, mais si l'on en mange souvent, elle degnoste fort, et est assez ventese."—Mocquet, Voyages, 83.

1764. — "There let Potatos mantle o'yer the ground, Sweet as the cane-juice is the root they bear."—Granger, Bl. iv.

SYCE. s. Hind. from Ar. sīs. A grooms. It is the word in universal use in the Bengal Presidency. In the South horse-keeper is more common, and in Bombay a vernacular form of the latter, viz. ghorawildi (see GORA-WALLAH). The Ar. verb, of which sīs is the participle, seems to be a loan-word from Syriac, suasti, 'to coax.'

[1759.—In list of servants' wages: "Syce, Rs. 2."—In Long, 182.]

1779. — "The bearer and scise, when they returned, came to the place where I was, and laid hold of Mr. Duarell. I took hold of Mr. Shee and carried him up. The bearer and scise took Mr. Duarell out. Mr. Keeble was standing on his own house looking, and asked, 'What is the matter?'}
The bearer and seise said to Mr. Keeble, 'These gentlemen came into the house when my master was out.'—Evidence on Trial of Grand c. Francis, in Echoes of Old Calcutta, 230.

SYCEE. s. In China applied to pure silver bullion in ingots, or shoes (q.v.). The origin of the name is said to be si (pron. at Canton sai and sei) = sz, i.e. 'fine silk'; and we are told by Mr. Giles that it is so called because, if pure, it may be drawn out into fine threads. [Linschoten (1598) speaks of; "Peecees of cut silver, in which sort they pay and receive all their money" (Hak. Soc. i. 132).]

1711.—"Formerly they used to sell for Sisee. or Silver full fine; but of late the Method is alter'd.'—Lockyer, 135.

SYRAS, CYRUS. See under CYRUS.

SYRIAM. n.p. A place on the Pegu R., near its confluence with the Rangoon R., six miles E. of Rangoon, and very famous in the Portuguese dealings with Pegu. The Burmese form is Than-byang, but probably the Talaing name was nearer that which foreigners give it. [See Burmese Gazetteer, ii. 672. Mr. St John (J. R. As. Soc., 1894, p. 151) suggests the Mian word surang or siring, 'a swinging cradle.'] Syrian was the site of an English factory in the 17th century, of the history of which little is known. See the quotation from Dalrymple below.

1587.—"To Cirion a Port of Pegu come ships from Meeca with wollen Cloath, Scarletts, Velvets, Opium, and such like.'—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 383.

1600.—"I went thither with Philip Brito, and in fiftene days arrived at Sirian the chief Port in Pegu. It is a lamentable spectacle to see the bankes of the Rivers set with infinite fruit-bearing trees, now over-whelmed with ruins of gilded Temples, and noble edifices; the ways and fields full of skulls and bones of wretched Peguans, killed or famished, and cast into the River in such numbers that the multitude of corpses prohibiteth the way and passage of ships.'—The Jesuit Andrea Boes, in Purchas ii. 1748.

c. 1606.—"Philip de Brito issued an order that a custom-house should be planted at Serian (Serito), at which duties should be paid by all the vessels of this State which went to trade with the kingdom, of Pegu, and with the ports of Martavan, Tavay, Tenasserim, and Junacol. . . Now certain merchants and shipowners from the Coast of Coromandel refused obedience, and this led Philip de Brito to send a squadron of 6 ships and galliots with an imposing and excellent force of soldiers on board, that they might cruise on the coast of Tenasserim, and compel all the vessels that they met to come and pay duty at the fortress of Serian.'—Leurre, 135.

1695.—"9th. That the Old house and Ground at Syriah, formerly belonging to the English Company, may still be continued to them, and that they have liberty of building dwelling-houses, and watch-houses, for the securing their Goods, as shall be necessary, and that more Ground be given them, in what they formerly had not sufficient.' Petition presented to the K. of Burma at Ava, by Ed. Fleetwood: in Dalrymple, O.R. ii. 371.

1726.—Zierjhang (Syrian) in Volatija, Chora., &c. 127.

1727.—"About 60 Miles to the Eastward of China Backaar (see CHINA-BUCKEER) is the Bar of Syriah, the only port now open for Trade in all the Pegu Dominions. . . . It was many Years in Possession of the Portuguese, till by their Insolence and Pride they were obliged to quit it.'—J. Hamilton, ii. 31-32; [ed. 1714].

SYUD. s. Ar. saiyid, 'a lord.' The designation in India of those who claim to be descendants of Mahommed. But the usage of SAIYID and SHARIF varies in different parts of Mahommedan Asia. ["As a rule (much disputed) the SAIYID is a descendant from Mahommed through his grandchild Hasan, and is a man of the pen; whereas the SHARIF derives from Husayn and is a man of the sword" (Burton, Ar. Nights, iv. 209)].

1401.—"On this day the Lord played at chess, for a great while, with certain Zaytes; and Zaytes they call certain men who come of the lineage of Mahomad.'—Chiriqja, § cxiv. (Markham, p. 141-2).

1869.—"Il y a dans l'Inde quatre classes de musulmans : les SAIYIDS ou descendants de Mahomet par Huçain, les Schokiks ou Arabes, nonmens vulgairement Maures, les Pathans ou Afans, et les Mogols. Ces quatre classes ont chacune lour défens, a religion de saints personnages, qui sont souvent designés par ces dénominations, et par d'autres spécialement consacrées a chacune d'elles, telles que Mir pour les SAIYIDS, Kheda pour les Pathans, Miya, Beg, Aga, et Khorja pour les Mogols."—Garcia de Tassy, Religion Mus. dans l'Inde, 22.
(The learned author is mistaken here in supposing that the obsolete term Moor was in India specially applied to Arabs. It was applied, following Portuguese custom, to all Mahomedans.)

TABASHEER. s. 'Sugar of Bamboo.' A siliceous substance sometimes found in the joints of the bamboo, formerly prized as medicine, [also known in India as Bansbahan or Banskapur]. The word is Pers. tabisheer, but that is from the Skt. name of the article, takkshira, and tavakkshira. The substance is often confounded, in name at least, by the old Materia Medica writers, with spodium and is sometimes called topodio de cuna. See Ces. Federici below. Garcia De Orta goes at length into this subject (f. 193 seqq.). [See SUGAR.]

c. 1150.—"Tanah (miswritten Bunah) est une jolie ville située sur un grand golfe ... Dans les montagnes environnantes croissent le ... kana et le ... tabahir. Quant au tebahir, on le fabrique en le mélangeant avec de la cendre d'ivoire; mais le véritable est celui qu'on extrait des racines du roseau dit ... al Nharki."—Edrizi, f. 175a.

1563.—"And much less are the roots of the cane tabaxer; so that according to both the translations Avicena is wrong; and Averois says that it is charcoal from burning the canes of India, whence it appears that he never saw it, since he calls such a white substance charcoal."—Garcia, f. 155c.

c. 1570.—"Il sporio si congela d'acqua in alcune canne, e io n'ho trovato assai nel Persia quando faccvo fabricar la mia casa."—Ces. Federici, in Rumianio, III. 387.

1578.—"The Spodium or Tabaxir of the Persians ... was not known to the Greeks."—Acosta, 295.

c. 1580.—"Spodium Tabaxir vocant, quo nomine vulgo pharmacopoeo Spodium facitium, quippe metallicum, intelligunt. At eruditosque viri ex nomine lacrymam quandam, ex cædici arbore procerae in India nascentis, albeantem, odoratam, facultatis refrigeratoriae, et cor maxime roborantis itidem intelligunt."—Prosper Alpinus, Recum Egyptiarum, Lib. III. vii.

1598.—"... these Mahabo have a certain Matter within them, which is (as it were) the pith of it ... the Indians call it Saccar Mahabo, which is as much as to say, as Sugar of Mahabo, and is a very deep Medicinal thing much esteemed, and much sought for by the Arabian, Persians, and Moores, that call it Tabaxiar."—Lin-schoten, p. 104; [Hak. Soc. ii. 56].

1587.—"Allied to these in a botanical point of view is Saccarum officinarum, which has needlessly been supposed not to have yielded saccarum, or the substance known by this name to the ancients; the same authors conjecturing this to be Tabasheer. ... Considering that this substance is pure saccharum, it is not likely to have been arranged with the honeys and described under the head of Saccarum officinarum."—Boute on the Art. of Indian Medicine, p. 83. This confirms the views expressed in the article SUGAR.

1551.—"In the cavity of these cylinders water is sometimes secreted, or, less commonly, an opaque white substance, becoming opaline when wetted, consisting of a flinty secretion, of which the plant divests itself, called Tabasheer, concerning the optical properties of which Sir David Brewster has made some curious discoveries."—Engl. Cyc. Nat. Hist. Section, article Bamboo.

TABBY. s. Not Anglo-Indian. A kind of watered silk stuff; Sp. and Port. tabi, Ital. tabino, Fr. tabis, from Ar. 'attabi, the name said to have been given to such stuffs from their being manufactured in early times in a quarter of Baghdad called al'attabiyah; and this derived its name from a prince of the 'Omaityad family called Attab. [See Burton, Ar. Nights, ii. 371.]

12th cent.—"The *Attabiyah . . . here are made the stuffs, called Attabiyah, which are silks and cottons of divers colours;"—Ibn Jobair, p. 227.

[c. 1220.—"Attabi. See under SUG-

LAT.]

TABOOT. s. The name applied in India to a kind of shrine, or model of a Mahomedan mausoleum, of flimsy material, intended to represent the tomb of Husain at Kerbela, which is carried in procession during the Moharrum (see Herklots, 2nd ed. 119 seqq.), and Garcin de Tassy, Rel. Musulm., dans l'Inde, 36). [The word is Ar. tabat, 'a wooden box, coffin.' The term used in N. India is taziya (see TAZEA.).]

[1856.—"There is generally over the vault in which the corpse is deposited an oblong monument of stone or brick (called tarkoebh or *wood (in which case it is called taboot)."—Lace, Med. Egypt., 5th ed. i. 298.]

[TACK-RAVAN, s. A litter carried on men's shoulders, used only by royal personages. It is Pers. takht-ravan, 'travelling-throne.' In the Hindi of Behar the word is corrupted into tartarwaon.

[c. 1669.—"... several articles of Chinese and Japan workmanship; among which were a platey and a tack-ravan, or travelling throne, of exquisite beauty, and much admired."—Bernier, ed. Constant, 128; in 370, tact-ravan.

[1758.—"Mahommed Shah, emperor of Hindostan, seated in a royal litter (takht revan, which signifies a moving throne) issued from his camp. ..."—Howroyd, iv. 169.]

TAELE. s. This is the trade-name of the Chinese ounce, viz., ⅓ of a catty (q.v.); and also of the Chinese money of account, often called "the ounce of silver," but in Chinese called liang. The standard liang or tael is, according to Dr. Wells Williams, 573-84 grs. troy. It was formerly equivalent to a string of 1000 tsien, or (according to the trade-name) cash (q.v.). The China tael used to be reckoned as worth 6s. 8d., but the rate really varied with the price of silver. In 1879 an article in the Fortnightly Review puts it at 5s. 7½d. (Sept. p. 362); the exchange at Shanghai in London by telegraphic transfer, April 13, 1855, was 4s. 9½d.; [on Oct. 3, 1901, 2s. 7½d.]. The word was apparently got from the Malays, among whom tail or tahil is the name of a weight; and this again, as Crawfurd indicates, is probably from the India tala (q.v.). [Mr. Pringle writes: "Sir H. Yule does not refer to such forms as tala (see below), tailes (plural in Fryer's New Account, p. 210, sub Machao), Taye (see quotation below from Saris), tyazes (see quotation below from Mocquet), or teay, and taeyes (Philip's translation of Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 149). These probably come through the medium of the Portuguese, in which the final l of the singular tael is changed into s in the plural. Such a form as taes might easily suggest a singular wanting the final s, and from such a singular French and English plurals of the ordinary type would in turn be fashioned" (Diary Ft. St. Geo., 1st ser. ii. 126).]

The Chinese scale of weight, with their trade-names, runs: 16 taels = 1 catty, 100 catties = 1 pecul = 133½ lbs. avoird. Millburn gives the weights of Achin as 4 copangs (see KOPANG) = 1 mace. 5 mace = 1 myam, 16 myam = 1 tale (see TAELE), 5 tales = 1 bunwal, 20 bunwaals = 1 catty, 200 catties = 1 bahar; and the catty of Achin as = 2 lbs. 1 oz. 13 dr. Of these names, mace, tale and bahar (q.v.) seem to be of Indian origin, myam, bangal, and kati Malay.

1540.—"And those three junks which were then taken, according to the assertion of those who were aboard, had contained in silver alone 200,000 taels (taels), which are in our money 300,000 cruzados, besides much else of value with which they were freighted."—Pinto, cap. xxxv.

1598.—"A Tael is a full ounce and a half Portingale weight."—Linschoten, 41; [Hak. Soc. i, 119].

1601.—"Est et pommier genus, quod Tael vocant in Malacaen. Tael unam in Malacaen pendent 16 masas."—Dr. Brig, li. 61.

... "Four hundred cashes make a corper (see KOBANG). Fouro are one mas. Fouro oxasses make a Pardao (see PARDAO). Four Pardao make a Tayel."—Coept. T. Daclos, in Purchas, i. 128.

c. 1608.—"Bezar stones are thus bought by the Taile ... which is one Ounce, and the third part English."—Naris, in do., 392.

1613.—"A Taye is five shillinge sterling."—Naris, in do. 593.

1613.—"Les Portugais sont fort desirous de ces Chinois pour esclaves ... il y a des Chinois faicts a ce mestier ... quand ils voyent quelque beau petit garçon on file ... les enlevent par force et les cachent ... puis viennent sur la rine de la mer, ou ils se warrant que sont les trafiquans a qui ils les vendent 12 et 15 tayes chacun, qui est environ 25 escus."—Moquet, 312.

c. 1656.—"Vn Religion Xhinois qui a esté surpris auec des femmes de dalchaeu ... on a pere le col avec vn fer chaud; a ce fer est attaché vn chaine de fer d'environ dix brasses qu'il est oblige de traîner jusques a ce qu'il nait apporté au Couuent trente theysis d'argent qu'il faut qu'il amasse en demandant l'auomse."—In Thevenot, Divers Voyages, ii. 67.

[1683. —"The above said Musk wayes Cattee 10: taehe 11: Mas 03: ...."—Pringle, Diary Ft. St. Geo., 1st ser. ii. 31.]

TAHELDEAR, s. The chief (native) revenue officer of a subdivision (tala, conf. Pergunnah, Talook) of a district (see ZILLAH). Hind, from Pers. tahsilidar, and that from Ar. tasal, ‘collection.’ This is a term of the Mahonnemon administration which we have adopted. It appears by the quotation from Williamson that the term was formerly employed in Calcutta to designate the cash-keeper in a firm or private establishment, but this use is long obsolete.

TALAOING.

[Possibly there was a confusion with takaeldar, 'a cashier.']

[1772.—"Tahaeldar, or Suzzned, an collect the revenues."—Glossary, in Verbr.

View of Bengal, s.v.]

1799.—"... He (Tippoo) divided his lector or T. Hussein there."—Pandu-durang Hari, ed. 1833, i. 155.]

TALOOR-BIRD. s. This bird is so called from the fact that it is in the habit of drawing together "one leaf or more, generally two leaves on each side of the nest, and stitches them together with cotton, either woven by itself, or cotton thread picked up; and after putting the thread through the leaf, it makes a knot at the end to fix it" (Jordan). It is Orthotomus longicauda, Gmelin (sub-ram. Dryg. moicinicus).

[1813.—"Equally curious in the structure of its nest, and far superior to the baya in the variety and elegance of its plumage, is the telor-bird of Hindostan. There follows a description of its nest."—Perks, on Mem., 2nd ed. i. 83.]

1883.—"Clear and loud above all... sounds the to-wheel, to-wheel, to-wheel of the telor-bird, a most plain-looking little greenish thing, but a skilful workman and a very Beaconsfield in the matter of keeping its own counsel. Aided by its industrios-souse, it will, when the monsoon comes on, spin cotton, or steal thread from the durzea, and sew together two broad leaves of the laurel in the pot on your very doorstep, and when it has warmly lined the bag so formed it will bring up therein a large family of little talkers."—Tales on My Frontier, 145.

TAJ. s. Pers. taj, 'a crown.' The most famous and beautiful mausoleum in Asia; the TAJ MAHAL at Agra, erected by Shah Jahan over the burial-place of his favourite wife Mumtaz-i-Mahal ("Ornament of the Palace") Babur Begam.

1663.—"I shall not stay to discourse of the Monument of Ekhari, because whatever beauty is there, is found in a far higher degree in that of Taj Mehal, which I am now going to describe to you... judge whether I had reason to say that the Mausoleum, or Tomb of Taj-Mehal, is something worthy to be admired. For my part I do not yet well know, whether I am somewhat infected still with Indianism; but I must needs say, that I believe it ought to be reckoned amongst the Wonders of the World."—Bertrand, E.T. 91-95; [ed.
Constable, 268.]

1665.—"Of all the Monuments that are to be seen at Agra, that of the Wife of Cha-Jehan is the most magnificent; she caus'd it to be set up on purpose near the Tusi-man, to which all strangers must come, that they should admire it. The Tusi-man ("Taj-i-mukâm, 'Place of the Taj') is a great Bazar, or Market-place, comprised of six great courts, all encompass'd with Porticos; under which there are Warehouses for Merchants. The monument of this Bazar, or Sultaness, stands on the East side of the City... I saw the beginning and com pleating of this great work, that cost two and twenty years labour, and 20,000 men always at work."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 50;
[ed. Ball, i. 169.]

1856.—"But far beyond compare, the glorious Taj, seen from old Agra's towering battlements, and mirrored clear in Jumma's silent stream.
Sun-lighted, like a pearly diadem
Set royal on the melancholy brow Of withered Hindostan; but, when the moon
Dins the white marble with a softer light, Like some quenched maiden, veiled in dainty lace.
And waiting for her bridegroom, stately, pale.
But yet transcendent in her loveliness."
The Bengal Tree.

TALAING. n.p. The name by which the chief race inhabiting Pegu (or the Delta of the Irrawadi) is known to the Burmese. The Talaings were long the rivals of the Burmese, alternately conquering and conquered, but the Burmese have, on the whole, so long predominated, even in the Delta, that the use of the Talaing language is now nearly extinct in Pegu proper, though it is still spoken in Martaban, and among the descendants of emigrants into Siamese territory. We have adopted the name from the Burmese to designate the race, but their own name for their people is Myn or Mian (see MONE).

Sir Arthur Phayre has regarded the name Talaing as almost undoubtedly a form of Telinga. The reasons given are plausible, and may be briefly stated in two extracts from his Essay On the History of Pegu (J. As. Soc. Beng., vol. xlii. Pt. i.): "The names given in the histories of Thahtun and Pegu to the first Kings of those cities are Indian; but they cannot be accepted as historically true. The countries from which the Kings are said to have derived their origin... may be recognised as Karnāta, Kalinga, Venga and Vizianagaram... probably mistaken for the more famous Vijayanagar. The word Talingana never occurs in the Pegman histories, but only the more ancient name Kalinga" (op. cit. pp. 32-33). The early settlement of a colony or city for trade, on the coast of Rūmānya by settlers from Talingana, satisfactorily accounts for the name Talain, by which the people of Pegu are known to the Burmese and all peoples of the west. But the Pegmans call themselves by a different name... Mun, Muan, or Mon" (ibid. p. 34).

Prof. Forchhammer, however, who has lately devoted much labour to the study of Talain, archaeology and literature, entirely rejects this view. He states that prior to the time of Alompra's conquest of Pegu (middle of 18th century) the name Talain was entirely unknown as an appellation of the Muns, and that it nowhere occurs in either inscriptions or older palm-leaves, and that by all nations of Further India the people in question is known by names related to either Mun or Pegu. He goes on: "The word 'Talain' is the term by which the Muns acknowledged their total defeat, their being vanquished and the slaves of their Burmese conqueror. They were no longer to bear the name of Muns or Peguans. Alompra stigmatized them with an appellation suggestive at once of their submission and disgrace. Talain means" (in the Mun language) "'one who is trodden under foot, a slave'... Alompra could not have devised more effective means to extirpate the national consciousness of a people than by burning their books, forbidding the use of their language, and by substituting a term of abject reproach for the name under which they had maintained themselves for nearly 2000 years in the marine provinces of Burma. The similarity of the two words 'Talain' and 'Telunga' is purely accidental; and all deductions, historical or etymological... from the resemblance... must necessarily be void ab initio" (Notes on Early Hist. and Geog. of Br. Burma, Pt. ii. pp. 11-12, Rangoon, 1884).

Here we leave the question. It is not clear whether Prof. F. gives the story of Alompra as a historical fact, or as a probable explanation founded on the etymology. Till this be clear we cannot say that we are altogether satisfied. But the fact that we have been unable to find any occurrence of Talain earlier than Symes's narrative is in favour of his view.

Of the relics of Talain literature almost nothing is known. Much is to be hoped from the studies of Prof. Forchhammer himself.

There are linguistic reasons for connecting the Talain or Mun people with the so-called Kolarian tribes of the interior of India, but the point is not yet a settled one. [Mr. Baines notes coincidences between the Mon and Munda languages, and accepts the connection of Talain with Telinga (Census Report, 1891, i. p. 128).]

1795.—"The present King of the Birman... has abrogated some severe penal laws imposed by his predecessors on the Talien, or native Peguans. Justice is now impartially distributed, and the only distinction at present between a Birman and a Talien, consists in the exclusion of the latter from places of public trust and power."—Symes, 183.

TALAPOIN. s. A word used by the Portuguese, and after them by French and other Continental writers, as well as by some English travellers of the 17th century, to designate the Buddhist monks of Ceylon and the Indo-Chinese countries. The origin of the expression is obscure. Monseigneur Pallegoix, in his Desc. du Royaume That ou Siam (ii. 23) says: "Les Européens les ont appelés talapoins, probablement du nom de l'éventail qu'ils tiennent à la main, lequel s'appelle talapout, qui signifie feuille de palmier." Childers gives Talapouvna, Pali, "a leaf used in writing, &c." This at first sight seems to have nothing to support it except similarity of sound; but the quotations from Pinto throw some possible light, and afford probability to this origin, which is also accepted by Koeppen (Rel. des Buddhäs, i. 331 note), and by Bishop Bigandet (J. Ind. Archip. iv. 220). [Others, however, derive it from Peguan Talapoin, tala (not tīla), 'lord,' pōin, 'wealth.']

c. 1554.—"... hūa procissō... na qual se asfirmou... que híou quarenta mil Saecerdotēs... dos quae muitos tinham dife-rentes dignidades, como eriō Grepōs (!), Talagrepōs, Rotina, Ne-pois, Bicas, Sco reveres e Chanjaranhos, os quae todas pelas vesti-duras, de que híou ornados, e pelas di-cas, e azunias, que levarão nos nósos, se conhecendo, quae será húno, e quae erião outros."—F. M. Pinto, ch. exx. Thus rendered by Cogan:

A Procession... it was the common opinion of all, that in this Procession were 40,000 Priests... most of them were of different dignities, and called Grepes. Talagrepo ( Ven.). Now by the ornaments they wear, as also by the devices and ensigns which they carry in their hands, they may be distinguished."—p. 218.

1759.—"When asked if they believed the existence of any Superior Being, they ite Carinners (Carensl) replied that the Bāragnahms and Pegu Tālapoines told them so."—Letter in Dicyclopium, Or. Rep. i. 100.

1818.—"A certain priest or Tālapoi conceived an inordinate affection for a garment of an elegant shape, which he possessed, and which he diligently preserved to prevent its wearing out. He died without correcting his irregular affection, and immediately becoming a house, took up his abode in his favourite garment."—Sangermann, p. 20.

1850.—"The Phoongies (Pongees), or Buddhist Monks, sometimes called Tālapoins, a name given to them, and introduced into Europe by the Ibnnes, who, in their carrying a fan formed of talapoit-palm, or palm-leaves."—Naty. Rec., Feb. 21, p. 296, quoting Rp. Bigandet.

TALEE. s. Tan. tali. A small trinket of gold which is fastened by a string round the neck of a married woman in S. India. It may be a curious question whether the word may not be an adaptation from the Ar. talīḥ, "qui signifie proprement: prononcer la formule lā ilāhu ista 'inā... ." Cette formule, écrite sur un morceau de papier, servit d'annuo-llette... le tout était renfermé dans un étui auquel on donnait le nom de talīḥ" (Decq & Engelmann, 346). These Mahommedan talīḥes were worn by a band, and were the origin of the Sp. word talī, "a baldric." [But the talī is a Hindu, not a Mahommedan ornament, and there seems no doubt that it takes its name from Skt. tala, 'the palmyn' (see TALIARPOT), it being the original garment worn by men to wear this leaf dipped in saffron-water (Mad. Gloss, s.v. Logan, Malabar, i. 134.) The Indian word appears to occur first in Abraham Rogers, but the custom is alluded to by early writers, e.g. Gouvea, Synodo, i. 43c.

1651. — "So the Bridegroom takes this Tali, and ties it round the neck of his bride."—Rogers, 15.

1672. — "Among some of the Christians there is also an evil custom, that they for the greater tightening and fast-making of the marriage band, allow the Bridegroom to tie a Tali or little band round the Bride's neck; although in my time this was as much as possible denounced, seeing that it is a custom derived from Heathenism."—Balthasar, Zeylon (German), 498.

1674. — "The bridegroom attaches to the neck of the bride a line from which hang three little pieces of gold in honour of the three gods; and this they call Tale; and it is the sign of being a married woman."—Faria y Sousa, Asia Port., ii. 707.

1704. — "Practerea, quum moris hujs Regionis sit, ut infantes sex vel septem annorum, interdum etiam in teneoriis acetate, ex genuitorum consensu, matrimonio indissolubile de praestanti contrahant, per impositionem Tali, sua aureae tesserae nuptialis, uxorico collo pensilis; missionariorum mandamus ne hujsmodi irrita matrimonia inter Christianos fieri permittant."—Preces of Carl, Toucham, in Neubert, Mem. 11. Hist. i. 155.

1726. — "And on the betrothal day the Tali, or bride's betrothal band, is tied round her neck by the Bramin, and this she must not untie in her husband's life."—Valentine, Charo. 51.

1813. — "... the tali, which is a ribbon with a gold head hanging to it, is held ready; and, being shown to the company, some prayers and blessings are pronounced; after which the bridegroom takes it, and hangs it about the bride's neck."—Parke, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 312.

TALIARPOT, TARRYAR. s. A watchman (S. India). Tam. talaiyirai, [from talai, 'head,' a chief watchman].

1860. — "The Peons and Tarryars sent in quest of two soldiers who had deserted... returned with answer that they could not light of them, whereas upon the Peons were turned out of service, but upon Verona's intercession were taken in again and fined each one month's pay, and to repay the money paid them for Batte (see Batta); also the Pedda Naigu was fined in like manner for his Tarryars."—Fort St. Geo. Comms., Feb. 18, In Notes and Exts., Madras, 1873, No. 111. p. 3.

1693. — "Taliars and Peons appointed to watch the Black Town..."—In Wheeler, i. 297.

1707. — "Resolving to march 250 soldiers, 200 taliars, and 200 peons."—Ibid. ii. 74.

[1800. — "In every village a particular officer, called Taliari, keeps watch at night, and is answerable for all that may be stolen."—Beckham, Mysore, i. 3.]

TALIARPOT, s. The great-leaved fan-palm of S. India and Ceylon, Coryphap umbraculifera, L. The name, from Skt. tala-pattra, Hind. tali, 'leaf of the tala tree,' properly applies to the leaf of such a tree, or to the smaller leaf of the palm tree (Borassus flabelliformis), used for many purposes, e.g. for slips to write on, to make fans and umbrellas, &c. See OLLAH, PALMYRA, TALAPOIN. Sometimes we find the word used for an umbrella, but this is not common. The quotation from Jordanus, though using no name, refers to this tree. [Arrian says: "These trees were called in Indian speech tala, and there grew on them, as there grows at the tops of the palm-trees, a fruit resembling balls of wool" (Indika, vii.).]

c. 1328. — "In this India are certain trees which have leaves so big that five or six men can very well stand under the shade of one of them."—Fr. Jordanus, 29-30.

c. 1430. — "These leaves are used in this country, for writing upon instead of paper, and in rainy weather are carried on the head as a covering, to keep off the wet. Three or four persons travelling together can be covered by one of these leaves stretched out." And again: "There is also a tree called tal, the leaves of which are extremely large, and upon which they write."—N. Cant, in India in the XV. Cent., 7 and 13.

1672. — "Talpets or sunshades."—Bolduwes, Dutch ed., 102.

e. 1681. — "There are three other trees that must not be omitted. The first is Taliarpot..."—Knox, 15.

e. 1683. — "They (the priests) have the honour of carrying the Taliarpot with the broad end over their heads foremost; which none but the King does."—Ibid. 74. [See TALAPOIN.]

1803. — "The taliarpot tree... affords a prodigious leaf, impenetrable to sun or rain, and large enough to shelter ten men. It is a natural umbrella, and is of as eminent service in that country as a great-cane tree would be in this. A leaf of the taliarpot-tree is a tent to the soldier, a parasol to the traveller, and a book to the scholar."—Sydney Smith, Works, 3rd ed. iii. 15.
1874.— "... dans les embrasures ... s'étaient des bananiers, des talipots."

- Franz, Souvenirs d'un Cosaque, ch. iv.

1881.— "The lofty head of the talipot palm ... the proud queen of the tribe in Ceylon, towers above the scrub on every side. Its trunk is perfectly straight and white, like a slender marble column, and often more than 100 feet high. Each of the fans that compose the crown of leaves covers a semi-circle of from 12 to 16 feet radius, a surface of 150 to 200 square feet."—Hawke's Visit to Ceylon, E.T. p. 129.

TALISMAN. s. This word is used by many medieval and post-medieval writers for what we should now call a moollah, or the like, a member of the Mahomedan clergy, so to call them. It is doubtless the corruption of some Ar. term, but of what it is not easy to say. Qu. talima, 'disciples, students'?

[See Burton, Ar. Nights, ix. 165.] On this Prof. Robertson Smith writes: "I have got some fresh light on your Talisman.

"W. Bedwell, the father of English Arabists, in his Catalogue of the Chapters of the Turkish Alcoran, published (1615) along with the Mahomedis Impostures, and Arabian Tracts, has the following, quoted from Postellus de Orbis Concordia, i. 13: "Hæc precatio (the fitba) illis est communes ad nobis dominica; et ita quibusdam ad battalogiam usque recitatur ut euntis idem, aut duo aut tria vocabula repetant dicendo, Alhamdu libbik, hamda libbik, hamda libbik, et eateria ejus vocabula eodem modo. Idque facit in publica oratione Taalima, id est sicutculus, pro his qui negligenter orant ut aiunt, ut ea repititione suppleat eorum erroribus ... Quidam medio in campo tam assidui, ut defessi consiliant; alii circumgirando corpus; etc.

"Here then we have a form without the s, and one which from the vowels seem to be tilm, 'a very learned man.' This, owing to the influence of the guttural, would sound in modern pronunciation nearly as Taalima. At the same time tilm is not the name of an office, and prayers on behalf of others can be undertaken by any one who receives a mandate, and is paid for them; so it is very possible that Postellus, who was an Arabic scholar, made the pointing suit his idea of the word meant, and that the real word is talami, a shortened form, recognised by Jawhari, and other lexicographers, of talamidh, 'disciples.' That students should turn a penny by saving prayers for others is very natural." This, therefore, confirms our conjecture of the origin.

1893.— "They treated me civilly, and set me in front of their mosque during their Easter; at which mosque, on account of its being their Easter, there were assembled from divers quarters a number of their Custodi, i.e. of their bishops, and of their Talismani, i.e. of their priests."—Letter of Friar Paschal, in Cathly, &c., p. 255.

1471.— "In questa città è una fossa d'acqua nel modo di una fontana, la qual è guardata da quelli suoi Thalassimani, cioè preti; quest' acqua dicono che ha gran vertù contro la lebra, e contra le canalette."

TAŁOOk, s. This word, Ar. ta'ALLUK, from root 'elak, 'to hang or depend,' has various shades of meaning in different parts of India. In S. and W. India it is the subdivision of a district, presided over as regards revenue matters by a tāhseeīdar. In Bengal it is applied to tracts of pro-cerminy land, sometimes not easily distinguished from Zeminandis, and sometimes subordinate to or dependent on Zemindars. In the N.W. Prov. and Oudh the ta'Alluk is an estate the profits of which are divided between different proprietors, one being superior, the other inferior (see TAŁOOK-DAR). Ta'Alluk is also used in Hind.
for 'department' of administration.

1855.—"In October, 1779, the Ducca Council were greatly disturbed in their minds by the appearance amongst them of John Doe, who was then still in his prime.
One Chandermonee denounced to John Doe and his assigns certain lands in the per-gunnā Ballera... whereupon George H.L., by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, and so forth, commanded the Sheriff of Calcutta to give John Doe possession.
At this Mr. Shakespeare burst into fury, and in language which must have surprised John Doe, proposed 'that a sealed be appointed for the collection of Patparrab Talook, with directions to pay the same into Bullera cutcherry.'"—Sir J. Stephen, Nuncowar and Impy, ii. 159-60. A suzulch is 'an officer specially appointed to collect the revenue of an estate, from the management of which the owner or farmer has been removed."—(Wilson).

TAŁOOKDĀR, s. Hind. from Pers. ta'Allukdār, 'the holder of a ta'Alluk' (see TAŁOOK) in either of the senses of that word; i.e. either a Government officer collecting the revenue of a ta'Alluk (though in this sense it is probably now obsolete everywhere), or the holder of an estate so designated. The famous Tałookdārs of Oudh are large landowners, possessing both villages of which they are sole proprietors, and other villages, in which there are subordinate holders, in which the Tałookdar is only the superior proprietor (see Carnegie, Ka-chari Technicalities).

[1769.—"... intiemements are frequently employed by the Tałookdārs to augment the concourse to their lands."—World, View of Bengal, App. 233. In his Glossary he defines 'Tałookdar, the Zemmen-dar of a small district.']

TAMARIND. s. The pod of the tree which takes its name from that product, Tamarindus indica, L., N.O.
Leguminosae. It is a tree cultivated throughout India and Burma for the sake of the acid pulp of the pod, which is laxative and cooling, forming a most refreshing drink in fever. The tree is not believed by Dr. Brandis to be indigenous in India, but is supposed to be so in tropical Africa. The origin of the name is curious. It is Ar.
tamar-al-Hindi, 'date of India,' or perhaps rather in Persian form, tamar-ali-Hindi. It is possible that the original name may have been thamor,
'fruit' of India, rather than tamar,
'date.'

1295.—"When they have taken a merchant vessel, they force the merchants to swallow a stuff called Tamarindi, mixed in sea-water, which produces a violent purgation."—Marco Polo, 2nd ed., ii. 383.
1355.—"L'arbre appelé hammar, c'est à dire al-tamar-al-Hindi, est un arbre sauvage qui couvre les montagnes."— Maftūt-alfars, in App. xi. Ext. xiii. 175.
1563.—"It is called in Mahyar rod, and in Gujarat owbli, and this is the name they have among all the other people of this India; and the Arab calls it tamarindi, because tamar, as you well know, is our tamar, or, as the Castilians say, datil [i.e.
date], so that tamarindi are 'dates of India; and this was because the Arabs could not think of a name more appropriate on account of its having stones inside, and not because either the tree or the fruit had any resemblance."—Garcia, i. 200. ["Pari is the Malayul name; ambili is probably Hind. indi, Skt. anubh, 'the tamarind."

c. 1590. — "In febrisbus verò pestilentiibus, atque omnibus aliis ex patritiis, exurentibus, aquam, in qua multa coja Tamarindorum influsa fuerit cum exsaccharo elixibunt."—

1592. — "They have a great store of Tamarindos."—Castalina, by X.L. f. 94.

1598. — "Tamarinde is by the Egyptians called Jacraide (qui. dard-semben, "Our Lady's tree")"—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 121.]

1611. — "That wood which we cut for firewood did all hang brazed with cobs of greene fruit (as big as a Bean-coed in England) called Tamerim; it hath a very soueraine taste, and by the Apothecaries is hold good against the Scurvie."—N. Duvaton, in Purchas, i. 277.

[1623. — "Tamarinds, which the Indians call Rambha" (indi, as in quotation from Garcia above),—P. delle Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 92.]

1629. — "A singularly beautiful Tamarind tree (ever the most graceful, and amongst the most magnificent of trees). . . ."—Mon. of Col. Mountaine, 98.

1577. — "The natives have a saying that sleeping beneath the Date of Hind gives you feter, which you cure by sleeping under a vine tree (Melia azadirachta), the iliac of Persia."—Burton, Ned Reiated, i. 92. The vine (see NEEM) (per. Capt. Burton) is not the 'illic of Persia' (see BUCKYNE). The prejudice against encamping or sleeping under a tamarind tree is general in India. But, curiously, I. Fulgeo speaks of it as the practice of the Sinmese "to rest and play under the beneficent shade of the Tamarinds."—Iss. du Roquema Soo, Saam, i. 139.]

TAMARIND-FISH. s. This is an excellent zest, consisting, according to Dr. Balfour, of white pomfret, cut in transverse slices, and preserved in amarinds. The following is a note kindly given by the highest authority on Indian fish matters, Dr. Francis Day:

"My account of Tamarind fish is very short; but in my Fishes of Malabar as follows:

"'The best Tamarind fish is prepared from the Seer fish (see SEER-FISH), and from the Lutarche, known as Cockup in aletta; and a rather inferior quality from the Polyneus (or Roe-ball, to which genus the Mango-fish belongs), and the more common from any kind of fish.' The above refers to Malabar, and more especially to Kochin. Since I wrote my Fishes of Malabar I have made many inquiries as to Tamarind fish, and found that the white pomfret, where it is taken, appears to be the best for making the preparation."

TAMBERANEE. s. Malayul, tanharain, 'Lord; God, or King.' It is a title of honour among the Nairs, and is also assumed by Saiva monks in the Tamil countries. [The word is derived from Mal. tanam, 'one's own,' purain, 'lord.' The junior male members of the Malayali Raja's family, until they come of age, are called Tambain, and after that Tamburain. The female members are similarly styled Tambiatt and Tumbiratti (Logan, Malabar, iii. Gloss. s.v.).]

[c. 1610. — "They (the Nairs) call the King in their language Tambiraine, meaning "God."" —Pyrrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 357.]

TANA, TANNA, n.p. Thana, a town on the Island of Salsette on the strait ('River of Tana') dividing that island from the mainland and 20 m. N.E. of Bombay, and in the early Middle Ages the seat of a Hindu kingdom of the Konkan (see CONCAN), as well as a seaport of importance. It is still a small port, and is the chief town of the District which bears its name.

c. 1520. — "From Dhar southwards to the river Norbuda, nine: thence to Mahrats . . . eighteen: thence to Konkan, of which the capital is Tana, on the seashore, twenty-five parasangs."—Al-Birrul, in Elliot, i. 60.

[c. 1150. — "Tannah," miswritten Banah. See under TABASHER.]

1268. — "Tana is a great Kingdom lying towards the West . . . There is much traffic here, and many ships and merchants frequent the place."—Moro Polo, BK. III, ch. 27.

1221. — "After their blessed martyrdom, which occurred on the Thursday before Palm Sunday in Thana of India, I baptised about 90 persons in a certain city called Furacco, ten days' journey distant therefrom, and I have since baptised more than twenty, besides thirty-five who were baptised between Thana and Supara Supara."—Letter of Friar Jordanus, in Cathay, &c., 226.

c. 1232. — "And having thus embarked I passed over in 28 days to Tana, where for the faith of Christ four of our Minor Friars had suffered martyrdom . . . The land is under the dominion of the Saracens . . ."—Fr. Odoric, Ibid. i. 57-58.
TANA, THANA. s. A Police station. Hind. thana, thānd, [Skt. śhānā, 'a place of standing, a post']. From the quotation following it would seem that the term originally meant a fortified post, with its garrison, for the military occupation of the country; a meaning however closely allied to the present use.

c. 1610-50.—"Thānāh means a corps of cavalry, matchlockmen, and archers, stationed within an enclosure. Their duty is to guard the roads, to hold the places surrounding the Thānāh, and to despatch provisions (i.e., see RUSSUD) to the next Thānāh."—Priester, in JH, i. 315.

TANADAR, THANADAR. s. The chief of a police station (see TANA). Hind. thāndar. This word was adopted in a more military sense at an early date by the Portuguese, and is still in habitual use with us in the civil sense.

1516.—In a letter of 4th Feb. 1515 (i.e., 1516), the King Don Manolo constitutes João Machado to be Tanadar and captain of land forces in Goa.—Archiv. Port. Oriental, fise. 5, 1-3.

1519.—"Senhor Duarte Pereira; this is the manner in which you will exercise your office of Tannadar of this Isle of Teycarí (i.e., Goa), which the Senhor Capitão will now encharge you with."—Ibid. p. 35.

c. 1548.—"In Agnami is a great mosque (masulla), which is occupied by the tenadars, but which belongs to His Highness; and certain praegres, (yards?) in which bade (paddy) is collected, which also belong to His Highness."—Tanka in Subsidiae, 216.

1692.—"So all the force went aboard of the light boats, and the Governor in his bastard-galley entered the river with a grand clangour of music, and when he was in mid-channel there came to his galley a boat, in which was the Tanadar of the City (Dabad), and going aboard the galley presented himself to the Governor with much humility, and begged pardon of his offences. . . ."—Corto, iv. i. 9.

[1813.—"The third in succession was a Tandar; or petty officer of a district. . . ."]—Forber, Or. Miss. 2nd ed. ii. 5.

TANGA. s. Mahr. tānāk, Turki tanq. A denomination of coin which has been in use over a vast extent of territory, and has varied greatly in application. It is now chiefly used in Turkestan, where it is applied to a silver coin worth about 7/3d. And Mr. W. Erskine has stated that the word tanga or tanku is of Chagatai Turk origin, being derived from tāq, which in that language means 'white' (H. of Bohr and Hunayn, i. 546).

Though one must hesitate in differing from one usually so accurate, we must do so here. He refers to Josafa Barbaro, who says this, viz., that certain silver coins are called by the Mongolians tērūrī, by the Greeks aspērī, by the Turks awhī, and by the Zaga-tais tāq, all of which words in the respective languages signify 'white.' We do not however find such a word in the dictionaries of either Vambréy or of Pavet de Courteille;—the latter only having tāngāk, 'fer-blanc.' And the obvious derivation is the Skt. tankū, 'a weight (of silver) equal to 4 miskās ... a stamped coin.' The word in the forms tātkē (see TUCKA) and tankē (for these are apparently identical in origin) is, "in all dialects, laxly used for money in general" (Wilson).

In the Lahore coinage of Mahmud of Ghaznī, a.d. 418-419 (A.D. 1027-28), we find on the Skt. legend of the reverse the word tanka in correspondence with the dirham of the Arab obverse (see Thomas, Pathan Kings, p. 49). Tanka or Tanga seems to have continued to be the popular name of the chief silver coin of the Delhi sovereigns during the 13th and first part of the 14th centuries, a coin which was substantially the same with the rupee (q.v.) of later days. In fact this application of the word in the form tātē (see TUCKA) is usual in Bengal down to our own day. Ibn Batuta indeed, who was in India in the time of Mahommed Tughlak, 1333-1343 or thereabouts, always calls the gold coin then current a tanka or dinár of gold. It was, as he repeatedly states, the equivalent of 10 silver dinârs. These silver dinârs (or rupees) are called by the author of the Masâlîk-al-Abârî (c. 1340) the "silver tankâ of India." The gold and silver tankâ continue to be mentioned repeatedly in the history of Feroz Shah, the son of Mahommed (1351-1388), and apparently with the same value as before. At a later period under Sikandar Buhilol (1458-1517), we find black (or copper) tankâs, of which 20 went to the old silver tankâ.

We cannot say when the coin, or its name rather, first appeared in Turkestan.

But the name was also prevalent on the western coast of India as that of a low denomination of coin, as may be seen in the quotations from Linchoten and Grose. Indeed the name still survives in Goa as that of a copper coin equivalent to 60 reis or about 2d. And in the 16th century also 60 reis appears from the papers of Gerson da Cunha to have been the equivalent of the silver tankâ of Goa and Bassein, though all the equations that he gives suggest that the rei may have been more valuable then.

The denomination is also found in Russia under the form dengî. See a quotation under COPECK, and compare PARDÃO.

c. 1335.—"According to what I have heard from the Shaikh Mubarak, the red lâk (see LÁCK) contains 100,000 golden tankâs, and the white lâk 100,000 (silver tankâs). The golden tankâ, called in this country the red tankâ, is equivalent to three mihtkâlî, and the silver tankâ is equivalent to 8 hashtkânî dirhâms, this dirham being of the same weight as the silver dirham current in Egypt and Syria."—Masâlîk-al-Abârî, in Not. et Exts. xiii. 211.

c. 1340.—"Then I returned home after sunset and found the money at my house. There were 3 bags containing in all 2,283 tankâs, i.e. the equivalent of the 55,000 dinârs (of silver) which was the amount of my debts, and of the 12,000 which the sultan had previously ordered to be paid me, after of course deducting the tenth part according to Indian custom. The value of the piece called tankâ is 2½ dinârs in gold of Barbary."—Ibn Battûta, iii. 426. Here the gold tankâ is spoken of.)

c. 1370.—"Sultan Firoz issued several varieties of coins. There was the gold tankâ, and the silver tankâ." &c.—Târikh-i-Firoz Shahî, in Elliot, iii. 357.

1404.—"... vna sua moneda de plata que llaman Tangaes."—Clavijo, f. 498.

1516.—"... a round coin like ours, and with Moorish letters on both sides, and about the size of a fanam (see PANAM) of Calicut, ... and its worth 55 maravedis; they call these tanga, and they are of very fine silver."—Barbosa, 45.

[1519.—Rules regulating ferry-dues at Goa: they may demand for this one tamqua only.—Arcins, Port. Orient. fasc. 6, p. 18.]

c. 1541.—"Todar ... fixed first a golden akse (see ASHRAFEE) at the enormous remuneration for one stone, which induced the Râkâks to dock to him in such numbers that afterwards a stone was paid with a rupee, and this pay a stone fell to 5 tankâs, till the fortress (Rôhtâs) was completed."—Târikh-i-Khân-Jâkân Lodi, in Elliot, v. 115. (These are the Bahlûl or Sikandar tankâs of copper, as are also those in the next quotation from Elliot.)

1559.—"The old Muscovite money is not round but oblong or egg-shaped, and is called denga. ... 100 of these coins make a Hungarian gold-piece; the Dutch call them dengas and reckon them in thalers. In 1610 a thaler was worth 200 a ruble."—Herberstein, in Batavus, ii. f. 15r. 1571.—"Gujarati tankchahs at 100 tankchahs to the rupee. At the present time the rupee is fixed at 40 daim. ... As the current value of the tankchah of Pattan, etc., was less than that of Gujarât."—Mirâl-i-Ahmâdî, in Bayley, Gujarât, pp. 6, 11.

[1591.—"Dingoes." See under RUBLE.]
1592-3.—"At the present time, namely, A.H. 1002, Hindustan contains 3200 towns, and upon each town are dependent 200, 500, 1000, or 1500 villages. The whole yields a revenue of 640 drachms (see CRORE) murâdî tankâs."—Tabâkât-i-Abârî, in Elliot, v. 156.

1598.—"There is also a kind of reckoning of money which is called Tangaas, not that there is any such coined, but are so named only in telling. Five Tangaas is one Pardão see PARDÃO, or Kerpîn and badde money, for you must understand that in telling they have two kinds of money, good and badde, for four Tangaas good money are as much as five Tangaas badde money."—Linchoten, ch. 35; [Hak. TANK, s. A reservoir, an artificial pond or lake, made either by excavation or by damming. This is one of those perplexing words which seem to have a double origin, in this case one Indian, the other European.

As regards what appears to be the Indian word,820514 Shakespear gives: "Tānkt (in Guzerat), an underground reservoir for water." [And so Platts.] Wilson gives: "Tānken or tāken, Mahr. ... Tānkh (said to be Guzerath). A reservoir of water, an artificial pond, commonly known to Europeans in India as a Tank. Tānki, Guz. A reservoir of water; a small well." R. Drummond, in his Illustrations of Guzerat, &c., gives: "Tanke (Mah.) and Tankow (Guz.) Reservoirs, constructed of stone or brick or lime, of larger and lesser size, generally inside houses. ... They are almost entirely covered at top, having but a small aperture to let a pot or bucket down." ... "In the towns of Bikaner, says Tod, "most families have large cisterns or reservoirs called Tankas, filled by the rains" (Rajputana, ii. 202). Again, speaking of towns in the desert of Marwar, he says: "they collect the rain water in reservoirs called Tanka, which they are obliged to use sparingly, as it is said to produce night blindness" (ii. 300). Again, Dr. Spilsbury (J.A.S.B. ix. pt. 2, 891), describing a journey in the Nerbudda Basin, cites the word, and notes: "I first heard this word used by a native in the Betol district; on asking him if at the top of Bowergurth there was any spring, he said No, but there was a Tanka or place made of pukka (stone and cement) for holding water." Once more, in an Appendix to the Report of the Survey of India for 1881-1882, Mr. G. A. MacGill, speaking of the rain cisterns in the driest part of Rajputana, says: "These cisterns or wells are called 'by the people tankas' (App. p. 12). See also quotation below from a Report by Major Strahan. It is not easy to doubt the genuineness of the word, which may possibly be from Skt. tādāga, tatāga, tatāka, 'a pond, pool, or tank.'

Fr. Paolino, on the other hand, says the word tanka used by the Portuguese in India was Portoghese corrotta, which is vague. But in fact tanka is a word which appears in all Portuguese dictionaries, and which is used by authors so early after the opening of communication with India (we do not know if there is an instance actually earlier) that we can hardly conceive it to have been borrowed from an Indian language, nor indeed could it have been borrowed from Guzerat and Rajputana, to which the quotations above ascribe the vernacular word. This Portuguese word best suits, and accounts for that application of tank to large sheets of water which is habitual in India. The indigenous Guzerat and Maharatti word seems to belong rather to what we now call a tank in England; i.e. a small reservoir for a house or ship. Indeed the Port. tanka is no doubt a form of the Lat. stagnum, which gives It. stagno, Fr. old estang and esvon, mod. étang. Sp. estanque, a word which we have also in old English and in Lowland Scotch, thus:

"I never drank the Muses' tank, Castalia's burn and a' that: But there it streams, and richly reams, My Helicon I ca' that."—Burns.

It will be seen that Pyrard de Laval uses estang, as if specifically, for the tank of India.

1498. — "And many other saints were there painted on the walls of the church, and these wore diadems, and their portraiture was in a divers kind, for their teeth were so great that they stood an inch beyond the mouth, and every saint had 4 or 5 arms, and below the church stood a great tanka wrought in cut stone like many others that we had seen by the way."—Boiereiro de Vasco da Gama, 57.

"So the Captain Major ordered Nicolas Coelhio to go in an armed boat, and see where the water was, and he found in the said island (Anchediva) a building, a church of great ashar work which had been destroyed by the Moors, as the country people said, only the chapel had been covered with straw, and they used to make their prayers to three black stones which stood in the midst of the body of the chapel. Moreover they found just beyond the church a tanka of wrought ashlar in which we took as much water as we wanted; and at the top of the whole island stood a great tanka of the depth of 4 fathoms and more we found in front of the church a beach where we careened the ship Berrio."—Ibid. 55.

1510. — "Early in the morning these Pagans go to wash at a tank, which tank is a pond of still water (—ad uno Tanco ilquel Tancho è una fossa d'acqua morta)."—Varchema, 149.

"Near to Culicute there is a temple in the midst of a tank, that is, in the middle of a pond of water."—Ibid. 175.

1553. — "In this place where the King (Bahdadur Shah) established his line of battle, on one side there was a great river, and on the other a tank (tanque) of water, such as they are used to make in those parts. For as there are few streams to collect the winter's waters, they make these tanks (which might be more properly called lakes), all lined with stone. They are so big and many are more than a league in compass."—Berrio, IV. vi. 5.

c. 1610. — "Son logis estoit éloigné près d'une lice de palais Royal, situé sur un estang, et basty de pierres, ayant bien dany lieu de tour, comme rons les autres estangs."—Pyrard de Laval, ed. 1679, i. 292: [Hak. Soc. i. 397].

[1615.—"I rode early ... to the tancke to take the ayre."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 78.]

1616. — "Besides their Rivers ... they have many Ponds, which they call Tankes."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1470.

1638.—"A very faire Tankes, which is a square pit paved with gray marble."—W. Broton, in Hakl. v. 50.

1618.—"... a standing water or Tanck."—Van Twest, Gen. Beschr. 11.

1672.—"Outside and round about Suratte, there are elegant and delightful houses for recreation, and stately cemeteries in the usual fashion of the Moors, and also divers Tanks and reservoirs built of hard and solid stone."—Baldaeus, p. 12.

1673.—"Within a square Court, to which a stately Gate-house makes a Passage, in the middle whereof a Tank vaulted. . . ."—Fryer, 27.

1754.—"The post in which the party intended to halt had formerly been one of those reservoirs of water called tanks, which occur so frequently in the arid plains of this country."—Orme, i. 354.

1799.—"One crop under a tank in Mysore or the Carnatic yields more than three here."—T. M‘Mur, in Life, i. 241.

1809.—"Water so cool and clear,
The peasants drink not from the humble well.
Nor tanks of costliest masonry dispense
To those in towns who dwell,
The work of kings in their beneficence."—Kehama, xii. 6.

1883.—"... all through sheets" 123, 123, 126, and 131, the only drinking water is from 'tankas,' or from 'tanks.' The former are circular pits puddled with clay, and covered in with wattle and daub domes, in the top of which are small trap doors, which are kept locked; in these the villages store rain-water; the latter are small and somewhat deep ponds dug in the valleys where the soil is clayey, and are filled by the rain; these latter of course do not last long, and then the inhabitants are entirely dependent on their tanks, whilst their cattle migrate to places where the well-water is fit for use."—Report on Cent. Ind. and Rajputana Topogr. Survey (Bikaner and Jodhpur). By Major C. Stewart, R.E., in Report of the Survey in India, 1882-83. App. p. 4. [The writer in the Rajputana Gazetteer (Bikanir) (i. 182) calls these covered pits khand, and the simple excavations zar.]

TANOR, n.p. An ancient town and port about 22 miles south of Calicut. There is a considerable probability that it was the Typosal of the Periplus. It was a small kingdom at the arrival of the Portuguese, in partial subjection to the Zamorin. [The name is Malayal. Tánor, tannu, the tree Terminalis belerica, är, village.]

1516.—"Further on . . . are two places of Moors 5 leagues from one another. One is called Parvanor, and the other Tanor, and inland from these towns is a lord to whom they belong; and he has many Nairs, and sometimes he rebels against the King of Calicut. In these towns there is much shipping and trade, for these Moors are great merchants."—Barbosa, Hak. Soc. 153.

1521.—"Cotatu was a great man among the Moors, very rich, and lord of Tanor, who carried on a great sea-trade with many ships, which trafficked all about the coast of India with passes from our Governors, for he only dealt in wares of the country; and thus he was the greatest possible friend of the Portuguese, and those who went to his dwelling were entertained with the greatest honour, as if they had been his brothers. In fact for this purpose he kept houses fitted up, and both cots and bedsteads furnished in our fashion, with tables and chairs and casks of wine, with which he regaled our people, giving them entertainments and banquets, insomuch that it seemed as if he were going to become a Christian. . . ."—Correia, ii. 679.

1528.—"And in the year (A.H.) 955, a ship belonging to the Franks was wrecked off Tanor . . . Now the Ray of that place affording aid to the crew, the Zamorin sent a messenger to him demanding of him the surrender of the Franks who composed it, together with such parts of the cargo of the ship as had been saved, but that chieftain having refused compliance with this demand, a treaty of peace was entered into with the Franks by him; and from this time the subjects of the Ray of Tanor traded under the protection of the passes of the Franks."—Tobkat-ul-Majahidin, E.T. 124-125.

1558.—"For Lopo Soares having arrived at Cochín after his victory over the Camorín, two days later the King of Tanor, the latter's vassal, sent (to Lopo) to complain against the Camorín by ambassadors, begging for peace and help against him, having fallen out with him for reasons that touched the service of the King of Portugal."—Barros, i. vii. 10.

1727.—"Four leagues more southerly is Tannore, a Town of small Trade, inhabited by Mahometans."—J. Hamilton, i. 922; [ed. 1741].

TAPPAUL, s. The word used in S. India for 'post,' in all the senses in which dawk (q.v.) is used in Northern India. Its origin is obscure. C. P. Brown suggests connection with the Fr. étape (which is the same originally as the Eng. stage). It is sometimes found in the end of the 18th century written tappa or topay. But this seems to have been derived from Telugu clerks, who sometimes write tappâ as a singular of tappâlu, taking the latter for a plural (C.P.B.). Wilson appears to give the word a southern origin. But though its use is confined to the South and West, Mr. Beames assigns it to an Aryan origin: 'tappâ 'post-office,' i.e. where letters are stamped, tappal 'letter-post.' (tappal + alya = "stamping-house"), connecting it radically with tāpā 'a coop,' tāpāṇā 'to tap,' ṭḷattē, 'beat down,' ōppak 'a sledge hammer,' tāppā 'to press,' &c. [with which Platt's agrees.]

1799—"You will perceive that we have but a small chance of establishing the tappal to Poomnah."—Westminster, i. 90.

1800.—"The Tappal does not go 30 miles a day."—T. Munro, in Life, i. 241.

1809.—"Requiring only two sets of bearers I knew I might go by tappal the whole way to Seringapatam."—Ed. Valeriana, i. 985.

TAPTEE R., n.p. Tāpī; also called Tāpā. [Skt. Tāpī, 'that which is hot.']. The river that runs by the city of Surat.

[1538.—"Tapi." See under GODAVARY.]

c. 1630.—"Surat is... watered with a sweet River named Tappée (or Tinda), as broad as the Thames at Windsor."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, p. 36.

1813.—"The sacred groves of Pulpara are the general resort for all the Yogees (Jogee), Semasses (Sunyasse), and Hindoo pilgrims... the whole district is holy, and the Tappée in that part has more than common sanctity."—Forbes, or. Mem, i. 288; [2nd ed. i. 134, and compare i. 176].

"Tappée or Tafty."—Ibid. 244; [2nd ed. i. 146].

TARA, TARE, s. The name of a small silver coin current in S. India at the time of the arrival of the Portuguese. It seems to have survived longest in Calicut. The origin we have not traced. It is curious that the commonest silver coin in Sicily down to 1860, and worth about 43d., was a tare, generally considered to be a corruption of dirhem. I see Sir Walter Elliot has mooted this very question in his Coins of S. India (p. 138). [The word is certainly Malayāl. tāram, defined in the Madras Gloss, as "a copper coin, value ½ pies." Mr. Gray in his note to the passage from Pyrard de Laval quoted below, suggests that it took its name from tārā, 'a star.'] 1442—"They cast (at Vijayanagar), in pure silver a coin which is the sixth of the foanum, which they call tar."—Abdurrazzāk, in India in the XV. Cent. 26.

1506—"The Viceroys, D. Francisco D'Almeida, wintering his fleet in Cochin. "As the people were numerous they made quite a big town with a number of houses covered with upper stories of timber, and streets also where the people of the country set up their stalls in which they sold plenty of victuals, and cheap. Thus for a vinten of silver you got in change 20 silver coins that they call tara, something like the scale of a sardine, and for such coin they gave you 12 or 15 fags, or 4 or 5 eggs, and for a single vinten 3 or 4 fowls, and for one tara fish enough to fill two men's bellies, or rice enough for a day's victuals, dinner and supper too. Bread there was none, for there was no wheat except in the territory of the Mores."—Correa, i. 624.

1510.—The King of Narsinga (or Vijayanagar) "coins a silver money called tare, and others of gold, twenty of which go to a paradao, and are called fanom. And of these small ones of silver, there go 16 to a fanom."—Farthema, 130.

[c. 1610.—"Each man receives four tarens, which are small silver coins, each of the value of one-sixteenth of a larin."—Pyramid de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 344. Later on (i. 412) he says "16 tarens go to a Phanam"]

1673.—(at Calicut). "Their coin admit-no Copper; Silver Tarrs, 25 of which make a Fanam, passing instead thereof."—Fryer, 55.

"Tart."—"Calicut.

"Tarrs are the peculiar Coin, the rest are common to India."—Ibid. 297.

1727.—"Curent... coins are 10 Tar to a Fanam, 45 Fanams to a Rupee."—A. Hamilton, ii. 319; [ed. 1741].

"Tăr."—"We are to allow each man 4 measures of rice and tăr per diem."—Agreement in Logan, Malabar, iii. 95, and see "tarrs" in iii. 192. Mr. Logan (vol. iii. Gloss. s.v.) defines the tara as equal to 2 pies.]

TARE AND TRET. Whence comes this odd form in the books of arithmetic? Both partners apparently through Italy. The first Fr. tare, It. tara, from Ar. taraha, 'to reject,' as pointed out by Dozy. Tret is alleged to be from It. tribare, 'to crumble or grind,' perhaps rather from trito, 'ground or triturated.' [Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v.) derives it from Fr. truiter, 'a draught,' and that from Lat. tractus, trahere, 'to draw.]

TAREGA. s. This represents a word for a broker (or person analogous to the hong merchants of Canton in former days) in Pegu, in the days of its prosperity. The word is from S. India. We have in Tel. tarega, 'the occupation of a broker;' Tam. taragari, 'a broker.'

1658—"Sonò in Pegu otto sensari del Re che si chiamano Tarega li quali sono obligati di far vendere tutte le mercantie . . . per il prezzo corrente."—Ces. Federici, in Romania, iii. 395.

1583.—". . . e se fosse alcuno che a tempo del pagamento per non pagar si absentasse dalla città, o si ascosse, il Tarreca e obbligato pagar per lui . . . i Tarreca essi si demandano i sensuri."—G. Balbi, t. 167, 108.

1587.—"There are in Pegu eight Brokers, whom they call Tareghe, which are bound to sell your goods at the price they be Woorth, and you give them for their labour two in the hundred: and they be bound to make your debt good, because you sell your marchandises upon their word."—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 393.

TARIFF, s. This comes from Ar. tarifr, tarifja, 'the making known.' Dozy states that it appears to be comparatively modern in Spanish and Port., and has come into Europe apparently through Italian.

[1591.—"So that helping your memorie with certain Tablei or Tariffas made of purpose to know the numbers of the soldiers that are to enter into ranke."—Garrard, Art Warre, p. 224 (Stafyli. Dict.).]

[1617.—"... a brief Tareg of Persia."
—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 462.]

TAROUK, TAROUP, n.p. Burm. Tarāk, Tarāp. This is the name given by the Burmese to the Chinese. Thus a point a little above the Delta of the Irawadi, where the invading army of Kublai Khan (c. 1285) is said to have turned back, is called Tarāk-mou, or Chinese Point. But the use of this name, according to Sir A. Phayre, dates only from the Middle Ages, and the invasion just mentioned. Before that the Chinese, as we understand him, are properly termed Tsin; though the coupled names Tarāk and Tart, which are applied in the chronicles to early invaders, "may be considered as designations incorrectly applied by later copyists." And Sir A. Phayre thinks Tarāk is a form of Tāk, whilst Taret is now applied to the Manchus. It seems to us probable that Tarāk and Tart are probably meant for 'Turk and Tartar' (see H. of Burma, pp. 8, 11, 56). [Mr. Scott (Upper Burma Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 193) suggests a connection with the Tura or Tero State, which developed about the 11th century, the race having been expelled from China in 778 a.d.]

TASHREEF, s. This is the Ar. tashrif, 'honouring'; and thus "con-ferring honour upon anyone, as by paying him a visit, presenting a dress of honour, or any complimentary donation" (Wilson). In Northern India the general use of the word is as one of ceremonious politeness in speaking of a visit from a superior or from one who is treated in politeness as a superior; when such an one is invited to 'bring his tashrif,' i.e. 'to carry the honour of his presence,' to 'condescend to visit.' The word always implies superiority on the part of him to whom tashrif is attributed. It is constantly used by polite natives in addressing Europeans. But when the European in return says (as we have heard said, through ignorance of the real meaning of the phrase), 'I will bring my tashrif,' the effect is ludicrous in the extreme, though no native will betray his amusement. In S. India the word seems to be used for the dress of honour conferred, and in the old Madras records, rightly or wrongly, for any complimentary present, in fact a honorarium. Thus in Wheeler we find the following:

1674.—"He (Lingapa, naik of Poona-malee) had, he said, carried a tasheriff to the English, and they had refused to take it. . . ."—Op. cit. i. 81.

1850.—"It being necessary to appoint one as the Company's Chief Merchant (Verona being deceased), resolved Bena Pedda Vineatadory, do succeed and the Tasheriff be given to him and the rest of the principal Merchants, viz., 3 yards Scarlet to Pedda Vineatadory, and 2½ yards each to four others. . . ."

The Governor being informed that Verona's young daughter was melancholy and would not eat because her husband had received no Tasheriff, he also is Tasheriff with 2½ yards Scarlet cloth."—Fort St. Geo. Consns., April 6. In Notes and Exts., Madras, 1873, p. 15.

1855.—"Goyall Pundit having been at great charge in coming hither with such a numerous retinue . . . that we may engage him . . . to continue his friendship, to attain some more and better privileges there (at Cuddalore) than we have as yet—It is ordered that he with his attendants be Tasheriff as followeth" (a list of presents follows).—In Wheeler, i. 148. [And see the same phrase in Pringle, Diary, &e., i. 1].

TATTOO, and abbreviated, TAT, s. A native-bred pony. Hind. tattā, [which Platts connects with Skt. tura, 'passing over'].

c. 1324.—"Tughlak sent his son Mahommed to bring Khusrū back. Mahommed seized the latter and brought him to his father mounted on a tathi, i.e. a pack-horse."— Ibn Batuta, iii. 207.

1784.—"On their arrival at the Choultry they found a miserable dooley and 15 tattoo horses."— Sten-Kurr, i. 15.

1785.—"We also direct that strict injunctions be given to the baggage department, for sending all the lean Tatos, bullocks, &c., to grass, the rainy season being now at hand."— Tippee's Letters, 105.

1504.—"They can be got for 25 rupees each horseman upon an average; but, I believe, when they receive only this sum they muster tattoos... From 30 to 35 rupees each horse is the sum paid to the best horsemen."— Willington, iii. 174.

1508.—"These tutboos are a breed of small ponies, and are the most useful and hardy little animals in India."— Broughton's Letters, 150; [ed. 1582, 117].

1810.—"Every servant... goes share in some tattoo... which conveys his luggage."— Williamson, T. M. i. 311.

1824.—"Tattoos. These are a kind of small, cat-hammed, and ill-looking ponies; but they are hardy and walk faster than oxen."— Scott, Wonders of Elkor, ch. ii.

1826.—"... when mounted on my tattoo or pony, I could at any time have commanded the attendance of a dozen grooms, so many pressed forward to offer me their services."— Pandourangi Hari, 21; [ed. 1873, i. 25].

1830.—"Mourning our tatts, we were on the point of proceeding homewards."— Oriental Sport, ed. 1873, i. 497.

c. 1831.—"... mon tattoo est fort an dessous de la taille d'un arabe..."— Jacquemont, Corresp. i. 347.

c. 1840.

"With its bright brass patent axles, and its little hog-manned tatties, And its ever jetty harness, which was always made by Watts... A fair line in honour of the late Mr. Simmons, in Parker's Isle Poultry, 1851, ii. 215.

1853.—"... Smith's plucky proposal to run his notable tat Pickles."— Oakfield, i. 9.

1857.—"You young Gentlemen ride over on your tatties, I suppose? The Subaltern's tat—that is the name, you know, they give to a pony in this country—is the most useful animal you can imagine."— The Dilemma, ch. iii.

TATTY. s. Hind. tatti and tatti, [which Platts connects with Skt. tantra, 'a thread, the warp in a loom']. A screen or mat made of the roots of fragrant grass (see CUSCUS) with which door or window openings are filled up in the season of hot winds. The screens being kept wet, their fragrant evaporation as the dry winds blow upon them cools and refreshes the house greatly, but they are only efficient when such winds are blowing. See also THERMANTIDOTE. The principle of the tatty is involved in the quotation from Dr. Fryer, though he does not mention the grass-mats.

c. 1695.—"... or having in lieu of Collarage certain Kuts-Kamuya, that is, little Houses of Straw, or rather of odoriferous Roots, that are very neatly made, and commonly placed in the midst of a Parterre... that so the Servants may easily with their Pompion bottles, water them from without."— Bernier, E.T. 79; [ed. Constable, 247].

1673.—"They keep close all day for 3 or 4 Months together... repelling the Heat by a coarse wet Cloath, continually hanging before the chamber-windows."— Fryer, 47.

1789.—The introduction of tatties into Calcutta is mentioned in a letter from Dr. Campbell, dated May 10, 1789:—"We have had very hot winds and delightful cool houses. Everybody uses tatties now... Tatties are however dangerous when you are obliged to leave them and go abroad, the heat acts so powerfully on the body that you are commonly affected with a severe catarrh."— In Carey, Good Old Days, i. 80.

1808.—"... now, when the hot winds have set in, and we are obliged to make use of tatties, a kind of screens made of the roots of a coarse grass called Kus."— Broughton's Letters, 110; [ed. 1852, p. 83].

1809.—"Our style of architecture is by no means adapted to the climate, and the large windows would be insufferable, were it not for the tatties which are easily applied to a house one story high."— Ed. Valentin, i. 104.

1810.—"During the hot winds tatts (a kind of mat, made of the root of the coarse grass, which has an agreeable smell, are placed against the doors and windows..."— Maria Graham, 125.

1814.—"Under the roof, throughout all the apartments, are iron rings, from which the tatties or screens of sweet scented grass were suspended."— Forbes, On Mem., iv. 6; [2nd ed. ii. 382].

1828.—"An early breakfast was over; the well watered tatties were applied to the windows, and diffused through the apartment a cool and refreshing atmosphere which was most comfortably contrasted with the white heat and roar of the fierce wind without..."— The Kurr-e-Bak, i. ii.

In Persia it seems to be applied to the whole of the mystery-play which is presented at that season. At the close of the procession the ta'zíyus must be thrown into water; if there be no sufficient mass of water they should be buried. [See Sir L. [Pack bullocks for making bags (gonies, see GUNNY) for holding grain, &c."—Tr. Bo. Lit. Soc. iii. 244.]

The word tawee or taweez is used for a charm. The Indian phrase dhi or dhi-wá, 'a charm,' is also used. In the Birmese language the verb tob means 'to put in a charm' or 'to make a charm.'
TEA. s. Crawfurd alleges that we got this word in its various European forms from the Malay Te, the Chinese name being Chhâ. The latter is indeed the pronunciation attached, when reading in the ‘mandarin dialect,’ to the character representing the tea-plant, and is the form which has accompanied the knowledge of tea to India, Persia, Portugal, Greece (τσαί) and Russia. But though it may be probable that Te, like several other names of articles of trade, may have come to us through the Malay, the word is not, the less, originally Chinese, Te (or Tay as Medhurst writes it) being the utterance attached to the character in the Fuh-kien dialect. The original pronunciation, whether direct from Fuh-kien or through the Malay, accompanied the introduction of tea to England as well as other countries of Western Europe. This is shown by several couplets in Pope, e.g.

1711.—

"... There stands a structure of majestic frame Which from the neighbouring Hampton takes its name.

*    *    *    *

Here thou, great ANNA, whom three Realms obey,
Dost sometimes counsel take, and sometimes tea."

Rape of the Lock, iii.

Here tay was evidently the pronunciation, as in Fuh-kien. The Rape of the Lock was published in 1711. In Gray’s Tricinia, published in 1720, we find tea rhyme to pay, in a passage needless to quote (ii. 206). Fifty years later there seems no room for doubt that the pronunciation had changed to that now in use, as is shown by Johnson’s extemporised verses (c. 1770):

"I therefore pray thee, Renny, dear,
    That thou wilt give to me
With cream and sugar softend well, Another dish of tea."—and so on.

The change must have taken place between 1720 and 1750, for about the latter date we find in the verses of Edward Moore:

"One day in July last at tea.
And in the house of Mrs. P."

The Trial of Sarah, &c.

[But the two forms of pronunciation seem to have been in use earlier, as appears from the following advertisement in The Gazette of Sept. 9, 1658 (quoted in 8 ser. N. & Q. vi. 266): "That excellent, and by all Physicians approved, China Drink, called by the Chineseus Tohn, by other nations Tay, alias Tee, is sold at the Sultaness Head, a coffee house in Sweetings Rents by the Royal Exchange, London." And in Zeller’s Lexicon (1745) it is stated that the English write the word either Tee or T-e, but pronounce it Tey, which seems to represent our modern pronunciation. (“Strange to say, the Italians, however, have two names for tea, cia and te, the latter, of course, is from the Chinese word te, noticed above, while the former is derived from the word ch’a. It is curious to note in this connection that an early mention, if not the first notice, of the word in English is under the form cba (in an English Glossary of A.D. 1371); we are also told that it was once spelt teha—both evidently derived from the Cantonese form of the word; but 13 years later we have the word derived from the Fokienese te, but borrowed through the French and spelt in the latter language the; the next change in the word is early in the following century when it drops the French spelling and adopts the present form of tea, though the Fokienese pronunciation, which the French still retain, is not dropped for the modern pronunciation of the now wholly Anglicised word tea till comparatively lately. It will thus be seen that we, like the Italians, might have had two forms of the word, had we not discarded the first, which seemed to have made but little lodgement with us, for the second” (Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. 583 seq.).]
Dr. Bretschneider states that the Tea-shrub is mentioned in the ancient Dictionary Rh-ya, which is believed to date long before our era, under the names K'ou and K'ou-ta (K'ou = 'bitter'), and a commentator on this work who wrote in the 4th century A.D. describes it, adding "From the leaves can be made by boiling a hot beverage" (On Chinese Botanical Works, &c., p. 13). But the first distinct mention of tea-cultivation in Chinese history is said to be a record in the annals of the T'ang Dynasty under A.D. 793, which mentions the imposition in that year of a duty upon tea. And the first western mention of it occurs in the next century, in the notes of the Arab traders, which speak not only of tea, but of this fact of its being subject to a royal impost. Tea does not appear to be mentioned by the medieval Arab writers upon Materia Medica, nor (strange to say) do any of the European travellers to Cathay in the 13th and 14th centuries make mention of it. Nor is there any mention of it in the curious and interesting narrative of the Embassy sent by Shah Rukh, the son of the great Timur, to China (1419-21).* The first European work, so far as we are aware, in which tea is named, is Ramusio's (posthumous) Introduction to Marco Polo, in the second volume of his great collection of Navigazioni e Viaggi. In this he repeats the account of Cathay which he had heard from Hajji Mahommed, a Persian merchant who visited Venice. Among other matters the Hajji detailed the excellent properties of Chiái-Catali (i.e. Pers. Chái-i-Khtái, 'Tea of China'), concluding with an assurance that if these were known in Persia and in Europe, traders would cease to purchase rhubarb, and would purchase this herb instead, a prophecy which has been very substantially verified. We find no mention of tea in the elaborate work of Mendoza on China. The earliest notices of which we are aware will be found below.

Millburn gives some curious extracts from the E.I. Co.'s records as to the early importation of tea into England. Thus, in 1666, June 30, among certain "rarities," chiefly the production of China, provided by the Secretary of the Company for His Majesty, appear:

"22$ lb. of thea at 50s. per lb. = £56 17 0
For the two cheefe persons that attended his Majesty, thea . . . . . . 6 15 6"

In 1667 the E.I. Co.'s first order for the importation of tea was issued to their agent at Bantam: "to send home by these ships 100lb. weight of the best they that you can get." The first importation actually made for the Co. was in 1669, when two canisters were received from Bantam, weighing 143 l. (Millburn, ii. 531.) [The earliest mention of tea in the Old Records of the India Office is in a letter from Mr. R. Wickham, the Company's Agent at Firando, in Japan, who, writing, June 27, 1615, to Mr. Eaton at Mianco, asks for "a pt. of the best sort of chaw" (see Birdwood, Report on Old Records, 26, where the early references are collected).]

A.D. 851.—"The King of (China) reserves to himself . . . a duty on salt, and also on a certain herb which is drunk infused in hot water. This herb is sold in all the towns at high prices; it is called sákh. It has more leaves than the rottháh (Medicago sativa recent) and something more of aroma, but its taste is bitter. Water is boiled and poured upon this herb. The drink so made is serviceable under all circumstances." — Relation, &c., trad. par Rehnard, i. 40.

c. 1615.—"Moreover, seeing the great delight that I above the rest of the party took in this discourse of his, he (Chiàgi Memot, i.e. Hajji Mahommed) told me that all over the country of Cathay they make use of another plant, that is of its leaves, which is called by those people Chiai Catali: it is produced in that district of Cathay which is called Cechau-fu. It is a thing generally used and highly esteemed in all those regions. They take this plant whether dry or fresh, and boil it well in water, and of this decoction they take one or two cups on an empty stomach; it removes fever, headache, stomach-ache, pain in the side or joints; taking care to drink it as hot as you can bear; it is good also for many other ailments which I can't now remember, but I know gout was one of them. And if any one chance to feel his stomach oppressed by overmuch food, if he will take a little of this decoction he will in a short time have digested it. And thus it is so precious and highly esteemed that every one going on a journey takes it with him."

and judging from what he said these people would at any time gladly swap a sack of rhubarb for an ounce of China tea. These Chinese, he says, (he told us) that if in our country, and in Persia, and the land of the Franks, it was known, merchants would no longer invest their money in Rauend Chini as they call rhubarb."—Ro- musius, Diciorationes, in i. f. 15.

1844.—"The Polish word for tea, Herbata, signifies more properly 'herb,' and in fact there is little more of the genuine Chinese beverage in the article itself than in its name, so that we often thought with longing of the delightful Russian Tahai, genuine in word and fact."—J. I. Kohl, Austria, p. 444.

The following are some of the names given in the market to different kinds of tea, with their etymologies.

1. (TEA) BOHEA. This name is from the Wu-i (dialectically Bâ-i) Shan Mountains in the N.W. of Fuh-kien, one of the districts most famous for its black tea. In Pope's verse, as Crawford points out, Bohea stands for a tea in use among fashionable people. Thus:

"To part her time 'twixt reading and bohea, To muse, and spill her solitary tea."—Epsile to Mrs Teresa Blount.

[The earliest examples in the N.E.D. carry back the use of the word to the first years of the 18th century.]

1711.—"There is a parcel of extraordinary fine Bohea Tea to be sold at 2s. per Pound, at the sign of the Barber's Pole, next door to the Brazier's Shop in Southampton Street in the Strand."—Advt. in the Spectator of April 2, 1711.

1711.—"Oh had I rather unadmired remained On some lone isle or distant northern-land;
Where the gift chariot never marks the way,
Where none learn ombre, none e'er taste bohea."—Belinda, in Rape of the Lock, iv. 153.

The last quotation, and indeed the first also, shows that the word was then pronounced Bohey. At a later date Bohea sank to be the market name of one of the lowest qualities of tea, and we believe it has ceased altogether to be a name quoted in the tea-market. The following quotations seem to show that it was the general name for "black-tea."

1711.—"Bohea is of little Worth among the Moors and Gentoo's of India, Arrabs and Persians... that of 45 Tael (see Tael) would not fetch the Price of green Tea of 10 Tael a Pecull."—Lockyer, 116.

1721.—"Where Indus and the double Ganges flow,
On odorifrons plains the leaves do grow,
Chief of the treat, a plant the boast of fame,
Sometimes called green, Bohea's the greater name."—Allen Ramsay's Poems, ed. 1800, i. 213-14.

1726.—"Anno 1670 and 1680 there was knowledge only of Boey Tea and Green Tea, but later they speak of a variety of other sorts... Congo... Pego... Tongge, Rosamryn Tea, rare and very dear."—Valentijn, iv. 14.

1727.—"In September they strip the Bush of all its Leaves, and, for Want of warm Winds to cure it, are forced to lay it on warm Plates of Iron or Copper, and keep it stirring gently, till it is dry, and that Sort is called Bohea."—1. Hamilton, ii. 289; [ed. 1744, ii. 288.]

But Zedler's Lexicon (1745) in a long article on Thee gives Thee Bohea, as "the worst sort of all." The other European trade-names, according to Zedler, were Thee-Peco, Congo which the Dutch called the best, but Thee Cancho was better still and dearer, and Chaucon best of all.

2. (TEA) CAMPOY, a black tea also. Kam-poi, the Canton pron. of the characters Kien-pei, "select-dry (over a fire)."

3. (TEA) CONGOU (a black tea). This is Kung-hu (tâ) the Amoy pronunciation of the characters Kung-fu "work or labour." [Mr. Pratt (9 seq. N. & Q. iv. 26) writes: "The N.E.I
under Congou derives it from the standard Chinese Kung-fu (which happens also to be the Cantonese spelling); ‘the omission of the f’ we are told, ‘is the foreigner’s corruption.’ It is nothing of the kind. The Amoy name for this tea is Kung-hu, so that the omission of the f is due to the local Chinese dialect.’]

4. HYSON (a green tea). This is He- (hei and ai in the south) -ch’un, ‘bright spring;’ [which Mr. Ball (Things Chinese, 586) writes yu-tseh, before the rain], characters which some say formed the hong name of a tea-merchant named Le, who was in the trade in the dist. of Hiu-ning (S.W. of Hang-chau) about 1700; others say that He-chun was Le’s daughter, who was the first to separate the leaves, so as to make what is called Hyson. [Mr. Ball says that it is so called, ‘the young hyson being half-opened leaves plucked in April before the spring rains.’]

c. 1722,—

‘And Venus, goddess of the eternal smile, Knowing that stormy brows but ill become Fair patterns of her beauty, hath ordained Celestial Tea;—a fountain that can cure
The ills of passion, and can free from frowns.
* * * * *
To her, ye fair! in adoration bow!
Whether at blushing morn, or dewy eve.
Her smoking cordials greet your fragrant board!
With Hyson, or Bohea, or Congo crown’d.’

R. Ferguson, Poems.

5. OOLONG (bl. tea). Wu-lung, ‘black dragon;’ respecting which there is a legend to account for the name.

‘A black snake (and snakes are sometimes looked upon as dragons in China) was coiled round a plant of this tea, and hence the name’ (Ball, op. cit. 586).]

6. PEKOE (do.). Pak-ho, Canton, pronom. of characters po-ch’ao, ‘white-down.’

7. POUCHONG (do.). Pao-chung, fold-sort.’ So called from its being packed in small paper packets, each of which is supposed to be the produce of one choice tea-plant. Also called Padre-souchong, because the priests in the Wu-i hills and other places prepare and pack it.

1781.—‘Les Nations Européennes retirent de la Chine des thés connus sous les noms de le bouy, thé vert, et le saothon.’—Sonnerat, ii. 249.

9. TWANKAY (green tea). From Tun-kei, the name of a mart about 15 m. S.W. of Hwei-chiang in Ngan-hwei, Bp. Moule says (perhaps after W. Williams) from Tun-kei, name of a stream near Yen-shan-fu in Chi-kiang. [Mr. Pratt (loc. cit.) writes; “The Amoy Tun-ke is nearer, and the Cantonese Tun-kei nearer still, its second syllable being absolutely the same in sound as the English. The Twankay is a stream in the E. of the province of Ngan-hwui, where Twankay tea grows.”] Twankay is used by Theodore Hook as a sort of slang for ‘tea.’

10. YOUNG HYSON. This is called by the Chinese Yü-t’ien, ‘rain-before,’ or ‘Yu-before,’ because picked before Kue-yu, a term falling about 20th April (see HYSON above). According to Giles it was formerly called, in trade, Yehain, which seems to represent the Chinese name. In an “Account of the Prices at which Teas have been brought up to Sale, that arrived in England in 1784, 1785” (MS. India Office Records) the Teas are (from cheaper to dearer):

“Bohea Tea. Singlo (l),

Hyson."

TEA-CADDY. s. This name, in common English use for a box to contain tea for the daily expenditure of the household, is probably corrupted, as Crawford suggests, from catty, a weight of 1½ lb. (q.v.). A ‘catty-box,’ meaning a box holding a catty, might easily serve this purpose and lead to the name. This view is corroborated by a quotation which we have given under caddy (q.v.) A friend adds the remark that in his youth ‘Tea-caddy’ was a Londoner’s name for Harley Street, due to the number of E.I. Directors and proprietors supposed to inhabit that district.
TEAPOY, s. A small tripod table. This word is often in England imagined to have some connection with tea, and hence, in London shops for japanned ware and the like, a teapot means a tea-chest fixed on legs. But this is quite erroneous. Tipāṭ is a Hindustāni, or perhaps rather an Anglo-Hindustāni word for a tripod, from Hind. tin, 3, and Pers. pāṭ, 'foot.' The legitimate word from the Persian is sipāṭ (properly sīlpāṭa), and the legitimate Hindi word trīpad or trīπāṭ, but tipāṭ or tepoy was probably originated by some European in analogy with the familiar charpoy (q.v.) or 'four-legs,' possibly from the desire to avoid confusion with another very familiar word sepoṣy, seapoy. [Platts, however, gives tipāṭ as a regular Hind. word, Skt. trīπāṭa-īkā.] The word is applied in India not only to a three-legged table (or any very small table, whatever number of legs it has), but to any tripod, as to the tripod-stands of surveying instruments, or to trestles in carpentry. Sīlpāṭa occurs in 'Ali of Yezd's history of Timur, as applied to the trestles used by Timur in bridging over the Indus (Eliot, iii. 482). A teapoy is called in Chinese by a name having reference to tea: viz. Chih-ch′ēn. It has 4 legs.

[c. 1809.—"(Dinajpoor) Sepaya, a wooden stand for a lamp or candle with three feet." —Buchanan, Eastern India, ii. 945.]

1814.—"Well, to be sure, it does seem odd—very odd; —and the old gentleman chuckled,—most odd to find a person who don't know what a teapoy is . . . Well, then, a tepoy or trīpad is a thing with three feet, used in India to denote a little table, such as that just at your right."

"'Why, that table has four legs,' cried Peregrine.

"'It's a tepoy all the same," said Mr. Havethelacks."—Peregrine Pultoney, i. 112.

TEAK, s. The tree, and timber of the tree, known to botanists as Tectona grandis, L., N.O. Verbenaceae. The word is Malayal. tekka, Tum. tekla. No doubt this name was adopted owing to the fact that Europeans first became acquainted with the wood in Malabar, which is still one of the two great sources of supply; Pugon being the other. The Skt. name of the tree is śīka, whence the modern Hind. name sāgovān or sāguṇ and the Mahr. sāy. From this last probably was taken sāj, the name of teak in Arabic and Persian. And we have doubtless the same word in the αγγαλα of the Periplus, one of the exports from Western India, a form which may be illustrated by the Mahr. adj. sīgāṭi, 'made of the teak, belonging to teak.'

The last fact shows, in some degree, how old the export of teak is from India. Teak beams, still undecayed, exist in the walls of the great palace of the Sassanid Kings at Selencul or Ctesiphon, dating from the middle of the 6th century. [See Birdwood, First Letter Book, Intro, XXIX.] Teak has continued to recent times to be imported into Egypt. See Forskal, quoted by Royle (Hindin Medicin, 128). The yew-p.oor of Genesis is translated sāj in the Arabic version of the Pentateuch (Royle). [It was probably cedar (see Encycl. Bibl. s.v.)]

Teak seems to have been hardly known in Gangetic India in former days. We can find no mention of it in Baber or the 2nd century, and the only mention we can find is in the Ain, is in a list of the weights of a cubic yard of 72 kinds of wood, where the name "Sīgāṇa" has not been recognised as teak by the learned translator (see Blochmann's E.T. i. p. 228).

c. a.d. 80.—"In the innermost part of this Gulf (the Persian) is the Port of Apologos, lying near Pasine Charax and the river Eratapares.

Sailing past the mouth of the Gulf, after a course of 6 days you reach another port of Persia called Omata. Thither they are wont to despatch from Barygaza, to both these parts of Persia, great vessels with brass, and timbers and beams of teak (γολαν σαγγαλων και δοκων), and horns and spars of shisham (see SISSOO) (σασαμων), and of ebony. . . ."—Peripl. Maris Eryth. § 35-36.

c. 800.—(under Hārūn al Rashid) "Fazl continued his story . . . I heard loud wailing from the house of Abdallah . . . told me he had been struck with the diādēm, that his body was swollen and all black. . . . I went to Rashid to tell him, but I had not finished when they came to say Abdallah was dead. Going out at once I ordered them to hasten the obsequies.
. . . I myself said the funeral prayer. As they let down the bier a slip took place, and the bier and earth fell in together an intolerable stench arose . . . a second slip took place. I then called for planks of teak (sāj)."—Quotation in Maqāmāt Præsides d'Or, vi. 298-299.

c. 880.—"From Kol to Simlān, where they collect teak-wood (sāj) and cane, 18 far sakhs."—Ibn Khurdâbâ, in J. As. S. VI. tom. v. 284.

c. 940.—"... The tree is taller than the date-palm, and more bulky than the walnut, can shelter under its branches a great number of men and cattle, and you may judge of its dimensions by the logs that arrive, of their natural length, at the depôts of Basra, of Írãk, and of Egypt."—Mag. Jâli, iii. 12.

Before 1200.—Abu'l-dhâlî the Sindian, describing the regions of Hind, has these verses:

* * * * *

"By my life! it is a land where, when the rain falls, Jacinths and pears spring up for him who wants ornaments.
There are also produced musk and camphor and umbretsis and agilit,
* * * * *

And ivory there. and teak (al-sâj) and aloeswood and sandal..."

Quoted by Kâzîwân, in Gillinderster, 217-218.

The following order, in a King's Letter to the Goa Government, no doubt refers to Pegu teak, though not naming the particular timber:

1507.—"We enjoin you to be very vigilant not to allow the Turks to export any timber from the Kingdom of Pegu, nor from that of Acheen (see ACHIEN), and you must arrange how to treat this matter, particularly with the King of Acheen."—In Archiv. Port. Orient. fisc. ii. 669.

1602.—"... It was necessary in order to appease them, to give a promise in writing that the body should not be removed from the town, but should have public burial in our church in sight of everybody; and with this assurance it was taken in solemn procession and deposited in a box of teak (taca), which is a wood not subject to decay."—Soott, Oriente Conquist. (1710), ii. 265.

[...] "Of many of the roughest thickets of bamboos and of the largest and best wood in the world, that is teca."—Conto, Dec. VII. Bk. vi. ch. 6. He goes on to explain that all the ships and boats made either by Moors or Gentiles since the Portuguese came to India, were of this wood which came from the inexthaustible forests at the back of Damaun.]

1631.—Bonitius gives a tolerable cut of the foliage, &c., of the Teak-tree, but writing in the Archipelago does not use that name, describing it under the title Quercus Indica, Kiat Malaisis dicta."—Av. ib. cap. 18. On this Rheedoe, whose plate of the tree is, as usual, excellent (Hortus Malabaricus, iv. tab. 27), observes justly that the teak has no resemblance to an oak-tree, and also that the Malay name is not Kiat but Jati. 'Kiat' seems to be a mistake if some kind growing out of Kayu-Jati, Teak-wood.

1644.—"Hã nestas terras de Damam myuta e boa madeyra de Teca, a melhor de toda a India, e tambem de myuta parte do mundo, porque com ser muy fasil de laurar he perduravel, e particularmente nam lhe tocando agua."—Bocarro, Ms.

1675.—"At Cook-crow we parted hence and observed that the Sheds here were round thatched and lined with broad Leaves of Teke (the Timber Ships are built with) in Fashion of a Beehive."—Fryer, 142.

"Teke by the Portuguese, Sogwan by the Moors, is the finest Wood they have for Building... in Height the lofty Pine exceeds it not, nor the sturdiy Oak in Bulks and Substance... This Prince of the Indian Forest was not so attractive, though mightily glorious, but that..."—Ibid. 178.

1727.—"Guindace is next, where good Quantities of Teak Timber are cut, and exported, being of excellent Use in building of Houses or Ships."—J. Hamilton, i. 178; [ed. 1741].

1744.—"Tecca is the name of costly wood which is found in the Kingdom of Martaban in the East Indies, and which never decays."—Zieten, Curs. Lexicon, s.v.

1759.—"They had endeavoured to burn the Teak Timber also, but they lying in a portuguese store, could not take fire."—Capt. Aches, Report on Ships of Nagors, in Delaunay, i. 349.

c. 1790.—"As to the wood it is a sort called Teak, to the full as durable as oak."

—Grose, i. 198.

1777.—"Experience hath long since shown, that ships built with oak, and joined together with wooden trunnels, are by no means so well calculated to resist the extremes of heat and damp, in the tropical latitudes of Asia, as the ships which are built in India of teakwood, and bound with iron spikes and bolts."—Price's Treats, i. 191.

1783.—"The teak forests, from whence the marine yard at Bombay is furnished with that excellent species of ship-timber, lie along the western side of the Gout mountains... on the north and north-east of Basseen... I cannot close this subject without remarking the unmercendable negligence we are guilty of in delaying to build teak ships of war for the service of the Indian seas."—Rennell, Memoir, 3rd ed. 260.

[1890.—"Tayca. Tedona Robusta."—Brachman, Mysore, i. 26.]

TEE. s. The metallic decoration, generally gilt and hung with tinkling bells, on the top of a dagoba in Indo-Chinese countries, which represents the chatras [chhatras] or umbrellas which in ancient times, as royal emblems, crowned these structures. Burn. K'ti, 'an umbrella.'

1890.—"... In particular the Tee, or umbrella, which composed of open iron-work, crowned the spire, had been thrown down."—Sujasa, i. 193.

1855.—"... gleaming in its white plaster, with numerous pinnacles and tall central spire, we had seen it (Gaudapaleni Temple at Ugan) from far down the Irawati rising like a dim vision of Milan Cathedral. ... It is errectiform in plan ... exhibiting a massive basement with porches, and rising above in a pyramidal gradation of terraces, crowned by a spire and htee. The latter has broken from its stays at one side, and now leans over almost horizontally. ..."—Yale, Mission to Ava, 1855, p. 42.

1786.—"... a feature known to Indian archaeologists as a Tee. ..."—Fergusson, Ind. and Eost. Archit, 61.

TEEK, adj. Exact, precise, punctual; also parsimonious, [a meaning which Platts does not record]. Used in N. India. Hind. theh.

[1843.—"They all feel that the good old rule of right (teek), as long as a man does his duty well, can no longer be relied upon."—G. W. Johnson, Stranger in India, i. 290.]

[1857.—"... it is necessary to send an explanation to the magistrate, and the return does not look so theh' (a word expressing all excellence)."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 253.]

TEERUT, TEERTHA, s. Skt. and Hind. tirtha, tirtha. A holy place of pilgrimage and of bathing for the good of the soul, such as Hindwar, or the confluence at Práag (Allahabad).

[1623.—"The Gentiles call it Rántírt, that is, Holy Water."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 265.]

c. 1770.—"An temple l' enfant is recue par les devades-chjes (Deva-dasi) des mains de ses parents, et après l'avoir baignée dans le tirtha ou éang du temple, elles lui mettent des vêtements neufs. ..."—Hausser, i. 114.

[1858.—"He then summoned to the place no less than three crores and half, or thirty millions and half of teeruts, or angels (aie) who preside each over his special place of religious worship."—Seaman, Journey through Ootth, ii. 4.]

TEHR, TAIR, &c., s. The wild goat of the Himalaya; Himatruo jemiliacas, Jerdon, [Blanford, Mammalia, 509]. In Nepál it is called jháral. (See SURROW.)

TEJPAT, s. Hind. tejpat, Skt. tejapatra, 'pungent leaf.' The native name for malabathrum.

1833.—"Last night as I was writing a long description of the tês-pât, the leaf of the cinnamon-tree, which humbly pickles beef, leaving the honour of crowning heroes to the Laurus nobilis. ..."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 278.

1872. —Tejpát is mentioned as sold by the village shopkeeper, in Gourida Samanta, i. 223.

(1) TELINGA, n.p. Hind. Tilaṅga, Skt. Trilinga. One of the people of the country east of the Deccan, and extending to the coast, often called, at least since the Middle Ages, Telingña or Tilaṅgana, sometimes Tilting or Tilang. Though it has not, perhaps, been absolutely established that this came from a form Trilinga, the habitual application of Tri-Kaliṅga, apparently to the same region which in later days was called Telinga, and the example of actual use of Trilingha, both by Ptolemy (though he carries us beyond the Ganges) and by a Tibetan author quoted below, do make this a reasonable supposition (see Bp. Caldwell's Dravidian Grammar, 2nd ed. Introd. pp. 30 seqq., and the article KLING in this book).

A.D. c. 150. —"Trigálýov, to kal Teli-łáγgoν Basileión ... k. t. L."—Ptolomy, vi. 2, 23.

1309.—"On Saturday the 10th of Shálan, the army marched from that spot, in order that the pure tree of Islam might be planted and flourish in the soil of Tilang, and the evil tree which had struck its roots deep, might be torn up by force. ... When the blessed canopy had been fixed about a mile from Arangal (Warangal, N.E. of Hyderabad), the tents around the fort were pitched so closely that the head of a needle could not get between them."—Amur Kháánr, in Elliot, iii. 89.

1321.—"In the year 721 H. the Sultan (Ghiyášu-ddin) sent his eldest son, Umgh Khán, with a canopy and an army against Arangal and Tilang."—Zíā-ud-dín Barí, Ibl, 231.

c. 1335.—"For every mile along the road there are three dívát (post stations) ... and so the road continues for six months marching, till one reaches the countries of Tiling and Ma'lar. ..."—Ibn Batútá, iii. 192.

"In the list of provinces of India under the Sultan of Delhi, given by Shíháb-ad-dín Dimishki, we find both Tálan and Taláná, probably through some mistake.—Not. et Extc. Pt. i. 170-171.

c. 1390.—"Sība Bérár. ... Its length from Bátála (or Fáṭála) to Bálirágarh is 200 Euroh (or kos); its breadth from Bátála to Hindía 180. On the east of Bálirágarh it marches with Bastár; on the north with Hindía; on the south with Tilingána; on the west with Mahkarábád. ..."—Ibn (orig. i. 476; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 228; and see 230-237].
1608.—"In the southern lands of India since the day when the Turushkas (Turks, i.e. Mahommedans) conquered Magadha, many abodes of Learning were founded: and though they were inconsiderable, the continuance of instruction and exorcism was without interruption, and the Pandit who was called the Son of Men, dwelt in Kalinga, a part of Telinga."—Tenamala's H. of Buddhism (Gurum. ed. of Schiefner), p. 261. See also 116, 155, 166.

c. 1614.—"Up to that time none of the zamindars of distant lands, such as the Rijj of Tilang, Pegun, and Malabar, had ventured upon disobedience or rebellion."—Firishka, in Elliot, vi. 549.

1703.—"Tellingana, of which Waramgoll was the capital, comprehended the tract lying between the Kistnah and Godavery Rivers, and east of Vissiapour... —Rennell's Memoir, 3rd ed. p. [ext.]

(2) TELINGA, s. This term in the 18th century was frequently used in Bengal as synonymous with sepoys, or a native soldier disciplined and clothed in quasi-European fashion, and is still commonly used by natives to indicate a sepoys or armed policeman in N. India, no doubt because the first soldiers of that type came to Bengal from what was considered to be the Telinga country, viz. Madras.

1758.—"... the latter commanded a body of Hindu soldiers, armed and accoutred and disciplined in the European manner of fighting; I mean those soldiers that are become so famous under the name of Telingas."—Sir Metaphor, ii. 92.

c. 1760.—"... Sepoys, sometimes called Telingas."—Glaris, in his Glossary, see vol. i. iv.

1760.—"300 Telingees are run away, and entered into the Beerboom Rajah's service."—In Long. 265; see also 236, 237, and (1761) p. 255, "Telingers."

c. 1765.—"Sonro's force, which amounted to 15 or 16 field-pieces and 6000 or 7000 of those foot soldiers called Talinghas, and which are armed with dint muskets, and accoutred as well as disciplined in the French or European manner."—Sir Metaphor, iii. 25.

1783.—"... Gardi (see GARDEE), which is now the general name of Sipahies all over India, save Bengal... where they are tided Telingas, because the first Sipahies that came in Bengal (and they were imported 1757 by Colonel Clive) were all Telingas or Telougous born... speaking hardly my language but their native..."—Note of Tr. of Sir Metaphor, ii. 93.

c. 1805.—"The battalions, according to an old mode of France, were called after the names of cities and forts... The Telingas, composed mostly of Hindoos, from ida, were disciplined according to the old English exercise of 1750. ..."—Sketch of the Regular Corps, &c., in Service of Native Princes, by Major Lewis Ferdinand Smith, p. 50.

1827.—"You are a Sahib Angrezie... I have been a Telinga... in the Company's service, and have eaten their salt. I will do your errand."—Sir H. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiii.

1833.—"We have heard from natives whose grandfathers lived in those times, that the Oriental portions of Clive's army were known to the Bengalis of Nuddea as Telingas, because they came, or were supposed to have accompanied him from Telingana or Madras."—Saty. Revie, Jan. 29, p. 120.

TELOOGOO, n.p. The first in point of diffusion, and the second in culture and copiousness, of the Dravidian languages of the Indian Peninsula. It is "spoken all along the eastern coast of the Peninsula, from the neighbourhood of Pulicut" (24 m. N. of Madras) "where it supersedes Tamil, to Chitacole, where it begins to yield to the Orya (see ORIYA), and inland it prevails as far as the eastern boundary of the Mahratha country and Mysore, including within its range the 'Ceded Districts' and Kurnool (see KURNOOL), a considerable part of the territories of the Nizam... and a portion of the Nargp country and Gondvâna" (Bp. Caldwell's Dravid. Gram. Introd. p. 29). Telogo is the name given to the language of the people themselves (other forms being, according to Bp. Caldwell, Telunga, Telinga, Tailinga, Tenugu, and Tenungu), as the language of Telingâna (see TELINGA (1)). It is this language (as appears in the passage from Fryer) that used to be, perhaps sometimes is, called Gentoo at Madras. [Also see BEADAG.]

1673.—"Their Language they call generally Gentoo... the peculiar name of their speech is Telinga."—Fryer. 33.

1793.—"The Tellinga language is said to be in use, at present, from the River Pennar in the Carnatic, to Orissa, along the coast, and inland to a very considerable distance."—Rennell, Memoir, 3rd ed. p. [ext.]

TEMBOOL. Betel-leaf. Skt. tāmbülā, adopted in Pers. as tāmbül, and in Ar. al-tambūl. [It gives its name to the Tamboli or Tamoli, sellers of betel in the N. Indian bazars.]

1298.—"All the people of this city, as well as the rest of India, have a custom of perpetually keeping in the mouth a certain leaf called Tembul. —"Marco Polo, ii. 338.

1498,—"And he held in his left hand a very great cup of gold as high as a half a usual pot . . . into which he spat a certain herb which the men of this country chew for solace, and which herb they call atambor."—Roteiro de V. de Gama, 59.

1510,—"He also eats certain leaves of herbs, which are like the leaves of the sour orange, called by some tamboli."—Vartehina, 110.

1563. —"Only you should know that Avicenna calls the betre (Betel) tembul, which seems a word somewhat corrupted, since everybody pronounces it tambul, and not tambali."—Garcia, f. 37th.

TENASERIM, n.p. A city and territory on the coast of the Peninsula of Further India. It belonged to the ancient kingdom of Pegu, and fell with that to Ava. When we took from the latter the provinces east and south of the Delta of the Irawadi, after the war of 1824-26, these were officially known as "the Martaban and Tenasserim Province," or often as "the Tenasserim Provinces." We have the name probably from the Malay form Tannasari. We do not know what language the name originally belongs. The Burmese call it Ta-yan-tha-ri. ["The name Tenasserim (Malay Tanah-sari), the land of happiness or delight," was long ago given by the Malays to the Burmese province, which still keeps it, the Burmese corruption being Tanyang-sari] (Gray, in Pygarg de Laval, quoted below.)

1442.—"The inhabitants of the shore of the Ocean came thither (to Hormuz) from the countries of Chin (China), Java, Bengala, the cities of Zirbâd (q.v.), of Tenasari, of Sokotara, of Shadrinno (see SARNAU), of the Isles of Diah Malal (Maldives).”—Alber-racazâ, in Not. et Ext. xiv. 429.

1498.—"Tenasar is peopled by Christians, and the King is also a Christian . . . in this land is much brasil, which makes a fine vermillion, as good as the grain, and it costs here 8 cruzados a bahar, whilst in Quyro (Cairo) it costs 60; also there is here nooswood, but not much."—Roteiro de V. de Gama, 110.

1501.—Tanaser appears in the list of places in the East Indies of which Amerigo Vespucci had heard from the Portuguese fleet at C. Verde. Printed in Baddeley Boni's II Milione, pp. liii. seqq.

1506,—"At Tenasar grows all the pervi (brazil), and it costs 1½ ducats the baer (bahar), equal to 4 bahtars. This place, though on the coast, is on the mainland. The King is a Gentile; and thence come pepper, cinnamon, galanga, camphor that is eaten, and camphor that is not eaten. . . . This is indeed the first mart of spices in India."—Leonardo Co' Masser, in Archite. Soc. Ital. p. 25.

1510.—"The city of Tannasari is situated near the sea, etc."—Vartehina, 196. This adventurer's account of Tenasserim is an imposture. He describes it by implication as in India Proper, somewhere to the north of Coromandel.

1516.—"And from the Kingdom of Peiug as far as a city which has a seaport, and is named Tenassary, to which there are a hundred leagues."—Beronis, 188.

1568.—"The Pilot told vs that wee were by his altitute not farre from a citie called Tanassary, in the Kingdom of Pegu."—C. Frederik, in Habl. ii. 359. See Lancaster.

e. c. 1590.—"In Kompanget (Cambay) a Nékhad (Nacoda) gets 800 R. . . . In Pegu and Dannahari, he gets half as much again as in Cambay."—I, i. 281.

[1598,—"Between two Islands the coast runneth inwards like a bow, wherein lyeth the towne of Tanassarien."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 103. In the same page he writes Tanassaria.

1608.—"The small quantities they have here come from Tannaserye."—Dowser, Letters, i. 222.

c. 1610.—"Some Indians call it (Ceylon) Tenassirin, signifying land of delights, or earthly paradise."—Pygarg de Laval, ii. 110, with Gray's note (Hak. Soc.) quoted above.]

1727.—"Mr. Samuel White was made Shawbandar (Shabunder) or Custom-Master at Morjee (Mergui) and Tanacorerin, and Captain Williams was Admiral of the King's Navy."—A. Hamilton, ii. 64; [ed. 1741].

1783.—"Tanasserin . . ."—Forrest V. to Mergui, 4.

TERAI, TERYE. s. Hind. tarali, 'moist (land) from tar, 'moist' or 'green.' [Others, however, connect it with taral, tarali, 'beneath the Himalaya.'] The term is specially applied to a belt of marshy and jungly land which runs along the foot of the Himalaya north of the Ganges, being that zone in which the moisture which has sunk into the talus of porous material exudes. A tract on the south side of the Ganges, now part of Bhagalpur, was also formerly known as the Jungle-terry (q.v.).

1793.—"Hillbora, though standing very little below the level of Cheeria Ghat's top is nevertheless comprehended in the Turry or Turryani of Nepaul... Turryani properly signifies low marshy lands, and is sometimes applied to the flats lying below the hills in the interior of Nepaul, as well as the low tract bordering immediately on the Company's northern frontier."—Kirkpatrick's Nepaul (1811), p. 40.

1824.—"Mr. Boulundson said he was sorry to learn from the rajah that he did not consider the unhealthy season of the Terrai yet over... I asked Mr. B. if it were true that the monkeys forsook these woods during the unwholesome months. He answered that not the monkeys only, but everything which had the breath of life instinctively deserts them from the beginning of April to October. The tigers go up to the hills, the antelopes and wild hogs make incursions into the cultivated plain... and not so much as a bird can be heard or seen in the frightful solitude."—Heber, ed. 1814, 250-251.

The word is used as an adj. to describe a severe form of malarial fever, and also a sort of double felt hat, worn when the sun is not so powerful as to require the use of a sola topee.

[1859.—"Remittent has been called Jungle Fever, Terai Fever, Bengal Fever, &c., from the locality in which it originated...."—Moore, Family Med. for India, 211.

[1880.—"A Terai hat is sufficient for a Collector."—Ali Baba, 85.]

THAKOOR, s. Hind. thakur, from Skt. thakura, 'an idol, a deity.' Used as a term of respect, Lord, Master, &c., but with a variety of specific applications, of which the most familiar is as the style of Rajput nobles. It is also in some parts the honorific designation of a barber, after the odd fashion which styles a tailor khaliya (see CALEFFA); a bhikshiti, juwad-dr (see JEMADAR); a sweeper, mehtar. And in Bengal it is the name of a Brahman family, which its members have Anglicised as Tagore, of whom several have been men of character and note, the best known being Dwarkanath Tagore, "a man of liberal opinions and enterprising character" (Wilson), who died in London in 1840.

[1810.—"The nobles in blood (in the Muidives) add to their name Tacourou."—Pyjard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 217.

[1798.—"The Thacur (so Rajput chief- tains are called) was nacked from the waist upwards, except the sacrificial thread or scarf on his shoulders and a turban on his head."—L. of Colebrooke, 492.

[1851.—"After the sons have gone to their respective offices, the mother changing her clothes retires into the thakurghar (the place of worship), and goes through her morning service."—S. C. Bose, The Hindus as they are, 13.]

THERMANTIDOTE. s. This learned word ("heat-antidote") was applied originally, we believe, about 1830-32 to the invention of the instrument which it designates, or rather to the application of the instrument, which is in fact a winnowing machine fitted to a window aperture, and inclosed in wet tatties (q.v.), so as to drive a current of cooled air into a house during hot, dry weather. We have a dim remembrance that the invention was ascribed to Dr. Spilsbury.

1831.—"To the 21st of June, this oppressive weather held its sway; our only consolation grapes, iced-water, and the thermantidote, which answers admirably, almost too well, as on the 22d. I was laid up with rheumatic fever and lumbago, occasioned... by standing or sleeping before it."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 208.

[Mrs Parkes saw for the first time a thermantidote at Cawnpore in 1830.—Ibid. i. 134.]

1840.—"... The thermometer at 112° all day in our tents, notwithstanding tatties, phermanticotes, and every possible invention that was likely to lessen the stifling heat."—Gibson, Court and Camp of Runjet Singh, 132.

THUG. s. Hind. thug, Mahr. thak, Skt. thuya, 'a cheat, a swindler.' And this is the only meaning given and illustrated in R. Drummond's Illustrations of Guzerattee, &c. (1808). But it has acquired a specific meaning, which cannot be exhibited more precisely or tersely than by Wilson:

*This book was printed in England, whilst the author was in India; doubtless he was innocent of this quaint error.
"Latterly applied to a robber and assassin of a peculiar class, who sallying forth in a gang ... and in the character of wayfarers, either on business or pilgrimage, fall in with other travellers on the road, and having gained their confidence, take a favourable opportunity of strangling them by throwing their handkerchiefs round their necks, and then plundering them and carrying their bodies." The proper specific designation of these criminals was phanégar or phánásígar, from phanási, 'a noose.'

According to Mackenzie (in As. Res. xiii.) the existence of gangs of these murderers was unknown to Europeans till shortly after the capture of Seringapatam in 1799, when about 100 were apprehended in Bangalore. But Fryer had, a century earlier, described a similar gang caught and executed near Surat. The Phánási gar (under that name) figured prominently in an Anglo-Indian novel called, we think, "The English in India," in which one of the present writers read in early boyhood, but cannot now trace. It must have been published between 1826 and 1830.

But the name of Thug first became thoroughly familiar not merely to that part of the British public taking an interest in Indian affairs, but even to the mass of Anglo-Indian society, through the publication of the late Sir William Sleeman's book "Romance second; or a Vocabulary of the peculiar language used by the Thugs, with an Introduction and Appendix, descriptive of that Fraternity, and of the Measures which have been adopted by the Supreme Government of India for its Suppression," Calcutta, 1836; and by an article on it which appeared in the Edinburgh Review, for Jan. 1837, (lxxiv. 357). One of Col. Meadows Taylor's Indian romances also, Memoirs of a Thug (1839), has served to make the name and system familiar. The suppression of the system, for there is every reason to believe that it was brought to an end, was organised in a masterly way by Sir W. (then Capt.) Sleeman, a wise and admirable man, under the government and support of Lord William Bentinck. [The question of the Thugs and their modern successors has been again discussed in the Quarterly Review, Oct. 1901.]

c. 1665.—"Les Voleurs de ce pays-là sont les plus adroits du monde; ils ont l'usage d'un certain lasso à noéud coulant, qu'ils savent jeter si subtilement au col d'un homme, quand ils sont à sa portée, qu'ils l'embrasent et l'étouffent; cet acte de force un moment ils l'étranglent ..." &c.—Thérèse, v. 123.

1673.—"They were Fifteen, all of a Gang, who used to lurk under Hedges in narrow Lanes, and as they found Opportunity, by a Device of a Weight tied to a Cotton Bow-string made of Guts, ... they used to throw it upon Passengers, so that winding it about their Necks, they pulled them from their Beasts and dragging them upon the Ground strangled them, and possessed themselves of what they had ... they were sentenced to Lex Talionis, to be hang'd; wherefore being delivered to the Catech or Sheriff's Men, they led them two Miles with Ropes round their Necks to some Wild Date-trees: In their way thither they were cheerful, and went singing, and snuffing Tobacco ... as jolly as it going to a Wedding; and the Young Lad now ready to be tied up, boasted, That though he were not 14 Years of Age, he had killed his Fifteen Men. ..."—Fryer, 87.

1785.—"Several men were taken up for a most cruel method of robbery and murder, practised on travellers, by a tribe called Phanéegars, or stranglers ... under the pretence of selling them the same way, they enter into conversation with the strangers, share their sweetmeats, and pay them other little attentions, until an opportunity offers of suddenly throwing a rope round their necks with a slip-knot, by which they most dexterously contrive to strangle them on the spot."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 13; [2nd ed. ii. 307].

1808.—"Phanéen. A term of abuse in Gazaret, applied also, truly, to thieves or robbers who strangle children in secret or travellers on the road."—R. Drummond, India, i. 104.

1823.—"In the more northern parts of India these murderers are called Thugs, signifying deceivers."—As. Res. xiii. 250.

1823.—"The Thugs are composed of all castes. Mahomedans even were admitted: but the great majority are Hindus; and among these the Brahmins, chiefly of the Bundelcund tribes, are in the greatest numbers, and generally direct the operations of the different bands."—Malcolm, Central India, ii. 187.

1841.—"The inhabitants of Jubbulpore were this morning assembled to witness the execution of 25 Thugs. ... The number of Thugs in the neighbouring countries is enormous; 115, I believe, belonged to the party of which 25 were executed, and the remainder are to be transported; and report says there are as many in Sanger Jail."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 201-202.

1843.—"It is by the command, and under the special protection of the most powerful goddesses that the Thugs join themselves to the unsuspecting traveller, make friends with him, slip the noose round his neck, plunge their knives in his eyes, hide him in the earth, and divide his money and baggage."—Macaulay, Speech on Gates of Somanath.

1874.—"If a Thug makes strangling of travellers a part of his religion, we do not allow him the free exercise of it."—W. Newman, in Fortnightly Rev., N.S. xx. 151.

[Tavernier writes: "The remainder of the people, who do not belong to either of these four castes, are called Pauzeour." This word Mr. Ball (ii. 185) suggests to be equivalent to either pariah or phansigar. Here he is in error. Pauzeour is really Skt. Pantha-Gauda, the five classes of northern Brahmins, for which see Wilson, (Indian Caste, ii. 124 seqq.).]

TIBET, n.p. The general name of the vast and lofty table-land of which the Himalaya forms the southern marginal range, and which may be said roughly to extend from the Indus elbow, N.W. of Kashmir, to the vicinity of Sining-fu in Kansuh (see SLING) and to Tatsienlu on the borders of Szechuen, the last a distance of 1800 miles. The origin of the name is obscure, but it came to Europe from the Mahometans of Western Asia; its earliest appearance being in some of the Arab Geographies of the 9th century.

Names suggestive of Tibet are indeed used by the Chinese. The original form of these (according to our friend Prof. Terrien de la Cepperie) was Tu-pot; a name which is traced to a prince so called, whose family reigned at Liang-chau, north of the Yellow R. (in modern Kansuh), but who in the 5th century was driven far to the south-west, and established in eastern Tibet a State to which he gave the name of Tu-pot, afterwards corrupted into Tu-poh and Tu-fan. We are always on ticklish ground in dealing with derivations from or through the Chinese. But it is doubtless possible, perhaps even probable, that these names passed into the western form Tibet, through the communication of the Arabs in Turkestan with the tribes on their eastern border. This may have some corroborative from the prevalence of the name Tibet, or some proximate form, among the Mongols, as we may gather both from Carpini and Rubruck in the 13th century (quoted below), and from Sanang Setzen, and the Mongol version of the Bodhisattva several hundred years later. These latter write the name (as represented by I. J. Schmidt), Tibet and Tbolt.

1851.—"On this side of China are the countries of the Taghuzhan and the Khakan of Tibet; and that is the termination of China on the side of the Turks."—Relation, &c., tr. par Reinaud, pt. i. p. 69.

c. 880.—"Quand un étranger arrive au Tibet intérieur, il éprouve, sans pouvoir s'en rendre compte, un sentiment de gaieté et de bien être qui persiste jusqu'au départ."—Ibn Khordadbe, in J. As. Soc. vi. tom. v. 522.

c. 910.—"The country in which lives the goat which produces the musk of China, and that which produces the musk of Tibet are one and the same: only the Chinese get into their hands the goats which are nearest their side, and the people of Tibet do likewise. The superiority of the musk of Tibet over that of China is due to two causes: first, that the musk-goat on the Tibetan side of the frontier finds aromatic plants, whilst the tracts on the Chinese side only produce plants of a common kind."—Relation, &c., pt. 2. pp. 114-115.

c. 920.—"This country has been named Tibet because of the establishment there of the Himyarites, the word thbat signifying to fix or establish oneself. That etymology is the most likely of all that have been proposed. And it is thus that Di'bal, son of Ali-al-Khuzala, vaunts this fact in a poem, in which when disputing with Al-Kumairi he extols the descendants of Kaslan above those of Nisar, saying:

"Tis they who have been famous by their writings at the gate of Merv,

And who were writers at the gate of China,

Tis they who have bestowed on Samar-kan the name of Shamr,

And who have transported thither the Tibetans." (A1-Tibbatina.)

Mos. i. 352.

c. 976.—"From the sea to Tibet is 4 months' journey, and from the sea of Fars to the country of Kanauj is 3 months' journey."—Ban Haukel, in Elliot, i. 35.

* This refers to an Arab legend that Samarkand was founded in very remote times by Tobbat-al-Akbar, Himyarite King of Yemen (see c. 961), by Jacob, ii. 183, and the following: "The author of the Travels, in the Figure of the Earth says on this subject: "This is what was told me by Abu-Bakr-Dinashi—'I have seen over the great gate of Samarkand an iron tablet bearing an inscription, which, according to the people of the place, was engraved in Himyarite characters, and is an old tradition related, had been the work of Tobbat.'"—Shahbuddin Dinashi, in Nat. et Ant. xiii. 274."

s. This (tikal) is a word which has long been in use by foreign traders to Burma, for the quasi-standard weight of (uncoined) current silver, and is still in general use in B. Burma as applied to that value. This weight is by the Burmese themselves called kyat, and is the hundredth part of the viss (q.v.), being thus equivalent to about 13 rupee in value. The origin of the word tikal is doubtful. Sir A. Phayre suggests that possibly it is a corruption of the Burmese words tu-kyat, "one kyat." On the other hand perhaps it is more probable that the word may have represented the Indian takā (see TUCKA). The word is also used by traders to Siam. But there likewise it is a foreign term; the Siamese word being bet. In Siam the tikal is according to Crawford a silver coin, as well as a weight equivalent to 2253 grs. English. In former days it was a short cylinder of silver bent double, and bearing two stamps, thus half-way between the Burmese bullion and proper coin.*

1759. — "a dozen or 20 fowls may be bought for a Tikal (little more than 1/4 a Crown)." — In Deane and Stret., Or. Rep. i. 121.

* [Col. Temple notes that the pronunciation has always been twofold. At present in Burma it is usual to pronounce it like tikel, and in Siam like teakul. He regards it as certain that it comes from takā through Takah and Peguān fkc.]
TICCA, TICKER. 919

TICCA, and vulg. TICKER. adj. This is applied to any person or thing engaged by the job, or on contract. Thus a ticca carry is a hired carriage, a ticca doctor is a surgeon not in the regular service but temporarily engaged by Government. From Hind, thikā, thikāyā, 'hire, fare, fixed price.'

[1813. — TEECKA. hire, fare, contract, job. —Gloss. to Fifth Report, s.v.]

1827. — A Rule, Ordinance and Regulation for the good Order and Civil Government of the Settlement of Fort William in Bengal, and for regulating the number and fare of Teeka Palankeens and Teeka Bearers in the Town of Calcutta . . . registered in the Supreme Court of Judicature, on the 27th June, 1827. —Bengal Regulations of 1827.

1875. — 'Leaving our servants to jauber over our heavier baggage, we got into a ticca gharry,' hired trap,' a bit of civilization I had hardly expected to find so far in the Mofussil.' —Life in the Mofussil. ii. 94.

TICKA. s. Hind, tikā, Skt. tilaka, a mark on the forehead made with coloured earth or unguents, as an ornament, to mark sectarian distinction, accession to the throne, at betrothal, &c; also a sort of spangle worn on the forehead by women. The word has now been given the additional meaning of the mark made in vaccination, and the tikwala Sahib is the vaccination officer.

[c. 1798. — ' . . . another was sent to Kutch to bring thence the tikā . . . .' —Mr Hume in All. Life of Tipu, 251]

1832. — 'In the centre of their foreheads is a teeka (or spot) of lamp-black.' —Herkules, qanoon-E-Islam, 2nd ed. 139.

[c. 1875. — 'When a sudden stampede of the children, accompanied by violent yells and sudden fall, has taken place as I entered a village, I have been informed, by way of apology, that it was not I whom the children feared, but that they supposed that I was the Tikwala Sahib.' —Punjab Gazetteer, Rohilkad, p. 9.]

TICKY-TOCK. This is an unmeaning refrain used in some French songs, and by foreign singing masters in their scales. It would appear from the following quotations to be of Indian origin.

c. 1755. — 'These gentry (the band with nautch-girls) are called Tickytaur boys, from the two words Ticky and Taw, which they continually repeat, and which they chant with great vehemence.' —Ives, 75.

[c. 1838. — 'Each pair of boys then, having privately arranged to represent two separate articles . . . comes up to the stage, and one of the pair says dik dik, daun daun, which apparently has about as much meaning as the analogous English nursery saying, 'Dickory, dickory dock.' —Panjab Gazetteer, Hoshārpur, p. 35.]

[TIER-CUTTY, s. This is Malavāl. tīgīr-kattī, the knife used by a Tiyan or toddy-drawer for scarifying the palm-trees. The Tiyan caste take their title from Malavāl. tīgīr, which again comes from Malavāl. tīrī, Skt. dīra, 'an island,' and derive their name from their supposed origin in Ceylon.

1799. — 'The negadees (nogdī, 'cash-payment') on houses, banksauls (see BANK-SHALL), Tiers' knives.' —Ibid. iii. 324.]

TIFFIN. s. Luncheon, Anglo-Indian and Hindustani, at least in English households. Also to Tiff, v. to take luncheon. Some have derived this word from Ar. tajīmun, 'diversion, amusement,' but without history, or evidence of such an application of the Arabic word. Others have derived it from Chinese ch'ih-fan, 'eating,' which is only an additional example that anything whatever may be plausibly resolved into Chinese monosyllables. We believe the word to be a local survival of an English colloquial or slang term. Thus we find in the Lexicon Balatronicum, compiled originally by Capt. Grose (1755): "Tiffing, eating or drinking out of meal-times," besides other meanings, Wright (Dict. of obsolete and Provincial English) has: "Tiff, s. (1) a draught of liquor, (2) small beer;" and Mr. Davies (Supplemental English Glossary) gives some good quotations both of this substantive and of a verb "to tiff," in the sense of 'take off a draught.' We should conjecture that Grose's sense was a modification of this one, that his "tiffin" was a participial noun from the verb to tiff, and that the Indian tiffin is identical with the participial noun. This has perhaps some corroboration both from the form "tiffin" used in some earlier Indian examples, and from the Indian use of the verb "to Tiff." [This view is accepted by Prof. Skeat, who derives tiff from Norweg. tuff, a drawing in of the breath, sniff, term, to sniff (Concise Diet. s.v.; and see 9 ser. N. d. Q. iv. 425, 460, 506; v. 13.).] Rumphius has a curious passage which we have tried in vain to connect with the present word; nor can we find the words he mentions in either Portuguese or Dutch Dictionaries. Speaking of Todd y and the like he says:

"Hominis autem qui eas (potiones) colligunt, nec praegrant, dicitur Portu galleco nomine Tribunales, atque opus ipsum Tribunae nostratibus Belgis tiffenas (Herb. Ambi dinase, 1. 5.)."

We may observe that the comparatively late appearance of the word tiffin in our documents is perhaps due to the fact that when dinner was early no lunch was customary. But the word, to have been used by an English novelist in 1811, could not then have been new in India.

We now give examples of the various uses:

Tiffin. s. In the old English senses (in which it occurs also in the form tip, and is probably allied to tipple and tipsy); [see Prof. Skeat, quoted above].

(1) For a draught:
1758.—"Monday . . . Sen on. Returned  to my room. Made a tiff of warm punch, and to bed before nine."—Journal of a Senior Fellow, in the Idler, No. 33.

(2) For small beer:
1604.—" . . . make waste more prodigal Than when our beer was good, that John may float To Styx in beer, and lift up Charon's boat With wholesome waves: and as the conduits ran With elcat at the Coronation, So let your channels flow with single tiff, For John I hope is crown'd . . . ."

On John Dawson, Butler of Christ Church, in Bishop Corbet's Poems, ed. 1807, pp. 207-8.

TO TIFF, v. in the sense of taking off a draught.
1812.—"He tiff'd his punch and went to rest."—Conde, Dr. Syntax, i. Canto v.

(This is quoted by Mr. Davies.)

Tiffin (the Indian substantive).
1807.—"Many persons are in the habit of sitting down to a repast at one o'clock, which is called tiffin, and is in fact an early dinner."—Condict's Cyclopa. i. 83.
1810.—"The (Mahommmedan) ladies, like ours, indulge in tiffings (slight repasts), it being delicate to eat but little before company."—Williamson, V. M. i. 322.

"(published 1812)" (The dinner is scarcely touched, as every person eats a hearty meal called tiffin, at 2 o'clock, at home."—Maria Graham, 29.
1811.—"Gertrude was a little unfortunate in her situation, which was next below Mrs. Fashionist, and who . . . detailed the delights of India, and the tiffin of its day; the changing lines, the corresponding . . . the idleness, the dissipation, the sleeping and the necessity of sleep, the gay tiffings, were all delightful to her in reciting . . . ."—The Countess and Gertrude, or Modes of Discipline, byastic Maria Hawkins, i. 12.
1824.—"The entreaty of my friends compelled me to remain to breakfast and an early tiffin . . . ."—Seyt, Wonders of Elbo, ch. iii.

1832.—"Reader! I, as well as Pliny, had an uncle, an East Indian Uncle . . . . everybody has an Indian Uncle. . . . He is not always so orientally rich as he is reputed; but he is always orientally munificent. Call upon him at any hour from two till five, he insists on your taking a tiffin! The English corresponding term is luncheon: but how meagre a shadow is the European meal to its glowing Asiatic cousin."—De Quincey, Cauties of Roman Meals, in Works, iii. 259.
1847.—"Come home and have some tiffin, Dobbin," a voice cried behind him, as a padgy hand was laid on his shoulder . . . . But the Captain had no heart to go a feasting with Joe Sedley."—Vandy Fair, ed. 1807, i. 285.
1850.—"A vulgar man who enjoys a champagne tiffin and swindles his servants . . . may be a pleasant companion to those who do not hold him in contempt as a vulgar knave, but he is not a gentleman."—Sir C. Napier, Piewall Address.
1853.—"This was the case for the prosecution the court now adjourned for tiffin."—Oakfield, i. 319.
1882.—"The last and most vulgar form of 'nibbling' the press is well known as the luncheon or tiffin trick. It used to be confined to advertising tradesmen and hotel-keepers, and was practised on newspaper reporters. Now it has been practised on a loftier scale . . . ."—Setty, Rec., March 25, 357.
TO TIFF, in the Indian sense.

1503.—"He hesitated, and we were interrupted by a summons to tiff at Floyer's. After tiffin Cloce said he should be glad to go." —Elphinstone, in Life, i. 116.

1514.—"We found a pool of excellent water, which is scarce on the hills, and laid down to tiff on a full soft bed, made by the grass of last year and this. After tiffing, I was cold and unwell." —Hall, p. 283.

Tiffin being here is a participle, but its use shows how the noun tiffin would be originally formed.

1516.—"The huntsman now informed them all! They were to tiff at Bobbry Hall. Mounted again, the party starts. Upset the hackeries and carts. Hammels (see HUMMAUL) and palanquins and doolies.

Dobies (see DHOBY) and Burrawa-1(7) and cooie.

The General Monarch, or Adventures of Qui H., by Qui (Canto viliii.).

[Burrawa is probably H. thugga, 'a pander.]

1829.—"I was tiffin with him one day, when the subject turned on the sagacity of elephants. . . ." —John Skipp, ii. 267.

1859.—"Go home, Jack. I will tiff with you to-day at half-past two." —J. Lornet, Wanderings in India, p. 13.

The following, which has just met our eye, is bad grammar, according to Anglo-Indian use:

1855.—"Look here. Randolph, don't you know," said Sir Peel . . . . Here you've been gallivanting through India, riding on elephants, and tiffining with Rajahs . . . .

— Punch, Escape of Parliament, April 26, p. 204.

TIGER, s. The royal tiger was apparently first known to the Greeks by the expedition of Alexander, and a little later by a live one which Seleucus sent to Athens. The animal became, under the Emperors, well known to the Romans, but fell out of the knowledge of Europe in later days, till it again became familiar in India. The Greek and Latin τίγρα, tigris, is said to be from the old Persian word for an arrow, tigo, which gives the modern Pers. (and Hind.) tir.*

Pliny says of the River Tigris: "a celeritate Tigris incipit voceari. Its appellant Med. supittam" (vi. 27). In speaking of the animal and its "celeritate tremendae." Pliny evidently glances at this etymology, real or imaginary. So does Pausanias probably, in his remarks on its colour. [This view of the origin of the name is accepted by Schirard (Prehist. Ant. of the Arman Peoples, E.T. 250), who writes: "Nothing like so far back in the history of the Indo-Europeans does the lion's dreadful rival for supremacy over the beasts, the tiger, go. In India the songs of the Rigveda have nothing to say about him; his name (cyphed) first occurs in the Atharvaveda, i.e. at a time when the Indian immigration has must have extended much farther towards the Ganges; for it is in the reeds and grasses of Bengal that we have to look for the tiger's proper home. Nor is he mentioned among the beasts of prey in the Avesta. The district of Hyrcania, whose numerous tigers the later writers of antiquity speak of with especial frequency, was then called Vbrhana, 'wolf-land.' It is, therefore, not improbable . . . that the tiger has spread in relatively late times from India over portions of W. and N. Asia."

* Sir H. Rawlinson gives Cnns as old Persian for an arrow (see Herod. vol. iii. p. 529), Villiers seems to consider it rather an indication than a known word for an arrow. He says: "Besides the name of that river (Tigris) Ascult, which often occurs in the Akkadian, and which properly signifies 'running' or 'swift'; another Med.-persian name Tigris is found in the cuneiform inscriptions, and is cognate with the Zend word tigfr, tiferen, and Palsh tihron, i.e. a running river, which is entered in Anquetil's vocabulary. And these, along with the Persian τίγρα, tir, 'a sword,' tī and τίγρα 'sharp,' are to be regarded to the Zend root Titr."

C. B.C. 325.—"The Indians think the Tiger (τίγρα) a great deal stronger than the elephant. Nearchus says he saw the skins of tigers, but did not see the beast itself, and that the Indians assert the tiger to be as big as the biggest horse; whilst in swiftness and strength there is no creature to be compared to him. And when he engages the elephant he springs on its head, and easily throttles it. Moreover, the creatures which we have seen and call tigers are only jackals which are dappled, and of a kind bigger than ordinary jackals."—Arrian, Indica, xv. We apprehend that this big dappled jackal (nēhar) is equivalent for a knarr."

C. B.C. 322.—"In the island of Tylös, there is also another wonderful thing they say: for there is a certain tree, from which they cut sticks, and these are very handsome articles, having a certain variegated colour, like the skin of a tiger. The wood is very heavy; but if it is struck against any solid substance it shivers like a piece of

c. B.C. 321.—"And Ulpius ... said: 'Do we anywhere find the word used a masculine, τίγρινος, that I know that Philemon says thus in his Naeera: 'A. We've seen the tigress (ἐν τιγρίνος) that Seleucus sent us: Are we not bound to send Seleucus back Some beast in fair exchange?'

In Athenaeus, xiii. 57.

c. B.C. 320.—"According to Megasthenes, the largest tigers are found among the Prasii, almost twice the size of lions, and of such strength that a tame one led by four persons seized a mule by its hinder leg, overpowered it, and dragged it to him."—Strabo, xv, ch. 1, § 37 (Hamilton and Falconer's E.T. iii. 97).

c. B.C. 19.—"And Augustus came to Samos, and again passed the winter there ... and all sorts of embassies came to him; and the Indians who had previously sent messages proclaiming friendship, now sent to make a solemn treaty, with presents, and among other things including tigers, which were then seen for the first time by the Romans; and if I am not mistaken by the Greeks also."—Dio Cassius, liv. 9. c. A.D. 70.—"The Emperor Augustus ... in the letter that Q. Tullero and Fabius Maximus were Consuls together ... was the first of all others that showed a tame tigre within a cage: but the Emperor Claudius foure at once. ... Tygres are bred in Hircania and India; this beast is most dreadful for incomparable swiftness."—Pliny, by Ph. Holland, i. 291.

c. 80-90.—"Wherefore the land is called Dachanabalas (see DECCAN), for the South is called Dacanost in their tongue. And the land that lies in the interior above this towards the East embraces many tracts, some of them of deserts or of great mountains, with all kinds of wild beasts, panthers and tigers (τίγρεσι) and elephants, and immense serpents (δράκωνσι) and hyenas (κροκόττα) and cynopsycha of many species, and many and populous nations till you come to the Ganges."—Periplus, § 50.

c. A.D. 180.—"That beast again, in the talk of Ctesias about the Indians, which is alleged to be called by them Martyrte (Martidóriat), and by the Greeks Andrugrapus (Mancuter), I am convinced is really the tiger (τίγρινος, τίγραν). The story that he has a triple range of teeth in each jaw, and sharp prickles at the tip of his tail which he shoots at those who are at a distance, like the arrows of an archer,—I don't believe it to be true, but only to have been generated by the excess of fear which the beast inspires. They have been wrong also about his colour:—no doubt when they see him in the bright sunlight he takes that colour and looks red; or perhaps it may be because of his going so fast, and because even when not running he is constantly darting from side to side; and then (to be sure) it is always from a long way off that they see him."—Pausanias, IX. xxi. 4. [See Frazer's tr. i. 470; v. 86. Marty-choras is here Pers. mardwakhtar, 'eater of men.]

Thus Marco Polo can only speak of this huge animal, striped black and red and white, as of a Lion. And a medieval Bestiary has a chapter on the tiger in which the lines are: "Uin Bestiary qui est elapse Tigres, c'est une maniere de serpent."—(In Cahier et Martin, Mélanges d'Archeol. ii. 110.)

1553.—"... Beginning from the point of Chingapura and all the way to Puliocnamliham, i.e. the whole length of the Kingdom of Malaca ... there is no other town with a name except this City of Malacan, only some hundred of fishermen, and in the interior a very few villages. And indeed the most of these wretched people sleep at the top of the highest trees they can find, for up to a height of 20 palms the tigers can seize them at a leap; and if anything saves the poor people from these beasts it is the bonfires they keep burning at night, which the tigers are much afraid of. In fact these are numerous that many come into the city itself at night in search of prey. And if this has happened, since we took the place, that a tiger leapt into a garden surrounded by a good high timber fence, and lifted a beam of wood with three slaves who were laid by the hels, and with these made a clean leap over the fence."—Barros, ii. vi. 1. Last I am doing the great historian wrong as to this Munchhausen-like story, I give the original: "E j a aconteceo ... saltar hum tigre em hum quintal cepado de madeira e hum alto, e levon hum tronco de madeira com trez (tros) osesvos que estavam prezos nelle, com os suas saiton de claro em claro por cima da cerca."
1583.—"We also escaped the peril of the multitude of tigers which infest those tracts" (the Pegu delta) 'and pray on whatever they can get at. And although we were on that account anchored in midstream, nevertheless it was asserted that the ferocity of these animals was such that they would press even into the water to seize their prey.'—Gasparo Balbi, f. 94c.

1586.—"We went through the wildnesses because the right way was full of thieves, when we passed the country of Guerra, where we found but few Villages, but almost all Wilderness, and saw many Buffes, Swine, and Deer. Grasse longer than a man, and very many Tigres."—R. Fick, in Purchas, ii. 1736.

1675.—"Going in quest whereof, one of our Soldiers, a Youth, killed a Tigre-Royal; it was brought home by 30 or 40 Combés (Koonbee), the Body tied to a long Bamboo, the Tail extended . . . it was a Tigre of the Biggest and Noblest Kind, Five Feet in Length beside the Tail. Three and a Half in Height, it was of a light Yellow, streaked with Black, like a Tabby Cat . . . the Visage Fiery and Majestick, the Teeth gnashing . . ."—Flyer, 176.

1683.—"In ye afternoon they found a great Tiger, one of ye black men shot a barbed arrow into his Buttock. Mr. Frenchfield and Capt. Raynes alighted off their horses and advanced towards the thicket where ye Tiger lay. The people making a great noise. ye Tiger flew out upon Mr. Frenchfield, and he shot him with a brace of Bullets into ye breast : at which he made a great noise, and returned again to his den. The Black Men seeing of him wounded fell upon him, but the Tiger had so much strength as to kill 2 men, and wound a third, before he died. At Night ye Egea sent me the Tiger."—Hodges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 66-67.

1754.—"There was a Charter granted to the East India Company. Many Disputes arose about it, which came before Parliament; all Arts were used to corrupt or delude the Members; among others a Tyger was bailed with Solemny, on the Day the great Question was to come on. This was such a Noveltie, that several of the Members were drawn off from their Attendance, and absent on the Division . . ."—A Collection of Letters relating to the E. I. Company, &c. (Tract), 1754, p. 13.

1802.—"Les tigres et les léopards sont considérés, autant par les Hindous que par les musulmans, comme étant la propriété des pie (see PEER): aussi les naturels du pays ne sympathisent pas avec les Européens pour la chasse du tigre."—Garcia de Tassis, Rel. Maj., p. 24.

1872.—"One of the Frontier Battalion soldiers approached me, running for his life . . . This was his story:—"Sahib, I was going along with the letters . . . which I had received from your highness . . . a great tiger came out and stood in the path. Then I feared for my life: and the tiger stood, and I stood, and we looked at each other. I had no weapon but my kukri (Kookry) . . . and the Government letters. So I said, 'My lord Tigre, here are the Government letters, the letters of the Honourable Kumpany Bahadur . . . and it is necessary for me to go on with them.' The tiger never ceased looking at me, and when I had done speaking he growled, but he never offered to get out of the way. On this I was much more afraid, so I knelled down and made obeisance to him: but he did not take any more notice of that either, so at last I told him I should report the matter to the Sahib, and I threw down the letters in front of him, and came here as fast as I was able. Sahib, I now ask for your justice against that tiger."—Ib. Col. T. Lewis, A Trip on the Whal, p. 444.

TINDAL s. Malayal. tundul, Telug. tandal, also in Mahr, and other vernaculars tandel, tandail, which Platts connects with tondé, Skt. tanta, 'a line of men,' but the Madras Gloss. derives the S. Indian forms from Mal. tandi, 'an roar, rali, to pull.' The head or commander of a body of men; but in ordinary specific application a native petty officer of lascars, whether on board ship (boatswain) or in the ordnance department, and sometimes the head of a gang of labourers on public works.

c. 1348.—"The second day after our arrival at the port of Kalikari this princess invited the palikal (Nacoda) or owner of the ship, the kothaw (see CRANNY) or clerk, the merchant, the persons of distinction, the tandil . . ."—Fra Budde, iv. 250. The Moorish traveller explains the word as mukaddum (Moeuddum, q.v.), which the French translators render as "general deplétons,” but we may hazard the correction of “Master of the crew.”

c. 1596.—“In large ships there are twelve classes. 1. The Náthada, or owner of the ship. . . 3. The Tándil, or chief of the khâtavés (see CLASSY) or sailors.”—Fryer, ii. 280.

1678.—“The Captain is called Nucueledah, the boatswain Tindal.”—Fryer, 107.

1745.—“One Tindal, or Corporal of Lascars.”—Orme, ii. 399.

1826.—“I desired the tindal, or steerman, to answer, ‘Bombay.’” —Proudhomme Hat, ed. 1873, ii. 157.

TINNEVELLY, n.p. A town and district of Southern India, probably Tíru-nél-veli, ‘Sacred Rice-hedge.’ [The Madras Gloss. gives ‘Sacred Paddy-village.’] The district formed the southern part of the Madura territory, and first became a distinct district about 1744, when the Madura kingdom was incorporated with the territories under the Nawáb of Arcot (Caldwell, H. of Tinnevelly).

TIPPARY, s. Beng. and Hind. tipârî, têparî, the fruit of Physalis peregrina, L., N. O. Solanaceae. It is also known in India as ‘Cape gooseberry,’ [which is usually said to take its name from the Cape of Good Hope, but as it is a native of tropical America, Mr. Ferguson (8 ser. N. d Q. xii. 106) suggests that the word may really be cape or cap, from the peculiarity of its structure noted below.] It is sometimes known as ‘Brazil cherry.’ It gets its generic name from the fact that the inflated calyx encloses the fruit as in a bag or bladder (phœna). It has a slightly acid gooseberry flavour, and makes excellent jam. We have seen a suggestion somewhere that the Bengali name is connected with the word tipârî, ‘inflated,’ which gives its name to a species of tetraden or globe-fish, a fish which has the power of dilating the oesophagus in a singular manner. The native name of the fruit in N.W. India is maik or mâko, but tipârî is in general Anglo-Indian use. The use of an almost identical name for a gooseberry-like fruit, in a Polynesian island (Kingsmill group) quoted below from Wilkes, is very curious, but we can say no more on the matter.

1845.—“On Makin they have a kind of fruit resembling the gooseberry, called by the natives ‘teiparū;’ this they pound, after it is dried, and make with molasses into cakes, which are sweet and pleasant to the taste.” —U.S. Expedition, by C. Wilkes, U.S.N., v. 81.

1878.—“... The enticing tipari in its crinkly covering.”—P. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 49-50.

TIPPOO SAHIB, n.p. The name of this famous enemy of the English power in India was, according to C. P. Brown, taken from that of Tipù Sultàn, a saint whose tomb is near Hyderabad. [Wilks (Hist. Sketches, i. 522, ed. 1869), says that the tomb is at Arcot.]

TIRKUT, s. Foresail. Sea Hind. from Port. trique (Roebuck).

TIYAN, n.p. Malayal. Tîyan, or Tîva, pl. Tîyâr or Tîrâr. The name of what may be called the third caste (in rank) of Malabar. The word signifies ‘islander,’ [from Mal. tîvâ, Skt. ṛṣyā, ‘an island’]; and the people are supposed to have come from Ceylon (see TIER CUTTY).

1570.—“The third class of Pagans are called Tîva, who are artizans.”—Yatashma, 112.

1518.—“The cleanest of these low and rustic people are called Tâlia (read Tivas), who are great labourers, and their chief business is to look after the palm-trees, and gather their fruit, and carry everything ... for hire, because there are no draught cattle in the country.” —Barbares, Lisbon ed. 395.

[1890.—“All Tirs can eat together, and intermarry. The proper duty of the east is to extract the juice from palm-trees, to boil it down to Jaggery (Jaggery), and to distil it into spirituous liquors; but they are also very diligent as cultivators, porters, and cutters of firewood.”—Barbares, Voyage, ii. 115; and see Logan, Malabar, i. 110, 142.]

TOBACCO, s. On this subject we are not prepared to furnish any elaborate article, but merely to bring together a few quotations touching on the introduction of tobacco into India and the East, or otherwise of interest.

[c. 1550.—“... Abâ Kîr would carry the cloth to the market-street and sell it, and with its price buy hay, meat and vegetables and tobacco.”—Burton, Arab. Nights, vii. 210. The only mention in the Nights and the insertion of some scribe.] ...

“... It has happened to me several times, that going through the provinces of Guatemala and Nicaragua I have entered the house of an Indian who had taken this herb, which in the Mexican language is called tabaco, and immediately perceived the sharp fetid smell of this truly diabolical and smoking stink, I was obliged to go away in haste, and seek some other place."—Giovanni Benzon, Hak. Soc. p. 31. (The word tabacco is from the Spanish tobacco of Hayti, and meant, first, the pipe, secondly, the plant, thirdly, the slip which followed its use (Mr. J. Platt, 9 ser. N. a Q. viii. 322.)

1595.—"Et hi" (viz. Ralph Lane and the first settlers in Virginia) "reduces Indian illam plantam quam Tabaccam vocant et Nicotiam, qua contra eruditis ab Indis edocti, usi erant, in Angliam primum, quod suam, intulerunt. Ex illo sano tempore usu coepit esse cerebrillo, et magno prelato, dum quas plurimi gravolentem illum communis, alii lascivientes, alii valutandi consulentes, per tubulam testaeccum inexplicabilis aeditate passim hauriunt, et max e habitibus; adeo ut tabernae Tabaccaee non minus quam cerveisirea et vinarine passim per oppida habeantur. Ut Anglorum corpora (quod saepe ille dixit) qui hac plantae tantopere delectentur in Barbarorum naturam degenerasse videantur; quim si dixam quibus Barbari delectentur et sanari se possit credant."—Gul. Camden, Ann. Regn. Anglorum. (secundum . . . rogunt. Elizabethe, ed. 1717, l. 149.

1602.—"Into the woods thence forth in haste she went to seek for hearles that might him remedy; For shee of herbes had great intendment. Taught of the Nympe which from her infancy her noised had in true Nobility: This whether yt divine Tobacco were. Or Pamachee, or Polygeny. Shee harkned, and brought it to her patient deare. Who at this while lay bleeding out his heart blood neere."—The Fancie Queen. III. v. 52.

1607.—"His Lordship" (E. of Essex at Villarfauna) "made no answer, but called for Tobacco, seeming to give but small credit to this alarm; and so on horseback, with these noblemen and gentlemen on foot beside him, took Tobacco, whilst I was telling his Lordship of the men I had sent forth, and the order I had given them. Within some quarter of an hour, we might hear a good round volley of shot betwixt the 30 men I had sent to the chapel, and the enemy, which made his Lordship cast his pipe from him, and listen to the shooting."—Commentaries of Sir Francis Vere, p. 62.

1585.—"Coh. Odes me I marie what pleasure or felicity they have in taking this rugged Tobacco. It is good for nothing but to choke a man, and fill him full of smoke and embers; there were four died out of one house last week with taking of it, and two more the bell went for yeerelyght: one of them they say will never scape it; he voided a bushel of soot yesterday upward and downward . . . its little better than rats-hane or rosaker."—Every Man in his Humour. iii. 2.

1604.—"Oct. 19. Demise to Tho. Lane and Ph. Bold of the new Impost of 6s. St. and the old Custom of 2d. per pound on Tobacco."—The State Papers Domestic, James I., p. 159.

1604 or 1605.—"In Bijaipor I had found some Tobacco. Never having seen the like in India, I brought some with me, and prepared a handsome pipe of jewel work. . . . His Majesty (Akbar) was enjoying himself after receiving my presents, and asking me how I had collected so many strange things in so short a time, when his eye fell upon the tray with the pipe and its appurtenances; he expressed great surprise and examined the Tobacco, which was made up in pippins; he inquired what it was, and where I had got it. The Nawab Khan-i-Azam replied: 'This is Tobacco, which is well known in Mecca and Medina, and this doctor has brought it as a medicine for your Majesty.' His Majesty looked at it, and ordered me to prepare and take him a pippin. He began to smoke it, when his physician approached and forbade his doing so . . . (omitting much that is curious). 'As I had brought a large supply of Tobacco and had all the nobles, as well as the commoners, take it by the nose, that they might know its virtues, no others sent to ask for some: indeed all, without exception, wanted some, and the practice was introduced. After that the merchants began to sell it, so the custom of smoking spread rapidly."—Ioeand Bw. in Eltott. vi. 165-167.

1610.—"The Turks are also incredible takers of Opium . . . carrying it about with them both in peace and in warre; which they say expelleth all feare, and makes them courageous; but I rather think giddy headed. . . . And perhaps for the self same cause they also delight in Tobacco; they take it through reeds that have Joined unto them great heads of wood to contain it: I doubt not but lately taught them, as brought them by the English: and were it not sometimes lookt into for Monet Basse not long since commanded a pipe to be thrust through the nose of a Turk, and so to be led in derision through the Citie; no question but it would prove a principal commodity. Nevertheless they have not yet taken it in corners, and are so ignorant therein, that that which in England is not saleable, doch passe here amongst them for most excellent."—Sedber. Journal. 66.

1615.—"Il tabacco ancora usano qui" (at Constantinople) "di pigliar in conversazione per gusto: ma io non ho voluto mai provarne, e ne avera cognizione in Italia che molti ne pigliano, ed in particolare il signore cardinale Crescendo quale volta per medicamento insecatagli dal Signor don Virgilio Orsino, che primo di tutti, se io non falso, gli anni addietro lo porto in Roma d'Inghilterra."—P. della Valle, i. 78.

1616.—"Such is the miraculous omnipotence of our strong tasted Tobacco, as it cures all sorts of diseases (which never any druggist could do before) in all persons and at all times. . . . It cures the gout in the feet and (which is miraculous) in that very instant when the smoke thereof, as light, flies vp into the head, the virtue thereof, as heavy, runs down to the little toe. It helps all sorts of agues. It refreshes a weary man, and yet makes a man hungry. Being taken when they go to bed, it makes one sleepe soundly, and yet being taken when a man is sleepe and drousie, it will, as they say, awake his braine, and quicken his understanding. . . . O omnipotent power of Tobacco! And if it could by the smoke thereof chase out dealls, as the smoke of Tobias fish did (which I am sure could smell no stronger) it would serve for a precious Relicke, both for the superstitions Priests, and the insolent Paritaines, to cast out dealls withall."—K. James I., Counterblinde to Tobacco, in Works, pp. 219-220.

1617. — "As the smoking of tobacco (tambakú) had taken very bad effect upon the health and mind of many persons, I ordered that no one should practise the habit. My brother Shah 'Abbas's, also being aware of its evil effects, had issued a command against the use of it in Irán. But Khán'-Alam was so much addicted to smoking, that he could not abstain from it, and often smoked."—Memoirs of Jahangir, in Elliot, v. 85. See the same passage rendered by Blochmann, in Ind. Antiq. i. 161.

1623. — "Incipit nostro seculo in immensa crescere usum tobacco, atque adhibere homines occulta quidem delectatione, ut illi simile assueti sint, difficile postea abstinent."—Bacon, H. Vite et Moris, in B. Montagius's ed. x. 189.

We are unable to give the date or Persian author of the following extract (though clearly of the 17th century), which with an introductory sentence we have found in a fragmentary note in the handwriting of the late Major William Youle, written in India about the beginning of last century: *

"Although Tobacco be the produce of an European Plant, it has nevertheless been in use by our Physicians medieinally for some time past. Nay, some creditable People even have been friendly to the use of it, though from its having been brought sparingly in the first instance from Europe, it rarely prevented it from coming into general use. The Culture of this Plant, however, became speedily almost universal, within a short period after its introduction into Hindostan; and the produce of it rewarded the Cultivator far beyond every other article of Husbandry. This became more especially the case in the reign of Shah Jehan (commenced A.M. 1657) when the Practice of Smoking pervaded all Ranks and Classes within the Empire. Nobles and Beggars, Pious and Wicked, Devotees and Free-thinkers, poets, historians, rhetoricians, doctors and patients, high and low, rich and poor, all! all seemed intoxicated with a decided preference over every other luxury, may even often over the necessities of life. To a stranger no offering was so acceptable as a Whiff, and to a friend one could produce nothing half so grateful as a Chillum. So rooted was the habit that the confirmed Smoker would abstain from Food and Drink rather than relinquish the gratification he derived from inhaling the Fumes of this deleterious Plant! Nature recollas at the very idea of touching the Saliva of another Person, yet in the present instance our Tobacco smokers pace the moistened Tube from one month to another without hesitation on the one hand, and it is received with complacency on the other! The more acid the Fumes so much the more grateful to the Palate of the Connoisseur. The Smoke is a Collyrium to the Eyes, whilst the Fire, they will tell you, supplies to the Body the waste of Radical Heat. Without doubt the Hookah is a most pleasing Companion, whether to the Wayworn Traveller or to the solitary Hermit. It is a Friend in whose Bosom we may repose our most confidential Secrets; and a Counsellor upon whose advice we may rely in our most important Concerns. It is an elegant Ornament in our private Apartment: it gives joy to the Beholder in our public Halls. The Music of its sound puts the warbling of the Nightingale to Shame, and the fragrance of its Perfume brings a Blush on the Cheek of the Rose. Life in short is prolonged by the Fumes inhaled at each inspiration, whilst every expiration of them is accompanied with extatic delight. . . ."—(cetera desunt).

c. 1700.—"Tambakú. It is known from the Madrïr-i-Rakhim that the tobacco came from Europe to the Dakhin, and from the Dakhin to Upper India, during the reign of Akbar Shah (1556-1605), since which time it has been in general use."—Badrîr-i-Ahmar, quoted by Blochmann, in Ind. Antiq. i. 161.

1758.—"It appears from Miss Bird's Japan that tobacco was not cultivated in that country till 1605. In 1612 and 1615 the Shogun prohibited both culture and use of tabako. — See the work, i. 275-77. [According to Mr. Chamberlain (Things Japanese, 3rd ed. p. 102) by 1651 the law was so far relaxed that smoking was permitted, but only out-of-doors.]

TOBRA. s. Hind. tobra, [which, according to Platts, is Skt. pratha, "nose of a horse," inverted]. The leather nose-bag in which a horse's feed is administered. "In the Nerbudda valley, in Central India, the women wear a profusion of toe-rings, some standing up an inch high. Their shoes are consequently curiously shaped, and are called tobras" (M.-Gen. R. H.

* Some notice of Major Youle, whose valuable Oriental MSS. were presented to the British Museum after his death, will be found in Dr. Ric's Preface to the Catalogue of Persian MSS. (col. iii. p. xviii.).
Keatinge). As we should say, 'buckets.' [The use of the nosebag is referred to by Sir T. Herbert (ed. 1634): "The horses (of the Persians) feed usually of barley and chopt-straw put into a bag, and fastened about their heads, which implies the manger." Also see TURA.]

1598.—"... stable-boys are apt to serve themselves to a part out of the poor beasts allowance; to prevent which a thrifty housewife sees it put into a tobra or mouth bag, and spits thereon to make the Hostier loathe and leave it alone."—Drummond, Illustrations, &c.

[1575.—"One of the horsemen dropped histobra or nose-bag."—D'Urv, Jumana, 240.]

TODDY, s. A corruption of Hind. tari, i.e. the fermented sap of the tál or palmyra, Skt. tāla, and also of other palms, such as the date, the coco-palm, and the Caryota umbr. palm-wing. Toddy is generally the substance used in India as yeast, to leaven bread. The word, as is well known, has received a new application in Scotland, the immediate history of which we have not traced. The tāla-tree seems to be indicated, though confusingly, in this passage of Megasthenes from Arrian:

c. B.C. 320.—"Megasthenes tells us... the Indians were in old times nomadic... were so barbarous that they wore the skins of such wild animals as they could kill, and subsisted (!) on the bark of trees; that these trees were called in the Indian speech tāla, and that there grew on them as there grows at the tops of the (date) palm trees, a fruit resembling balls of wool."—Arrian, Indic. vii., tr. by McCrindle.

c. 1330.—"... There is another tree of a different species, which... gives all the year round a white liquor, pleasant to drink, which tree is called tari."—F. Jordanus, 16.

[1554.—"There is in Gujarat a tree of the palm-tribe, called tari agadij (millet tree). From its branches cups are suspended, and when the cut end of a branch is filled... liquid is placed into one of these vessels, a sweet liquid, something of the nature of arrack, flows out in a continuous stream... and presently changes into a most wonderful wine."—Travels of Siddi Ali Rūz, trans. A. Tambey, p. 29.]

1609–10.—"Tarree." See under SURA.

1611.—"Palmiti Wine, which they call Taddy."—V. Draveton, in Purchas, i. 285.

[1614.—"A sort of wine that distillett out of the Palm-tree, called Tadie."—Poyer, Letters, iii. 4.]
TOMAUN.  s. A Mongol word, signifying 10,000, and constantly used in the histories of the Mongol dynasties for a division of an army theoretically consisting of that number. But its modern application is to a Persian money, at the present time worth about 70, 6d. [In 1889 the exchange was about 53 crans to the £1; 10 crans=1 tuman.] Till recently it was only a money of account, representing 10,000 dinárs; the latter also having been in Persia for centuries only a money of account, constantly degenerating in value. The tomaun in Fryer's time (1677) is reckoned by him

TOLA, s. An Indian weight (chiefly of gold or silver), not of extreme antiquity. Hind, tolá, Skt., tulā, a balance; tul, 'to lift up,' to weigh. The Hind scale is 8 rattis (see RUTTEE) = 1 māsha, 12 māshas = 1 tolā. Thus the tolā was equal to 96 rattis. The proper weight of the rattí, which was the old Indian unit of weight, has been determined by Mr. E. Thomas as 1.75 grains, and the medieval bangá which was the prototype of the rupee was of 100 rattis weight. "But... the factitious rattí of the Muslims was merely an aliquot part—\( \frac{1}{96} \) of the comparatively recent tolá, and \( \frac{2}{96} \) of the newly devised rupee." By the Regulation VII. of 1833, putting the British India coinage on its present footing (see under SEER) the tolá weighing 180 grs., which is also the weight of the rupee, is established by the same Regulation, as the unit of the system of weights, 80 tolas = 1 s., 40 sers = 1 Maund.

TODDY-BIRD, s. We do not know for certain what bird is meant by this name in the quotation. The nest would seem to point to the Baya, or Weaver-bird (Phoenicus Baya, Blyth): but the size alleged is absurd; it is probably a blunder. [Another bird, the Artamus fuscescens, is, according to Balfour (Cyc. s.n.) called the toddy-shrike.

[1573.—"For here is a Bird (having its name from the Tree it chooses for its Sanctuary, the toddy-tree). . . ."—Fryer, 76.]

c. 1750-60.—"It is in this tree (see PALMYRA, ERAB) that the toddy-birds, so called from their attachment to that tree, make their exquisitely curious nests, wrought out of the thinnest reeds and filaments of branches, with an inimitable mechanism, and are about the bigness of a partridge (!) The birds themselves are of no value. . . ."—Gros, i. 18.

TODDY-CAT, s. This name is in S. India applied to the Paradoxurus Musanga, Jerdon: [the P. rufus, the Indian Palm-Civet of Blanford (Mammalia, 106).] It infests houses, especially where there is a ceiling of cloth (see CHUTT). Its name is given for its fondness, real or supposed, for palm-juice.

[TOKO, s. Slang for 'a thrashing.' The word is improper, of Hind, toka, 'to censure, blame,' and has been converted into a noun on the analogy of bunnow and other words of the same kind.

[1823.—"Toco for com—Yams are food for negroes in the W. Indies . . . and if, instead of receiving his proper ration of these, blackee gets a whip (toco) about his back, why 'he has caught toco instead of yam.'—John Lee, Slang Diet.

[1867.—"Toko for Yam. An expression peculiar to negroes for crying out before being hurt."—Smgth, Sailor's Word-Book, s.n.] as equal to £3, 6s. 8d. P. della Valle's estimate 60 years earlier would give about £4, 10s. Od., and is perhaps loose and too high. Sir T. Herbert's valuation (5 x 138, 8d.) is the same as Fryer's. In the first and third of the following quotations we have the word in the Tartar military sense, for a division of 10,000 men:

c. 1340. "Ces deux portions réunies formaient un total de 500 tounmans, dont chacun vaut 10,000 dinars courants, et le dinar 6 dirhems."—Shikabaddia, Masalak-ul Abiyar, in Not. et Etsa. xiii. 194.

c. 1347.—"I was informed . . . that when the Kän assembled his troops, and called the array of his forces together, there were with him 100 divisions of horse, each composed of 10,000 men, the chief of whom was called Amir Tumân, Herberstein, Della Moscovia, Ramusio, iii. 159.

[c. 1590.—"One thousand in the language of the people is called Tassuti; likewise ten thousand in a single word Tma: twenty thousand Diumtma: thirty thousand Ttama," Herberstein, Della Moscovia, Ramusio, iii. 159.

c. 1630.—"But how miserable so ever it seems to others, the Persian King makes many happy harvests; filling every yeere his insatiate coffers with above 350,000 Tomans (a Toman is five markes sterline)."—Sir T. Herbert, p. 225.

[c. 1655.—In Persia "the abâyâ is worth 4 shahls, and the toman 50 abâyâs or 200 shahls."—Tavernier, ed. Bull. i. 24.]

1677.—". . . Receipt of Custom (at Gombroon) for which he pays the King yearly Twenty-two thousand Thomands, every Thomand making Three pound and a Noble in our Accont. Half which we have a Right to."—Fryer, 222.

1711.—"Camels, Houses, &c. are generally sold by the Thomand, which is 200 Shahees or 50 Assasies: and they usually reckon their Estates that way; such a man is worth so many Thomands, as we reckon by Pounds in England."—Lockyer, 229.

[1838.—"Girwur Singh, Tomandar, came up with a detachment of the special police."

—Sleeman, Journey through Oudh, ii. 17.]
1770.—"... An instrument of brass which the Europeans lately borrowed from the Turks to add to their military music, and which is called a tam—"(1).—Abbé Raynal, tr. 1777, i. 90.

1789.—"An harsh kind of music from a tom-tom or drum, accompanied by a loud rustic pipe, sounds from different parties throughout the throng. ..."—Moro, Navig. 73.

1804.—"I request that they may be hanged; and let the cause of their punishment be published in the gazette, by beat of tom-tom. ..."—Wellington, iii. 186.

1824—"The Maharrats in my vicinity kept up such a confounded noise with the tam-tams, cymbals, and pipes, that to sleep was impossible. ..."—Selby, Wonders of India, ch. iv.

1836.—For the use of the word by Dickens, see under GUM-GUM.

1852.—"The first musical instruments were without doubt percussive sticks, calabashes, tom-toms."—Herbert Spencer, First Principles, 356.

1881.—"The tom-tom is ubiquitous. It knows no rest. It is content with depriving man of his rest. It selects by preference the hours of the night as the time for its malignant influence to assert its most potent sway. It reverberates its dull unmeaning monotonies through the fitful dreams which sheer exhaustion brings. It inspires delusive hope by a brief lull only to break forth with refreshed vigour into wilder ecstacies of maniacal fury—accompanied with nasal incantations and protracted howls. ..."—Overland Times of India, April 11.

TONGA, s. A kind of light and small two-wheeled vehicle, Hind. tāngā, [Skt. tamānga, 'a platform']. The word has become familiar of late years, owing to the use of the tonga in a modified form on the roads leading up to Simla, Darjeeling, and other hill-stations. [Tavernier speaks of a carriage of this kind, but does not use the word:—

[c. 1605.—"They have also, for travelling, small, very light, carriages which contain two persons; but usually one travels alone. In which they sometimes a pair of oxen only. These carriages, which are provided, like ours, with curtains and cushions, are not slung. ..."—Tavernier, ed. Bell, i. 44.]

1874.—"The villages in this part of the country are usually superior to those in Poon or Sholapur, and the people appear to be in good circumstances. ... The custom too, which is common, of driving light Tongas drawn by ponies or oxen points to the same conclusion."—Settlement Report of Nāik.

1879.—"A tongha dak has at last been started between Rajpore and Dehra. The first tongha took only 5½ hours from Rajpore to Saharunpore."—Pioneer Mail.

1880.—"In the (Times) of the 19th of April we are told that 'Syed Mahomed Padshah has repulsed the attack on his fort instigated by certain nooloks of tonga dák.' ... Is the relentless tonga a region of country or a religious organization? ... The original telegram appears to have contemplated a full stop after 'certain nooloks,' Then came an independent sentence about the tonga dák working admirably between Poshawur and Jellalabad, but the sub-editor of the Times, interpreting the message referred to, made sense of it in the way we have seen, associating the ominous mystery with the nooloks, and helping out the other sentence with some explanatory ideas of his own."—Pioneer Mail, June 10.

TONICATCHY, TUNNYKETCH, s. In Madras this is the name of the domestic water-carrier, who is generally a woman, and acts as a kind of under-housemaid. It is a corr. of Tamil tannir-kai, tannikkaiy, an abbreviation of tannir-kaisi, 'water-woman.' c. 1750.—'... Voudriez-vous me permettre de faire ce traité avec mes gens et mes bagages, qui ne consistent qu'en deux malles, quatre caisses de vin, deux ballots de toiles, et deux femmes, dont l'une est ma cuisinière, et l'autre, ma tannie karette a portance de l'eau.'—Bacon, i. 322.

1780.—'The Armenian ... now mounts a bit of brass ... and dashes the mind about through the streets of the Black Town, to the admiration and astonishment of the Tanny-kertches.'—Madras Courier, April 26.

TONJON, and vulg. TOMJOHN, s. A sort of sedan or portable chair. It is (at least in the Bengal Presidency) carried like a palanquin by a single pole and four bearers, whereas a jompon (q.v.), for use in a hilly country, has two poles like a European sedan, each pair of bearers bearing it by a stick between the poles, to which the latter are slung. We cannot tell what the origin of this word is, nor explain the etymology given by Williamson below, unless it is intended for thān-jāngh, which might mean 'support-thigh.' Mr. Platts gives as forms in Hindī. tānjhān and thānān. The word is perhaps adopted from some trans-gangatic language. A rude contrivance of this kind in Malabar is described by Col. Welsh under the name of a ‘Telligcherry cloth’ (ii. 40).

c. 1594. — “I had a tonjon, or open palanquin, in which I rode.” — Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiography, 283.

1510. — “About Dacca, Chittagong, Tipperah, and other mountainous parts, a very light kind of conveyance is in use, called a taum-jaung, i.e. ‘a support to the feet.’” — Williamson, V. M., i. 322-23.

“Some of the party at the tents sent a tonjon, or open chair, carried like a palanquin, to meet me.” — Maria Graham, 160.

[1527. — “In accordance with Lady D’Oyly’s earnest wish I go out every morning in her tonjon.” — Diary of Mrs. Fenston, 100.

1528. — “I had been conveyed to the hill in Hanson’s tonjon, which differs only from a palanquin in being like the body of a gig with a head to it.” — Memoir of Col. Mountain, 88.

[1532. — “I never seat myself in the palanquin or thonjaun without a feeling bordering on self-reproach.” — Mrs. Mary Hasset, M. T., Observations, i. 320.]

1539. — “He reined up his ragged horse, facing me, and dancing about till I had passed; then he dashed past me at full gallop, wheeled round, and charged my tonjon, bending down to his saddlebow, pretending to throw a lance, showing his teeth, and uttering a loud quack!” — Letters from Madras, 200.

[1549. — “We proceeded to Nawabunge, the minister riding out with me, for some miles, to take leave, as I sat in my tonjon.” — Steeman, Journey through Ootth, i. 2.]

TOOLSY. s. The holy Basil of the Hindus (Ocinum sanctum, L.), Skt. tulsi or tulasi, frequently planted in a vase upon a pedestal of mosaic in the vicinity of Hindu temples or dwellings. Sometimes the ashes of deceased relatives are preserved in these domestic shrines. The practice is alluded to by Fr. Odoric as in use at Tana, near Bombay (see Cathay, i. 59, c. 1322); and it is accurately described by the later ecclesiastic quoted below. See also Ward’s Hindoos, ii. 203. The plant has also a kind of sanctity in the Greek Church, and a character for sanitary value at least on the shores of the Mediterranean generally.

[c. 1650. — “They who bear the tulasi round the neck . . . they are Vaishnavas, and sanctify the world.” — Bhatias Mad, in H. H. Wilson’s Works, i. 41.]

1672. — “Almost all the Hindus adore a plant like our Basilic Gentile, but of more pungent odour . . . Every one before his house has a little altar, girl with a wall half an ell high, in the middle of which they erect certain pedestals like little towers and in these the shrub is grown. They recite their prayers daily before it, with repeated prostrations, sprinklings of water, &c. There are also many of these maintained at the bathing-places, and in the courts of the pagodas.” — P. Vincenzo Maria, 300.

1673. — “They plaster Cow-dung before their Doors; and so keep themselves clean, having a little place or two built up a Foot Square of Mud, where they plant Colominth, or (by them called) Tulice, which they worship every Morning, and tend with Diligence.” — Eyre, 169.

1542. — “Veneram a planta chamada Tulosae, por dizerem & do pateo dos Deoses, e por isso & commum no pateo de suas casas, os todos se mantem a vao tributar veneração.” — Annares Marítimes, iii. 413.

1572. — “At the head of the ghast, on either side, is a sacred tulasi plant, placed on a high pedestal of mosaic.” — Cocinda Samanta, i. 15.

The following illustrates the esteem attached to Toolsy in S. Europe:

1855. — “I have frequently realised how much prized the basil is in Greece for its mystical properties. The herb, which they say grew on Christ’s grave, is almost worshipped in the Eastern Church. On St. Basil’s day women take sprigs of this plant to be blessed in church. On returning home they cast some on the floor of the house, to secure luck for the ensuing year. They eat a little with their household, and no sickness, they maintain, will attack them for a year. Another bit they put in their cupboard, and firmly believe that their embrocations and silken raiment will be free from the visitation of rats, mice, and moths, for the same period.” — J. T. Bent, The Cyclades, p. 328.

TOOMONGONG. s. A Malay title, especially known as borne by one of the chiefs of Johor, from whom the Island of Singapore was purchased. The Sultans of Johor are the representatives of the old Mahometan dynasty of Malacca, which took refuge in Johor, and the adjoining islands (including Bintang especially), when expelled by Albuquerque in 1511, whilst the Tomangong was a minister who had in Peshwa fashion appropriated the power of the Sultan, with hereditary tenure; and this chief now lives, we believe, at Singapore. Crawford says: “The word is most probably Javanese; and in Java is the title of a class of nobles, not of an office.” (Malay Dict. s.v.)

[1774. — “Paid a visit to the Sultan . . . and Pangaram Toomongong.” — Diary]

1782.—"Wanted one or two Tanyans (see TANGUN) rising six years old, Wanted also a Bay Toorkey, or Bay Tazi (see TAZEE) Horse for a Buggy..."—India Gazette, Feb. 9.

..."To be disposed of at Ghryetty... a Buggy, almost new... a pair of uncommonly beautiful spotted Toorkeys."

—Ibid. March 2.

TOOTNAGUE, s. Port tutenaga.

This word appears to have two different applications. a. A Chinese alloy of copper, zinc, and nickel, sometimes called 'white copper' (i.e. peh-tung of the Chinese). The finest qualities are alleged to contain arsenic.* The best comes from Yunnan, and Mr. Joubert of the Garnier Expedition, came to the conclusion that it was produced by a direct mixture of the ores in the furnace (L’Oyage d’Exploration, ii, 160).

TOON, TOON-WOOD.

TOON, TOON-WOOD, s. The tree and timber of the Cedrela Toona, Roxb. N.O. Meliaceae. Hind. tun, tān, Skt. tuna. The timber is like a poor mahogany, and it is commonly used for furniture and fine joiner’s work in many parts of India. It is identified by Bentham with the Red Cedar of N.S. Wales and Queensland (Cedrela australis, F. Mueller). See Brouallis, Forest Flora, 73. A sp. of the same genus (C. sinensis) is called in Chinese ch’un, which looks like the same word.

[1798.—The tree first described by Sir W. Jones, As. Res. iv, 285.]

1510.—"The toon, or country mahogany, which comes from Bengal. ..."—Mara Graham, 101.

1537.—"Rosellini informs us that there is an Egyptian altar at Florence, of which the wood is what is commonly called E. Indian mahogany (Atheneum, July 22, 1837). This may be the Cedrela Toona."—Rayle’s Hindu Medicine, 30.

TOORKEY, s. A Turki horse, i.e. from Turkestan. Marco Polo uses what is practically the same word for a horse from the Turcoman horse-breeder of Asia Minor.

1298.—"... the Turcomans... dwell among mountains and downs where they find good pasture, for their occupation is cattle-keeping. Excellent horses, known as Turquans, are reared in their country. ..."—Marco Polo, Bk. 1, ch. 2.

[1650.—"The fourth class (Turki) are horses imported from Turan; though strong and well formed, they do not come up to the preceding (Arabs, Persian, Mughams)."

-[1895.—"

[1663.—"If they are found to be Turki horses, that is from Turkestan or Tartary, and of a proper size and adequate strength, they are branded on the thigh with the King’s mark. ..."—Briani, ed. Constantine, 243.

* St. Julien et F. Champion, Industries Anciennes et Modernes de l’Empire Chinois, 1869, p. 73.

Well Williams says:—"The peh-tung argentum, or white copper of the Chinese, is an alloy of copper 40/4, zinc 25/4, nickel 31/2, and iron 26, and occasionally a little silver; and these proportions are nearly those of German silver."—Middle Kingdom, ed. 1883, ii, 19.

["... In the list of commodities brought from the East Indies, 1678. I find among the drugs, tincal (see TINCALL) and Toothnaghe set done. Enquire also what these are. ..."—Letter of Sir T. Browne, May 29, in N. d' Q. 2 ser. vii. 520.]

1727.—"Most of the Spunge in China had pernicious Qualities because the Sub-terraneous Grounds were stored with Minerals, as Copper, Quicksilver, Alom. Toothnaghe, &c.—I. Hamilton, ii. 223:—[ed. 1744, ii. 222. for "Spunge" reading "Springs"]."

1750.—"A sort of Cash made of Toothnague is the only Currency of the Country."—Some Ac. of Cochín China, by Mr. Robert Krop, in Dublinlge, or. Rep. i. 215.

1757—8.—Speaking of the freemen enrolled at Nottingham in 1757. Bailey (Annals of Nottinghamshire, iii. 1235) mentions as one of them William Tutin, buckle-maker, and then goes on to say: "It was a son of this latter person who was the inventor of that beautiful composite white metal, the introduction of which created such a change in numerous articles of ordinary table service in England. This metal, in honour of the inventor, was called Tutinic. but which word, by one of the most absurd perversion of language ever known, became transferred into 'Tooth and Egg': the name by which it was almost uniformly recognised in the shops."—Quoted in 2 ser. N. d' Q. x. 144.

1759.—At Quedah, there is a trade for calin (see CALAY) or tutenage ... to export to different parts of the Indies."—Dunn, New Directory, 5th ed. 338.

1757.—"Tutnag is, properly speaking, zinc, extracted from a rich ore or calamine: the ore is powdered and mixed with charcoal dust, and placed in earthen jars over a slow fire, by means of which the metal rises in form of vapour, in a common distilling apparatus, and afterwards is condensed in water."—Newton's Account of Lord Mountracy's Embassy, 4to ed. ii. 540.

TOPAZ. TOPASS. &c., s. A name used in the 17th and 18th centuries for dark-skinned or half-caste claimants of Portuguese descent, and Christian profession. Its application is generally, though not universally, to soldiers of this class, and it is possible that it was originally a corruption of Pers. (from Turkish) top-ālī, 'a gunner.' It may be a slight support to this derivation that Italians were employed to cast guns for the Zamorin at Calicut from a very early date in the 16th century, and are frequently mentioned in the annals of Correa between 1503 and 1510. Various other etymologies have however been given. That given by Orme below (and put forward doubtfully by Wilson) from topā, 'a hat,' has a good deal of plausibility, and even if the former etymology be the true origin, it is probable that this one was often in the minds of those using the term, as its true connotation. It may have some corroboration not only in the fact that Europeans are to this day often spoken of by natives (with a shade of disparagement) as Topewawals (q.v.) or 'Hat-men,' but also in the pride commonly taken by all persons claiming European blood in wearing a hat; indeed Fra Paolino tells us that this class call themselves gente de chapeo (see also the quotation below from Ovington). Possibly however this was merely a misrendering of topan: from the assumed etymology. The same Fra Paolino, with his usual fertility in error, propounds in another passage that topan is a corruption of do-bhātsiya, 'two-tongued' (in fact is another form of Dubash. q.v.), viz. using Portuguese and a debased vernacular (pp. 50 and 144). [The Madras Gloss, assumes Mal. topōshi to be a corruption of dubash.] The Topaz on board ship is the sweeper, who is at sea frequently of this class.

1692.—"The 12th ditto we saw to seaward another Champagne (Sampen) wherein were 20 men. Mestigos (see MUSTEEES) and Topuass."—Fra Spilbergen's Voyage, p. 34, pub. 1545.

1672.—"Toopasses."—See under MADEAS.

1678.—"To the Fort then belonged 300 English, and 100 Topazes, or Portugal Firemen."—Fryer, 66. In his glossarial Index he gives "Topazes, Musketeers."

1680. — "It is resolved and ordered to entertain about 100 Topasses, or Black Portugese, into pay."—In Wheeler, i. 121.

1686.—"It is resolved, as soon as English soldiers can be provided sufficient for the garrison, that all Topasses be disbanded, and no more entertained, since there is little dependence on them."—In in, 159.

1690.—"A Report spread abroad, that a Rich Moor Ship belonging to one Abdal Chajred, was taken by Hat-men, that is, in their (the Moors) Dialect, Europeans."—Ovington, 411.

1705.—"... Topasses, qui sont des gens du pais qu'on elève et qu'on habile à la Françoise, lesquels ont esté instruits dans la Religion Catholique par quelques uns de nos Missionnaires."—L'deur, 15-48.

1711.—"The Garrison consists of about 250 Soldiers, at 91 Fanhmans, or 17, 2e, 94, per Month, and 200 Topasses, or black Moors Portugese, at 90, or 52 Fanhmans per Month."—Lockyer, 14.

1727.—"Some Portuguese are called Topasses... will be served by none but Portuguese Priests, because they indulge them more and their Villany."—J. Hamilton, [ed. 1741, i. 326].

1745.—"Les Portugais et les autres Catholiques qu'on nomme Mestices (see MUSTÉES) et Topasses, également comme les naturels du Pays y viennent sans distinction pour assister aux Divins mystères."—Norbert, ii. 31.

1747.—"The officers upon coming in report their People in general behaved very well, and could not do more than they did with such a handful of men against the Force the Enemy had, being as they believe at least to be one thousand Europeans, besides Topasses, Coffrees (see CAFFER), and Seapoy (see SEPOY), altogether about Two Thousand (2000)."—M.S. Corams, at Ft. St. David, March 1. (In India Office).

1749.—"... 600 effective Europeans would not have cost more than that Crew of noble Topasses and Peons of which the Major Part of our Military has of late been composed."—In A Letter to a Proprieter of the E.I. Co. p. 57.

"The Topasses of which the major Part of the Garrison consisted, every one that knows Madrass knows it to be a black, degenerate, wretched Race of the ancient Portugese, as proud and bigotted as their Ancestors, lazy, idle, and vipers withal, and for the most Part as weak and feeble in Body as base in Mind, not one in ten possessed of any of the necessary Requisites of a Soldier."—Ibid, App. p. 108.

1756.—"... in this plight, from half an hour after eleven till near two in the morning, I sustained the weight of a heavy man, with his knees on my back, and the pressure of his whole body on my head; a Dutch sergeant, who had taken his seat upon my left shoulder, and a Topaz bearing on my right."—Holwell's Narr. of the Black Hole, [ed. 1758, p. 19].

1758.—"There is a distinction said to be made by you... which, in our opinion, does no way square with rules of justice and equity, and that is the exclusion of Portuguese topasses, and other Christian natives, from any share of the money granted by the Nawab."—Court's Letter, in Long, 133.

c. 1785.—"Topasses, black foot soldiers, descended from Portuguese marrying natives, called topasses because they wear hats."—Currie's Chive, iv. 564. The same explanation in Orme, i. 80.

1787.—"... Assuredly the mixture of Moormen, Raja-pootos, Gentooos, and Malabaros in the same corps is extremely beneficial... I have also recommended the corps of Topasses or descendants of Europeans, who retain the characteristic qualities of their progenitors."—Col. Fullarton's View of English Interests in India, 222.

1789.—"Topasses are the sons of Europeans and black women, or low Portuguese, who are trained to arms."—Moore, Narr. 321.

1817.—"Topasses, or persons whom we may denominate Indo-Portuguese, either the mixed produce of Portuguese and Indian parents, or converts to the Portuguese, from the Indian, faith."—J. Mill, Hist. iii. 19.

TOPE. s. This word is used in three quite distinct senses, from distinct origins.

a. Hind. top, 'a cannon.' This is Turkish top, adopted into Persian and Hindustani. We cannot trace it further. [Mr. Platts regards T. tob, as meaning originally 'a round mass,' from Skt. stūpa, for which see below.]

b. A grove or orchard, and in Upper India especially a mango-orchard. The word is in universal use by the English, but is quite unknown to the natives of Upper India. It is in fact Tam. tōppu, Tel. tope, [which the Madras Gloss, derives from Tam. topu, 'to collect,'] and must have been carried to Bengal by foreigners at an early period of European traffic. But Wilson is curiously mistaken in supposing it to be in common use in Hindustan by natives. The word used by them is bīgh.

c. An ancient Buddhist monument in the form of a solid dome. The word top is in local use in the N.W. Punjab, where ancient monuments of this kind occur, and appears to come from Skt. stūpa through the Pali of Prakrit thīpa. According to Sir H. Elliot (i. 505), Stupa in Icelandic signifies 'a Tower.' We cannot find it in Cleasby. The word was first introduced to European knowledge by Mr. Elphinstone in his account of the Tope of Manikya in the Rawal Pindi district.

1857.—"The Topkhi. These are Gunners, called so from the word Tope, which in Turkish signifies a Cannon, and are in number about 1200, distributed in 52 Battalions: their Quarters are at Tophana, or the place of Guns in the Suburbs of Constantinople."—Report's Present State of the Ottoman Empire, p. 94.

1726.—"Islandar Chan, chief of the Artillery (called the Darogar see DAROGA) of the Topscanna."—Valentijn, iv. (Suratte), 278.

1765.—"He and his troops knew that by the treachery of the Tope Khonnah Droger (see DAROGA), the cannon were loaded with powder only."—Helwell, Hist. Events, &c. i. 96.

TOPEE. s. A hat, Hind. topī. This is sometimes referred to Port. topo, 'the top' (also tope, 'a top-knot,' and topeka, 'a toupee'), which is probably identical with English and Dutch top, L. German topp, Fr. topet, &c. But there is also a simpler Hind. word top, for a helmet or hat, and the quotation from the Roteiro Vocabulary seems to show that the word existed in India when the Portuguese first arrived. With the usual tendency to specialize foreign words, we find this word becomes specialized in application to the sola hat.

1498.—In the vocabulary ("Esto he a linguafrona de Calico") we have: "burrete (i.e. a cap): toppy."—Roteiro, 118.

The following expression again, in the same work, seems to be Portuguese, and to refer to some mode in which the women's hair was dressed: "Trazem em uma topeira a sua cabeça."—Ibid. 52.

1859.—"Our good friend Sol came down in right earnest on the waste, and there is need of many a fold of twisted muslin round the white topi to keep off his importunity."—Ibid. Leaves from Young Egypt, 2.

1853.—"Topee. a solar helmet."—Wills, Modern Persia, 263.

TOPEEWALA, s. Hind. topīvālī, 'one who wears a hat,' generally an European, or one claiming to be so. Formerly by Englishmen it was habitually applied to the dark descendants of the Portuguese. R. Drummond says that in his time (before 1805) Topiweala and Puggrywala were used in Guzerat and the Maharratta country for 'Europeans' and 'natives.' [The S. Indian form is Topikār.] The author of the Persian Life of Hydur Nār (Or. Tr. Fund, by Miles) calls Europeans Kalah-posh, i.e. ‘hat-wearers’ (p. 85).

1863. — "The descendants of the Portuguese . . . unfortunately the ideas of Christianity are so imperfect that the only mode they hit upon of displaying their faith is by wearing hats and breeches." — Sydney Smith, Works, 3d. ed. iii. 5.

[1826. — "It was now evident we should have to encounter the Topee wallas." — Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 71.]

1574.—". . . you will see that he will not be able to protect us. All topiwālas . . . are brothers to each other. The magistrates and the judge will always decide in favour of their white brethren." — Goribada Somanta, ii. 211.

TORCULL, s. This word occurs only in Castanheda. It is the Malayalam tiru-koyil, [Tam. tiru, Skt. śrī, ‘holy’ koyil, ‘temple’]. See i. 253, 254; also the English Trans. of 1582, i. 151. In fact, in the 1st ed. of the 1st book of Castanheda turcull occurs where pagode is found in subsequent editions. [Tricolore in S. Arcot is in Tam. Tirukkoyil, with the same meaning.]

TOSHACONNA, s. P.—H. toshakāna. The repository of articles received as presents, or intended to be given as presents, attached to a government-office, or great man’s establishment. The toshakāna is a special department attached to the Foreign Secretariat of the Government of India.

[1616. — "Now indeed the atashckannoe was become a right stage." — Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 300.]

[1742. — " . . . the Treasury, Jewels, toshik-khana . . . that belonged to the Emperor. . . ." — Fraser, H. of Nadir Shah, 173.]

1799. — "After the capture of Seringapatam, and before the country was given over to the Raja, some brass swamies (q.v.), which were in the toshekanah were given to the Brahmins of different pagodas, by order of Macleod and the General. The prize-agents require payment for them." — Wellington, i. 56.

[1885. — "When money is presented to the Viceroy, he always ‘remits’ it, but when presents of jewels, arms, stuffs, horses, or other things of value are given him, they are accepted, and are immediately handed over to the tosh khana or Government Treasury . . . ." — Lady Dufferin, Viceroyal Life, 76.]

TOSTDAUN, s. Military Hind. toshāin for a cartouche-box. The word appears to be properly Pers. toshātin, ‘provision-holder,’ a wallet.

[1841. — "This last was, however, merely ‘tos-dan kee awaz’—a cartouche-box report—as our sepoys oddly phrase a vague rumour." — Society in India, ii. 223.]

TOTY, s. Tam. totti, Canar. tolīga, from Tam. tondu, ‘to dig,’ properly a low-caste labourer in S. India, and a low-caste man who in villages receives certain allowances for acting as messenger, &c., for the community, like the gorayt of N. India.

1730.—"Il y a dans chaque village un homme de service, appelé Totti, qui est chargé des impositions publiques." — Lettr. Edif. xiii. 371.

[1883. — "The name Toty being considered objectionable, the same officers in the new arrangements are called Talaiaras (see TALIAR) when assigned to Police, and Vettias when employed in Revenue duties." — Le Foua, Mus. of Salem, ii. 211.]

TOUCAN, s. This name is very generally misapplied by Europeans to the various species of Hornbill, formerly all styled Buceros, but now subdivided into various genera. Jerdon says: "They (the hornbills) are, indeed, popularly called Toucans throughout India; and this appears to be their name in some of the Malayan isles; the word signifying ‘a worker,’ from the noise they make." This would imply that the term did originally belong to a species of hornbill, and not to the S. American Ramphastos or Zygodactyl. Tukang is really in Malay a ‘craftsmen or artificer’; but the dictionaries show no application to the bird. We have here, in fact, a remarkable instance of the coincidences which often justly perplex etymologists, or would perplex them if it were not so much their habit to seize on one solution and despise the others. Not only is tukang in Malay an ‘artificer,’ but, as Willoughby tells us, the Spaniards called the real S. American toucan, carpintero, from the noise he makes. And yet there seems no doubt that Toucan is a Brazilian name for a Brazilian bird. See the quotations, and especially Thevet’s, with its date.

The Toucan is described by Oviedo (c. 1535), but he mentions only the name by which the “Christians” called it,—in Ramusio’s Italian Pictura (Buceto: Sommaria, in Raimusio, iii. f. 60). [Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v.) gives only the Brazilian derivation.
The question is still further discussed, without any very definite result, save that it is probably an imitation of the cry of the bird, in N. c. Q. 9 ser. vii. 486; viii. 22. 67. 55; 171, 250.]

1556.—"Sur la côte de la marine, la plufréquent marchandise est le plumage d'un oiseau, qu'ils appellent en leur langue Toucan, lequel descrivons sommairement puis qu'il vient à propos. Cet oiseau est de la grandeur d'un pigeon. . . . Au reste cet oiseau est merveilleusement difforme et mortellement dangereux; on ne le beth plus gos et plus long que le reste du corps."—Les Singularitez de la France Antartique, autre-ment nommée Amériche. . . . Par T. Andri Thomé, Nat. d'Amouronde, Paris. 1558, p. 91.

1645.—"Toucana sive Toucan Brasiliensibus; avis picea aut palumbi magnitudine.
. . . Rostrum habet ingenis et nonnullum plumum longum, exterius flavam. . . .
Mirum est autem videri possit quomodo tantilla avis tam grande rostrum ferat:
se levisissum est."—George Marcgrave

See also (1599) Aubry's Descriptions, Ornitholog.
lib. xii. cap. 19, where the word is given toucham.

Here is an example of misapplication to the Hornbill, though the latter name is also given:

1855.—"Soopah (in N. Canara) is the only region in which I have met with the toucan or great hornbill. . . . I saw the comical looking head with its huge aquiline beak, regarding me through a fork in the branch:
and I account it one of the best shots I ever made, when I sent a ball . . . through the head just at its junction with the hand-size orange-coloured helmet which surmounts it.
Down came the toucan with outspread wings.
dead apparently; but when my bee Mancl raised him by the thick muscular neck, he fastened his great claws on his hand, and made the wood resound with a succession of roars more like a bull than a bird."—Gordon

TOWLEEA. s. Hind. tawliya, 'a towel.' This is a corruption, however, not of the English form, but rather of the Port. têla (Panjub N. d' Q., 1855,
i. 117).

TRAGA. s. [Molesworth gives "S. trâqâ, Guz. trâgâ"; trâg does not appear in Monier-Williams's Skt. Dict., and Wilson queries the word as doubtful. Dr. Grisorson writes: "I cannot trace its origin back to Skt. One is tempted to connect it with the Skt.
root tral, or trâ, 'to protect,' but the termination qa presents difficulties which I cannot get over. One would expect it to be derived from some Skt. word like trâka, but no such word exists." The extreme form of dhurana (q.v.) among the Râjputs and connected tribes, in which the complainant puts himself, or some member of his family, to torture or death, as a mode for bringing vengeance on the oppressor. The tone adopted by some persons and persons at the time of the death of the great Charles Gordon, tended to imply their view that his death was a kind of tragâ intended to bring vengeance on those who had sacrificed him. [For a case in Greece, see Panamazones, N. i. 6. Another name for this self-sacrifice is Châniâ, which is perhaps Skt. dhurâ, 'passionate' (see Malcolm, Cont. India, 2nd ed.
i. 137). Also compare the jâhâr of the Râjputs (Ted. Annals, Calcutta reprint. i. 74). And for Kôr, see
As. Res. iv. 357 seqq.]

1808.—A case of tragâ is recorded in Sir Jasper Nicol's Journal, at the capture of Gâwilgarh, by Sir A. Wellesley.
See note to Wilminglon. ed. 1857, p. 357.

1513.—"Every attempt to levy an assessment is succeeded by the Tarakâv, a most horrid mode of murdering themselves and each other."—Forbes, J. Mem. ii. 49; [2nd ed. i. 378: and see i. 244].

1519.—For an affecting story of Traga, see Macnair, in B. Lit. Soc. Trans. i. 251.

[TRANEKEY. s. A kind of boat used in the Persian Gulf and adjoining seas. All attempts to connect it with any Indian or Persian word have been unsuccessful. It has been supposed to be connected with the Port. trinocol, a sort of flat-bottomed coating vessel with a high stern, and with triquart, a hering-boat used in the English Channel. Smyth (Sailor's Word-book, s.v.) has: "Trankey or Trankie, a large boat of the Gulf of Persia." See N. d' Q. 8 ser. vii. 167. 376.

1554.—"He sent certain spies who went in Terranquins dressed as fishermen who cught fish inside the straits."—Conto, Dec.
VI. Bk. x. ch. 20.

[1750.—... he remained some years in obscurity, till an Arab trankey being driven in there by stress of weather, he made himself known to his countrymen. . . ."—Grose, 1st ed. 25.

[1753.—"Taghi Khan... soon after embarked a great number of men in small vessels." In the note terranquins.—Han-way, iv. 181.]}
TRANCHEBAR. n.p. A seaport of S. India, which was in the possession of the Danes till 1807, when it was taken by England. It was restored to the Danes in 1814, and purchased from them, along with Serampore, in 1845. The true name is said to be Tranganabadi, ‘Sea-Town’ or ‘Wave-Town’; [so the Madras Gloss.; but in the Man. (ii. 216) it is interpreted ‘Street of the Telegu people.’]

1810.—“The members of the Company have petitioned me, that inasmuch as they do much service to God in their establishment at Negapatam, both among Portuguese and natives, and that there is a settlement of newly converted Christians who are looked after by the catechumens of the parish (freguezia) of Trangabar. . . .”—King’s Letter, in Livros dos Mouços, p. 255.

[1853-4.—“This Morning the Portuguese ship that came from Vizagapatam Sailed hence for Trangambad.”—Pringle, Diary, Pt. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 16.]

TRAVANCORE, n.p. The name of a village south of Trevandrum, from which the ruling dynasty of the kingdom which is now called Travancor is derived. [The Madras Gloss. gives Travancón, tira, Skt. śri, ‘the goddess of prosperity,’ vāzh, ‘to reside,’ kār, ‘part.’]

[1514.—“As to the money due from the Raja of Travancor. . . .”—Albuquerque, Cartos, p. 270.]

1553.—“And at the place called Travancor, where this Kingdom of Cauhán terminates, there begins another Kingdom, taking its name from this very Travancor, the king of which our people call the King of Travancor, the king of which our people call the King of Travancor, the king of which our people call the King of Travancor, the king of which our people call the King of Travancor, the king of which our people call the King of Travancor, the king of which our people call the King of Travancor, the king of which our people call the King of Travancor, the king of which our people call the King of Travancor, the king of which our people call the King of Narsinga.”—Barros, 1. ix. 1.

1600.—“The said Governor has written to me that most of the kings adjacent to our State, whom he advised of the coming of the rebels, had sent replies in a good spirit, with expressions of friendship, and with promises not to admit the rebels into their ports, all but him of Travancor, from whom no answer had yet come.”—King of Spain’s Letter, in Livros dos Mouços, p. 255.

TRIBENY, n.p. Skt. tri-ropi, ‘threefold braid’; a name which properly belongs to Prayaga (Allahābād), where the three holy rivers, Ganges, Jumna, and (unseen) Sarasvati are considered to unite. But local requirements have instituted another Tribeni in the Ganges Delta, by bestowing the name of Jumna and Sarasvati on two streams connected with the Hugh. The Bengal Tribeni gives name to a village, which is a place of great sanctity, and to which the metas or religious fairs attract many visitors.

1682.—“. . . if I refused to stay there he would certainly stop me again at Trinipany some miles further up the River.”—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 14; [Hak. Soc. i. 38.]

1705.—“. . . pendant la Lune de Mars il arrive la Fête de Trinipany, c’est un Dieu enfermé dans une manière de petite Mosquée, qui est dans le milieu d’une tres-grand pleine . . . au bord du Gange.”—Laillier, 69.

1763.—“Au-dessous de Xudin, à Tripini, dont le nom signifie trois eaux, le Gange fait encore sortir du même côté un canal, qui par sa rentrée, forme une seconde ile renfermée dans la première.”—D’Ancile, 64.

TRICHIES, TRITCHIES. s. The familiar name of the cheroots made at Trichinopoly; long, and rudely made, with a straw inserted at the end for the mouth. They are (or were) cheap and coarse, but much liked by those used to them. Mr. C. P. Brown, referring to his etymology of Tri- chinopoly under the succeeding article, derives the word cheroot from the form of the name which he assigns. But this, like his etymology of the place-name, is entirely wrong (see CHEROOT). Some excellent practical scholars seem to be entirely without the etymological sense.

1876.—“Between whiles we smoked, generally Manillas, now supplanted by foul Dimshigs and fetid Trichies.”—Barton, South Revisited, i. 7.

TRICHINOPOLY, n.p. A district and once famous rock-fort of S. India. The etymology and proper form of the name is the subject of much difference. Mr. C. P. Brown gives the true name as Chiramattapalli, ‘Little-Town,’ but this may be safely rejected as mere guess, inconsistent with facts. The earliest occurrence of the name on an inscription is (about 1520) as Tiru-śilla-palli, apparently ‘Holy-rock-town.’ In the Travancor the place is said to be mentioned under the name of Sirapalli. Some derive it from Tri-sira-puram, 'Three-head-town,' with allusion to a ‘three-headed demon.' [The Madras Gloss. gives Tirukkinandapalli, tiru, 'holy,' skina, 'the plant cissampelos pareira, L. palli, 'village.']

1744. "The Maratas concluded the campaign by putting this whole Peninsula under contribution as far as C. Cumeram, attacking, conquering, and retaining the city of Tiruxerapalli, capital of Madura, and taking prisoner the Nabab who governed it."—Report of the Port, Viceroy, in Besque de las Poncees, &c., Documentos, ed. 1553. ii. 19.

1758. "These embouchures are in grand nombre, v la division de ce deuvre en differens bras ou canaux, a remonter jusqu'a Tirishirapalli, et a la pagode de Shirangham."—D'Aville, 115.

1761. "After the battle Mahomed Ali Khan, son of the late nabob, fled to Truchinapalli, a place of great strength."—Complete Hist. of the War in India, 1761. p. 3.

TRINCOMALEE, n.p. A well-known harbour on the N.E. coast of Ceylon. The proper name is doubtful. It is alleged to be Tirukko-ndthaka-malai, or Ternaga-malai. The last ('Sea-Hill') seems conception to fit our modern pronunciation, but not the older forms. It is perhaps Tri-kona-malai, for 'Three-peak Hill.' There is a shrine of Siva on the hill, called Trikoneswara; [so the Madras Man. (ii. 216)].

1553. "And then along the coast towards the north, above Batticaloa, there is the kingdom of Triquinamale."—Barroso, II. ii. cap. 1.

1602. "This Prince having departed, made sail, and was driven by the winds until he arrived. In a few days he came in sight of a desert island (being that of Ceylon), where he made the land at a haven called Preture, between Triquillimalai and the point of Jatanapadam."—Corda, i. p. 5.

1672. "Trinqueenalai hath a surpassingly fine harbour, as may be seen from the draught thereof, ye a one of the best and largest in all Ceylon, and better sheltered from the winds than the harbours of Bellimagane, Galle, or Colombo."—Baldaeus, 413.

1675. "The Cinghalese themselves oppose this, saying that they emigrated from an emigrant ... than some thousand years ago, a Prince of great piety, driven out of the land of Tanassery: ... came to land near the Hill of Trincomale with 1500 or 2000 men: ... Rikhyf van Gerve, in Valentijn (Ceylon), 210.

1685. "Triquinimale."—Ribeiro, Fr. Tr. 6.

1726. "Trinkenemale, properly Triconemalai. (i.e. Triquinamale). — Valentijn (Ceylon), 19.

1727. "... Trincomale ..."—Ibid. 103.

1727. "... that vigilant Dutchman was soon after them with his Fleet, and forced them to fight disadvantageously in Trankamalaya Bay, wherein the French lost one half of their Fleet, being either sunk or burnt."—A. Hamilton, i. 343, [ed. 1744].

1761. "We arrived at Trincomalain in Ceylon (which is one of the finest, if not ye best and most capacious Harbours in ye World) the first of November, and employed that and part of the ensuing Month in preparing our Ships for ye next Campaign."—MS. Letter of James Renwck, Jan. 31.

TRIPANG, s. The sea-slug. This is the Malay name, tripang, teripang, see SWALLOW, and BECHE-DE-MER.

1817. "Bich de mar is well known to be a dried sea slug used in the dishes of the Chinese; it is known among the Malayan Islands by the name of Tripang ..."—Raffles, H. of Jav., 2nd ed. i. 292.

TRIPICANE, n.p. A suburb of Fort St. George; the part where the palace of the ‘Nabob of the Carnatic' is. It has been explained, questionably, as Tiru-valli-keli, 'sacred creeper-tank.' Seshagiri Sastri gives it as Tiru-allikeli, 'sacred lily- (Nymphaea rubra) tank.' [and so the Madras Gloss, giving the word as Tiruvallikkili].

1674. "There is an absolute necessity to go on fortifying this place in the best manner we can, our enemies at sea and land being within less than musquet shot, and better fortified in their camp at Trivelicane than we are here."—Pt. St. Geo. Consns, Feb. 2. In Notes and Exts. Madras. 1871. No. 1. p. 28.

1673. "The Didwan (Dewan) from Conjevarum, who pretends to have come from Court, having sent word from Treplicane that unless the Governor would come to the garden by the river side to receive the Phyrmaund he would carry it back to Court again. answer is returned that it hath not been accenomant for the Governors to go out to receive a bare Phyrmaund except there come therewith a Sersow (see SEERPAW) or a Tashiff" [see TASHREEF].—Do., do., Dec. 2. Ibid. 1573. No. 111. p. 40.

TRIVANDRUM, n.p. The modern capital of the State now known as Travancore (q.v.) Properly Tiru- (vemana) puram, 'Sacred Visha-n-Town.'
TRUMPÁK, n.p. This is the name by which the site of the native suburb of the city of Ormus on the famous island of that name is known. The real name is shown by Lt. Stiffle's account of that island (Geogr. Mag. i. 13) to have been Türün-bâgh, 'Garden of Türün,' and it was properly the palace of the old Kings, of whom more than one bore the name of Türün or Türün Shah.

1507.—"When the people of the city saw that they were so surrounded, that from no direction could water be brought, which was what they felt most of all, the principal Moors collected together and went to the king desiring him earnestly to provide a garden for the pools of Turumbaque, which were at the head of the island, lest the Portuguese should obtain possession of them."—Comment. of Albuquerque, E.T. by Birch, i. 175.

"Meanwhile the Captain-Major ordered Afonso Lopes de Costa and João da Nova, and Manuel Teles with his people to proceed along the water's edge, whilst he with all the rest of the force would follow, and come to a place called Turumbaque, which is on the water's edge, in which there were some palm-trees, and wells of brackish water, which supplied the people of the city with drink when the water-boats were not arriving, as sometimes happened owing to a contrary wind."—Correa, i. 830.

1610.—"The island has no fresh water... only in Torunpaque, which is a piece of white salt clay, at the extremity of the island, there is a well of fresh water, of which the King and the Wazir take advantage, to water the gardens which they have there, and which produce perfectly everything which is planted."—Travels, Bot. de los Reys de Hormuz, 115.

1682.—"Behind the hills, to the S.S.W. and W.S.W. there is another part of the island, lying over against the anchorage that we have mentioned, and which includes the place called Turum bake... here one sees the ancient pleasure-house of the old Kings of Ormus, with a few small trees, and sundry date-palms. There are also here two great wells of water, called after the name of the place, 'The Wells of Turum bake'; which water is the most wholesome and the freshest in the whole island."—Nieuhof, Zee en Land-Rite, ii. 86.

TUCKÉE, s. Money advanced to a ryot by his superior to enable him to carry on his cultivation, and recoverable with his quota of revenue. It is Ar.—H. tâfârî, from Ar. kârî, 'strength,' thus literally 'a reinforcement.'

1580.—"When the Sirkar disposed of lands which reverted to it... it sold them almost always for a nazarâk (see NUZZER-ANA). It sometimes gave them gratis, but it never paid money, and seldom or ever advanced takávi to the tenant or owner.'—Minutes of Sir T. Munro, i. 71. These words are not in Munro's spelling. The Editor has reformed the orthography.

TUCKED. s. An official reminder. Ar.—H. takíd, 'emphasis, injunction,' and verb takíd bána, 'to enjoin stringently, to insist.'

1862.—'I can hardly describe to you my life—work all day, English and Persian, scores of appeals and irrigation cases, and a continual irritation of tukkedes and offensive remarks... these take away all the enjoyment of doing one's duty, and make work a slavery.'—Letter from Col. J. R. Becher, in (unpublished) Memoir, p. 28.

TUCKISH. s. Pers. takýa, literally 'a pillow or cushion'; but commonly used in the sense of a hut or hermitage occupied by a fakir or holy man.

[1500.—He declared... that two of the people charged... had been at his tukiah.—Wellingon, Desp. i. 75.

[1847.—'In the centre of the wood was a Faqir's Talkiat (sic) or Place of Prayer, stunted on a little mound.'—Mr. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, &c. ii. 47.

TULWAIR. s. Hind. tulwár and tarwár, 'a sabre.' Williams gives Skt. taruvír and taradukla. [Tulwáir is a general term applied to shorter or more or less curved side-arms, while those that are lighter and shorter still are often styled níchás' (Sir W. Elliot, in Ind. Antiq. xv. 29). Also see Egerton, Hand. Book, 138.]

[1799.—Ahmed Sollar... drew his tolwá on one of them.—Jackson, Journey from India, 49.

[1829.—the pandás khera turwár Ràkórān, meaning the 'fifty thousand Rahtore swords,' is the proper verbal phrase to denote the master of Maroo...—Tod, Annals, Calcutta reprint, ii. 170.

1853.—'The old native officer who carried the royal colour of the regiments was cut down by a blow of a Sikh tulwar.—Oakfield, ii. 78.

TUMASHA. s. An entertainment, a spectacle (in the French sense), a popular excitement. It is Ar. tamáshi, 'going about to look at anything entertaining.' The word is in use in Turkestan (see Schuyler, below).

1610.—'Heere are also the ruins of Runakand (sic), Ramechand's () Castle and Houses which the Indians acknowledge for the great God, saying that he took descent upon him to see the Tamasha of the World.'—Finch, in Purchas, i. 136.

1631.—'His quoque meridiem prospicit, ut spectet Thamasham id est pagus Elephantisum Luminum Buffalorum et alarium terrarum... —De Lat. De Imperio Magni Moguló, 127. (For this quotation I am indebted to a communication from Mr. Archibald Constable of the Oudh and Rohilkund Railway.)—Y.)

1673.—'... We were discovered by some that told our Banyan... that two Englishmen were come to the Tomaisia, or Sight...—Fryer, 159.

1705.—Tamachars. C'est des réjouissances que les Gentils font en l'honneur de quelqu'unes de leurs divinités.'—Luillier, Tall. des Matières.

1850.—'Runjeet replied, 'Don't go yet: I am going myself in a few days, and then we will have better tomasha.'—Obowied, Court and Camp of Punjeb Singh, 120-121.

1759.—'If you told them that you did not want to buy anything, but had merely come for tamasha, or amusement, they were always ready to explain and show you everything you wished to see.'—Schuyler's Turkestan, i. 176.

TUMLET. s. Domestic Hind. tamíl, being a corruption of tamular.

TUMLOOK. n.p. A town, and anciently a sea-port and seat of Buddhist learning on the west of the Hoogly near its mouth, formerly called Tamralipiti or -lpta. It occurs in the Mahâbhârata and many other Sanskrit words. 'In the Dasa Kumâra and Vrîhat Katha, collections of tales written in the 9th and 12th centuries, it is always mentioned as a great port of Bengal, and the seat of an active and flourishing commerce with the countries and islands of the Bay of Bengal, and the Indian Ocean' (Prof. H. H. Wilson, in J. R. As. Soc. v. 135). [Also see Cunningham, Anc. Geoj. p. 504.]

TUMTUM, s. A dog-cart. We do not know the origin. [It is almost certainly a corr. of English tandum, the slang use of which in the sense of a conveyance (according to the Stains Dict.) dates from 1807. Even now English-speaking natives often speak of a dog-cart with a single horse as a tandum.]

TUNCA. TUNCAY, &c., s. P.—H. tankkiveth, pron. tankhâ. Properly an assignment on the revenue of a particular locality in favour of an individual; but in its most ordinary modern sense it is merely a word for the wages of a monthly servant. For a full account of the special older uses of the word see Wilson. In the second quotation the use is obscure; perhaps it means the villages on which assignments had been granted.

1778. — "These rescripts are called tuncaws, and entitle the holder to receive to the amount from the treasuries . . . as the revenues come in." — Orme, ii. 276.

TURA, s. Or. Turk. tûra. This word is used in the Autobiography of Baber, and in other Mahommedan military narratives of the 16th century. It is admitted by the translators of Baber that it is rendered by them quite conjecturally, and we cannot but think that they have missed the truth. The explanation of tûr which they quote from Meninski is "reticulatus," and combining this with the manner in which the quotations show these tûr to have been employed, we cannot but think that the meaning which best suits is "a gabion." Sir H. Elliot, in referring to the first passage from Baber, adopts the reading tûbâ, and says: "Tûbrâs are nose-bags, but . . . Badauni makes the meaning plain, by saying that they were filled with earth (Tûrikh-i-Badâhîi, f. 136). . . . The sacks used by Sher Shâh as temporary fortifications on his march towards Râjputâna were tûbrâs" (Elliot, vi. 469). It is evident, however, that Baber’s tûras were no tobras, whilst a reference to the passage (Elliot, iv. 405) regarding Sher Shâh shows that the use of tobras with sand on that occasion was regarded as a new contrivance. The tûbra of Badauni may therefore probably be a misreading; whilst the use of gabions implies necessarily that they would be filled with earth.

1526. — (At the Battle of Pânijât) "I directed that, according to the custom of Râm, the gun-carrriages should be connected together with twisted bull-hides as with chains. Between every two gun-carrriages were 6 or 7 tûras (or breastworks). The matchlockmen stood behind these guns and tûras, and discharged their matchlocks . . . It was settled, that as Pânijât was a considerable city, it would cover one of our flanks by its buildings and houses while we might fortify our front by tûras. . . ." — Baber, p. 304.
Shakespeare's Dict., and marks the use as 'Hindustani-Persian.' But a merely Hindustani use of a Persian word could hardly have become habitual in Turkey in the 15th and 16th centuries. The use of dulband for a turban was probably genuine Persian, adopted by the Turks. Its etymology is apparently from Arab. dul, 'vulnere,' admitting of application to either a girdle or a head-wrap. From the Turks it passed in the forms Tulipan, Tolliban, Turbent, &c., into European languages. And we believe that the flower tulip also has its name from its resemblance to the old Ottoman turban, [a view accepted by Prof. Skemat (Concise Diet. s.v. tulip, turban)].*

TURKEY, s. This fowl is called in Hindustani pera, very possibly an indication that it came to India, perhaps first to the Spanish settlements in the Archipelago, across the Pacific, as the red pepper known as Chili did. In Tamil the bird is called van-korpi, 'great fowl.' Our European names of it involve a complication of mistakes and confusions. We name it as if it came from the Levant. But the name turkey would appear to have been originally applied to another of the Pavoideæ, the guinea-fowl, Melagræs of the ancients. Minshew's explanations (quoted below) show strange confusions between the two birds. The French coq d'Inde or Drusdon points only ambiguously to India, but the German Calcutische Hahn and the Dutch Kalkoen (from Calicut) are specific in error as indicating the origin of the Turkey in the East. This misnomer may have arisen from the nearly simultaneous discovery of America and of the Cape route to Calicut, by Spain and Portugal respectively. It may also have been connected with the fact that Malabar produced domestic fowls of extraordinary size. Of these Ibn Battuta (quoted below) makes quaint mention. Zeller's great German Lexicon of Universal Knowledge, a work published as late as 1745, says that these birds (turkeys) were called Calcutische and Indische because they were brought by the Portuguese from the Malabar coast. Dr. Caldwell cites a curious disproof of the antiquity of certain Tamil verses from their containing a simile of which the turkey forms the subject. And native scholars, instead of admitting the anachronism, have boldly maintained that the turkey had always been found in India (Dravidaion Gramm. 2nd ed. p. 137). Padre Paulino was apparently of the same opinion, for whilst explaining that the etymology of Calicut is "Castle of the Fowls," he asserts that Turkeys (Galli d'India) came originally from India: being herein, as he often is, positive and wrong. In 1615 we find W. Edwards, the E.I. Co.'s agent at Ajmir, writing to send the Mogul "three or four Turkey cocks and hens, for he hath three cocks but no hens" (Colonial Paper, E. i. c. 388). Here, however, the ambiguity between the real turkey and the guinea-fowl may possibly arise. In Egypt the bird is called Dik-Dikum. 'fowl of Rum' (i.e. of Turkey), probably a rendering of the English term.

c. 1347.—"The first time in my life that I saw a China cock was in the city of Kaulam. I had at first taken it for an ostrich, and I was looking at it with great wonder, when the owner said to me, 'Posh! there are cocks in China much bigger than that!' and when I got there I found that he had said no more than the truth."—De Bataua, iv. 257.

c. 1550.—"One is a species of peacock that has been brought to Europe, and commonly called the Indian fowl."—Gardian Bronzo, 148.

Je croi que cet oyeau nous est venu de l'Amerique."—De la Boulaye-de-Groz, ed. 1657, p. 236.

1750-52.—"Some Germans call the turkeys Calcutta hens; for this reason I looked about for them here, and to the best of my remembrance I was told they were foreign."—Thft Tornne, 199-200. We do not know whether the mistake of Calcutta for Calicut belongs to the original author or to the translator—probably to the proverbial traditore.

TURNEE, Tunne. s. An English supercargo, Sea-Hind, and probably a corruption of attorney. (Roweck.)

TURPAUL. s. Sea-Hind. A tar-paulin (bâlit). [The word (trouble) has now come into common native use.]

TUSSAH, TUSser. s. A kind of inferior silk, the tissues of which are now commonly exported to England. Anglo-Indians generally regard the termination of this word in r as a vulgarism, like the use of solar for sola (q.v.); but it is in fact correct. For though it is written by Millburn (1813) tussah, and tussh (ii. 158, 244), we find it in the Ains-Akbari as tasser, and in Dr. Buchanan as tassar (see below). The term is supposed to be adopted from Skt. tassara, tassara, Hind. tasser, a shuttle; perhaps from the form of the cocoon? The moth whose worm produced this silk is generally identified with Antherea paphia, but Capt. Hutton has shown that there are several species known as tassar worms. These are found almost throughout the whole extent of the forest tracts of India. But the chief seat of the manufacture of stuffs, wholly or partly of tassar silk, has long been Bhagalpur on the Ganges. [See also Allen, Mon. on Silk Cloth. of Assam, 1899; Yuenj Ali, Silk Fabrics of N.W.P., 1900.] The first mention of tassar in English reports is said to be that by Michael Atkinson of Jangpîr, as cited below in the Linnatan Transactions of 1804 by Dr. Roxburgh (see Official Report on Agriculture in India, by J. Gough, Calcutta, 1872), and the elaborate article in Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. iii. 96 sqq.]

1756.—"The work of the Tusser silk-weavers has so fallen off that the Calcutta merchants no longer do business with them."—Satt, Rec., 14 Oct., p. 468.

TUTICORIN, n.p. A sea-port of Tinnevelly, and long the seat of pearl-fishery, in Tanul Tattukkodi, [which the Modrus Gloss, derives from Than, tatta, 'to scatter,' kudi, 'habitation']. According to Fra Paolino the name is Tattukodi, 'a place where nets are washed,' but he is not to be trusted. Another etymology alleged is from tairy, 'a bush.' But see Bp. Caldwell below.

1549.—"At this time the King of Cape Comorin, who calls himself the Great King (see TRAVANCORE), went to war with a neighbour of his who was king of the places beyond the Cape, called Minapati and Tutocury, inhabited by the Christians that were made there by Miguel Vaz, Viceroy General of India at the time."—Correa, iv. 493.

1610.—"And the said Captain and Auditor shall go into residence every three years, and to him shall pertain all the temporal government, without any intermeddling therein of the members of the Company . . . nor shall the said members (religiosos) compel any of the Christians to remain in the island unless it is their voluntary choice to do so, and such as wish it may live at Tutucorin."—King's Letter, in L. das Moççes, 336.

1643.—"The other direction in which the residents of Coehim usually go for their trading purchases is to Tutucorim, on the Fishery Coast (Costa da Pescaria), which gets that name from the pearl which is fished there."—Borrero, Ms.

1881.—"The final w in Tuticorn was added for some such euphonious reason as turned Kochii into Cochin and Kumari into Comorin. The meaning of the name Tuttakodi is said to be 'the town where the wells get filled up'; from tatta (properly tartta), 'to fill up a well,' and kudi, 'a place of habitation, a town.' This derivation, whether the true one or not, has at least the merit of being appropriate . . ."—Bp. Caldwell, Hist. of Tinnevelly, 75.

TYCONNA, TYEKANA, s. A room in the basement or cellars, or dug in the ground, in which it has in some parts of India been the practice to pass the hottest part of the day during the hottest season of the year. Pers. hul-khatna, 'nether-house,' i.e. 'subterraneous apartment.' ["In the centre of the court is an elevated platform, the roof of a subterraneous chamber called a wera rneon, whether travellers retire during the great heats of the summer." (Morier, Journey through Persia, &c., 81). Another name for such a place is surdbeh (Burton, Ar. Nights, i. 314).]

1663.—" . . . in these hot Countries, to entitle a House to the name of Good and Fair it is required it should be . . . furnish'd also with good Cellars with great Flaps to stir the Air, for reposing in the fresh Air from 12 till 4 or 5 of the Clock, when the Air of these Cellars begins to be hot and stuffling. . . .'—Borrero, E.T. 79; [ed. Constable, 247].
c. 1753.—"The throng that accompanied that minister proved so very great that the floor of the house, which happened to have a Tah-Qhana, and possibly was at that moment under a secret influence, gave way, and the body, the Vizir, and all his company fell into the apartment underneath."—Sir Mutaghren, iii. 19.

1812.—"The heat at Jellalabad from the end of April was tremendous, 105° to 110° in the shade. Everybody who could do so lived in underground chambers called tykhánas. Broadfoot dates a letter 'from my den six feet under ground.'"—Mrs. Mackenzie, Stories and Sunshine of a Soldier's Life, i. 286. [The same author in her Life in the Mission (i. 399) writes taikhana.]

TUXALL, TAKSAUL. s. The Mint. Hind. taksal, from Skt. tankşal, 'coin-hall.'

[1757.—"Our provisions were regularly sent us from the Dutch Tank sulphat. . . ."]—Hollwell's Navig. of Attack on Calutta, p. 34: in Wheeler, Early Records, 218.

[1811.—"The Ticksal, or superintendent of the mint. . . ."—Kirkpatrick, N. Paul, 201.]

TYPHOON. s. A tornado or cyclonic-wind; a sudden storm, a 'nor'wester' (u.v.). Sir John Barrow (see Autobiog., 57) ridicules "learned anti-quarrians" for fancying that the Chinese took typhoon from the Egyptian Typhon, the word being, according to him, simply the Chinese syllables ts'fang, 'Great Wind.' His ridicule is misplaced. With a monosyllabic language like the Chinese (as we have remarked elsewhere) you may construct a plausible etymology, to meet the requirements of the sound alone, from anything and for anything. And as there is no evidence that the word is in Chinese use at all, it would perhaps be as fair a suggestion to derive it from the English "though 'twixt." Mr. Giles, who seems to think that the balance of evidence is in favour of this (Barrow's) etymology, admits a serious objection to be that the Chinese have special names for the typhoon, and rarely, if ever, speak of it vaguely as a 'great wind.' The fact is that very few words of the class used by seafaring and trading people, even when they refer to Chinese objects, are directly taken from the Chinese language, E.g. Mandarin, paqada, chop, cooly, tutunyug :—none of these are Chinese. And the probability is that Vasco and his followers got the ts'fang, which our sailors made into bungf, and then into typhoon, as they got the monsù which our sailors made into monsoon, direct from the Arab pilots.

The Arabic word is ٽٰسٰن, which is used habitually in India for a sudden and violent storm. Lane defines it as meaning 'an overpowering rain. . . . Noah's flood,' etc. And there can be little doubt of its identity with the Greek τυφών or τυφών. [But Burton (Ar. Nights, iii. 257) alleges that it is pure Arabic, and comes from the root  UIScreen, 'going round.'] This word ٽٰسٰن (the etymologists say, from λυφάς, 'I raise smoke') was applied to a demon-giant or Titan, and either directly from the etym. meaning or from the name of the Titan (as in India a whirlwind is called 'a Devil or Pisachee') to a 'waterspout,' and thence to analogous stormy phenomena. 'Waterspout' seems evidently the meaning of ٽٰسٰن in the Meteoroüogia of Aristotle (γαρτερα μεν ου τυφών . . . κ.τ.λ.) iii. 1: the passage is exceedingly difficult to render clearly; and also in the quotation which we give from Aubus Gellius. The word may have come to the Arabs either in maritime intercourse, or through the translations of Aristotle. It occurs (al-tūṣūn) several times in the Koran; thus in sura, vii. 134, for a flood or storm, one of the plagues of Egypt, and in s. xxix. 14 for the Deluge.

Dr. F. Hirth, again (Journ. R. Geog. Soc. i. 260), advocates the quasi-Chinese origin of the word. Dr. Hirth has found the word T'ai (and also with the addition of fang, 'wind') to be really applied to a certain class of cyclonic winds, in a Chinese work on Formoss, which is a re-issue of a book originally published in 1634. Dr. Hirth thinks T'ai as here used (which is not the Chinese word la or t'ai, 'great,' and is expressed by a different character) to be a local Formossan term; and is of opinion that the combination t'ai-fang is "a sound so near that of typhoon as almost to exclude all other conjectures, if we consider that the writers using the term in European languages were travellers distinctly applying it to storms encountered in that part of the China Sea." Dr. Hirth also refers to F. Mendes Pinto and the passages (quoted below) in which he says tūsūn is the Chinese name for such storms. Dr. Hirth's paper is certainly worthy of much more attention than the scornful assertion of Sir John Barrow, but it does not induce us to change our view as to the origin of typhoon.

Observe that the Port. tūfān distinctly represents tāfān and not tāf-jān, and the oldest English form 'tuffon' does the same, whilst it is not by any means unquestionable that these Portuguese and English forms were first applied in the China Sea, and not in the Indian Ocean. Observe also Lord Bacon's use of the word typhoons in his Latin below; also that tūfān is an Arabic word, at least as old as the Koran, and closely allied in sound and meaning to τφως, whilst it is habitually used for a storm in Hindustani. This is shown by the quotations below (1810-1836); and Platts defines tūfān as "a violent storm of wind and rain, a tempest, a typhoon; a flood, deluge, inundation, the universal deluge" etc.; also tūfānā, "stormy, tempestuous... boisterous, quarrelsome, violent, noisy, riotous."

Little importance is to be attached to Pinto's linguistic remarks such as that quoted, or even to the like dropt by Couto. We apprehend that Pinto made exactly the same mistake that Sir John Barrow did; and we need not wonder at it, when so many of our countrymen in India have supposed hackery to be a Hindustani word, and when we find even the learned H. H. Wilson assuming tope (in the sense of 'grove') to be in native Hindustani use. Many instances of such mistakes might be quoted. It is just possible, though not we think very probable, that some contact with the Formosan term may have influenced the modification of the old English form tuffon into typhoon. It is much more likely to have been influenced by the analogies of monsoon, sinoom; and it is quite possible that the Formosan mariners took up their (unexplained) tā-fān from the Dutch or Portuguese.

On the origin of the Ar. word the late Prof. Robertson-Smith forwarded the following note:

"The question of the origin of Tāfān appears to be somewhat tangled. Tāfān, 'whirlwind, waterspout,' connected with τφως seems pure Greek; the combination in Baal-Zaphon, Exod. xiv. 2, and Sephānī, the northern one, in Joel, ii. 29, suggested by Hitzig, appears to break down, for there is no proof of any Egyptian name for Set corresponding to Typhon."

"On the other hand Tāfān, the deluge, is plainly borrowed from the Aramaic. Tāfān, for Noah's flood, is both Jewish, Aramaic and Syriac, and this form is not borrowed from the Greek, but comes from a true Semitic root Tāf to 'overflow.'

"But again, the sense of which wind is not recognised in classical Arabic. Even Dozy in his dictionary of later Arabic only cites a modern French-Arabic dictionary (Bochtore's) for the sense, "Tornado, trombe.

Bistānī in the Moqlīt et Moqlīt does not give this sense, though he is pretty full in giving modern as well as old words and senses. In Arabic the root Tāf means 'to go round,' and a combination of this idea with the sense of sudden disaster might conceivably have given the new meaning to the word. On the other hand it seems simpler to regard this sense as a late loan from some modern form of τφως, tufān, or tūfān. But in order finally to settle the matter one wants examples of this sense of Tāfān."

'Sometimes claimed as a Chinese word meaning 'a great wind'... but this seems to be a late mystification. In old authors the forms are tufan, tufoun, tufun, &c.—Arab. Tāfān, a hurricane, storm. Gr. τφως, better τφως, a whirlwind. The close accidental coincidence of these words in sense and form is very remarkable, as Whitney notes.'

1575.—"But when we approach'd unto it (Cyprus), a Hurricane arose suddenly, and blew so fiercely upon us, that it wound our great Sail round about our main Mast. . . . These Winds arise from a Wind that is called by the Greeks Typhon; and Play calleth it Vortex and Vorter; but as dangerous as they are, so quickly again they are laid again also."—Rambler's Travels, p. 320. Here the traveller seems to intimiate, though we are not certain, that Typhon was then applied in the Levant to such winds; in any case it was exactly the tyfán of India.

1602.—"This Junkt seeking to make the port of Chincheo met with a tremendous storm such as the natives call Tufado, a thing so overpowering and terrible, and bringing such violence, such earthquake as it were, that it appears as if all the spirits of the infernal world had got into the waves and seas, driving them in a whirl till their fury seemed incredible. . . ."—Dunstan's Travels, p. 1712. The passage seems to be free from any particular allusion.

1615.—"And about midnight Capt. Adams went out in a bark aboard the Houndard with many other barks to tow her in, we fearing a typhon."—Culpeper's Diary, i. 50.

1624.—"3. Typhoons majors, qui per latitudinem aliam corrupit, et corrupta sorbent in sursum, raro fiunt; at vertice, sive pointax exigu et quasi ludidi, frequenter.

Mr. Ruskin appears to have had no doubt as to the etymology of Typhoon, for the rain-cloud from this picture is engraved in Modern Painters, vol. iv. as "The Looks of Typhoon." See Mr. Hamerton's Life of Turner, pp. 288, 291, 315.

Punch parodied Turner in the following imaginary entry from the R.A. Catalogue:

Compare the next quotation, from the same writer, with that given above from Couto respecting the Olho de Boi:

1885.—"The district was subject to cyclonic storms of incredible violence, fortunately lasting for a very short time, but which often caused much destruction. These storms were heralded by the appearance above the horizon of clouds known to the natives by the name of 'lady's eyebrows,' so called from their being curved in a narrow black-arched wise, and these most surely forecast the approach of the tornado."—Ibid. 176.

TYRE, s. Tamil and Malayăl, toypir. The common term in S. India for curdled milk. It is the Skt. dadhī, Hind. dahī of Upper India, and probably the name is a corruption of that word.

1626.—"Many reasoned with the Isuets, and some held vaine Discourses of the Creation, as that there were seven seas; one of Salt water, the second of Fresh, the third of Honey, the fourth of Milk, the fifth of Tair (which is Cream beginning to sour). ..."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 561.

1651.—"Tayer, dat is dicke Melch, die wie Swen nommen."—Reigerius, 138.

1672.—"Curdled milk, Tayer, or what we call Suene, is a thing very grateful to them, for it is very cooling, and used by them as a remedy, especially in hot fevers and smallpox, which is very prevalent in the country."—Baldes, Zeylon, 406.

1776.—"If a Bramin applies himself to commerce, he shall not sell ... Camphire and other aromatics, or Honey, or Water, or Poison, or Flesh, or Milk, or Tyer (Sour Cream) or Ghee, or bitter Oil. ..."—Heldic, Code, 41.

1782.—"Les uns en font affligés pour avoir passé les nuits et dormi en plein air; d'autres pour avoir mangé du riz froid avec de la Tair."—Sorceret, i. 201.

1800.—"The boiled milk, that the family has not used, is allowed to cool in the same vessel; and a little of the former day's tyre, or curdled milk, is added to promote its coagulation."—Buchanan, Mysore, ii, 147.

1822.—"He was indeed poor, but he was charitable; so he spread before them a repast, in which there was no lack of ghee, or milk, or tyre."—The Gourro Paramartan, E.T. by Babington, p. 89.

UJUNGTANAH, n.p. This is the Malay name (nearly answering to 'Land's End,' from Ujung, 'point or promontory,' and tanah, 'land') of the extreme end of the Malay Peninsula terminating in what the maps call Pt. Romana. In Godinho de Eредia's Declaration de Malaca the term is applied to the whole Peninsula, but owing to the interchangeable use of UMBRELLA. s. This word is of course not Indian or Anglo-Indian, but the thing is very prominent in India, and some interest attaches to the history of the word and thing in Europe.

We shall collect here a few quotations bearing upon this. The knowledge and use of this serviceable instrument seems to have gone through extraordinary eclipses. It is frequent as an accompaniment of royalty in the Nineveh sculptures; it was in general Indian use in the time of Alexander;
it occurs in old Indian inscriptions, on Greek vases, and in Greek and Latin literature; it was in use at the court of Byzantium, and at that of the Great Khan in Mongolia, in medieval Venice, and more recently in the semi-savage courts of Madagascar and Ashantee. Yet it was evidently a strange object, needing particular description, to John Marignolli (c. 1350), Ruy Clavijo (c. 1404), Barbosa (1516),
John de Barros (1553), and Minshew
(1617). See also CHATTA, and SOM-

UPAS. s. This word is now, like Juggernaut, chiefly used in English as a customary metaphor, and to indicate some institution that the speaker wishes to condemn in a compendious manner. The word upas is Javanese for poison; [Mr. Scott writes: "The Malay word upas, means simply 'poison.' It is Javanese hupas, Sundanese hupas, Balinese hupas, 'poison.' It commonly refers to vegetable poison, because such are more common. In the Lampung language hupas means 'sickness.'"] It became familiar in Europe in connection with exaggerated and fabulous stories regarding the extraordinary and deadly character of a tree in Java, alleged to be so called. There are several trees in the Malay Islands producing deadly poisons, but the particular tree to which such stories were attached is one which has in the last century been described under the name of Antutris toxicaria, from the name given to the poison by the Javanese proper, viz. Anjir, or Anchor (the name of the tree all over Java), whilst it is known to the Malays and people of Western Java as Upas, and in Celebes and the Philippine Islands as Ipo or Hipo.
[According to Mr. Scott "the Malay name for the 'poison-tree' or any poison-tree, is pohun upas, pohon upas, represented in English by bohon-upas. The names of two poison-trees, the Javanese anchar (Malay also anchar) and chetik, appear occasionally in English books. ... The Sundanese name for the poison tree is bulo ompho."

It was the poison commonly used by the natives of Celebes and other islands for poisoning the small bamboo darts which they used (and in some islands still use) to shoot from the blow-tube (see SUMPTAN, SARPATANE).

The story of some deadly poison in these islands is very old, and we find it in the Travels of Friar Odoric, accompanied by the mention of the disgusting antidote which was believed to be efficacious, a genuine Malay belief, and told by a variety of later and independent writers, such as Nieuhof, Saar, Tavernier, Clever, and Kaempfer.

The subject of this poison came especially to the notice of the Dutch in connection with its use to poison the arrows just alluded to, and some interesting particulars are given on the subject by Bontius, from whom a quotation is given below, with others. There is a notice of the poison in De Bry, in Sir T. Herbert (whencesoever he borrowed it), and in somewhat later authors about the middle of the 17th century. In March 1666 the subject came before the young Royal Society, and among a long list of subjects for inquiry in the East occur two questions pertaining to this matter.

The illustrious Rumphius in his Herbarium Amboinense goes into a good deal of detail on the subject, but the tree does not grow in Amboyna where he wrote, and his account thus contains some ill-founded statements, which afterwards lent themselves to the fabulous history of which we shall have to speak presently. Rumphius however procured from Macassar specimens of the plant, and it was he who first gave the native name (Ipo, the Macassar form) and assigned a scientific name, Arbor bohion-caria. Passing over with simple mention the notices in the appendix to John Ray's Hist. Plantarum, and in Valentijn (from both of which extracts will be found below), we come to the curious compound of the loose statements of former writers magnified, of the popular stories current among Europeans in the Dutch colonies, and of pure romantic invention, which first appeared in 1783, in the London Magazine. The professed author of this account was one Foersch, who had served as a junior surgeon in the Dutch East Indies.* This person describes the tree, called bohon-upas, as situated "about 27 leagues† from Batavia, 14 from Soura Kartaa, the seat of the Emperor, and between 18 and 20 leagues from Tinkjoe" (probably for Tjikjoe, i.e. Djokjo-Karta), "the present residence of the Sultan of Java." Within a radius of 15 to 18 miles round the tree no human creature, no living thing could exist. Condemned malefactors were employed to fetch the poison; they were protected by special arrangements, yet not more than 1 in 10 of them survived the adventure. Foersch also describes executions by means of the Upas poison, which he says he witnessed at Soura Kartaa in February 1776.

The whole paper is a very clever piece of sensational romance, and has impressed itself indelibly, it would seem, on the English language; for to it is undoubtedly due the adoption of that standing metaphor to which we have alluded at the beginning of this article. This effect may, however, have been due not so much directly to the article in the London Magazine as to the adoption of the fable by the famous ancestor of a man still more famous, Erasmus Darwin, in his poem of the Loves of the Plants. In that work not only is the essence of Foersch's story embodied in the verse, but the story itself is quoted at length in the notes. It is said that Darwin was warned of the worthlessness of the narrative, but was unwilling to rob his poem of so sensational an episode.

Nothing appears to be known of Foersch except that there was really a person of that name in the medical service in Java at the time indicated. In our article ANACONDA we have adduced some curious particulars of analogy between the Anaconda-myth and the Upas-myth, and intimated a suspicion that the same hand may have had to do with the spinning of both yarns.

The extraordinary éclat produced by the Foerschian fables led to the appointment of a committee of the Batavian Society to investigate the true facts, whose report was published in 1789. This we have not yet been able to see, for the report is not contained in the regular series of the Transactions of that Society; nor have we found a refutation of the fables by M. Charles Coquembert referred to by Leschenault in the paper which we are about to mention. The poison tree was observed in Java by Deschamps, naturalist with the expedition of D'Entrecasteaux, and is the subject of a notice by him in the Annales de Voyages, vol. i., which goes into little detail, but appears to be correct as far as it goes, except in the statement that the Anchar was confined to Eastern Java. But the first thorough identification of the plant, and scientific account of the facts was that of M. Leschenault de la Tour. This French savant, when about to join a voyage of discovery to the South Seas, was recommended by Jussieu to take up the investigation of the Upas. On first enquiring at Batavia and Samarang, M. Leschenault heard only fables akin to Foersch's romance, and it was at Sura Karta that he first got genuine information, which eventually enabled him to describe the tree from actual examination.

The tree from which he took his specimens was more than 100 ft. in height, with a girth of 18 ft. at the base. A Javanese who climbed it to procure the flowers had to make cuts in the stem in order to mount. After ascending some 25 feet the man felt so ill that he had to come down, and for some days he continued to suffer from nausea, vomiting, and vertigo. But another man climbed to the top of the tree without suffering at all. On another occasion Leschenault, having had a tree of 4 feet girth cut down, walked among its broken branches, and had face and hands besprinkled with the gum-resin, yet neither did he suffer; he adds, however, that he had washed immediately after. Lizards and insects were numerous on the trunk, and birds perched upon the branches. M. Leschenault gives details of the preparation of the poison as practised by the natives, and also particulars of its action, on which experiment was made in Paris with the material which he brought to Europe. He gave it the scientific name by which it continues to be known, viz. Antiaris toxicaria (N.O. Arlocarpaceae).*

M. Leschenault also drew the attention of Dr. Horsfield, who had been engaged in the botanical exploration of Java some years before the British occupation, and continued it during that period, to the subject of the Upas, and he published a paper on it in the Batavian Transactions for 1813 (vol. vii.). His account seems entirely in accordance with that of Leschenault, but is more detailed and complete, with the result of numerous observations and experiments of his own. He saw the Antiaris first in the Province of Poegar, on his way to Banyuwangi. In Blambangan (eastern extremity of Java) he visited four or five trees; he afterwards found a very tall specimen growing at Passaruwang, on the borders of Malang, and again several young trees in the forests of Japara, and one near Onarang. In all these cases, scattered over the length of Java, the people knew the tree as anchar.

Full articles on the subject are to be found (by Mr. J. J. Bennet) in Horsfield's Plantae Javanicae Rariores, 1838-52, pp. 52 seqq., together with a figure of a flowering branch pl. xiii.; and in Blume's Kuphnia (Brussels, 1836), pp. 46 seqq., and pls. xxii., xxiii.; to both of which works we have been much indebted for guidance. Blume gives a drawing for the truth of which we vouches, of a tall specimen of the trees. These he describes as costus, antius, et a ceteris segregatas,—solitary

* Leschenault also gives the description of another and still more powerful poison, used in a similar way to that of the Antiaris, viz. the tying, called sometimes Upo Boja, the plant producing which is a Streblenes, and a creeper. Though, as we have said, the name Upo is generic, and is applied to this, it is not the Upas of English metaphore, and we are not concerned with it here. Both kinds are produced and prepared in Java. The Ipo (a form of Upo) of Macassar is the Antiros; the Ipo of the Borneo Dayaks is the Tieure.
and eminent, on account of their great longevity, (possibly on account of their being spared by the axe?), but not for any such reason as the fables allege. There is no lack of adjoining vegetation; the spreading branches are clothed abundantly with parasitical plants, and numerous birds and squirrels frequent them. The stem throws out ‘twings’ or buttresses (see Horshield in the Bot. Trans., and Blume’s Pl.) like many of the forest trees of Further India. Blume refers, in connection with the origin of the prevalent fables, to the real existence of exhalations of carbonic acid gas in the volcanic tracts of Java, dangerous to animal life and producing sterility around, alluding particularly to a paper by M. Loudoun (a Dutch official of Scotch descent), in the Edinburgh New Phil. Journal for 1832, p. 102, containing a formidable description of the Guwo Upas or Poison Valley on the frontier of the Pekalongan and Banyumas provinces. We may observe, however, that, if we remember rightly, the exaggerations of Mr. Loudoun have been exposed and ridiculed by Dr. Junghuhn, the author of “Java.” And if the Foerisch legend be compared with some of the particulars alleged by several of the older writers, e.g. Camell (in Bay), Valentijn, Spielman, Kaempfer, and Rumphius, it will be seen that the basis for a great part of that putrid commentary, as Blume calls it, is to be found in them.

George Colman the Younger founded on the Foerisch Upas-myth, a kind of melodrama, called the Law of Java, first acted at Covent Garden May 11, 1822. We give some quotations below.*

* I remember when a boy reading the whole of Foerisch’s story in a fascinating book, called Wood’s Zoology, which I have not seen for half a century, and which, I should suppose from my recollection, was more sensational than scientific.

Quelli nomini sono quasi tutti corsali, e quando vanno a battaglia portano cin-cuno uno canna in mano, di lunghessa d’un braccio e pongono in capo de la canna uno ago di ferro attossato in quel veleno, e soffano nella canna e il ago vola e percosce e spara contro quelle qui ch’è percosso more. Ma egli hanno la tina piene di stereo d’uomo e una iscodella di stereo guaressi l’uomo da queste colonai ponture.”—Storia di Foste Odorigo, from Palatina MS., in Cathay, &c., App., p. xlix.

e. 1630.—“And (in Makasser) which is no lesse infernall, the men use long cones or truncks (cald Semptians—see SUMPI-TAN, out of which they can (and use it) blow a little pricking quill, which if it drop the lest drop of blood from any part of the body, it makes him (though the strongest man living) die immediately: some venoms operate in an hour, others in a moment, the veins and body (by the virulence of the poyon) corrupting and rotting presently, to any man’s terror and amazement, and fear to live where such abominations pre-dominate.”—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1683, p. 329.

e. 1631.—“I will now conclude; but I first must say something of the poison used by the King of Macasser in the Island of Celebes to envenome those little arrows which they shoot through blowing-tubes, a poison so deadly that it causes death more rapidly than a dagger. For one wounded ever so lightly, be it but a scratch bringing blood, or a prick in the heel, immediately begins to nod like a drunken man, and falls dead to the ground. And within half an hour of death this putrescent poison so corrupts the flesh that it can be plucked from the body like so much wool. And what seems still more marvellous, if a man (e.g.) be scratched in the thigh, or higher in the body, by another point which is not poisoned, and the still warm blood as it flows down to the feet be merely touched by one of these poisoned little arrows, swift as wind the pestilent influence ascends to the wound, and with the same swiftness and other effects strikes the man from among the living.

These are no idle tales, but the experience of eye-witnesses, not only among our countrymen, but among Danes and Englishmen.”—Juc. Bentti, lib. v. cap. xxxiii.
Moreover beneath this tree, and in its whole circumference to the distance of a stone- cast, no plant, no shrub, or herbage will grow: the soil beneath it is barren, blackened, and burnt as it were... and the atmosphere about it is so polluted that poisoned that the birds which alight upon its branches become giddy and fall dead... all things perish which are touched by its emanations, insomuch that every animal shuns it and keeps away from it, and even the birds eschew flying by it.

"No man dares to approach the tree without having his arms, feet, and head wrapped round with linen... for Death seems to have planted his foot and his throne beside this tree..." (He then tells of a venomous basilisk with two feet in front and fiery eyes, a crest, and a horn, that dwelt under this tree).

"The Malays call it Cegap Upas, but in Macassar and the rest of Celebes it is called Ipo.

"It grows in desert places, and amid bare hills, and is easily discerned from afar, there being no other tree near it."

—Rumphii, Herbarium Amboinense, ii. 263–268.

1685.—"I cannot omit to set forth here an account of the poisoned missiles of the Kingdom of Macassar, which the natives of that kingdom have used against our soldiers, bringing them to sudden death. It is extracted from the Journal of the illustrious and gallant admiral, H. Cornelius Spelman. The natives of the kingdom in question possess a singular art of shooting arrows by blowing through canes, and wounding with these, insomuch that if the skin be but lightly scratched the wounded die in a twinkling."

(Then the old story of the only antidote). The account follows extracted from the Journal.

"There are but few among the Macassars and Bugis who possess the real knowledge needful for selecting the poison, so as to distinguish between what is worthless and what is highest quality. From the princes (or Rajas) I have understood that the soil in which the trees affording the poison grow, for a great space round about produces no grass nor any other vegetable growth, and that the poison is properly a water or liquid, flowing from a bruise or cut made in the bark of those trees, oozing out of the sap does not possess plants that afford milk or milk liquor. When the liquid is being drawn from the wounded tree, no one should carelessly approach it so as to let the liquid touch his hands, for by such contact all the joints become stiffened and contracted. For this reason the collectors make use of long bamboo, armed with sharp iron points. With these they stab the tree with great force, and so get the sap to flow into the canes, in which it..."

1758.—The following description of the BOHON UPAS: or Poison Tree, which grows in the Island of Java, and renders it unwholesome by its noxious vapours, has been translated from an original Dutch by Mr. Heydinger, who was employed to translate it from the original Dutch, by the author. Mr. Foersch, who, we are informed, is at present abroad, in the capacity of surgeon on board an English vessel.

... In the year 1774. I was stationed at Batavia, as a surgeon, in the service of the Dutch East India Company. During my residence there I redressed different accounts of the BOHON UPAS, and the violent effects of its poison. They all then seemed incredible to me, but raised my curiosity so high a degree, that I resolved to investigate this subject thoroughly. I had procured a recommendation from an old Malayan priest to another priest, who lives on the nearest habitable spot to the tree, which is about fifteen or sixteen miles distant. The letter proved of great service to me, and procured me different accounts of the BOHON UPAS, and the violent effects of its poison. They are then provided with a silver or tortoise-shell box, in which they are to put the poisonous gum, and are properly instructed how to proceed, while they are upon their dangerous expedition. Among other particulars, they are always told to attend to the direction of the winds: and this is the only chance they have of saving their lives.

leather cap with two glasses before their eyes, which comes down as far as their breast, and also provides them with a pair of leather gloves, etc.

"The worthy old ecclesiastic has assured me that during his residence there, for upwards of thirty years, he had dismissed above seven hundred criminals in the manner which I have described; and that scarcely two out of twenty returned." . . .

The paper concludes:

"[We shall be happy to communicate any authentic papers of Mr. Foersch to the public through the London Magazine."

1818.—"The literary and scientific world has in few instances been more grossly imposed upon than in the account of the Pohon Upas published in Holland about the year 1780. The history and origin of this forgery still remains a mystery. Foersch, who put his name to the publication, certainly was . . . a surgeon in the Dutch East India Company's service about the time. . . . I have been led to suppose that his literary abilities were as mean as his contempt for truth was consummate.

Having hastily picked up some vague information regarding the Upas, he carried it to Europe, where his notes were arranged, doubtless by a different hand, in such a form as by their plausibility and appearance of truth, to be generally credited. . . . But though the account just mentioned . . . has been demonstrated to be an extravagant forgery, the existence of a tree in Java, from whose sap a poison is prepared, equal in fatality, when thrown into the circulation, to the strongest animal poisons hitherto known, is a fact."—Farfield, in Bataflic Trans., vol. vii. art. x. pp. 2-4.

1868.—"The Church of Ireland offers to us, indeed, a great question, but even that question is but one of a group of questions. There is the Church of Ireland, there is the land of Ireland, there is the education of Ireland... they are all so many branches from one trunk, and that trunk is the tree of what is called Protestant ascendency... We therefore aim at the destruction of that system of ascendency, which, though it has been crippled and curtailed by former measures, yet still must be allowed to exist; it is still there like a tall tree of noxious growth, lifting its head to heaven, and darkening and poisoning the land as far as its shadow can extend; it is still there, gentlemen, and now at length the day has come when, as we hope, the axe has been laid to the root of that tree, and it nods and quivers from its top to its base..."—Mr. GLADSTONE'S Speech at Wigan, Oct. 23. In this quotation the orator indicates the Upas tree without naming it. The name was supplied by some commentators referring to this indication at a later date:

1873.—"It was perfectly certain that a man who possessed a great deal of imagination might, if he stayed out sufficiently long at night, staring at a small star, persuade himself next morning that he had seen a great comet; and it was equally certain that such a man, if he stared long enough at a bush, might persuade himself that he had seen a branch of the Upas Tree."—Speech of Lord EDMUND FITZMAURICE on the 2nd reading of the University Education (Ireland) Bill. March 3.

"It was to regain office, to satisfy the Iri-h irreconcilables, to secure the Pope's brass hand, and not to pursue "the glorious traditions of English Liberalism," that Mr. Gladstone struck his two blows at the Upas tree."—Mr. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN, in Fort. Res. Sept. pp. 289-90.

1885.—The dread Upas dropped its fruits. "Beneath the shady canopy of this tall fig no native will, if he knows it, dare to rest, nor will he pass between its stem and the wind, so strong is his belief in its evil influence. "In the centre of a tea estate, not far off from my encampment, stood, because no one could be found daring enough to cut it down, an immense specimen, which had long been a nuisance to the proprietor on account of the lightning every now and then striking off, to the damage of the shrubs below, large branches, which none of his servants could be induced to remove. One day, having been pitchforked together and burned, they were considered disposed of; but next morning the whole of his labourers awoke, to their intense alarm, afflicted with a painful eruption. It was then remembered that the smoke of the burning branches had been blown by the wind through the village. ..." (Two Chinese men were engaged to cut down and remove the tree, and did not suffer; it was ascertained that they had smeared their bodies with coconut oil.)—H. O. FORBES, A Naturalists's Wanderings. 112-113.

[Mr. Bent (Southern Arabia, 72, 89) tells a similar story about the collection of frankincense, and suggests that it was based on the custom of employing slaves in this work, and on an interpretation of the name Hadrimaut, said to mean 'valley of death.']

UPPER ROGER, s. This happy example of the Hobson-Jobson dialect occurs in a letter dated 1755, from Capt. Jackson at Syrian in Burma, which is given in Dalrymple's Oriental Repository, i. 192. It is a corruption of the Skt. yæ-rer-daţ, 'young King,' the Caesar or Heir-Apparent, a title borrowed from ancient India by most of the Indo-Chinese monarchies, and which we generally render in Siam as the 'Second King.'

A more elaborate form is 'arż-daţ, 'memorializing.' This is used in a very barbarous form of Hobson-Jobson below.

VARELLA, s. This is a term constantly applied by the old Portuguese writers to the pagodas of Indo-China and China. Of its origin we have no positive evidence. The most probable etymology is that it is the Malay "barahiti" or "brähiti," [in Wilkinson's Dict. brähita], 'an idol.' An idol temple is "brähita-barahiti," a house of idols; but "brähiti" alone may have been used elliptically by the Malays or misunderstood by the Portuguese. We have an analogy in the double use of "pagoda" for temple and idol.

1555.—"Their temples are very large edifices, richly wrought, which they call Valeras, and which cost a great deal....—Account of China in a Jesuit's Letter appended to Fr. Binos, H. of Ethopia, translated by Mr. Major in his India's Mem. Mor&, Hak. Soc. I. xlviii.

1589.—"Gran quantità se ne consuma ancora in quel Reino nelle loro Varella, che sono gli suoi pagodi, da quelli v'è gran quantità di grandi e di piccole, e sono alcune montagnole fatta a mano, a giusa d'vn pan di zuccaro, e alcune d'esse alte quanti il campanile di S. Marco di Venetia... si consuma in queste istesse varella anco gran quantità di oro di foglia....—Cos. Federico, in Romano, iii. 355; [in Hak. ii. 308.]

1586.—"... nusignamme fin la mattina, che ci troviamo alla Bara giusto di Negrais, checosi chiamasi in loro linguaggio il porto, che in Pagun, uno disegno di una bandiera sinistra del rino vn pagode, omer Varella tutta dorata, la quale si scopre di lontano da' vascelli, che vengono d'alto mare, et massime quando il sol percute in quell'oro, che la fia risplendere all'intorno....—Gasparo Balbi, i. 92.*

1557.—"...They consume in these Varellas great quantity of Gold; for that they be all gilded alfo....—Fitz, in Hakluyt, ii. 333; [and see quotation from same under DAGON.]

1811.—"...So also they have many Varelas, which are monasteries in which dwell their religious, and some of these are very summations, with their roofs and pinnacles all gilded....—Cotta. VI. vii. 9.

More than one prominent geographical feature on the coast-navigation to China was known by this name. Thus in Linschoten's description of the route from Malacca to Macau, he mentions at the entrance to the 'Strait of Simanqua,' a rock having the appearance of an obelisk, called the Varella del Chiou; and again, on the eastern coast of Champa, or Cochlin China, we have frequent notice of a point (with a river also called that of the Varella. Thus in Plato:

1540.—"...The Friday following we found ourselves just against a River called by the inhabitants of the Country Tsimorees, and by us (the) Varella."—Pinto (in Coppar. p. 47.

This Varella of Champa is also mentioned by Linschoten:

1585.—"... from this third point to the Varella the coast turneth North....—This Varella is a high hill reaching into the Sea, and above on the toppe it hath a very high stone called a tower or mill' which may be seen far off, therefore it is by the Portingall called Varella."—Pinto, p. 312.

VEDAS. The Sacred Books of the Brahmans, Veda being 'knowledge.' Of these books there are nominally four, viz., the Rg, Yajur, Sama and Atharva Vedas.

The earliest direct intimation of knowledge of the existence of the Vedas appears to be in the book called De Tribus Impostoribus, said to have been printed in 1508, in which they are mentioned.* Possibly this know-

* Compare this vivid description with a modern notice of the same pagoda.

1828.—"... the Pagoda range... 700 miles from its origin in the Nama wolds... sinks in the sea hard by Negrais, its last bold crowned by the golden Pagoda of Molinh, gleaming far to seaward in a brilliant stream...."—Pinto, in Coppar. p. 447. There is a small view of it in this work.

1908.—"...I wrote A. B. I cannot find the book in the B. Museum Library. —P. [A bibliographical account of the Veda books in the Bibliotheque des Treas Imposteurs, et prodic de dite nostre philo bicieue et bibilothique pour l'illustre Junct (i.e. Brune), Paris and Brussels, 1587. Also see Sec. I. & ii. vii. 414 seq.; Sec. IX. 55. The passage about the Vedas seems to be the following:

trade came through the Arabs. Though thus we do not trace back any direct allusion to the Vedas in European books, beyond the year 1600 or thereabouts, there seems good reason to believe that the Jesuit missionaries had information on the subject at a much earlier date. St. Francis Xavier had frequent discussions with Brahman, and one went so far as to communicate to him the mantra "Om śrīrūpayeyamānak." In 1559 a learned Brahman at Goa was converted by Father Belchior Carneyro, and baptized by the name of Manuel. He afterwards (with the Viceroy's sanction?) went by night and robbed a Brahman on the mainland who had collected many MSS., and presented the spoil to the Fathers, with great satisfaction to himself and them (Sousa, Orient. Conqrist, i. 151-2).

It is probable that the information concerning the Hindu religion and sacred books which was attained even in Europe by the end of the 16th century was greater than is commonly supposed, and greater than what we find in print would warrant us to assume. A quotation from San Roman below illustrates this in a general way. And in a constitution of Gregory XV. dated January 31, 1623, there is mention of rites called Haíeres and Tanídr, which doubtless represent the Vedic names Aitareya and Tādga (see Norbert, i, 39). Lucena's allusion below to the "four parts" of Hindu doctrine must have reference to the Vedas, and his information must have come from reports and letters, as he never was in India. In course of time, however, what had been known seems to have been forgotten, and even Halhed (1776) could write about 'Beids of the Shaster!' (see Code, p. xiii.). This shows that though he speaks also of the 'Four Beids' (p. xxxi.) he had no precise knowledge.

In several of the earlier quotations of the word it will be seen that the form used is Vedam or Vedium. This is the Tamil form. And it became prevalent during the 18th century in France from Voltaire's having constituted himself the advocate of a Sanskrit Poem, called by him Élozour Vedam, and which had its origin in S. India. This was in reality an imitation of an Indian Purâna, composed by some missionary in the 17th century (probably by R. de' Nobili), to introduce Christian doctrines; but Voltaire supposed it to be really an ancient Indian book. Its real character was first explained by Somerat (see the Essay by F. W. Ellis, in As. Res. xi.). The first information regarding the real Vedas was given by Colebrooke in 1805 (As. Res. viii.). Orme and some authors of the 18th and early part of the 19th century write Bed, which represents the N. Indian vernacular form Bed. Both forms, Bed and Vedam, are known to Fleurcy, as we see below.

On the subject of the Vedas, see Weber's Hist. of Indian Lit, Max Müller's Ancient Sanskrit Lit., Whitney's Oriental and Linguistic Studies, vol. i. [and Macdowell's Hist. of Sanskrit Lit., pp. 29 seqq.].

chronologial system of Vedic literature, in his statement that some parts of the Vedas are at least 500 years later than others.

VEDDAS. n.p. An aboriginal—or at least a forest—people of Ceylon.
The word is said to mean 'hunters,' [Tam. cedu, 'hunting'].

1655.—"The Weddas (who call themselves Beddas) are all original inhabitants

VILLARD, s. This is a word apparently peculiar to the Island of Bombay, used in the sense which the quotation shows. We have failed to get any elucidation of it from local experience; but there can be little doubt that it is a corruption of the Port. vallado , 'a mound or embankment.' [It is generally known as 'Horncy's Vellard', after the Governor of that name; but it seems to have been built about 1752, some 20 years before Hornby's time (see Douglas, Bombay and W. India, i. 140).]

1809.—"At the foot of the little hill of Sion is a causeway or vellard, which was built by Mr. Duncan, the present Governor, across a small arm of the sea, which separates Bombay from Salsette. ... The vellard was begun A.D. 1797, and finished in 1805, at an expense of 50,575 rupees."—Moran Graham, S.

VELLORE, n.p. A town, and formerly a famous fortress in the district of N. Arcot, 80 m. W. of Madras. It often figures in the wars of the 18th century, but is best known in Europe for the mutiny of the Sepoys there in 1806. The etym. of the name Vellar is unknown to us. Fra Paolino gives it as Velier, 'the Town of the Lame'; and Col. Brannill as Vellar, from Vel, a benefit, benefaction.' [Cox-Stuart (Man. N. Arcot, ii. 417) and the writer of the Madras Gloss, agree in deriving it from Tam. val, 'the babool tree, Acacia arabica,' and är, 'village.]

VENGOU-MASTER, s. We know this word only from the notifications which we quote. It was probably taken from the name of some Portuguese office of the same kind. [In the quotation given below from Owen it seems that the word was in familiar use at Johanna, and the context shows that his duty was somewhat like that of the cowrydr, as he provided fowls, cattle, fruit, &c., for the expedition.]

1781.—From an advertisement in the India Gazette of May 17th it appears to have been an euphemism for Auctioneer; [also see Bosted, Echoes of Old Calcutta, 3rd ed. p. 109].

"Mr. Donald ... begs leave to acquaint them that the Vendu business will in future be carried on by Robert Donald, and W. Williams."—India Gazette, July 28.

1783.—"The Governor-General is pleased to notify that Mr. Williamson as the Company's Vendu Master is to have the superintendance and management of all Sales at the Presidency."—In Seton-Karr, ii. 99. At pp. 107, 114, also are notifications of sales by "G. Williamson, Vendu Master."

[1823.—'One of the chiefs, a crafty old rogue, commonly known by the name of 'Lord Rodney' ... acted as captain of the port, interpreter, Vendue-Master and master of the ceremonies.'—Owen, Narrative of Voyages to explore the shores of Africa, &c., i. 179.]

VENETIAN, s. This is sometimes in books of the 18th and preceding century used for Sequins. See under CHICK.

1542.—"At the bottom of the cargo (lequip), among the ballast, she carried 4 big guns (tirons), and others of smaller size, and 60,000 venetians in gold, which were destined for Coje Chafar, in order that with this money he should in all speed provide necessaries for the fleet which was coming."—Corco, iv. 250.

1675.—Fryer gives among coins and weights at Goa:

"The Venetian ... 18 Tongaus, 30 Reecs."—p. 206.

1752.—"At this juncture a gold mohur is found to be worth 14 Arcot Rupees, and a Venetian 14 1/2 Arcot Rupees."—In Longi, p. 32.

VERANDA. s. An open pillar gallery round a house. This is one of the very perplexing words for which at least two origins may be maintained, on grounds equally plausible. Besides these two, which we shall immediately mention, a third has sometimes been alleged, which is thus put forward by a well-known French scholar:

"Ce mot (veranda) n'est lui-même qu'une transcription inexacte du Persan barāmda, perche, terrasse, balcon."—C. Defrémery, in Revue Critique, 1869, 1st Sem. p. 61.

Plausible as this is, it may be rejected. Is it not, however, possible that barāmda, the literal meaning of which is 'coming forward, projecting,' may be a Persian 'striving after meaning,' in explanation of the foreign word which they may have borrowed?

Williams, again, in his Skt. Dict. (1872) gives veranda ... a veranda, a portico. ... Moreover Beames in his Comparative Grammar of Modern Aryan Languages, gives Sansk. barāmda, 'portico,' Bengali barāmda, Hind. barāmda, adding: "Most of our wise-acres literateurs (qu. littérature?) in Hindustan now-a-days consider this word to be derived from Pers. bará-madah, and write it accordingly. It is, however, good Sanskrit* (i. 153). Fortunately we have in Bishop Caldwell a proof that comparative grammar does not preclude good manners. Mr. Beanes was evidently in entire ignorance of the facts which render the origin of the Anglo-Indian word so curiously ambiguous; but we shall not call him the "wise-acre grammarian." Varanda, with the meaning in question, does not, it may be observed, belong to the older Sanskrit, but is only found in comparatively modern works.*

Littre also gives as follows (1874): "ETYM. Varanda, mot rapporté de l'Inde par les Anglais, est la simple dégénérescence, dans les langues modernes de l'Inde, du Sansc. Varanda, colonnade, de var, couvrir.*

That the word as used in England and in France was brought by the English in India need not be doubted. But either in the same sense, or in one closely analogous, it appears to have existed, quite independently, in Portuguese and Spanish; and the manner in which it occurs without explanation in the very earliest narrative of the adventure of the Portuguese in India, as quoted below, seems almost to preclude the possibility of their having learned it in that country for the first time; whilst its occurrence in P. de Alcala can leave no doubt on the subject.

[Prof. Skeat says:] "If of native Span. origin, it may be Span. vera rod, rail. Cf. L. varus, crooked." (Concise Dict. s.v.)

1485.—"E vêo ter commosco onde esta-vamos lançados, em huma varanda onde estava hum grande castiçal d'arme que nos alumeava."—Rôrrio da Víngem de Vídeo da Gema, 2nd ed., 1591, p. 92. i.e. . . . and came to join us where we had been put in a varanda, where there was a great candlestick of brass that gave us light . . . .

And Correa, speaking of the same historical passage, though writing at a later date, says: "When the Captain-Major arrived, he was conducted through many courts and varandas (muitos patios e varandas) to a dwelling opposite that in which the king was. . . ."—Correa, by Stanley, 193, compared with original Lendas, i. i. 98.

1505.—In Pedro de Alcala's Spanish-Arabic Vocabulary we have:

"Varandas—Tárìgh,

Varandas assi çêrgaba, çêrgah."

* This last remark is due to A. B.

Interpreting these Arabic words, with the assistance of Prof. Robertson Smith, we find that târîgh is, according to Dozy (Supp. 1. 490), darbâr, itself taken from darbârin (ˋَذَرَبْرُنَ) 'a stair-rolling, fireguard, balcony, &c.;' whilst çêrgah stands for çergah, a variant (Ifr. 118, p. 755, i. 3) of the common word çerga, 'a latice, or anything lat-ticed,' such as a window,—"a balcony, a balustrade."

1540.—"This said, we entred with her into an outward court, all about inquired with Galleries (secoro a velo de duas ordens de varandas) as if it had been a Cloister of Religious persons . . . ."—Pinta (orig. cap. lxxxiii.), in Cupim. 102.

VERDURE, s. This word appears to have been used in the 18th century for vegetables, adapted from the Port. verduras.

1752.—Among minor items of revenue from duties in Calcutta we find:

"Verdure, fish pots, firewood 216 10 6."
—In Long, 35.

VERGE, s. A term used in S. India for rice lands. It is the Port. Värset, Värziu, Vargem, which Vieyra defines as 'a plain field, or a piece of level ground, that is sowed and cultivated.'

1749.—"... as well as vargens lands as hortas" (see OART).—Treaty, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 48.

1772.—"The estates and verges not yet assessed must be taxed at 10 per cent."—Goct. Order, ibid. i. 421.

VETTVVER, s. This is the name generally used by the French for the fragrant grass which we call cuscus (q.v.). The word is Tamil rettiver, from rettu, 'digging,* ver,* root*.

1860.—"Europeans cool their apartments by means of wetted mats (see TATTY) made of straw or grass, and sometimes of the roots of the wattie waeroa, which, when wetted, exhales a pleasant but faint smell."—Boyle's Tracts, p. 11.

VIDANA, s. In Ceylon, the title of a village head man. "The person who conveys the orders of Government to the people" (Clough, s.v. vidan). It is apparently from the Skt. vadana, "... the act of speaking... the mouth, face, countenance... the front, point," &c. In Javanese wadona (or wadono, in Jav. pronunciation) is "the face, front, van; a chief of high rank: a Javanese title" (Crawford, s.v.). The Javanese title is, we imagine, now only traditional; the Ceylonese one has followed the usual downward track of high titles; we can hardly doubt the common Sanskrit origin of both (see Abhinewa, April 1, 1852, p. 413, and May 13, ibid. p. 602). The derivation given by Alvis is probably not inconsistent with this.

1681.—"The Dissavas (see DISSAVE) by these Courli vidani their officers do oppress and squeeze the people, by laying Mules upon them. In Pree this officer is the Dissava's chief Substitute, who orders and manages all affairs incumbent upon his master."—Kings, 51.

1723.—"Vidanes, the overseers of villages, who are charged to see that no inhabitant suffers any injury, and that the Land is sown betimes. ..."—Valentijn (Ceylon), Names of Officers, &c., 11.

1755.—"Under each (chief) were placed different subordinate headmen, called *Vidana.*Artichokes and Vidans. The last is derived from the word (vaidad), 'commanding,' or 'ordering,' and means, as Clough (p. 617) defines it, the person who conveys the orders of the Government to the People."

—I, de Alvis, in Ceylon Journal, 8, p. 287.
VIHARA. WIHARE. &c., s. In Ceylon a Buddhist temple. Skt. vihāra, a Buddhist convent, originally the hall where the monks met, and thence extended to the buildings generally of such an institution, and to the shrine which was attached to them, much as minister has come from monasterium. Though there are now no Buddhist vihāras in India Proper, the former wide diffusion of such establishments has left its trace in the names of many noted places: e.g. Bihāra, and the great province which takes its name; Koch Behar; the Vihār water-works at Bombay; and most probably the City of Bokhara itself. [Numerous ruins of such buildings have been unearthed in X. India, as, for instance, that at Sarnāth near Benares, of which an account is given by Gen. Cunningham (Arch. Rep. i. 121). An early use of the word (probably in the sense of a monastery) is found in the Mathura Jain inscription of the 2nd century, a.d. in the reign of Huvīlika (ibid. iii. 33.).]

1851.—"The first and highest order of priests are the Tīrthankas, who are the priests of the Budhān God. Their temples are styled Veheras. . . . These. . . . only live in the Vihar, and enjoy great Revenues."—Kone, Ceylon, 74.

1855.—"The King last year purchased 500,000 viss of lead, at 5 tikals (see TICAL), for 100 viss, and sold it at twenty tickals."—Park, Mission to Am, 250.

VIZIER, WUZEER. s. Ar.—H. waźir, 'a minister,' and usually the principal minister, under a (Mahomedan) prince. [In the Koran (cap. xx. 30) Moses says: "Give a waźir of my family. Harūn (Aaron) my brother." In the Ain we have a distinction drawn between the Vakil, or prime minister, and the Vāzir, or minister of finance (ed. Bockhmann, i. 527.) In India the Nawāb of Oudh was long known as the Nawāb Vāzir, the founder of the quasi-independent dynasty having been Sādāt 'Ali Khān, who became Sīlādār of Oudh, c. 1732, and was also Vāzir of the Empire, a title which became hereditary in his family. The title of Nawāb Vāzir emerged in that of pādshāh, or King, assumed by Ghāzī-ud-dīn Hādar in 1820, and up to his death still borne or claimed by the ex-King Wājīd 'Ali Shāh, under surveillance in Calcutta. As most titles degenerate, Vāzir has in Spain become alquèrī, 'a constable,' in Port, alvèl, 'a alderman.'

VISS. s. A weight used in S. India and in Burma; Tam. visi, 'division.' Skt. vihāta, 'distributed.' In Madras it was 1 of a Madras maund, and = 3½ lb. 2 oz. avoirdupois. The old scale ran, 10 pagoda weights = 1 pollum, 40 pollums = 1 viss, & viss = 1 maund (of 25½ lbs.). 20 maunds = 1 catty. In Burma the viss = 100 tikals = 3½ lb. 5½ oz. Viss is used in Burma by foreigners, but the Burmese call the weight pekkha, probably a corruption of visi.

[WACADASH. s. Japanese wakizashi, 'a short sword.']
WALER, s. A horse imported from N. South Wales, or Australia in general.

1866.—"Well, young shaver, have you seen the horses? How is the Waler's off foreleg?"—Trevelyan, Dark Bangalor, 223.

1873.—"For sale, a brown Waler gelding, ...—Madras Mail, June 25.

WALLA, s. Two distinct words are occasionally written in the same way.

(a). Ar. wali. A Mahommadean title corresponding to Governor; ["the term still in use for the Governor-General of a Province as opposed to the Muhaitz, or district-governor. In E. Arabia the Wali is the Civil Governor as opposed to the Amir or Military Commandant. Under the Caliphate the Wali acted also as Prefect of Police (the Indian Faujdar—see FOUDJAR), who is now called Zabib." (Burton, Ar. Nights, i. 238)]. It became familiar some years ago in connection with Kandahar. It stands properly for a governor of the highest class, in the Turkish system superior to a Pasha. Thus, to the common people in Egypt, the Khedive is still the Wali.

1298.—"Whenever he knew of anyone who had a pretty daughter, certain rumahs of his would go to the father and say: 'What say you? Here is this pretty daughter of yours; give her in marriage to the Bailo Achmath' (for they call him the Bailo, or, as we should say, 'the Viceroy')."—Marco Polo, i. 402.

1498.—"... e mandos hum homen que se chama Bale, o qual he como alquimide."—Reis de V. da Gama, 54.

1727.—"As I was one morning walking in the Streets, I met accidentally the Governor of the City (Muscat), by them called the Waaly."—A. Hamilton, i. 70; [ed. 1743, i. 71.]

[1753.—In Georgia. "Vali, a viceroy descended immediately from the sovereigns of the country over which he presides."—Hone, iv. 25.]

b. Ar. wali. This is much used in some Mahommadean countries (e.g. Egypt and Syria) for a saint, and by a transfer for the shrine of such a saint. ["This would be a separate building like our family tomb and probably domed. ... Europeans usually call it 'a little Wali'; or, as they write it, 'Wely'; the contained for the container; the 'Santon' for the 'Santon's tomb'" (Burton, Ar. Nights, i. 97).] See under PEER.

WANDEROO. s. In Ceylon a large kind of monkey, originally described under this name by Knox (Probiades venirens). The name is, however, the generic Sinhalese word for 'a monkey' (wandan, wandan), and the same with the Hind. bandar, Skt. vaṇarā. Remarks on the disputed identity of Knox's wnderoo, and the different species to which the name has been applied, popularly, or by naturalists, will be found in Emerson Tenent, i. 129-130.

1681.—"Monkeys. Some so large as our English Spotted Dogs, of a darkish grey colour, and black faces, with great white beards round from ear to ear, which makes them show just like old men. There is another sort just these same beards, but differ in colour, being milk white both in body and face, having great beards like the others, both these sorts do but little mischief. ... This sort they call in their language Wanderow."—Knox, Hist. Rel. of the I. of Ceylon, 25.

1863.—"The wanderow is remarkable for its great white beard, which stretches quite from ear to ear across its black face, while the body is of a dark grey."—Perceval, Acc. of the I. of Ceylon, 296.

1810.—"I saw one of the large baboons, called here Wanderows, on the top of a cocoanut tree, where he was gathering nuts. ..."—Maria Graham, 97.
1874.—"There are just now some very remarkable monkeys. One is a Macaque... Another is the Wanderoo, a fellow with a great mass of hair round his face, and the most awful teeth ever seen in a monkey's mouth. This monkey has been credited with having killed two niggers before he was caught; he comes from Malabar."—F. Beckland, in Ley., 289.

WANGHEE, WHANGHEE. s. The trade name for a slender yellow bamboo with beautifully regular and short joints, imported from Japan. We cannot give the origin of the term with any conviction. The two following suggestions may embrace or indicate the origin. (1) Rumphius mentions a kind of bamboo called by him Arundinarbor fera, the native name of which is Bulu swangi (see in vol. iv. cap. vii. et seqg.). As Bulu is Malay for bamboo, we presume that swangi is also Malay, but we do not know its meaning. (2) Our friend Professor Terrien de la Coperie notes: "In the Kiang-hi treatise, 118, 119, the Huang-teh is described as follows: 'A species of bamboo, very hard, with the joints close together; the skin is as white as snow; the larger kind can be used for boats, and the smaller used for pipes, &c.' See also Wells Williams, Syllabic Dict. of the Chinese Names, p. 251.

[On this Professor Giles writes: '"Whangi' clearly stands for 'yellow,' as in Whampoo and like combinations. The difficulty is with 'a,' which should stand for some word of that sound in the Cantonese dialect. There is such a word in 'clothes, skin, sheath'; and 'yellow skin (or sheath)' would form just such a combination as the Chinese would be likely to employ. The suggestion of Terrien de la Coperie is not to the purpose." So Mr. C. M. Gardner writes: 'The word hanging has many meanings in Chinese according to the tone in which it is said. Hanging-teh or hanging-taing might be 'yellow-corded cane.' The word 'chuh' means 'bamboo,' and hanging-chuh might be 'yellow or Imperial bamboo.' Wen means 'a myriad, chi 'utensil'; wan-chi teh might mean a kind of cane 'good for all kinds of uses.' Wan-chuh is a particular kind of bamboo from which paper is made in W. Hapi.'

Mr. Skeat writes: ‘"Bulu swangi" is correct Malay. Favre in his Malay-Fr. Dict. has swangi, esprit, spectre, esprit mauvais.’ "Bulu swangi" does not appear in Ridley’s list as the name of a bamboo, but he does not profess to give all the Malay plant names."]

WATER-CHESTNUT. The trapa hispinoid of Roxb. Hind. singhara, "the hounded fruit." See SINGARA.

WEAVER-BIRD. s. See BAYA.

WEST-COAST. n.p. This expression in Dutch India means the west coast of Sumatra. This seems also to have been the recognised meaning of the term at Madras in former days. See SLAVE.

[1855.—"Order'd that the following good be laden aboard the Syann Merchant for the West Coast of Sumatra..."—Pringle, Diary Pt. St. Geo. 1st ser. IV. 199; also see 186, 188, &c.]

1747.—"The Revd. Mr. Francis Fordyce being entered on the Establishment... and having several months' allowance due to him for the West Coast, amounting to Pgs. 371. 9. ..."—Ps. St. India's Ccsn. April 30, MS. in India Office. The letter appended shows that the chaplain had been attached to Bencoolen. See also Wheeler, i. 148.

WHAMPOA. n.p. In former days the anchorage of European ships in the river of Canton, some distance below that city. [The name is pronounced Wampa (Bell, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. 631.).]

1770.—"Now all European ships are obliged to anchor at Hang-poa, three leagues from the city" (Canton).—Baysal. tr. 1777. ii. 258.

WHISTLING TEAL. s. This in Jerdon is given as Hendycoqua Aureola of Sykes. Latin names given to birds and beasts might at least fulfil one object of Latin names, in being intelligible and pronounceable by foreign nations. We have seldom met with a more barbarous combination of impossible words than this. A numerous flock of these whistlers is sometimes seen in Bengal sitting in a tree, a curious habit for ducks.

WHITE ANTS. See ANTS. WHITE.

WHITE JACKET. s. The old custom in the hot weather, in the family or at bachelor parties, was to wear this at dinner; and one or more dozens of white jackets were a regular item in an Indian outfit. They are now, we believe, altogether, and for many years obsolete. [They certainly came again into common use some 20 years ago.] But though one reads under every generation of British India that they had gone out of use, they did actually survive to the middle of the last century, for I can remember a white-jacket dinner in Fort William in 1849. [The late Mr. Bridgman of Gorakhpur, whose recollection of India dated from the earlier part of the last century told me that in his younger days the rule at Calcutta was that the guest always arrived at his host’s house in the full evening-dress of the time, on which his host meeting him at the door expressed his regret that he had not chosen a cooler dress; on which the guest’s Bearer always, as if by accident, appeared from round the corner with a nankeen jacket, which was then and there put on. But it would have been opposed to etiquette for the guest to appear in such a dress without express invitation.]

1893.—“It was formerly the fashion for gentlemen to dress in white jackets on all occasions, which are well suited to the country, but being thought too much an undress for public occasions, they are now laid aside for English cloth.”—Ld. Valtorta, i. 240.

[c. 1848.—“... a white jacket being evening dress for a dinner-party...”—Berncastle, Voyage to China, including a Visit to the Bombay Pres. i. 93.]

WINTER. s. This term is constantly applied by the old writers to the rainy season, a usage now quite unknown to Anglo-Indians. It may have originated in the fact that winter is in many parts of the Mediterranean coast so frequently a season of rain, whilst rain is rare in summer. Compare the fact that shita in Arabic is indifferently winter, or rain; the winter season being the rainy season, Shita is the same word that appears in Canticles ii. 11: “The winter (sethat) is past, the rain is over and gone.”

1513.—“And so they set out, and they arrived at Surat (Corona) in May, when the winter had already begun, so they went into winter-quarters (pnlse queneuerato), and in September, when the winter was over, they went to Goa in two foists and other vessels, and in one of these was the ganda (rhinoceros), the sight of which made a great commotion when landed at Goa. ...”—Correa, ii. 373.

1563.—“R. ... In what time the year does this disease (morsc, Mort-de-chien) mostly occur?" "O. ... It occurs mostly in June and July (which is the winter-time in this country)."”—García, f. 76g.

c. 1567.—“Du Bezeneger a Goa sono d’estate otto giornate di viaggio; ma noi lo facessimo di meno l’inverno, il mese di Luglio.”—Orazio Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 389.

1583.—“Il uermo in questo paese è il Maggio, Giugno, Luglio e Agosto, e il resto dell’anno è estate. Ma bene è da notare che qui la stagione nò si può chiamar uerno rispetto al freddo, che nò vi regna mai, nò solo per cagione de’ venti, e delle gran pioggie.”—Gasparo Balbi, f. 67e.

1584.—“Note that the City of Goa is the principal place of all the Oriental India, and the winter thus beginneth the 15 of May, with very great rain.”—Barret, in Hdb. ii. 413.

[1592.—See under PENANG.]

1610.—“The Winter becor beginneth about the first of June and dureth till the twentieth of September, but not with constant rains as at Goa, but for some six or seven daysy every change and full, with much wind, thunder and raine.”—Finch, in Purchas, i. 423.

c. 1610.—“L’Hyver commence au mois d’Avril, et dure six mois.”—Pyrard de Laval, i. 78: [Hak. Soc. i. 104, and see i. 64, ii. 31.]

1643.—“... des Calottes (qui sont) tous les ans pour faire la guerre aux Malabares ... et cela est emuiuer la May. September, lors que leur Hyver est passe.”...—Magvart, 347.

WOODE-APPLE. 971 WOODOCK, WOODLOCK.

usque ad Aprilem hyemem habent."—Iobi Lusdoji, ad saum Historiam Commentaries, 101.

1770. — "The mere breadth of these mountains divides summer from winter, that is to say, the season of fine weather from the rainy... all that is meant by winter in India is the time of the year when the clouds... are driven violently by the winds against the mountains," Sc.—Royall, tr. 1777, i. 34.

WOOD-APPLE. s. [According to the Madras Gloss, also known as Caril Fruit, Monkey Fruit, and Elephant Apple, because it is like an elephant's skin.] A wild fruit of the N.O. Aurantioceae growing in all the drier parts of India (Fernnia elephantum, Correa). It is somewhat like the bel (see BAEL) but with a still harder shell, and possesses some of its medicinal virtue. In the native pharmacopeia it is sometimes substituted (Moodeen Sheriff, Watt, Econ. Diet. iii. 324 seqg.). Buchanan-Hamilton calls it the Kot-bel (Kathbel). (Eastern India, ii. 787).

1575. — "Once upon a time it was announced that the Pathishah was about to go on a journey in the province of Upper India. And the village heads gathered in pandhavat to consider what offering they could present on such an unexampled occasion. Two products only of the village lands were deemed fit to serve as nazzma. One was the custard-apple, the other was the wood-apple... a wild fruit with a very hard shelly rind, something like a large lemon or small citron converted into wood. After many pro and con, the custard-apple carried the day, and the village elders accordingly, when the king appeared, made salami, and presented a large basket of custard-apples. His Majesty did not accept the offering graciously, but with much abusive language at being stopped to receive such trash, pelted the simpletons with their offering, till the whole basketful had been squashed upon their venerable heads. They retired, abashed indeed, but devoutly thanking Heaven, that the offering had not been of wood-apples!"—Some Unscientific Notes on the History of Plants (by H. Y.) in Geog. Mag., 1875, pp. 49-50. The story was heard many years ago from Major William Yule, for whom see under TOBACCO.

WOOD-OIL or GURJUN OIL. s. Beng.—H. gajam. A thin balsam oil drawn from a great forest tree (N.O. Dipteroxarpaceae) Dipteroxarps turbinis, Gaertn., and from several other species of Dipt., which are among the finest trees of Trans-gangetic India. Trees of this N.O. abound also in the Malay Archipelago, whilst almost unknown in other parts of the world. The celebrated Borneo camphor is the product of one such tree, and the saul-wood of India of another. Much wood-oil is exported from the Burmese provinces, the Malay Peninsula, and Siam. It is much used in the East as a natural varnish and preservative of timber; and in Indian hospitals it is employed as a substitute for copaiva, and as a remedy for leprosy (Hambury & Flückiger, Watt, Econ. Diet. iii. 167 seqg.). The first mention we know of is c. 1759 in Dalrymple's Or. Repertory in a list of Burmese products (i. 109).

WOOLOCK. WOODLOCK. s. [Platts in his Hind. Diet. gives ulâk, ulâk, as Turkish, meaning 'a kind of small boat.' Mr. Grierson (Bihar Peasant Life, 42), among the larger kinds of boats, gives ulâk, "which has a long narrow bow overhanging the water in front." Both he and Mr. Grant (Rural Life in Bengal, 27) give drawings of this boat, and the latter writes: "First we have the bulky ìolak, or baggage-boat of Bengal, sometimes as gigantic as the Pottlee (see PATTELO), and used for much the same purpuses. This last-named vessel is a clinkerbuilt boat—that is having the planks overlapping each other, like those in a London wherry; whereas in the round smooth-sided ìolak and most country boats, they are laid edge to edge, and fastened with iron clamps, having the appearance of being stitched."

[1838.—... 10 Ulocks for Souldiers, etc.—Hodges, Diary. Hak. Soc. i. 76.
1790.—... 20 Hoolocks 6 Oars at 28 Rs. per month."—In Long. 227.
1794.—"Then the Manjoes went after him in a woollock to look after him."—Ibid. 383.
1751.—"The same day will be sold a twenty-our'd Wollloc-built Budgerow..."—India Gazette, April 14.
1799.—"We saw not less than 200 large boats at the different quays, which on an average might be reckoned each at 60 tons burthen, all provided with good roofs, and masted after the country manner. They seemed much better constructed than the unwieldy wullocks of Bengal."—Synes, Apr., 283.
WOON. s. Burn. wun, 'a governor or officer of administration'; literally 'a burden,' hence presumably the 'Bearer of the Burden.' Of this there are various well-known compounds, e.g.: Woon-gyee, i.e. 'Wun-gyi' or Great Minister, a member of the High Council of State or Cabinet, called the Hot-dun (see LOTOO). Woon-donk, i.e. Wundonk, lit. 'the prop of the Wun,' a sort of Adjutant or Minister of an inferior class. We have recently seen a Burmese envoy to the French Government designated as 'M. Woondonk.' Atwen-wun, Minister of the Interior (of the Court) or Household. Myo-wun, Provincial Governor (May- room of Symes). Ye-wun, 'Water-Governor,' formerly Deputy of the Myo-wun of the Pr. of Pegu (May-room of Symes). Akaok-wun, Collector of Customs (Akowoon of Symes).

WOODY-MAJOR, s. The title of a native adjutant in regiments of Indian Irregular Cavalry. Both the rationale of the compound title, and the etymology of wardl, are obscure. Platts gives Hind. warali or wardl, 'uniform of a soldier, badge or dress of office,' as the first part of the compound, with a questionable Skt. etymology, vérula, 'crying, proclaiming, a pungwryg.' But there is also Ar. ward, 'a flight of birds,' and then also 'a troop or squadron,' which is perhaps as probable. [Others, again, as many military titles have come from S. India, connect it with Can. warali, 'news, an order.'] [1781.—'... We made the wurdee wollah acquainted with the circumstance. ...

[1861.—'The senior Ressaldar (native captain) and the Woordie Major (native adjutant) ... reported that the sepoyos were trying to tamper with his men.'—Care-Broca, Panjab and Delhi, i. 120.]

WOOTZ, s. This is an odd name which has attached itself in books to the so-called 'natural steel' of S. India, made especially in Salem, and in some parts of Mysore. It is prepared from small bits of malleable iron (made from magnetic ore) which are packed in crucibles with pieces of a particular wood (Cassia auriculata), and covered with leaves and clay. The word first appears in a paper read before the Royal Society, June 11, 1795, called: "Experiments and observations to investigate the nature of a kind of Steel, manufactured at Bombay, and there called Wootz..." by George Pearson, M.D." This paper is quoted below.

The word has never since been recognised as the name of steel in any language, and it would seem to have originated in some clerical error, or misreading, very possibly for woold, representing the Canarese uكد (pron. wulko) 'steel.' Another suggestion has been made by Dr. Edward Baldwin. He states that wcheda and nicha (Hind. wycha-nicha, in reality for 'high' and 'low') are used in Canarese speaking districts to denote superior and inferior descriptions of an article, and supposes that wootz may have been a misunderstanding of wcheda, 'of superior quality.' The former suggestion seems to us preferable. [The Madras Gloss. gives as local names of steel, Can. ukku, Tel. urku, Tam. and Malav. uruku, and derives wootz from Skt. śčcā, whence comes H. śčcā.]

The article was no doubt the famous 'Indian Steel,' the σιδνμος Ἰνδικὸς καὶ στέλματα of the Periplus, the material of the Indian swords celebrated in many an Arabic poem, the alhinde of old Spanish, the hundwendi of the Persian traders, ondunique of Marco Polo, the iron exported by the Portuguese in the 16th century from Baticula (see BATCUL) in Canara and other parts (see Correa passim). In a letter of the King to the Goa Government in 1501 he animadverts on the great amount of iron and steel permitted to be exported from Chaul, for sale on the African coast and to the Turks in the Red Sea (Archiv. Port. Orient., Fasc. 3, 318).

1795. — "Dr. Scott, of Bombay, in a letter to the President, acquainted him that he had sent over specimens of a substance known by the name of Wootz; which is considered to be a kind of steel, and in high esteem among the Indians."

—Phil. Trans. for 1795, Pt. ii. p. 322.

[1814.—See an account of wootz, in Heyne's Tracts, 352 seqq.]

1814. — "The cakes of steel are called Wootz; they differ materially in quality, according to the nature of the ore, but are generally very good steel, and are sent into Persia and Turkey. ... It may be remarked self-evident that the figure or pattern (of Damascus steel) so long sought after exists in the cakes of Wootz, and only requires to be produced by the action of diluted acids... it is therefore highly probable that the ancient blades (of Da-muscus) were made of this steel."—Wilkinson, Engines of War, pp. 203-206.

1864. — "Damascus was long celebrated for the manufacture of its sword blades, which it has been conjectured were made from the woots of India."—Percy's Metal- lurgy, Iron and Steel, 560.

WRITER. s.

(a). The rank and style of the junior grade of covenanted civil servants of the E.I. Company. Technically it has been obsolete since the abolition of the old grades in 1833. The term no doubt originally described the duty of these young men; they were the clerks of the factories.

(b). A copying clerk in an office, native or European.

WUG. s. We give this Beluchi word for loot on the high authority quoted. [On this Mr. M. L. James writes: "This is not, strictly speaking, a Balochi word, but Sindhi, in the form wug or luq. The Balochi word is bag, but I cannot say for certain whether it is borrowed from Sindhi by Balochi, or vice versâ. The meaning, however, is not loot, but 'a herd of camels.' It is probable that on the occasion referred to the loot consisted of a herd of camels, and this would easily give rise to the idea that the word meant loot. It is one of the commonest forms of plunder in those regions, and I have often heard Balochis, when narrating their raids, describe how they had carried off a 'bag.'"]

1845. — "In one hunt after wug, as the Beloochees call plunder, 200 of that beautiful regiment, the 2nd Europeans, marched incessantly for 15 hours over such ground as I suppose the world cannot match for ravines, except in places where it is impossible to march at all."—Letter of Sir C. Napier, in Life, iii. 208.
The word in this form represents a silver coin formerly current at Goa and several other Eastern ports, in value somewhat less than 1s. 6d. It varied in Portuguese currency from 300 to 360 réis. But in this case as in so many others the term is a corruption applied to a degenerated value. The original is the Arabic ashrafi (see ASHRAFEY) (or sharif, ‘noble’—compare the medieval coin so called), which was applied properly to the gold dinar, but was also in India, and still is occasionally by natives, applied to the gold mohur. Ashrafi for a gold dinar (value in gold about 11s. 6d.) occurs frequently in the ‘1001 Nights,’ as Dozy states, and he gives various other quotations of the word in different forms (pp. 353-354; [Burton, Ar. Nights, x. 160, 376]). Aligrifs, the name of a coin once known in France, is according to Littre also a corruption of ashrafi.

1498. — ‘And (the King of Calicut) said that they should tell the Captain that if he wished to go he must give him 600 xarafins, and that soon, and that this was the custom of that country, and of those who came thither.’ —Rob. of L. de l. 79.

1510. — ‘When a new Sultan succeeds to the throne, one of his lords, who are called Amhirs (Ameer), says to him: ‘Lord, I have been for so long a time your slave, give me Domaces, and I will give you 700,000 or 200,000 teraphins of gold.’” — Forthoua, 10.

In the preceding the word seems to apply to the golden dinar.

1523. — ‘And by certain information of persons who knew the facts... Antonio de Salamanca... agreed with the said King Tunusa (Turun Shâh),... that the said King... should pay to the King Our lord 10,000 xarafins more yearly... in all 25,000 xarafins...’ —Tomba de Ladin, Subsidios, 73. This is the gold mohur.

1540. — ‘This year there was such a famine in Choromandel, that it left nearly the whole land depopulated with the mortality, and people ate their fellow men. Such a thing never was heard of on that Coast, where formerly there was such an abundance of rice, that in the port of Negapatam I have often seen more than 700 sail take cargoes amounting to more than 20,000 quintals (the wage — 25,31)l of rice. This year of famine the Portuguese of the town of St. Thomâ did much good to the people, helping them with quantities of rice and millet, and coco-nuts and sugar (see JAGGERY), which they imported in their vessels from other parts, and sold in retail to the people at far lower prices than they could have got if they wished it; and some rich people caused quantities of rice to be boiled in their houses, and gave it boiled down in the gardens to the people to drink, all for the love of God. This famine lasted a whole year, and it spread to other parts, but was not so bad as in Choromandel. The King of Bishnagar, who was sovereign of that territory, heard of the humanity and beneficence of the Portuguese to the people of the country, and he was greatly pleased thereat, and sent an old (see OLLAH) of thanks to the residents of St. Thomâ. And this same year there was such a scarcity of provisions in the harbours of the Straits, that in Aden a load (perdo) of rice fetched forty xarafins, each worth a cruzado...’ — Corvo, iv. 131-132.

1548. — ‘The chief and most common money (at Goa) is called Pardane (Pardao) Xeraphin. It is of silver, but of small value. c. 1814.—"Sabris now are very different from what they once were. When I was a young man with an officer in the camp of Late Lik Sahib (Lord Lake) the sabris would give an asatra (Ashrafee), when now they think twice before taking out a rupee."—Perpet. Reminiscences of an old Khos- puma's Conversation. Here the gold mohur is meant.

XERCANSOR, n.p. This is a curious example of the manner in which the Portuguese historians represent Mahomedan names. Xercansor does really very fairly represent phonetically the name of Sher Khan Sär, the famous rival and displacer of Humayin, under the title of Sher Shah.

c. 1583.—"But the King of Bengal, seeing himself very powerful in the kingdom of the Patans, seized the king and took his kingdom from him... and made Governor of the kingdom a great lord, a vassal of his, called Cotoxa, and then leaving everything in good order, returned to Bengal. The administrator Cotoxa took the field with a great array, having with him a Pathan Captain called Xercansor, a valiant cavalier, much esteemed by all."—Correa, ii. 719.

The kingdom of the Patans appears to be Behar, where various Afghan chiefs tried to establish themselves after the conquest of Delhi by Baber. It would take more search than it is worth to elucidate the story as told by Correa, but see Elliot, iv. 333.

Cotoxa (Koto sha) appears to be Kuh Khan of the Mahomedan historian there.

Another curious example of Portuguese nomenclature is that given to the first Mahomedan king of Maharea by Barros, Nesperus Inrava (II. vi. 1), by Alboquerque Naqandarza Connor, Pt. 111, ch. 17. This name is rendered by Lassen's powerful lore into Skt. Baberadher, "d. h. Besitzer kräftiger Bestimmungen"—"Possessor of strong recollections."—Ind. Ath. iv. 540, whereas it is simply the Portuguese way of writing Sikandar Shâh! (So Linschoten (Hak. Soc. ii. 153) writes Xativas for Shâh Tavaos.) For other examples, see Codo- vascam, Idalcan.

YABOO. s. Pers. yîbû, which is perhaps a corruption of Ar, yûbah, defined by Johnson as 'a swift and long horse.' A nag such as we call a galloway, a large pony or small hardy horse; the term in India is generally applied to a very useful class of animals brought from Afghanistan.

c. 1590.—"The fifth class (yabû horses) are bred in this country, but fall short in strength and size. Their performances also are mostly bad. They are the offspring of Turki horses with an inferior breed."—Tiin, ed. Blochmann, i. 284.

1744.—"There are in the highland country of KANDAHAR and CABUL, a small kind of horses called Yabous, which are very serviceable."—Hawney, Travels, ii. 367.

[1839.—"A very strong and useful breed of ponies, called Yabuous, is however reared, especially about Baumun. They are used to carry baggage, and can bear a great load, but do not stand a long continuance of hard work so well as mules."—Elphinstone, Cautul, ed. 1842, i. 189.

YAK. s. The Tibetan ox (Bos grunius, L., Psephasus of Gray), belonging to the Bisantine group of Bovine. It is spoken of in Bogle's Journal under the odd name of the "cow-tailed cow," which is a literal sort of translation of the Hind, name chorhri qo, chorhës (see CHOWRY), having been usually called "cow-tails" in the 15th century. [The usual native name for the beast in N. India is surajhë, which comes from Skt. sarabhë, 'pleasing.] The name yak does not appear in Buffon, who calls it the 'Tartarian cow,' nor is it found in the 3rd ed. of Pennant's II. of Quad.

YAK.

culpus (1793), though there is a fair account of the animal as Bos grunniens of Lin. and a poor engraving. Although the word occurs in Della Penna's account of Tibet, written in 1730, as quoted below, its first appearance in print was, as far as we can ascertain, in Turner's Mission to Tibet. It is the Tib. gYak. Jasche's Dict. gnyag. The animal is mentioned twice, though in a confused and inaccurate manner, by Aelian; and somewhat more correctly by Cosmas. Both have got the same fable about it. It is in medieval times described by Rubruck. The domestic yak is in Tibet the ordinary beast of burden, and is much riddled. Its hair is woven into tents, and spun into ropes; its milk a staple of diet, and its dung of fuel. The wild yak is a magnificent animal, standing sometimes 18 hands high, and weighing 1600 to 1800 lbs., and multiplies to an astonishing extent on the high plateaux of Tibet. The use of the tame yak extends from the highlands of Khokand to Kukhpotan or Kwei-hwaching, near the great northern bend of the Yellow River.

e. A.D. 250. — "The Indians (at times) carry as presents to their King tame tigers, trained panthers, four-horned orxes, and cattle of two different races, one kind of great swiftness, and another kind that are terribly wild, that kind of cattle from (the tails of which) they make fly-flaps." — Aelian, de Animalibus, xv. cap. 14.

Again:

"There is in India a grass-eating animal, which is double the size of the horse, and which has a very bushy tail very black in colour. The hairs of the tail are finer than human hair, and the Indian women set great store by its possession. When it perceives that it is on the point of being caught, it hides its tail in some thicket, and thinks that since its tail is not seen, it will not be regarded as of any value, for it knows that the tail is the great object of fancy." — Ibid. xvi. 11.

e. 515. — "This Wild Ox is a great beast of India, and from it is got the thing called Topkat, with which officers in the field adorn their horses and pennons. They tell of this beast that if its tail catches in a tree it will not budger but stands stock-still, being horribly vexed at losing a single hair of its tail; so the natives come and cut his tail off, and then when he has lost it altogether, he makes his escape." — Cosmas Indicopleustes, Bk. xi. Transl. in Cuthbert, &c., p. 113.

[e. 1500. — In a list of things imported from the "northern mountains" into Oudh, we have "tails of the Kthb cow." — Jynv. ed. Jornet, i. 172; and see 260.]

1730. — "Dopo di che per circa 40 giorni di cammino non si trova più abitazioni di case, ma solo alcune tende con quantità di mandrie di lakt, ossiamo bovi pelosi, pecore, cavalli. —-Pre Occorso il Penanul di Bello, Brevi Note del Tibet (published by Klaproth in Journ. As. Soc. 2d. ser.) p. 17.

1784. — "In the opposite side saw several of the black shawled cattle. . . . This very singular and curious animal deserves a particular description. . . . The Yak of Tartary, called Snou Goy in Hindostan. —-Turner's Enquiry (pubd. 1800), 185-6. [Sir H. Yule identifies Snou Goy with Öltürk Göl; but, as will be seen above, the H. name is snagüco.]

In the publication at the latter date appears the excellent plate after Stubbs, called "the Yak of Tartary," still the standard representation of the animal. [Also see Turner's paper (1794) in the As. Journ., London reprint of 1798, iv. 366 seq.]

Though the two following quotations from Abbé Huc do not contain the word yak, they are pictures by that clever artist which we can hardly omit to reproduce:

1851. — "Les bœufs à long poils étaient de véritables curiosités; impossible de figurer la beauté de ces animaux; ils marchaient les jambes courtes et portés péniblement un charme de stalactites, qui leur pendiaient sous le ventre jusqu'au sol. Ces poivres bêtes étaient si informes et tellement recouvertes de glaçons qu'il semblait qu'en les eût mis en cage dans du sucre candi." — Huc et Gabet, Souvenirs d'un Voyage, &c. ii. 201; [E.T. ii. 105].

"Au moment où nous passâmes le monceau Gasson sur la glace, un spectacle assez bizarre s'offrit à nos yeux. Déjà nos avions remarqué de loin . . . des objets informes et noirs rongés en file en travers de ce grand fleuve. Ce fut seulement quand nous fumes tout près, que nous pûmes reconnaître plus de 50 bœufs sauvages incrustés dans la glace. Ils avaient voulut, sans doute, traverser le fleuve à la nage, au moment de la congélation des eaux, et ils s'étaient trouvés pris par les glaçons sans avoir la force de s'en débarrasser et de continuer leur route. Leur belle tête, surmontée de grandes cornes, était encore à découvrir; mais la Reste du corps était pris dans la glace, qui était si transparente qu'on pouvait distinguer facilement la position de ces imprudentes bêtes; on eût dit qu'elles étaient encore à nager. Les aiguës et les corbeaux leur avaient arraché les yeux." — Ibid. ii. 219; [E.T. ii. 119 seq. and for a further account of the animal see ii. 81].
YAM, n. This general name in English of the large edible tuber Dioscorea seems to be a corruption of the name used in the W. Indies at the time of the discovery. [Mr. Platt (9 ser. N. & Q. v. 226 seq.) suggests that the original form was nyam or nymai, in the sense of 'food,' nyami meaning 'to eat' in the Fulah language of Senegale. The cannibal Nyam-Nyama, of whom Miss Kingsley gives an account (Travels in W. Africa, 330 seq.) appear to take their name from the same word.]

1600.—"There are great store of Iniamas growing in Guinea, in great fields."—Par- cheo, ii. 587.

1613.—"... Moreover it produces great abundance of inhamas, or large subterranean tubers, of which there are many kinds, like the canstones of America, and these inhamas boiled or roasted serve in place of bread."—Trovai de Eredia, 19.

1734.—

"In meagre lands
Tis known the Yam will ne'er to bigness swell."

Frazer (Golden Bough, 2nd ed. ii. 14 seq.).]

1843.—"The sultan is a Kaţir called the Sāmari. ... When the time of our departure for China came, the sultan, the Sāmari equipped for us one of the 13 junks which were lying in the port of Calicut."—Ibn Battuta, iv. 894.

1142.—"I saw a man with his body naked like the rest of the Hindus. The sovereign of this city (Calicut) bears the title of Sāmari. When he dies it is his sister's son who succeeds him."—Abhurrazzāk, in Indua in the XVIIth. Cent. 17.

1570.—Now I will speak of the King here in Calicut. because he is the most important King of all those before mentioned, and is called Samory, which in the Pagan language means God on earth."—Faria e Sousa, 134. The traveller confounds the word with tamburin, which does mean 'Lord.' [Forbes (see below) makes the same mistake.]

1516.—"This city of Calicut is very large. ... This King became greater and more powerful than all the others: he took the name of Zomodri, which is a point of honour above all other Kings."—Burton, 103.

1552.—"Samorao." See under CELEC-

BES.

1553.—"The most powerful Prince of this Malebar was the King of Calicut, who for excellence was called Camarij, which among them is as among us the title Emperor."—Barros, i. iv. 7.

1564.—Speaking of the Moluccas, "Cam-arao, which in their language means Admiral."—Castanheda, Bk. vi. ch. 95.

1566.—"I wrote him a letter to tell him ... that, please God, in a short time the imperial fleet would come from Egypt to the Sāmari, and deliver the country from the hands of the insidels."—Sidr. Alvi, p. 88. [Vambery, who in his translation betrays a remarkable ignorance of Indian geography, speaks p. 24 of "Samiri, the ruler of Calcutta, by which he means Calicut."]

1563.—And when the King of Calicut (who has for title Samorim or Emperor) besieged Cochin. ... —Caviei, t. 585.

1572.—"Sentado o Gama junto ao rico leito
Os seus mais inquietados, prompto em vista Estava o Samor no trono, e gayto Da gente, nunca dantes delle vista."—

Camões, vii. 59.

By Burton:

"When near that splendid couch took place the guest and others further off, prompt glance and keen the Samorim cast on folk whose garb and gest were like to nothing he had ever seen."
1616.—Under this year there is a note of a Letter from Undercoocon-Cheete to the Great Samorin or K. of Calicut to K. James, — Scissbury, i. 462.

1673.—"Indeed it is pleasantly situated under trees, and it is the Holy See of their Zamerhin or Pope."—Fryer, 52.

1781.—"Their (the Christians') hereditary privileges were respected by the Zamorin himself."—Gibbon, ch. xlvii.

1785.—A letter of Tippoo's applies the term to a tribe or class, speaking of '2000 Samories'; who are these?—Select Letters, 271.

1787.—"The Zamorin is the only ancient sovereign in the South of India."—T. Monro, in Life, i. 59.

1810.—"On our way we saw one of the Zamorim's houses, but he was absent at a more favoured residence of Panulay."—Maria Graham, 110.

[1814.—"The King of Calicut was, in the Malabar language, called Samory, or Zamorine, that is to say, God on the earth."—Fors, d. 1st, 2nd ed. i. 293. See quotation above from Varthema.]

"... nor did the conqueror (Hyder Ali) take any notice of the Zamorire's complaints and supplications. The unfortunate prince, after fasting three days, and finding all remonstrances vain, set fire to his palace, and was burned, with some of his women and their brains."—Ibid, iv. 207-8; [2nd ed. ii. 477]. This was a case of Traga.

[1800.—"The Zamorin of Calicut who succeeded to the gaddi (Guddy) three months ago, has died."—Pioneer Mail, April 13.

Zanzibar, n.p. This name was originally general, and applied widely to the East African coast, at least south of the River Jub, and as far as the Arab traffic extended. But it was also specifically applied to the island on which the Sultan of Zanzibar now lives (and to which we now generally restrict the name); and this was the case at least since the 16th century, as we see from the Poteiro. The Pers. Zangibar, 'Region of the Blacks,' was known to the ancients in the form Zingia (Ptolemy, i. 17, 3; iv. 7, 11) and Zigium. The Arab softening of the " made the name into Zangibar, and this the Portuguese made into Zanzibar.

c. 515—"And those who navigate the Indian Sea are aware that Zanginum, as it is called, lies beyond the country where the incense grows, which is called Barbary."—Cosmas, in Culv., cxxxiv.

c. 940.—"The land of the Zanj begins at the channel issuing from the Upper Nile" (by this the Jubh seems meant) "and extends to the country of Sofala and of the Wawakwak."—Mayd., Prat. d'Or, iii. 7.

c. 1190.—Alexander having eaten what was pretended to be the head of a black captive says:

"... I have never eaten better food than this!
Since a man of Zang is in eating so heart-attracting,
To eat any other roast meat to me is not agreeable!"

1298.—"Zangibar is a great and noble Island, with a compass of some 2000 miles. The people... are all black, and go stark naked, with only a little covering for decency. Their hair is as black as pepper, and so frizzily that even with water you can scarcely straighten it," &c., &c.—Marco Polo, ii. 215. Marco Polo regards the coast of Zanzibar as belonging to a great island like Madagascar.

1410.—"Kalikut is a very safe haven...where one finds in abundance the precious objects brought from maritime countries, especially from Habshah (see HUBSHEE, ABYSSINIA). Zirbad, and Zanzibar."—Aburnazali, in Not. et Ext., xiv. 436.

1498.—"And when the morning came, we found we had arrived at a very great island called Jamgieber, peopled with many Moors, and standing good ten leagues from the coast."—Redeiro, 105.

1516.—"Between this island of San Lorenzo (i.e. Madagascar) and the continent, not very far from it are three islands, which are called one Manifa, another Zanzibar, and the other Penda; these are inhabited by Moors; they are very fertile islands."—Barbos, 14.

1553.—"And from the streams of this river Quilliance towards the west, as far as the Cape of Currents, up to which the Moors of that coast do navigate, all that region, and that still further west towards the Cape of Good Hope (as we call it), the Arabians and Persians of those parts call Zanguebar, and the inhabitants they call Zanguy."—Barros, 1. viii. 4.

A few pages later we have "Isles of Pemba, Zanzibar, Menfya, Comoro," showing apparently that a difference had grown up, at least among the Portuguese, distinguishing Zanguebar, the continental region from Zanzibar the island.

c. 1586.
"And with my power did march to Zanzibar
The western (sir) part of Afric, where I view'd
The Ethiopian Sea, rivers, and lakes. . . ."

-Morl'so's Travels, the Great, 2d. part. i. 3.

1592.—"From hence we went for the Isle of Zanzibar on the coast of Melinde, where at we stayed and wintered until the beginning of February following."—Henry May, in Hist. iv. 53.
ZEBU. s. This whimsical name, applied in zoological books, English as well as French, to the humped domestic ox (or Brahminy bull) of India, was taken by Buffon from the exhibitors of such a beast at a French fair, who perhaps invented the word, but who told him the beast had been brought from Africa, where it was called by that name. We have been able to discover no justification for this in African dialects, though our friend Mr. R. Cust has kindly made search, and sought information from other philologists on our account. Zebu passes, however, with most people as an Indian word; thus Webster's Dictionary, says "Zebu, the native Indian name." The only word at all like it that we can discover is zobo (q.v.) or zobo, applied in the semi-Tibetan regions of the Himalaya to a useful hybrid, called in Ladak by the slightly modified form dzo-mo. In Jäschke's Tibetan Dict. we find "Zébo ... I. hump of a camel, zebu, etc." This is curious, but, we should think, only one of those coincidences which we have had so often to notice.

Isidore Geoffroy de St. Hilaire, in his work Acclimatation et Domestication des Animaux Utiles, considers the ox and the zebu to be two distinct species. Both are figured on the Assyrian monuments, and both on those of ancient Egypt. The humped ox also exists in Southern Persia, as Marco Polo mentions. Still, the great naturalist to whose work we have referred is hardly justified in the statement quoted below, that the "zebu" is common to "almost the whole of Asia" with a great part of Africa. [Mr. Blanford writes: "The origin of Bos indicus (sometimes called zebu by European naturalists) is unknown, but it was in all probability tropical or sub-tropical, and was regarded by Blyth as probably African. No ancestral form has been discovered among Indian fossil bovines, which ... comprise species allied to the gaur and buffalo" (Mammalia, 453 seq.).]

c. 1772.—"We have seen this small humped ox alive. ... It was shown at the fair in Paris in 1752 (sic, but a transcript from the French edition of 1837 gives 1772) under the name of Zebu; which we have adopted to describe the animal by, for it is a particular breed of the ox, and not a species of the buffalo."—Buffon's Nat. Hist., E.T. 1857, viii. 19, 20; see also p. 33.

1851.—"Nous savons donc positivement qu'à une époque où l'homme était encore couvert de fœtus, l'orient, déjà civilisé, possédait déjà le boeuf et le Zebu; et par conséquent c'est de l'orient que ces animaux sont sortis, pour devenir, l'un (le boeuf) cosmopolite, l'autre commun à presque toute l'Asie et à une grande partie de l'Afrique."—Geoffroy St. Hilaire (work above referred to, 4th ed. 1861).

[1850.—"I have seen a herd of Zebras (so) or Indian humped cattle, but cannot say where they are kept."—In 9 ser. N. & Q. i. 165.]

ZEDOARY, and ZERUMBET. ss. These are two aromatic roots, once famous in pharmacy and often coupled together. The former is often mentioned in medieval literature. The name is Arabic jadīrīr, the latter Pars. zarambādī. There seems some doubt about the scientific discrimination of the two. Moodeen Sheriff says that Zedoary (Curcuma zedoaria) is sold in most bazaars under the name of *wīd- hadīlī, whilst jadīrīr, or zadīrīr, is the Indian name of roots of varieties of non-poisonous aconites. There has been considerable confusion in the nomenclature of these drugs [see Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 655, 670]. Dr. Royle, in his most interesting discourse on the Antiquity of Hindo Medicine (p. 77), transcribes the following prescription of the physician Acitus, in which the name of Zedoary first occurs, along with many other Indian drugs:

c. a.D. 540.—"Zadori (i.e. zedoarium), galangae, ligustici, seselis, cardamomi, piperis longi, piperis alii. cinnamomi, zingiberis, semenis Smyrni, carophylli, phylli, stachyos, myrobalani. plu. costi, scorodi, staphi vel入选phiti, rhei barkarii, poisoniae; aliis etiam arbris nucis visum et pallium semen, itemque saxfragum ac camas ad- dunt: ex his singulis stateres duos con- mixeaceo. ..."

c. 1500.—"Canell et setewale of price."—R. of the Bow.

1516.—"In the Kingdom of Calicut there grow much pepper, and very much good ginger of the country, cardamoms, myrobalans of all kinds, bamboo canes, zerumba, zedoary, wild cinnamon."—Bor- best, 154. 1563.—"... da zedoria, faz capitulo Arvicae e de Zerumbet: e isto que chama- mamos zedoria, chama Arvicae gudder, e o outro nome não lhe sei, porque o não ha senão nas terras confins a China e este gudder e uma medinha de muito prezo, e não achada senão nas mãos dos que os Genios chamam jeges, ou outros a quem os Mouros chamam calandares."—Garcia, f. 216-V217.

ZEMINDAR. s. Pers. zamindar, 'landholder.' One holding land on which he pays revenue to the Government direct, and not to any intermediate superior. In Bengal proper the zemindars hold generally considerable tracts, on a permanent settlement of the amount to be paid to Government. In the N.W. Provinces there are often a great many zemindars in a village, holding by a common settlement, periodically renewable. In the N.W. Provinces the rustic pronunciation of the word zamindar is hardly distinguishable from the ordinary Anglo-Indian pronunciation of jamidār (see JEMADAR), and the form given to zamindar in early English records shows that this pronunciation prevailed in Bengal more than two centuries ago.

1863.—"We lay at Bagatethera, a very pleasant and delightful Country, &c. Gemidar invited us ashore, and showed us Store of Deer, Peacocks, &c., but it was not our good fortune to get any of them."—Hodge, Diary, April 11; [Hak. Soc. i. 77, also i. 89.]

1866.—"He has ordered down 300 horse under the conduct of three Jemidars."—In ditto, II. iv.

1867.—"Having tried all means with the Jemidar of the Country adjacent to us to let us have the town of De Calcutta at the usual Hire or Rent, rather than fail, having promised him ¾ Part more than the Place at present brings him in, and all to no Purpose, he making frivolous and idle Objections, that he will not let us have any Part of the Country in the Right Honourable Company's name, but that we might have it to our use in any of the Native Names; the Reason he gives for it is, that the Place will be wholly lost to him—that we are a Powerful People—and that he cannot be possessed of his Country again when he sees Occasion—whereas he can take it from any of the Natives that rent any Part of his Country at his Pleasure.

* * * * * * *

October 31st, 1698. "The Prince having given us the three towns adjacent to our Settlement, viz. De Calcuta, Chutanutte, and Gobinpore, or more properly may be said the Jemidarsip of the said towns, paying the said Rent to the King as the Jemidars have successively done, and at the same time ordering the Jemidar of the said towns to make over their Right and Title to the English upon their paying to the Jemidars One thousand Rupees for the same, it was agreed that the Money should be paid, being the best Money that ever was spent for so great a Privilege; but the Jemidars making a great Noise, being unwilling to part with their Country ... and finding them to continue in their averseness, notwithstanding the Prince had an officer upon them to bring them to a Compliance, it is agreed that 1,500 Rupees be paid them, provided they will relinquish their title to the said towns, and give it under their Hands in Writing, that they have made over the same to the Right Honourable Company."—Ex. of Comms. at Chuttanutte, the 28th December (Printed for Parliament in 1788).

In the preceding extracts the De prefixed to Calcutta is Pers. d.h. 'village,' or 'township,' a common term in the language of Indian Revenue administration. An Explanation of Terms furnished by W. Hastings to the Fort William Council in 1759 thus explains the word:

"Deh—the ancient limits of any village or parish. Thus, 'Deh Calcuta' means only that part which was originally inhabited."—(In Long, p. 176.)

1851.—"The Zemindars of Lower Bengal, the landed proprietors established by Lord Cornwallis, have the worst reputation as landlords, and appear to have frequently deserved it."—Macaulay, Village Communities, 152.

ZENANA. s. Pers. zand, from zan, 'woman'; the apartments of a house in which the women of the family are secluded. This Mahomedan custom has been largely adopted by the Hindus of Bengal and the Mahrattas. Zanana is also used for the women of the family themselves. The growth of the admirable Zenana Missions has of late years made this word more familiar in England. But we have heard of more than one instance in which the objects of this Christian enterprise have been taken to be an amiable aboriginal tribe—"the Zenana.

[1760.—"I am informed the Dutch chief at Bimlipatam has... embarked his jeminora on board a sloop bound to Chinsurah..."—In Long, 296.]

1761.—"... I asked him where the Nabob was. Who replied, he was asleep in his Zanana."—Col. Good, in Van Sittert, i. 111.

1750.—"It was an object with the Omrabs or great Lords of the Court, to hold captive in their Zenanahs, even hundreds of females."—Hodge, Travels, 22.

1782.—"Notice is hereby given that one Zora, consumah, to Hadjee Mustapha of Mooreshabad these 13 years, has absconded, after stealing... He has also carried away with him two Women, heretofore of Sujah Dowlah's Zenana; purchased by Hadjee Mustapha when last at Lucknow, one for 300 and the other for 1200 Rupees."—India Gazette, March 9.

ZEND, ZENDAVESTA. s. Zend is the name which has been commonly applied, for more than a hundred years to that dialect of the ancient Iranian (or Persian) language in which the Avesta or Sacred Books of Zoroastrianism or the old Persian religion are written. The application of the name in this way was quite erroneous, as the word Zend when used alone in the Parsee books indicates a 'commentary or explanation,' and is in fact applied only to some Pahlavi translation, commentary, or gloss. If the name Zend were now to be used as the designation of any language it would more justly apply to the Pahlavi itself. At the same time Haug thinks it probable that the term Zand was originally applied to a commentary written in the same language as the Avesta itself, for in the Pahlavi translations of the Yasna, a part of the Avesta, where the scriptures are mentioned, Avesta and Zend are coupled together, as of equal authority, which could hardly have been the case if by Zend the translator meant his own work. No name for the language of the ancient scriptures has been found in the Parthian books; and Avesta itself has been adopted by scholars in speaking of the language. The fragments of these scriptures are written in two dialects of the Eastern Iranian, one, the more ancient, in which the Gathas or hymns are written; and a later one which was for many centuries the spoken and written language of Bactria.

The word Zend, in Hang's view, may be referred to the root zan, 'to know'; Skt. jāt, Gr. γνω, Lat. gnō (as in agnosco, cognosco), so that its meaning is 'knowledge.' Prof. J. Oppert, on the other hand, identifies it with old Pers. zadna, 'prayer.'

Zendavesta is the name which has been by Europeans popularly applied to the books just spoken of as the Avesta. The term is undoubtedly an inversion, as, according to Hang, the Pahlavi books always style them Avesta va Zand ('Avesta and Zend') i.e. the Law with its traditional and authoritative explanation. Abastā, in the sense of law, occurs in the funeral inscription of Darius at Behistūn; and this seems now the most generally accepted origin of the term in its application to the Parsi sacred books. (This is not, however, the explanation given by Hang.) Thus, 'Avesta and Zend' signify together 'The Law and the Commentary.'

The Avesta was originally much more extensive than the texts which now exist, which are only fragments. The Parthian tradition is that there were twenty-one books called Naske, the greater part of which were burnt by Alexander in his conquest of Persia; possibly true, as we know that Alexander did burn the palace at Persepolis. The collection of fragments which remains, and is known as the Zend-avesta, is divided, in its usual form, into two parts. I. The Avesta properly so called, containing (a) the Vendīdād, a compilation of religious laws and of mythical tales; (b) the Vispārda, a collection of litanies for the sacrifice; and (c) the Yasna, composed of similar litanies and of 5 hymns or Gathas in an old dialect. II. The Khorda, or small, Avesta, composed of short prayers for recitation by the faithful at certain moments of the day, month, or year; and in presence of the different elements, with which certain other hymns and fragments are usually included.

The term Zendavesta, though used, as we see below, by Lord in 1630, first became familiar in Europe through the labours of Anquetil du Perron, and his publication of 1771. [The Zend-Avesta has now been translated in Sacred Books of the East, by J. Darmesteter, L. H. Mills; Pahlavi Texts, by E. W. West.]

e. 930.—"Zarāda-ht, the son of Asa[mān, ... had brought to the Persians the book al-Bastāh in the old Farsi tongue. He gave a commentary on this, which is the Zend, and to this commentary yet another explanation which was called Bazand.... —"Maqālāt, ii. 107. [See Hang, Essays, p. 11.]

e. 1050.—"The chronology of this same past, but in a different shape, I have also found in the book of Hamza ben Airusian Alishahani, which he calls 'Chronology of great nations of the past and present.' He says that he has endeavoured to correct his account by means of the Abastā, which is the religious code (of the Zoroastrians). Therefore I have transferred it into this place of my book."—Al-Birūnī, Chronology of Ancient Nations, by Suchau, p. 112.

1854. — "The supposition that some of the books were destroyed by Alexander the Great is contained in the introductory chapter of the Pehlevi Viraj-Nama, a book written in the Sassanian times, about the 6th or 7th century, and in which the event is thus chronicled:—"The wicked, accused Guna Mino (the evil spirit), in order to make the people sceptical about their religion, proclaimed the accursed Alexidar (Alexander) the Ruman, the inhabitant of Egypt, to carry war and hardships to the country of Iran (Persia). He killed the monarch of Iran, and destroyed and made desolate the royal court. And this religion, that is, all the books of Avesta and Zend, written with gold ink upon prepared cow-skins, was deposited in the archives of Stakhar (Isfahân or Persepolis) of Papak. The accursed, wretched, wicked Ashmog (destroyer of the pious), Alexidar the evil-doer, took them (the books) out and burnt them." —Doschka Fanzhi, II. of the zar, 'gold,' off, 'woven.'

[1900. — "Kamkwabs, or kimkhaws (Kin-cob), are also known as zar-baft (gold-

ZILLAH, s. This word is properly Ar. (in Indian pron.) zilda, 'a rib,' therefore 'a side,' a district. It is the technical name for the administrative districts into which British India is divided, each of which has in the older provinces a Collector, or Collector and Magistrate combined, a Sessions Judge, and in the newer provinces, such as the Punjab and B. Burma, a Deputy Commissioner.

ZINGARI, n.p. This is of course not Anglo-Indian, but the name applied in various countries of Europe, and in various modifications, zinari, zingari, zinelli, chingari, ziganer, &c., to the gypsies.

Various suggestions as to its derivation have been made on the supposition that it is of Indian origin. Borrow has explained the word as 'a person of mixt blood,' deriving it from the Skt. sankara, 'made up.' It is true that varia sankara is used for an admixure of castes and races (e.g., in Bhangoo Gita. i. 41, &c.), but it is not the name of any caste, nor would people to whom such an opprobrious epithet had been applied be likely to carry it with them to distant lands.
A writer in the Saturday Review once suggested the Pers. zinger, 'a saddler.'
Not at all probable. — In Sleeman's Ramasseana or Vocabulary of the peculiar Language used by the Thugs (Calcutta, 1836), p. 85, we find:

"Chingaree, a class of Multani Thugs, sometimes called Naiks, of the Mussulman faith. They proceed on their expeditions in the character of Brinjars, with cows and bullocks laden with merchandize, which they expose for sale at their encampments, and thereby attract their victims. They use the rope of their bullocks instead of the rosomal in strangling. They are an ancient tribe of Thugs, and take their wives and children on their expeditions."

[These are the Chângars of whom Mr. Ibbetson (Panjab Ethnog, 308) gives an account. A full description of them has been given by Dr. G. W. Leitner (A Sketch of the Chângars and of their Dialect, Lahore, 1850), in which he shows reason to doubt any connection, between them and the Zingari.] De Goeje (Contributions to the Hist. of the Gypsys) regards that people as the Indian Zott (i.e. Jatt of Sind). He suggests as possible origins of the name first Shikari (see SHIKAREE), and then Pers. chang, 'harper,' from which a plural changin actually occurs in Lane's Arabian Nights, iii. 730, note 22. [These are the Al-Jink, male dancers (see Burton, Ar. Nights, viii. 18.)]

If the name is to be derived from India, the term in Sleeman's Vocabulary seems a more probable origin than the others mentioned here. But is it not more likely that zingari, like Gipsy and Bohemian, would be a name given ab extra on their appearing in the West, and not carried with them from Asia?

ZIRBAD, n.p. Pers. zir-bad, 'below the wind,' i.e. leeward. This is a phrase derived from nautical use, and applied to the countries eastward of India. It appears to be adopted with reference to the S.W. Monsoon. Thus by the extracts from the Mohit or 'Ocean' of Sidi 'Ali Kapudan (1554), translated by Joseph V. Hammer in the Journ. As. Soc. Bengal, we find that one chapter (unfortunately not given) treats "Of the Indian Islands above and below the wind." The islands "above the wind" were probably Ceylon, the Maldives, Socotra, &c., but we find no extract with precise indication of them. We find however indicated as the "tracts situated below the wind" Malacca, Sumatra, Tenasserim, Bengal, Martaban, Pegu. The phrase is one which naturally acquires a specific meaning among sea-faring folk, of which we have an instance in the Windward and Leeward Islands of the W. Indies. But probably it was adopted from the Malays, who make use of the same nomenclature, as the quotations show.

1142.—"The inhabitants of the sea coasts arrive here (at Ormuz) from the countries of Tchin, Java, Bengal, the cities of Zirbad."—Abdurezzâk, in India in the XVth Cent. 6.

1555.—". . . Before the foundation of Malnea, in this Cingapura . . . met all the navigators of the seas to the West of India and of those to the East of it, which last embrace the regions of Siam, China, Che-ans, Malaya, and the many thousand islands that lie in that Orient. And these two quarters the natives of the land distinguish as Dyblangium (di-baivah-angin) and Atas Angium (di-atas-angin) which are as much as to say 'below the winds' and 'above the winds,' below being West and above East."—Barros, Dec. ii. Liv. vi. cap. i. In this passage De Barros goes unusually astray, for the use of the Malay expressions which he quotes, baro-angin (or di-baivah) 'below the wind,' and atas (or di-atas) angin, 'above the wind,' is just the reverse of his explanation, the former meaning the east, and the latter the west (see below).

1560.—"Kulobala (see CALAMEAK) is the wood of a tree brought from Zirbad (♀)"—Ivo, p. 81. A mistaken explanation is given in the foot-note from a native authority, but this is corrected by Prof. Blochmann at p. 616.

1726.—"The Malays are also commonly called Orang di Barah Angin, or 'people beneath the wind,' otherwise Easterlings, as those of the West, and particularly the Arabs, are called Orang Atas Angin, or 'people above the wind,' and known as Westerlings."—Valentijina, v. 310.

"The land of the Peninsula, &c., was called by the geographers Zirbaad, meaning in Persian 'beneath the wind.'"—Ibid. 317.

1856.—"There is a peculiar idiom of the Malay language, connected with the monsoons. . . . The Malays call all countries west of their own 'countries above the wind,' and their own and all countries east of it 'countries below the wind.' . . . The origin of the phrase admits of no explanation, unless it have reference to the most important of the two monsoons, the western, that which brought to the Malayans the countries the traders of India."—Crawford's Desc. Dict. 288.

ZOBO, ZHOBO, DSOMO, &c., s. Names used in the semi-Tibetan tracts of the Himalaya for hybrids between the yak bull and the ordinary hill cow, much used in transport and agriculture. See quotation under ZEBU.

The following are the connected Tibetan terms, according to Jaeschke's Diet. (p. 463): "mdzo, a mongrel bred of Yak bull and common cow; bri-mdzo, a mongrel bred of common bull and yak cow; mdzo-po, a male; ndzo-mo, a female animal of the kind, both valued as domestic cattle." [Writing of the Lower Himalaya, Mr. Atkinson, says: "When the sire is a yak and the dam a hill cow, the hybrid is called jubu; when the parentage is reversed, the produce is called garjo. The jubu is found more valuable than the other hybrid or than either of the pure stocks." Himalayan Gazetteer, ii. 35. Also see Ain, ed. Jarrett, ii. 350.]

1258. — "There are wild cattle in that country almost as big as elephants, splendid creatures, covered everywhere but in the back with shaggy hair a good four palms long. They are partly black, partly white, and really wonderfully fine creatures, and the hair or wool is extremely fine and white, finer and whiter than silk. Messer Marco brought some to Venice as a great curiosity, and so it was reckoned by those who saw it. There are also plenty of the same name, which have been caught young. They also cross these with the common cow, and the cattle from this cross are wonderful beasts, and better for work than other animals. These the people use commonly for burden and general work, and in the plough as well: and at the latter they will do twice as much work as any other cattle, being such very strong beasts." Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 37.

1564. — "The Zobo, or cross between the yak and the hill-cow (much resembling the English cow) is but rarely seen in these mountains (Sikim), though common in the N.W. Himalaya." — Hooker's Harm. Journals, 20 ed. i. 208.

1571. — "The plough in Lahoul ... is worked by a pair of "dzo, hybrids between the cow and yak." — Sacred, Hist. Diet. of Kocher, Lahoul, and Spiti, 180.

1575. — "Ploughing is done chiefly with the hybrid of the yak bull and the common cow: this they call zo if male and zomo if female." — Harv. Jemawa and Konkhor, 239.

JURGA which furnished the first soldiers so called.

[ZUBT, ZUBTEE, adj. and s. of which the corrupted forms are JUBTEE, JUPTEE. Ar. zab, lit. 'keeping, guarding;' but more generally in India, in the sense of 'seizure, confiscation.' In the Ain it is used in the sense which is still in use in the N.W.P., 'cash rents on the more valuable crops, such as sugar-cane, tobacco, etc., in those districts where rents in kind are generally paid.'

[c. 1500. — "Of these Parganaahs, 138 pay revenue in cash from crops charged at special rates (in orig. zapt)." — Ain, ed. Jarrett, ii. 163.

1513. — "Zebt ... restraint, confiscation, sequestration. Zebty. Relating to restraint or confiscation; what has been confiscated. — Lands resumed by Jaffer Khan which had been appropriated by some other (see JAGHEER)." — Glossary to Fifth Report.

1551. — "You put down one hundred rupees. If the water of your land does not come ... then my money shall be confiscated to the Subh. If it does then your money shall be zapt (confiscated)." — Edreiade, A Tour on the Punjub Frontier, i. 275.]

ZUMBOORUCK, s. Ar. Turk. Pers. zamburen (spelt zamburen), a small gun or swivel usually carried on a camel, and mounted on a saddle; a falconet. [See a drawing in R. Kipling's Beast and Man in India, 255.] It was, however, before the use of gunpowder came in, the name applied sometimes to a cross-bow, and sometimes to the quarrel or bolt shot from such a weapon. The word is in form a Turkish diminutive from Ar. zambar, "a hornet;" much as 'musket' comes from mosquetter. Quatremère thinks the name was given from the twang of the cross-bow at the moment of discharge, see H. des Mongols, 285-6; see also Itech, Suppt. s.v.). This older meaning is the subject of our first quotation:

1348. — "Les écrivains arabes qui ont traité des guerres des croisades, donnent à l'arbalette, telle que l'employaient les chrétiens, le nom de zenbourek. La première fois qu'ils en font mention, c'est en parlant du siège de Tyr par Saladin en 1187. ... Suivant l'histoire des patriarches d'Alexandrie, le zenbourek était une flèche de l'épaulier du ponce, de la longueur d'une coude, qui avait quatre faces ... il traversait quelque fois au même coup deux hommes placés l'un derrière l'autre. . . . Les musulmans paraissent n'avoir fait usage qu'assez tard du zenbourek. Djénaal - Eddin est, à ma connaissance, le premier écrivain arabe qui, sous la date 614 (1215 de J.C.), cite cette arme comme servant aux guerriers de l'islamisme; c'est à propos du siège d'Ascalon par le sultan d'Egypte. . . . Mais bientôt l'usage du zenbourek devint commun en Orient, et dans la suite des Turcs ottomans entretinrent dans leurs armées un corps de soldats appelés zenbourekdjis. Maintenant . . . ce mot a tout à fait changé d'acception, et l'on donne en Perse le nom de zenbourek à une petite pièce d'artillerie légère,[[1829. — "He had no cannon; but was furnished with a description of ordnance, or swivels, called zumbooruk, which were mounted on camels; and which, though useful in action, could make no impression on the slightest walls. . . ."—Malcolm, II. of Persia, i. 419.]]

1707.—"Prince Bedár Bakht . . . was killed by a cannon-ball, and many of his followers also fell. . . . His younger brother Wálídžáh was killed by a ball from a zumbūrak."—Khâñ Kâhán, in Elliot, vii. 398.

c. 1764.—"Mirza Nedjef Qhan, who was preceded by some Zemberecs, ordered that kind of artillery to stand in the middle of the water and to fire on the eminence."—Sir Maturaer, iii. 250.

1825.—"The reign of Futeh Allee Shah has been far from remarkable for its military splendour. . . . He has rarely been exposed to danger in action, but, early in his reign . . . he appeared in the field, . . . till at last one or two shots from zumboorucks dropping among them, he fell from his horse in a swoon of terror. . . ."—J. B. Fraser, Journey into Khorasan in 1821-22, pp. 197-8.

1846.—"So hot was the fire of cannon, musquetry, and zumbooraks, kept up by the Khalsa troops, that it seemed for some moments impossible that the entrenchments could be won under it."—Sir Hugh Gough's desp. on the Battle of Sobraon, dd. Feb 13.

"The flank in question (at Sobraon) was mainly guarded by a line of two hundred 'zumboorucks,' or falconets; but it derived some support from a salient battery, and from the heavy guns retained on the opposite bank of the river."—Cunningham's H. of the Sikhs, 322.
